

UNITY

VOLUMES XIX, XX

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION

CHICAGO

CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY

175 Dearborn Street

1888

CONTENTS OF VOLUME XIX.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

About Cathedrals, 351; Amateur Competition, 131; Amenities of Spring, 119; Appeal for the Conference, Mr. Herford's, 103; Appeal to Young Grandmothers, An, 91; Appointment of Rev. T. L. Elliot as Western Agent of the A. U. A., The, 288; Arbor Days, 81; Argument for Immortality, The, 76; Available Temperance Tract, An, 131; Bartol's Anniversary, 3; Beecher, Henry Ward, 19; Beecher's Stand for Unpopular Causes, 63; Beecher, A Story of, 63; "Bible Class" as a Factor of Church Work, The, 219; Blessedness of Breathing, The, 63; "Blessed be Drudgery," 339; Boy Who Was Stronger than His Elders, A, 248; Call from Charles G. Ames of Philadelphia, A, 248; Call for Help from Hungary, A, 220; Cassell and Company's Cheap Edition of the Classics, 247; Casting Pearls Before Swine, 299; Channing's Sayings on Man, 147; Channing Unitarians, 35; Chicago Election, The, 75; Chicago Lectures, Mr. Mead's, 103; Church Furnishing, 4; Combined Mission to Japan, A, 219; Come to the Conference, 147; Conference, The Illinois, 235; Conference Notes, 175; Conference in Progress,

The, 163; Congregationalists on City Evangelization, 235; Connor on "Possibilities," 19; Consciousness of Deathlessness, 299; Criticism, A Searching, 176; Dangers of the "Ethical" Fellowship, 92; Dare to Fail, 271; Death of Jesse Fell, The, 3; Death of Hannah E. Stevenson, The, 235; Doctor Bernhard Stade's "History of Israel," 299; Doctor Everett on Revivals, 327; Doctor McGlynn and the Pope, 271; Doctor Thomas on Words vs. Deeds, 351; Dress and Vice, 147; Duty of Parents, The, 36; Early Churchmen in the Scriptural "Firmament," The, 299; Easter Thoughts, 76; Effect of the Declaration concerning Fellowship and Faith, 185; Elliot, Mr., Not to Accept, 327; Enemies of Song Birds, The, 92; Equality in Sublimity, 147; Essentials in Unitarianism, 47; Ethics of the Andover Case, 271; Ethics of Gambling, The, 147; Every-Day Religion, 339; Fear of Death, The, 259; Federal Aid to Education, 315; Fellowship and Belief, 47; Forestry, 92; For Mayor, John A. Roche, 47; Fraternal Word, A, 120; "Fresh Air Fund" in Chicago, The, 316; Friendly Negative, A, 76; Gannett's, Mr., Engagement at Hinsdale, 315; Georgia Law Against Education, The, 339; Glorious

Vantage Ground, A, 35; Glorious Company, The, 19; Good Womanliness, 3; "Gospel Hymn" Melodies, 119; Great Novels, The Pall Mall Gazette's, 147; Groping toward Safety, 19; Hamilton Vocation, The, 68; Helpful Books, 327; Hero Worship in American Churches, 76; How the Churches Used to Solicit Contributions, 299; How to Ride Down Hill, 19; How to Study the Bible, 351; Howells and Tolstoi, 351; Historical Study in Boston, 104; Human Helpfulness, 131; Idealism, 288; Important Demonstration, An, 85; "Indian Right Association's" Book, The, 220; Injustice of Our Laws, The, 299; Insidious Disease, An, 120; "Judaism, or Something Better," 163; Judging by Excerpts, 91; Kansas Post Office Mission Report, The, 91; King's Chapel Anniversary, 149; Kingship of To-Day, The, 120; Kinship of Transcendentalism and Science, 119; Knowledge and Wisdom, 131; Lakeside School of New Theology, The, 351; Lay Sermons, 119; Letter of Fellowship, A, 176; Letter from Nova Scotia, A, 9; Lesser Evil, The, 259; Links with the Past, 253; Living a Life Over, 76; London Unitarian Anniversaries, The, 235; Louisville Woman's Congress, The, 91; Love Offering, A, 91; Lowell's Visit, 4; Making the Good Contagious, 163; Manly Attitude, The, 47; Mann, Rev. N. M., on the Folly of Preaching, 91; "Mehr Licht," 35; Methodist Hymnal, The, 164; Miss Peabody's Mission to the Plute Indians, 76; More About the Rebel Flags, 288; Mrs. Van Cott's Converts, 119; Narrow Escape, A, 271; National Educational Association, The, 271; New English Martyrs, 19; New Gospel Hymns in the Nursery, The, 19; New Short Tract, The, 176; New Theology Lakeside School, The, 235; New Theology Herald on Iconoclasm, The, 287; Ninety Western Unitarian Ministers, 219; Noble Dedication, A, 47; Noble Use of a Church Building, A, 287; No Prohibition in Texas, 327; Object of Worship, The, 47; Occasion for Surprise, An, 92; Old-Fashioned Virtues, 63; "Old South" Lectures in Chicago, 147; Open Court, The, 3; Opinions on the Jury System, 315; Ordinance of 1787, The, 273; Origin of this New "Holy-day," 247; Organization and Spiritualizing, 131; Orthodoxy and Human Sympathy, 19; Our Editor Missing, 339; Palace and the Hovel, The, 35; Parker in India, 47; Parties in the Universe, The, 119; Philadelphia Year Book, A, 90; Piety and Fidelity, 132; Plea for the Keel Motor, A, 327; Poem of Browning, A, 163; Poetic Fragments from Flower Sunday, 247; Poet and His Minister, A, 147; Post's Mission, The, 3; Poetry in the Present, 47; Post Office Mission in England, 219; Praise and Fault-finding, 163; Professor Smyth and the Independent , 339; Progress in Religion, 298; Prophecy, James K. Hosmer's, 19; Proposed Dismantling of the Western Conference, The, 108; Providence and Grasshoppers, 287; Question of Fellowship as Applied to Colonel Ingersoll, 63; Rabbi Ilowizl's Address at the Dedication of the Unitarian Church at Minneapolis, 287; Race Fellowship, 271; Rallying Cry of the Episcopalian, 351; Rational Treatment of the Bible, 219; Real Infidel, The, 299; Rebel Flags, The, 248; Receiving and Giving, 47; "Reception Dresses," 35; Reply to Lowell, Savage's, 20; Reporter of Organized Charity, The, 92; Reporter of Organized Charity, The, 48; Representation at the Coming Conference, 119; Right and Expediency, 131; Robert Collyer on the "New Theology," 248; Root of All Evil, The, 327; Ruin by Gaming, 47; Sabbatarianism in St. Louis, 269; School for Deaf Mutes, A, 76; Second Volume of "Obiter Dicta," 248; Securing Church-members, 351; Secret of Greek Culture, The, 3; Shakespeare's Portraits, 235; "Shaybacks in Camp, The," 351; Simmons, Mr., on Tennyson's Last Poem, 19; Spiritual Courage, 35; Spirit of Synthesis in Religion, The, 247; St. Louis Christian Advocate on Hell, The, 339; St. Jerome, 269; Story of Tact, A, 91; Strange Grounds for Pride, 163; Stroke of Nature, A, 47; "Study of Primitive Christianity, A," 35; Summer Schools of Philosophy, 48; Swedenborgian Creed, A, 328; Take Heart and go Forward, 119; Tests of Love, The, 3; Text on Church Singing, A, 63; The Best of Everything on Social Reforms, 316; Thoughts from Channing, 219; Thoughts from Channing, 163; Thoughts on Immortal Life, 3; Things that Remain, 147; Things too Little to Believe, 47; Time for a Shibboleth, The, 131; Total Abstinence, 132; Tribute to Dr. Eliot, A, 148; True Line of Vision, The, 92; True Line for Co-operation, The, 103; Two Tests of Unitarianism, 120; Undeserved Censure, An, 327; Unfolding of the Divine, The, 131; "Unitarianism or Something Better," 131; Unitarian Church Temperance Society, The, 219; Unitarian Record , The, 35; Unitarianism in the Orthodox Fold, 259; Universalist on the Western Unitarian Conference, The, 219; Unity Clubs, New Fields for, 148; Unity Club Organization, 147; Unity's Mission, 131; Unity's "Bird Number," 108; "Unity's Short Tract, No. 16," 108; Unity the Key-note of Science, 299; "Unity Short Tract, No. 17," 185; Use and Abuse of Parish Annals, The, 119; Uses of this Number, 185; Vacation Season, The, 235; Violation of Civil Service Principles, A, 316; Vital Truth, The, 119; Wage-slaves, 300; W. C. T. U. Edition of "Duties of Women," The, 271; Westminster Review on American Education, The, 315; What the National Teachers' Association is Accomplishing, 287; Where is Christianity? 271; Why are the Women Left Out? 272; Women Suffrage Agitation in England, 315; Women on School Boards, 163; Women on School Boards, 235.

EDITORIALS.

Antioch College.....	248
A. U. A. Delegation in Chicago, The.....	132
Boodle-U.....	328
Bureau of Unity Clubs, The.....	273
Calamities and Providence—H. M. S.....	300
Character and Citizenship—J. V. B.....	94
Cincinnati Resolution—Was It Unconstitutional? W. C. G.....	64
Conference in Hindoo Lands—W. C. G.....	149
Declaration Concerning Unitarian Fellowship and Doctrine, A—W. C. G.....	94
Dissent Without Disfellowship—U.....	49
Do We Want a Fellowship Resolution?—U.....	106
Easter.....	76
Ethical Basis, An.....	132
Ethical Culture—U.....	20
Facts—J. V. B.....	36
Idealism—J. V. B.....	352
Is the Western Conference Ready to Give up Executive Functions?.....	48
Morality of Newspapers—J. V. B.....	133
New Moral Philosophy, The—J. C. L.....	120
Oliver Wendell Holmes Hospital, The.....	300
Our Missionary Opportunity.....	339
Our Western Anniversaries.....	148
Orthodoxy and Ethics—H. L. T.....	37
Parker's South Boston Sermon—J. V. B.....	133
Prayer Without Pronoun ("Uplifts of Heart and Will")—W. C. G.....	372

Reading—J. V. B.....	150
Relation of Doctrine to Life, The—J. C. L.....	86
Saint Patrick.....	86
Shame!—W. C. G.....	6
Summer Holiday, The—F. L. H.....	238
Sunday Circles.....	236
Story of the Western Conference Meeting of 1887, The—F. L. H.....	176
"Things Most Commonly Believed To-day Among Us, The"—W. C. G.....	77
Thoughtful Unchurched, The—J. C. L.....	259
Two "Statements of Faith" Better than One—W. C. G.....	149
Unitarian and Ethical Society, A—J. C. L.....	104
Unitarianism, The Gospel of Unity—H. M. S.....	230
Volume Nineteen.....	4
Was It Honest?.....	316
Western Unitarian Conference, The.....	93
Worship—J. V. B.....	237

POETRY.

Aspiration—Horace L. Traubel.....	66
At the Grave of Emerson—Sarah E. Burton.....	355
Barriers Overthrown—Virginia G. Ellard.....	107
Beyond the Human—Eugene Ashton.....	304
Bird Worship—E. C. L. Browne.....	151
Coming—George R. Lewis.....	121
Confirmation—J. C. L.....	135
Cosmic Tortoise, The—Mrs. J. W. F.....	279
Death—H. L. T.....	39
Divinity—H. L. T.....	108
Dover—W. C. G.....	50
Experience—J. V. B.....	317
Flower Souls—Eugene Ashton.....	249
For All—H. L. T.....	224
For the Last Time—J. W. Chadwick.....	53
Hope—F. A. B. D.....	164
In Vain—Eugene Ashton.....	152
Is It Nothing to You?—T. P. Wilson.....	123
Joan of Arc—Sarah E. Burton.....	289
Life's Gift—Junia Stafford.....	68
Maiden's Reply, The—Celia F. Woolley.....	151
Minstrel Band, The—Eugene Ashton.....	328
Moral Heroism—H. L. T.....	263
My Nasturtium—H. L. T.....	247
My Prayer—Sarah E. Burton.....	8
My Song—Hattie Tyng Griswold.....	345
Need—Minnie Stebbins Savage.....	52
On Easter Morning—A. W. B.....	95
Out to the Sea—Eugene Ashton.....	6
Origin of Snow, The—R. P. U.....	234
Perseverance—Martha S. Kirby.....	68
Question—H. L. T.....	239
Road to Rue, The—Charles G. Blandin.....	301
Satisfied—Louise M. Dunning.....	298
Satisfied—Louise M. Dunning.....	253
Send Back the Flags—Alice Williams Brotherton.....	248
Sex in Sin—Avonian.....	279
Stars Respond to Joy, The—H. L. T.....	291
Thirty Thousand—W. C. G.....	21
To Follow—Avonian.....	340
Twins, The—W. C. G.....	79
Unfinished Song, The—Alice Williams Brotherton.....	134
Unrounded Lives—Virginia G. Ellard.....	353
Uplifts of Heart and Will—J. H. West.....	37
Wait for the Heart—H. L. T.....	341
Who Knows!—Celia F. Woolley.....	236
Whirlpools, The—Minnie Stebbins Savage.....	261
White Clover, The.....	247
Wind Song, The—Eugene Ashton.....	221

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES.

About Ourselves—Robert Collyer.....	262
Address of Rabbi Ilowizl at Dedication of Unitarian Church of Minneapolis.....	308
Amiel and Browning—A. A. G.....	290
Arithmetic—K. G. W.....	166
Browning in Chicago—C. F. W.....	107
"Christ Before Pilate".....	342
Christianity in the Western World—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	108
Civil and Inter-Civil and International S. S. Conventions—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	225
Comfort—J. H. West.....	80
Congregationalists and the Bible—J. C. F. G.....	224
Conversation—Junia Stafford.....	264
Days of Quietness—Julia W. Goodridge.....	302
Dedication of the Minneapolis Unitarian Church.....	238
Doctor McGlynn and an Alleged New Protestantism—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	289
Echoes from the Unitarian Festival in Boston, May 28.....	221
Echoes from the Unitarian Church Temperance Meeting in Boston, May 23.....	222
Fellowship of the Spirit, The—J. N. Sprigg.....	9
Free Method of the Harvard Divinity School, and Doctor Channing's Endowment of It, The.....	6
Freedom in Religion— Doctor Channing's Note Book	39
Friends Known and Unknown—W.....	9
From Jerusalem—B. B. Wiley.....	318
Funerals and Officiating Ministers—A. J. R.....	304
George Eliot's Ideals in Real Life— Quincy Optic	24
Grove Meeting at Weira, N. H.—E. C. Abbott.....	329
Hannah Elizabeth Stevenson—By Three Friends of Here.....	271
Hebrew and Other Religious Growth—H. "L." T.....	54
Helping the Minister—A. Judson Rich.....	342
House Cleaning—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	165
How We Got the Temperance Society in the Church—W. C. G.....	22
Injustice of Socialism, The—Lida Minnie Brown.....	301
Is It Honest?—Z.....	151
Is Unitarianism Adapted to the Masses?—Eliza T. Wilkes.....	66
Iron Bed of Procrustes, The—Frank L. Phalen.....	240
Kansas Post Office Mission, The—J. S. Brown.....	95

Kitchen Windows—Grace Curtis.....	318
Lakeside School of New Theology, The—Solon Lauer.....	341
Leadership of Jesus, The—S. S. Hunting.....	36
Liberal Church of To-day, The— Charles G. Ames	53
Matthew Arnold as a Pleader for the Things of the Spirit—G. D. Black.....	261
Mission of the New Theology, The—S. L.....	344
Music in Sunday-school—M. Vaupel Clarke.....	223
Must the Church be Protected?.....	67
Nature and the Bible—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	151
No Time To Think— English Paper	355
Norway and Unitarianism—H. Tams Lyche.....	358
Our Covenant— Charles G. Ames	26
Our Present Opportunities and Our Present Needs—Oscar Clute.....	134
Picture Reform in Sunday-school—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	94
Post Office Mission Work.....	52
Prayer—Mar E. Cole.....	121
Preachers Who Live Over People's Heads—H. L. T.....	278
Prophecy of Fifty Years Ago—A. J. S. B.....	291
Prohibition—Its Domain—Minnie Stebbins Savage.....	238
Race Consciousness—F. E. R.....	279
Rebution—C. K. W.....	79
Reunion of Colored Veterans, A—A. M. G.....	329
Reverie, A—Ella F. Stevens.....	123
Rev. E. L. Rexford and Universalism—J. C. F. G.....	53
Spirit of Jesus, The—By an English Layman.....	88
Spirit of Jesus, The—By an English Layman.....	50
Superstition.....	343
Teaching of George Eliot's Novels—Abbie M. Gannett.....	317
The Unitarian Review —J. V. B.....	91
Things Behind and Things Before—C. B. Roberts.....	330
Tribe of the Indifferent, The—A. M. Gannett.....	340
True Discipleship, The—F. L. Hoerner.....	163
Unitarians and Poetry—W. W. Follows.....	239
What Makes a Church, and How to Make One—F. W. N. Hugenholz.....	178
What is a Noble Life?.....	6
Why Am I a Heathen?—J. C. F. Grumbine.....	353
Why Not Be Noble?—H. Tams Lyche.....	290
With an Eye to Perfection—J. F.....	68
Woman's Activities in Dakota—Mrs. E. T. Wilkes.....	294
Woman's Help to Woman—Lida Minnie Brown.....	39

CORRESPONDENCE.

About the Rebel Flags—G. M. Alves.....	209
"Belated Response, A"—E. C. L. Browne.....	110
Blessed be Drudgery.....	81
Crow Indian Mission, The—H. F. Bond.....	332
Deaf Mutes, The.....	81
Ifs for Parents—Janet E. Reintz-Rees.....	209
It Can not Be Done—T. P. Wilson.....	108
Montana Industrial School for Indians, The—J. F. B. Marshall.....	109
New Problems for the Western Conference.....	135
New South, The—W. J. Potter.....	109
Oidium Theologicum, The.....	135
Temperance in the Church—S. S. H.....	264

STUDY TABLE.

"Agatha and the Shadow".....	69
"Agnes Surriage".....	124
"American Patriotism".....	126
"Appeal to Life, The".....	253
"Apotheosis of an Ideal".....	168
"Art of Reading Latin, The".....	320
"Aztecs; Their History, Manners, Customs, The".....	280
"Branch of May, A".....	293
"Bridge Disasters in America".....	236
Browning's "Parleyings".....	110
"Century of Electricity, A".....	291
"Christian Platonists of Alexandria, The".....	292
"College Songs".....	10
"Commentary on the Literary Bibles of the Occident, A".....	26
"Daffodils".....	168
"Day in Ancient Rome, The".....	253
"Doctor Channing's Note Book".....	40
"Drone's Honey".....	356
"Elementary Principles of Electro-Therapeutics".....	226
"English Synonyms Discriminated".....	82
"Evolution and Christianity".....	292
"Faith on the Earth".....	240
"Faith and Righteousness".....	240
"Family, The".....	124
"Familiar Allusions".....	108
"Father Ryan's Poems".....	137
"Foes of Her Household".....	82
"Forced Acquaintances".....	82
"German Novellees".....	305
"Golden City, The".....	240
"Golden Legend, The".....	110
"Golden Justice, The".....	98
"Gordon Brown's Fairy Tales".....	152
"Half Century in Salem, A".....	280
"Hints on Writing and Speech-Making".....	82
"History of Education, A".....	137
"History of Music, The".....	152
"Home Life of Great Authors".....	40
"How Shall My Child Be Taught?".....	54
"Humboldt Library, The".....	319
"In thoughts from the Visions of the Night".....	305
"International Encyclopedia, The".....	137
"Inter-State Commerce Act, The".....	125
"Japanese Fairy Tales".....	137
"Job and Solomon".....	293
"Kernel and the Husk, The".....	223
"Library Magazine, The".....	69
"Love's Ladder".....	41
"Magazine of American History, The".....	111
"Magazine of American History".....	280
"Masters of the Situation".....	167
"Memorials of the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, B. A.".....	28

"Nameless Nobleman, A"	265
"New Birth, The"	253
"New York"	124
"Nuttall's Standard Dictionary"	69
"Peasant and the Prince, The"	152
"P. Terenti Afridelphe"	319
"Philosophical Realism"	240
"Practical Chiromancy"	253
"Progress from Poverty"	25
Professor Rolfe on Browning	81
"Recollections of Eminent Men"	356
"Rigveda, the Oldest Literature of the Indians, The"	10
"Riverside Browning, The"	292
"Romanism"	69
"Sailing of King Olaf and Other Poems"	180
"Shakespeareana"	280
"Shakespeare's Insomnia and the Causes Thereof"	54
"Shelby Seminary Memorial"	54
"Sir Philip Sidney"	10
"Social Studies"	226
"Song Classics"	10
"Sonnets in Shadow"	82
"Sower, The"	168
"Suggestive Lessons in Language and Reading"	293
"Sunday Lessons for Infants at School and Home"	356
"Study of Mexico, A"	167
"Story of the Nations, The"	110
"Story of the Normans, The"	10
"Susanna Wesley"	25
"Talks about Law"	240
"Theophilus Trent"	227
"Through Gates of Gold"	10
"Ticknor's Paper Series of Choice Reading"	168
"Volcano Under the City, The"	292
"Was Shakespeare Shapleigh?"	240
"Waste-land Wanderings"	320
"Will Power, The"	82
"Work of a True Church, The"	226
Young Days	11
"Young People's History of Ireland"	124
"Zury: The Meanest Man in Spring County"	305

THE HOME.
About Manliness—J. V. B.	233
Amen	281
"And Dod Will Say"	281
As a Boy	320
Balder—J. V. B.	111
Bird Sermon, A	41
"Bunny" Replies	125
Chicago Gamin, The	97
Child Philosophy—J. V. B.	345
Cloud Land—J. M. F.	69
Contentment—Eugene Ashton	233
Disciplining Another's Baby—S. C. Li. J.	241
Doorway Picture, A—Mrs. L. G. McVean.	356
Easter Bells	85
Evening Calm in Early Spring	85
Fred and the Mice—From the German	357
Fresh from a School Room	181
From a Bird's Righter	125
German Legend, A	281
Give—Adelaide A. Proctor	293
Grandfather's Inscription in Ethel's Bible	41
Granite Man, A	26
Hand Stories—J. V. B.	11
How to Keep a Secret—Young Folks	306
"Ifs" for Mothers and Fathers	281
In a Store Room—E. T. L.	153
Intimations of Immortality	181
Lad and the Lapis, The—J. M. F.	305
Miss Greene's Way—Ida M. Gardner	356
Mistakes	181
My Flowers	227
"Not Worth a Pin!"	41
Proverb Sermons—J. V. B.	168
Proverb Sermon—J. V. B.	332
Raiment of Light—J. V. B.	57
Rock that Makes Children Better, A	281
San Francisco Flower, A	330
Street Picture in Naples, A	57
Three Seeds	85
Tommy's Dream	227
Two Pets—S. B. B.	265
Word and a Deed, A	26
Youthful Contractor, A	330
UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.
Divine Satisfaction, The—J. H. West	138

Faith—Rev. G. W. Buckley	307
Good Friday from an Ethical Standpoint—W. M. Salter	154
Liberal and a Professional Faith, A—John C. Learned	27
Retribution and Reward—A. M. Judy	55
True Voice, The—S. M. Crothers	83

CONFERENCES.

Discussion on a Resolution Concerning a Declaration of Fellowship and Faith, The	202
Illinois Conference and a Birthday Party	249
Opening Address before the W. U. C.—D. L. Shorey	188
Proceedings of the 6th Annual Meeting of the W. U. C.	201
Proceedings of the 14th Annual Meeting of the W. U. S. S.	202
Proceedings of the 33d Annual Meeting of the W. U. C.	199
Religious Study Classes—Mrs. A. E. West	192
Report of the Treasurer of the W. W. U. C.—Mrs. J. C. Hilton	199
Report of the Treasurer of the W. U. S. S. Society—Ellen T. Leonard	199
Report of the Secretary of the W. W. U. C.—Mary H. Graves	193
Report of the Secretary of the W. U. S. S. Society—Ellen T. Leonard	195
Report of the Treasurer of the W. U. C.—James B. Galloway	198
Report of the Secretary of the Illinois Unitarian Conference—J. R. Effinger	252
Report of the Secretary of the W. U. C.—John R. Effinger	188
Treasurer's Report of the Illinois Unitarian Conference	252
Western Unitarian Year-Book for 1887 and '88, 209-216

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Pages 12, 30, 42, 58, 70, 86, 98, 112, 126, 142, 158, 170, 182, 228, 242, 254, 266, 282, 294, 310, 322, 334, 346, 358.
--	--

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Pages 12, 31, 43, 59, 71, 87, 99, 113, 127, 143, 159, 171, 183, 231, 242, 254, 266, 282, 295, 311, 323, 335, 347, 359.
--	--

CONTENTS OF VOLUME XX.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

About Woman Journalists, 263; Administering Estates, 3; Agnosticism, 185; "All Hall" to Minnesota, 159; All Mythology, Theology, 239; Alms, Justice, 239; American Culture, 171; American Tracts in Norway, 63; Andover Controversy, The, 39; Andover Review, Hope for the Heathen, The, 316; Another Resignation, 227; Another Unitarian Passed On, 239; Are the Negroes Abused? 200; Beecher's, Henry Ward, Library, 51; Beecher's Theology, 99; Best Workers, The, 227; Best Worship, The, 3; Better Day for the Churches, A, 263; Board Still Unswayed, A, 287; Brains not to be Crushed by Bigotry, 15; Bright Omen, A, 112; Brotherly Addresses with Stings under Them, 51; Broad-Church Conference, A, 113; Can an Arian Unite with the Presbyterian Church, 147; Case of Prof. E. C. Smyth, 227; Centennial at Charleston, 123; Channing on Riches, 27; Chicago Mission for Converting Jews to Christianity, 147; Character Contagious, 227; "Christ Life" in all Holy Lives, The, 51; Christian Brotherhood, 315; Christian Register on Prison Management, The, 276; Christianity a Process, 227; Civil Service Reform, 3; Clarke's, James Freeman, Church, 171; Coit's, Mr., New Charge, 263; Collyer's, Robert, Religious Experience, 99; Columbia of Thought and Art, A, 111; Commonwealth of Souls, The, 227; Congratulations, 159; Congratulations to the Unitarian, 263; Congregationalists and the "Ethical Basis," 287; Counterpart Forces, 15; Cooking, a Factor in Industrial Education, 147; Correct Method for Guidance, The, 212; Car's Way of Traveling, The, 27; Danger to the Christian Name, 186; Dangers of Scepticism, 199; Date of George Eliot's Birth, 171; Death of Clinton Cullom, The, 287; Death Made Beautiful, 3; Debt of the World to Jesus, The, 199; Difference, The, 111; Disgracing His Uniform, 15; Dishonest Thinker, The, 239; Divine River, The, 227; Doctor Thomas's First Sermon, 15; Educational County Fair, An, 99; Effect of Helpfulness, The, 237; Effect of Travel on Conceit, 275; Emerson's Helpfulness for the Ignorant, 316; Emerson's Hopefulness of Man, 111; English Law Regulating Street Children, 275; Ethical Culture Platform, 171; Ethical Lessons, 111; Eulogy on Albert Lester Kellogg, 87; Expanding of English Church "Times," 227; "Eye Religion," 28; Father McGlynn a Radical Protestant, 263; Farewell, A, 126; Fears of a Register Correspondent, 299; First Meeting of the Sunday School Teachers, 3; Florence Nightingale, 87; Food for Healthy Souls, 27; Force in the Sunday School, 125; For Unity Hat, 111; Free Libraries, 185; George Eliot's Defense of the Jews, 229; Give the Birds their Share, 3; Glenn Bill in Georgia, 15; God in the Constitution, 87; Golden Silence, 15; Good Motto, A, 239; Great Voice, The, 227; Hale, E. E., on George Washington, 99; Healing Power of a Cross, 315; Helps for the Sunday Circles, 288; Helps to Santa Claus, 200; High Service of the Church, 275; How God Works, 27; How to Be Godlike, 15; How to Treat the Ministers, 15; Humane Liquor Dealers, The, 15; Hymn From India, A, 239; Idolatrous Unitarian Church, An, 75; Illinois Industrial School, 111; Impossible Freedom, An, 186; Increase of Christian Converts, 227; Indian's Memory, The, 111; Indian Messenger on the
--	--

Pundita Ramabai, The, 315; Industrial Inebriate Farm, An, 275; Inexhaustible Universe, The, 263; Inquirer's Word About Soldiers, The, 263; Instinctive Virtue, 123; Intellectual Growth, 87; International Council of Women, The, 275; Interpretation of Genius by Genius, 171; Ireland's Self-imposed Curse, 3; Irving's "Faust," 228; Is Christianity a Natural Religion, 63; Is Conscience the Voice of God, 315; Is the Religion of Love Inefficient, 251; Jake's Creed, 75; Japanese Mission, 111; Japanese Reviewer's Thought, A, 227; Japanese Thralldom, 185; Journal of Industrial Education, 239; Joy in Revelation, 27; Journals Absorbed by Unity, The, 3; Judge of the Judge, 99; Justice, 147; Large Work of Religion, 227; Large Freshman Class, 99; Laudation of Certain Italics, The, 63; Leaven Working, The, 315; Lecture Circular, A, 251; Lectures on Dante, 199; Lectures on Robert Browning, 251; Let Your Church Bells Harmonize, 51; Lesson in Patience, A, 315; Living a Good Book, 228; Little's Living Age, 147; London Riots, The, 147; March of Religion, 159; Maxon, Henry D., on the "Religious Possibilities of Agnosticism," 28; Mead's, Edwin D., Lectures at Plymouth Church, 63; Meaning of Supernaturalism, 239; Meeting between Old Veterans, A, 27; Memorial Window in St. Margaret's Church, London, 275; Methodist Financiers, 186; Minister's Right Hand, The, 51; Minnesota Unitarian Conference, 159; Missionary Dollar, The, 99; Modernness of Early Utterances, 239; Muncackey's Painting of Jesus, 200; Must Catholicism Go? 240; Myths in Scripture and Theology, 87; Negro in Medicine, The, 27; New Universalist Creed, 112; New Unitarian Congregations, 212; No Artificial Lines, 287; No comfort in Unmixed Error, 277; Night Schools, The, 228; Nineteenth Century, 171; Nine Good Rules for School, Church and Home, 27; Old and New Theology, 4; "Old Fort Dearborn," 239; Omission, An, 171; On Miracles, 275; One Resemblance Between Hindus and Christians, 3; One Way, 123; Only Charity, The, 227; Opposition to Professor Woodrow, 278; Our Heredity from God, 123; Our Theology, 39; Pacific Coast Conference, 88; Panama Canal, 185; Pathetic View of the Salvation Army, A, 315; Paul on Woman Suffrage, 100; Paving the Streets with the Souls of Boys, 39; Pentecost, Rev. Hugh, Explanation, 228; Pentecost, Rev. Hugh, to His Former Congregation, 233; Pentateuch, Theology and Facts, The, 147; Platform of the United Labor Party, 100; Pies for Adam, A, 4; Pile System in Preaching, The, 15; Pioneer Missionary Service, 311; Poem by Ludwig II, 223; Polyglot Welcome, A, 99; Poor Advocate of Christianity, A, 239; Possibility of Prohibition, 227; Professor Swing on the "Newness of Things," 25; Professor Blackie's Defense of Burns, 268; Professor Hinsdale's Tribute to the Balloues, 287; Progressive Pulpit, The, 211; Prominent Universalist Passed Away, A, 211; Primal Force, The, 227; Proportionate Giving, 199; Prostrated on Sofas of Wellness, 39; Points on Prayer, 28; Puck on the Lecture Bureau, 100; Puritan Sabbath, A, 251; Public Sentiment on Orthodoxy, 88; Puzzling Problem, A, 111; Questions, 135; Questions Unanswered, 135; Questions from Sunday-schools, 135; Questions of Conscience in Dubuque,
--	--

185; Rabbi's Office, The, 239; Railroad Accommodations for Colored People, 211; Ramabai's Religious Belief, 199; Real Source of Many Sermons, The, 262; Reynolds, Secretary, in the West, 75; Reasons of Delay, 111; Results of Christ's Teachings, 211; Revival Among the West Side Universalists, 211; Religious Councils of the Future, The, 15; Reform in Tenement Building, 238; Representing Religion, 39; Richmond, A. B., on Spirit Manifestations, 63; Root, The, 123; Salter's, Mr., Arraignment of Chicago Business Houses, 299; Savage's, Mr. M. J., "Bluffton," 147; Scant Discussion, 135; Science Sections in Unity Clubs, 172; Schools Represented, 135; Scripture Readings, 100; Scriptures as a Stepping Stone, 87; Search After Truth, 276; Seeing vs. Saying our Faith, 27; Seers of Truth, 99; Self-Denial and Self-Gratification, 315; Sense in All of Browning, 315; Sensible Article, A, 263; Shadow of the Gallows, The, 111; Signs of Union, 63; Significance of Festivals, 316; Simmons, H. M., on Unitarianism, 160; Simmons, Mr., Patriotic Suggestions, 316; Soft-Hearted Ministers, 147; Some Questions by Doctor Townsend, 123; Some Telling Figures, 240; Spiritual Diseases, 4; Spiritual Evolution, 87; Spiritual Nearsightedness, 287; Spirit of Religion, 227; Statuettes of the Prophets, 75; Substance of Doctrine, 159; Suggestion to Sunday Schools, A, 75; Suggestion for Women Workers, A, 3; Suggestion for the Magnates of Fashion, A, 275; Suggestions for Church Building, 237; Sweden's Helps to the World, 239; Tale With a Moral for Husbands, A, 15; Temperance Equation, The, 51; "Temperance Hour," The, 27; Temperance Instruction, 87; Texts from Unity, 111; Theologic Poison in Orthodox Sunday-Schools, 73; They Were Not Bored, 51; Through Hand to Conscience, 275; To Hillside and Back, 276; Tolstol's Work, 123; Tolstoi, The Socialist and Infidel, 88; Too Much Fighting in the Church, 3; Too Many Left, 99; True Attitude, The, 239; True Church, The, 239; True Church, A, 3; True Christmas Celebration, A, 199; True Reverence, 16; Trusteeship for Ownership, 315; Tub or Hub, 99; Unconscious Planting, 185; Unique Entertainment, A, 199; Universalist Publishing House, 147; Universality Not a Proof of Validity, 287; Unjustifiable Bigotry, 315; U. C. T. S. Tracts, 171; Unity Clubs, To, 112; Unity Short Tracts, 299; Unity School of Religion and Morals, 147; Unity of Thought, 185; Upper (?) Classes, The, 111; "Uplift of Heart and Will," 211; Value of Mites, The, 51; Various Echoes, 75; Views of the Sixth Presbyterian Church on Pew Renting, 251; Virtues Unrecorded, 227; Wanted—A Statement of Universalism, 63; Wasted Opportunities, 63; W. C. T. U., 99; W. C. T. U. Convention, 159; What Shall We Do to be Saved? 99; Willard's, Frances, Suggestion to the W. C. T. U., 263; Wine or Water, 99; Woman's Help, Our Need of, 4; Women in the Pulpit, 288; Woman's Work, 147; Woolley's, Celia P., New Novel, 52; Word for the Crank, A, 100; Word to the Iconoclast, A, 275; Words from the Ancients, 239; Words to Readers, 135; Emerson's Works in French, 263; Work of Piety, The, 227; Workshop in the School, A, 99; Writer's Privilege, The, 315; Wrong Motives in Religion, 51; Written Examinations, 200.
---	--

EDITORIALS.

Are We on the Brink of a Revolution—L.	268
Baby's Spelling Lesson, A—W. C. G.	40
Batchelor's New Book	187
British and Foreign Unitarian Association—S. C. L. J.	148
Christ as a Factor in Theology—S. L.	18
Christmas Cards—W. C. G.	240
Dante	229
Debilitating Adjective, The	64
Editorial Wanderings	6
Editorial Wanderings	148
Editorial Wanderings	316
Editorial Wanderings	212
1887—L	226
1888	77
Faith and Works	252
Field—Ingersoll Lectures, Letters, The—F. L. H.	76
Fifty Years Ago	26
Frances Power Cobbe	135
General Survey of Sunday-school Sessions—J. C. L.	76
Ideal, The	201
Ideas of God, W. C. G.	300
Is Woman a Unit or a Fraction?	124
Justice and Business—H. L. T.	264
Love and Theology	90
Meeting of the American Board, The—F. L. H.	288
Model President's Message, A	172
More Editorial Wanderings	113
New Art Museum, The	4
New Theology and Old Religion	113
New Theology Herald, The	16
New Theology Herald, The	240
New Year of the Churches, The	77
Past, The—W. C. G.	112
Peep at the Exposition, A	262
Ramabal Circle, The	80
Reverence with a Downward Look	289
Right to Ask Questions, The	88
Robert Browning	200
Secular Press Comment	64
Some More Editorial Wanderings	300
Society of Solitude, The—S. L.	101
Study of Art, The	189
Sunday Question, The	17
Unity Clubs—C. P. W.	100
Unity Club Summer School, A	160
Unity Hat, The	277
Universalist Sunday-school Union	76
War Prospect, The—H. M. S.	52
Wayside Prophet, The	317
We Appeal to the Governor	89
"We See As We Are"—In Men	186
Where Are We?
Who Are the Descendants of the Puritans?

POETRY.

Choice—Mercie M. Thirde	124
Delayed Christmas Greeting, A—E. P. Powell	243
Discovery—Horace L. Traubel	202
Final—Hattie Tyng Griswold	161
Greeting—A. W. B.	230
Greeting—L. A. L.	290
Insight—Sarah E. Burton	78
Living Past, The—Alice Williams Brotherton	218
Longings—E. H. H.	80
Merciful Man, The—Emily Hewitt Leland	101
Nature's Undertone—Virginia G. Ellard	176
November Days—C. J. Bartlett	141
Patience—A. M.	7
Patience—H. P. Kimball	269
Quietness—Olive E. Dana	42
Rain, The—William S. Lord	53
Recompense—Celia P. Woolley	188
Sea Mosses—Julia Mills Dunn	318
September Lane, A—Alice Williams Brotherton	65
Sermon, The—A. H. F.	41
Song of the Star-ray—Solon Lauer	31
Sower, The—F. L. Hosmer	54
To—J. H. C.	215
To the Century Plant—Minnie Stebbins Savage	301
To Rev. Chester Covell on His Seventieth Birth-day—Junia Stafford	241
To a Maid of Eighteen—Lily A. Long	254
Well Done—T. P. Wilson	151
Winter Sunset, A—Alice Gordon	277
Woman and Artist—Alice Williams Brotherton	9

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES.

Another View of It—G. M. A.	125
Anti-Negro Slavery and Anti-Slavery—H. L. T.	289
Apostolic Succession—William J. Potter	30
Architects of the New Theology—J. G. T.	30
Browning's Statesman—Florence T. Griswold	319
Christian Agnosticism—C. H. Ames	41
Church and Social Problems, The—A. Goatherd	254
Closing Week of the Lakeside School of New Theology—S. L.	7
Compensations of the Country, The—Ellen C. Lloyd Jones	66
Communism, The—A. Judson Rich	290
Deathless Effluence and Influence—Perry Marshall	151
Evolution of Immortality, The—J. V. B.	265
Evolution of Religion in the Old Testament, The—John C. Learned	161
George Meredith—M. R. F. G.	149
Give—Perry Marshall	320
Glimpses into a Post Office Mission Parish	266
God of Science, The—F. H. Abbott	125
Greatest Cause of Crime, The—W. D. V.	278
Henry George and the United Labor Party—J. C. F. Grumblin	18
How to Help the Poor—Henry D. Stevens	268
Ignatius Donnelly's Comet	67
Immortality—H. Tambe Lyche	102
Judicial Murder—Lucinda B. Chandler	214
Man of God, The—Theodore Parker	101
Memorial Service of Rev. C. H. A. Dall—Indian Daily News	42

Minnesota Post Office Mission, The—J. E. McCaine	19
New Knowledge and the Old Faith, The—Rev. T. B. Forbush	242
New Version, A—P. M.	320
Our Every Day Charity—E. R. L.	188
"Our Heredity From God"—C. P. Woolley	174
Our Reading—Henry D. Thoreau	108
Perfect Personal Liberty—Belle L. Gorton	241
Philanthropy—Henry D. Thoreau	320
Pride in Littlethings—Celia P. Woolley	18
Queer Doctrines of My Friend, The—S. L.	175
Religion of It, The—F. E. R.	302
Religion and Politics—J. C. F. Grumblin	65
Resistance to Evil—Prof. E. D. Cops	30
Resistance or Non-Resistance—J. S. B.	320
Responsive Services—John R. Effinger	254, 267
Robert Browning on Immortality—M. Holy	126
Salvation for the Heathen—S. L.	214
Saving Power of the Religion of Love, The	277
Sketch, A—G. M. A.	55
Sunday Circles—John R. Effinger	279
Three Stone Steps, The—Abbie M. Gannett	203
To P. O. M. Workers	54
Undeveloped Side of Unity Club Work, An—Arthur Beavis	173
Union by Many Ways—Horace L. Traubel	53
Unity Clubs—C. P. W.	189
Use and Abuse of the Bible	67
Value of the Beautiful, The—Dr. R. H. Brown	103
Voice of God, The	67
Walt Whitman—G. D. Black	280
Was It Honest?	78
What Can Unitarianism Do for the Heathen?—E. W. Symonds	318
What Can Unitarianism Do for the Heathen?—A Unity Symposium	113
Widows in India and the Ramabal Circle	202
Woman's Medical College, The—Nelly Booth Simmons	90
Words, Words, Words—Mary H. Graves	213

CORRESPONDENCE.

Comment and Criticism—S. L.	42
Country Week, The—C. D. Adams	43
Ellsworth Zouave at Camp Sheridan, An—John Conant Long	104
Ethical Cultivators, The—Perry Marshall	104
If That Was Dishonest, Isn't This?—W. H. C.	43
Religious Character of the Labor Crusade, The—Alfred S. Houghton	55
Question in Ethics, A—H. L. T.	55
Post Office Mission Report, A—Beverly Sheley	69

STUDY TABLE.

"American Literature and Other Papers"	117
Another Lesson from Miss Phelps—Celia P. Woolley	68
"Bible Studies from the Old and New Testaments"	304
"Bird Talk"	216
"Bluffton"	292
"Breaking Waves Dashed High, The"	204
"Bridal of Triermain"	216
"Cabin in the Clearing, and Other Poems, The"	56
"Cicero's Tusculan Disputations"	152
"Colonial Ballads, Sonnets, and Other Verse"	32
"Columbia Calendar, The"	216
"Connecticut"	104
Conscious Motherhood—Elizabeth P. Peabody	69
"Earth in Space, The"	128
"Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard"	204
"Elements of Botany"	177
"Encyclopedia of Living Divines and Christian Workers of All Denominations in Europe and America"	304
"English Masterpiece Course"	128
"Exeter Phillips Lectures, The"	216
"Faith's Festivals"	204
"Fair God, The"	92
"Fortunes of the Faradays"	304
"Garland for Girls, A"	321
Great Book, A—"Anna Karenina"—A. M. G.	67
"Hand Book to Dante, A"	152
"Holmes Calendar, The"	216
"Homeric Language and Verse"	128
"Humboldt Library, No. 92"	216
"Idyls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley"	321
"Illustrated London News, The"	129
"It was the Calm and Silent Night"	204
"Jack Hall"	105
Lee & Shepard's Announcements	56
"Legends from Story Land"	256
"Life Notes; or, Fifty Years' Outlook"	256
"Little Flowers of St. Francis of Assisi, The"	245
"Miss Curtis"	204
"Mrs. Ludington's Sister"	105
"Natural Laws in the Business World"	245
"New Christianity, The"	92
"New Catholic Church, The"	269
"Non-Biblical Systems of Religion."	321
"Old Farm Home, The"—Sarah E. Burton	232
"Old Garden, The"	216
"Oliver Goldsmith"	153
"Old South Historical Leaflets."	56
"Outline Lessons Upon the English Drama"	32
"Pickings from Puck"	216
"Picture Pages for Little People"	183
"Poetry and Philosophy of Goethe"	32
"Ring Out, Wild Bells"	204
"Ruling Principles of Method Applied in Education, The"	56
"Science and Immortality"	93
"Selected Gems and Modern Themes for Church or Parlor Organ"	8
"Songs for the Night"	216
Songs and Legends	128
"Standard Cantatas, The"	216
"Studies in Musical History"	152
"Temperance Tract"	216

"That Glorious Song of Old"	304
"Unknown Country, An"	245
"What and Where Is God?"	269
"Whitney Calendar"	216
"Why Should the Spirit of Mortal Be Proud?"	304
"Wind Flowers"	32
"Wit, Wisdom and Beauties of Shakespeare"	176
"World to Come, The"	176

UNITY CLUB.

Carlyle and George Eliot, Again	231
Clubs and the Bureau	116
Dickens Procession, The	291
Divinity School Address, The—W. C. G.	91
Fifty Years of Emerson	79
George Eliot	127
Institute of Religious Study	128
King John	255
Lectures by Rev. George Willis Cooke	128
Lessing	104
Letter to Secretary of Unity Bureau—Fred E. Smith	190
National Bureau of Unity Clubs—A. J. R.	8
Notes	31
Notes	152
Origin of the Unity Club—M. J. Savage	127
Reading Circle of the W. C. T. U., The	281
Richard II.	256
Robert Browning	116
Sioux City Notes—E. E. G.	92
Study of the History of Ireland	244
Study of Kant, The	215
Thomas Carlyle	176
Trial and Death of Socrates, The	303, 321
Unity Club Notes	20
Unity Club, The	56
Unity Club Day at the First Annual Sunday-School Institute	80
Unity Clubs and Devotional Life—Lyman Clark	151
Unity Club and the Religious Life of the Church, The	190
Unity Club Institute, The—A. J. R.	244
Yr Eisteddfod	20

THE HOME.

Apple Lesson, The—Junia Stafford	306
Babies' Rights—Rhat Kunze	165
Bird and the Looking Glass—D. M.	245
Boys and Homes—Abbie M. Gannett	69
Boy's Prayer, A	325
Child Philosophy	43
Christmas—Anna M. Pratt	204
Comrades—Henry Ames Blood	219
Didn't Like the Kite	81
General Molasses	153
Golden Keys	191
Good Night—Sydney Dayre	165
Gospel and the Golden Rule, The	81
Grown Up Land	269
Her Conscience Lately Aroused	269
History of Our Home Circle—W. C. G.	120
How Blossom and Royal Prolonged Christmas—Mater	205
How It Struck Him	165
How Mothers are Sometimes Treated	21
If You Would Be Happy	281
Incident, An	306
In Quiet Places—Sarah M. Bailey	9
Jesse—Gazelle Stevens Sharp	298
John Weeley	21
Little Hero, A—Gazelle S. Sharp	177
Louis Agassiz	219
Magic of a Kiss, The	21
Moment for Revenge, The—Alice Williams Brotherton	293
New Year Thought, A—E. T. L.	219
Opportunity—J. V. B.	191
Our Lives	219
Playing in Earnest—E. T. L.	233
Proverb Sermons—J. V. B.	80, 93
Snow Bound—Sarah M. Bailey	325
Some Real Fairies—E. T. L.	290
"Some Real Work"	32
Souls of the Roses, The—Lucy L. Stout	245
Talk of the Horse Chestnuts, The—H. F. F.	257
Wanted—A Little Girl—Ella Wheeler Wilcox	177
Wedding in the Garden, A	43
Where Flowers Came From	219
Which Loved Best—Joy Allison	257
Woman and Artist—Alice Williams Brotherton	9
Youthful Old Age—Selected	9

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

Bread Words of God, The—J. G. Townsend, D.D.	44
Justice—J. L. Jones	303
Love—J. L. Jones	322
Religion not Theology—John C. Learned	217

CONFERENCES.

Illinois Conference of Unitarian and other Independent Societies	115
New Minnesota Conference, The—Mary E. Hale	163
Report of the Directors' Meeting of the W. W. U. C.	188
Sunday School Institute, The—Ellen T. Leonard	196
Treasurer's Report of the W. W. U. C.—Mrs. J. C. Hilton	189

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

10, 22, 34, 46, 58, 70, 82, 94, 106, 118, 130, 142, 154, 166, 178, 192, 206, 220, 234, 246, 258, 270, 282, 294, 310, 326.
---	--

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

11, 23, 35, 47, 59, 71, 83, 95, 107, 119, 131, 143, 155, 167, 179, 193, 207, 221, 235, 247, 259, 261, 272, 285, 311, 327.
---	--

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MARCH 5, 1887.

[NUMBER 1.]

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—

NOTES: Good Womanliness; the Tests of Love; the Poet's Mission; the Open Court ; a Letter from Nova Scotia; Doctor Bartol's Anniversary; the Secret of Greek Culture; the Death of Jesse Fell; Thoughts on Immortal Life; Church Furnishing; James Russell Lowell's Visit.....	3
Volume Nineteen	4
Shame!—W. C. G.	5
The Relation of Doctrine to Life—J. C. L.	5

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES—

Out to the Sea.—EUGENE ASHTON	6
The Free Method of Harvard Divinity School, and Doctor Channing's Endowment of it—WILLIAM H. SAVARY.....	6

My Prayer—SARAH E. BURTON.....	8
What is a Noble Life. A Tribute to Doctor Eliot.—A. JUDSON RICH.....	8
The Fellowship of the Spirit—J. N. SPRIGG.....	9
Friends Known and Unknown.....	9

THE STUDY TABLE—

"Sir Philip Sidney"; "Recollections of Eminent Men"; "The Story of the Normans"; "Through the Gates of Gold"; "College Songs"; "Song Classics"; Young Days	10
---	----

THE HOME—

Hand Stories.—J. V. B.	11
-----------------------------	----

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.....	12
---------------------------	----

ANNOUNCEMENTS.....	12
--------------------	----

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

A large proportion of the subscriptions to UNITY expire with the current number. Subscribers are respectfully requested to examine the address label on their papers, and if the date opposite their name is March 1, '87, or anything earlier, to send in their renewals at once without waiting for a special notice from us.

It is also hoped that many of our subscribers will send us new names with their own renewals, and as an inducement to this we shall extend to May 1, 1887, the following offers previously made in these columns:

1.—To any one sending us a new name and $1.50 for UNITY one year, and 13 cents additional for postage, we will send as a premium a copy of Theodore Parker's "Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man," as described elsewhere in the advertising columns of this paper.

2.—To any one sending us a new name and 50 cents in payment of a four months' trial subscription to UNITY, we will send, free of postage, a copy of the new volume of sermons by Jenkin Lloyd Jones, entitled "Practical Piety," the retail price of which is 30 cents.

Both of the foregoing offers apply either to present subscribers or to others into whose hands this number of UNITY may fall.

Remittances may be made at our risk in postal orders, bank drafts on Chicago or New York, or American or U. S. Express orders, payable to

CHARLES H. KERR & CO.,

175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

3824

THE OPEN COURT:

(A FORTNIGHTLY JOURNAL.)

PUBLISHED EVERY OTHER THURSDAY,

— AT —

175 LA SALLE ST., - CHICAGO,

BY THE OPEN COURT PUBLISHING COMPANY.

B. F. Underwood (formerly Editor of the Index),
Editor and Manager.

Sara A. Underwood, Associate Editor.

THE OPEN COURT, continuing the work of The Index, will aim to establish Ethics and Religion on the basis of Science; in the furtherance of this object encouraging the freest and fullest discussion, by able thinkers, of all the great moral, religious, social and philosophical questions now engaging the attention of thoughtful minds. Editorially it will be thoroughly independent, asserting its own convictions with frankness and vigor. It will endeavor to substitute for unquestioning credulity intelligent inquiry, for blind faith rational religious views, for unreasoning bigotry a liberal spirit, and for sectarianism a broad humanitarianism. While the critical work still needed in this transitional period will not be neglected, the most prominence will be given to the positive, affirmative side of modern thought. Subjects of practical interest will have preference over questions of pure speculation, although the latter, with their fascination for many minds, which as Lewes says, "the unequivocal failure of twenty centuries" has not sufficed to destroy, will receive adequate attention.

The new journal will aim to be broad and liberal, in the best sense, and to keep the banner of truth and reason waving above the distractions, party contentions, theological controversies, and social and political crazes of the hour, submitting all opinions to careful scrutiny, and recalling men from their aberrations to sanity and the pathway of truth.

Among the contributors to THE OPEN COURT are M. D. Conway, W. J. Potter, James Parton, Geo. Jacob Holyoake, M. J. Savage, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Edwin D. Mead, W. D. Gunning, Rowland Connor, Felix L. Oswald, John W. Chadwick, Ednah D. Cheney, Fred. May Holland, Thomas Davidson and Edmund Montgomery.

Terms: $3.00 per year; single copies fifteen cents.

Make all remittances payable to B. F. Underwood and address OPEN COURT, P. O. drawer F, Chicago, Ill.

TABLE OF CONTENTS OF THE OPEN COURT FOR FEB. 17.

SPECIAL CONTRIBUTIONS—	PAGE.
Society and the Individual. Wm. J. Potter	1
The Need for Free Thought Education. Thomas Davidson	3
Katzenjammer. W. D. Gunning	4
King Voltaire. Frederick May Holland	6
Monism in Modern Philosophy and the Agnostic Attitude of Mind. Edward Montgomery	9
The Two Hemispheres. B. W. Ball	11
Ethnological Studies. Theodore Stanton	13
Aphorisms from the Study. Xenos Clark	14
EDITORIALS—
Salutatory	15
Notes	16
ESSAY AND DISCUSSION—
The Basis of Ethics. Edward C. Hegeler	18
Remarks by Messrs. Prussing, Stern, Underwood and Zimmerman	22
CORRESPONDENCE—
A Letter from our Jerusalem Correspondent. "Special"	24
BOOK NOTICES—
To the Poet Laureate	27
Ein Leben in Liedern Gedichte eines Heimathlosen	27
The Sunday Law of Massachusetts	27
Mind	27
The Art Amateur	27
MISCELLANEOUS—
Unaware—Poem. Franklin—Extract from Lecture	28

A Book of Rare Value.

THE

CONSOLATIONS OF SCIENCE

OR, CONTRIBUTIONS FROM SCIENCE TO THE HOPE OF IMMORTALITY; AND KINDRED THEMES.

—BY—

JACOB STRAUB, A. M.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

HIRAM W. THOMAS, D. D.

READ WHAT IS SAID OF IT.

"The book is a most elevated and worthy one."—The Advance.

"The argument is ingenious, fair and conclusive."—The Examiner, N. Y.

"Able written and should be read by all interested in the subject."—Unity.

"Will accomplish much toward a union of earth and heaven."—Prof. D. Sving.

"Masterly in its criticisms."—Noah Porter, D. D., LL. D., Pres't Yale College.

"Has brought an immense amount of evidence in support of his position."—The Interior.

"A most substantial contribution to the literature of science and religion."—The Universalist.

"Deserves a cordial welcome from all thoughtful and cultivated minds."—Universalist Quarterly.

"This work is one of the most valuable that has come from the press in these later years."—Gospel Banner.

"The aim of the volume is praiseworthy, and its accomplishment most admirable."—Geo. C. Lorimer, D. D.

"Written with remarkable balance of judgment, with ample learning in the field it traverses."—The Standard.

"I find it hard to remember when I have been so pleased with a work of this kind."—Rev. Robert Collier.

"It supplies a want which pastors, in answering questions concerning the future life, have long felt."—Prof. Lee, D. D., St. Lawrence University.

"It will dispel the fears of those who may be wavering in faith, and strengthen the confidence and belief of the Christian heart."—The Christian at Work.

"Our conviction is that Mr. Straub is right, and if right, the fact is as important as any that could be expressed in words."—The Christian World, London.

"While it cannot fail to be a welcome instructor to all, it will possess especial value to those who are seeking light for the guidance of others."—A. A. Miner, D. D., LL. D., Ex-Pres't Tufts College.

"I have for many years steadfastly held in public and in private the same general conclusions as those which you have so forcibly sustained."—Thomas Hill, D. D., LL. D., Ex-Pres't Harvard University.

The work is an exhaustive argument for immortality from the standpoint of science alone, and no one who is troubled with doubt should be without the instruction which this volume supplies. What could be a more appropriate present to place in the hand of a friend? It is printed and bound in the best art of book making, contains 435 octavo pages.

Price $2.00.

. For sale by booksellers generally, or mailed, on receipt of price, by the publishers.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO.,

175 Dearborn st., Chicago.

"Unity Short Tracts."

Published from the Office of UNITY, 175 Dearborn Street Chicago.

Post-paid, 1 Cent each, 30 to 60 Cents a Hundred.

1. Unitarian Affirmations. (60 cts. a hundred. Three series. 1) Radical. 2) Middle Ground. 3) Conservative.
2. A Blessing on the Day. By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts. a hundred.)
3. A Shell of the Liberal Faith. (30 cts. a hundred.) Twenty-four books described, with prices.
4. The Art of Married Life. By George S. Merriam (60 cts.)
5. Jesus. By S. J. Barrows. (30 cts.)
6. The Faiths of Evolution. By William J. Potter (60 cts.)
7. A Negative and Doubting Gospel. By A. Walkley. (30 cts.)
8. Channing, the Man and his Message. By W. C. G. (60 cts.)
9. The Hell of Evolution. By John R. Effinger (30 cts.)
10. Unitarianism in a Nut-Shell. (30 cts.)
11. Channing and the Unitarian Movement in America. By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts.)
12. The Manliness of Christ. By J. L. Jones (30 cts.)
13. Blessed be Druggery! By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts.)
14. Deathlessness. By J. L. J. and W. C. G. (60 cts.)
15. A Tract Directory. Prepared for the use of Post Office Mission Workers. (60 cts.)

WE WANT YOU! a live energetic man or woman needing profitable employment to represent us in every county. Salary $75 per month and expenses, or a large commission on sales if preferred. Goods staple. Every one buys. Outfit and particulars Free. STANDARD SILVERWARE CO., BOSTON, MASS.

Horsford's ACID PHOSPHATE (LIQUID)

A preparation of the phosphates of lime, magnesia, potash and iron, with phosphoric acid in such form as to be readily assimilated by the system.

Prepared according to the directions of Prof. E. N. Horsford, of Cambridge, Mass.

FOR DYSPEPSIA, Mental and Physical Exhaustion, Weakened Energy, Nervousness, Indigestion, Etc.

Universally recommended and prescribed by physicians of all schools.

Its action will harmonize with such stimulants as are necessary to take.

It is the best tonic known, furnishing sustenance to both brain and body.

It makes a delicious drink with water and sugar only.

Invigorating, Strengthening, Healthful, Refreshing.

Prices Reasonable. Pamphlet giving further particulars mailed free. Manufactured by the RUMFORD CHEMICAL WORKS, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

Highest Awards of Medals in Europe and America.

The neatest, quickest, safest and most powerful remedy known for Rheumatism, Pleurisy, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Backache, Weakness, colds in the chest, and all aches and pains. Endorsed by 5,000 Physicians and Druggists of the highest repute. Benson's Plasters promptly relieve and cure where other plasters and greasy salves, liniments and lotions are absolutely useless. Beware of imitations under similar sounding names, such as "Capsicum," "Capucin," "Capelaine," as they are utterly worthless and intended to deceive. Ask for BENSON'S and TAKE NO OTHERS. All druggists. SEABURY & JOHNSON, Proprietors, N. Y.

Theodore Parker's

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

SELECTED FROM NOTES OF UNPUBLISHED SERMONS, BY RUFUS LEIGHTON. CLOTH, 12MO, PP. 430; REDUCED FROM $2.50 to $1.25.

"This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. * * * The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS.
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

WHAT IS IT TO BE A CHRISTIAN?

A Sermon by Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Pastor of All Souls (Unitarian) Church, Chicago. Price, 5 cents, 10 copies, 25 cents, postpaid. CHARLES H. KERR & CO. Publishers, 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

JAN 8 1908

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MARCH 5, 1887.

[NUMBER 1.

EDITORIALS.

"I LOOK with positive reverence, sometimes, on my patient maid of all work, and admire the moral attitude in which she meets her daily round of unutterably wearisome detail." So writes a friend. Good womanliness!

"You say of love, the proof is that it overmasters other passions," etc. True, I often say. Don't tell me that a person does unkindness because he does not know. It is not knowledge that is wanting, but love. If he loved that would give him eyes to see what was right to do. Love sees; love guides. It is so, friend. Love is the "circle of sciences"—cyclopedia.

"It is the poet's highest mission to see things and people, not as we mud-eyed ones see them, but, so to speak, as God sees them, in their possibilities—as he in his mind conceived them when he gave them the privilege to be." Yes, truly. But then the clay is only on the outside of the eye; nay, we may draw instruction from the man in whom Jesus cured blindness with some clay. "Every man his own poet," ought to be the motto.

THE Open Court, whose prospectus appears in our advertising columns, is before us, a handsome paper of thirty-two pages, Nation size. Both in appearance and matter it is attractive. That the leading articles are by William J. Potter, Thomas Davidson, Gunning, and Fred May Holland, is sufficient evidence of the dignity, earnestness and ability of the paper. There cannot be too much or too open a discussion of the questions with which the Open Court is to concern itself; consequently we bid it a hearty welcome.

A LETTER from a distant friend and subscriber in Nova Scotia brings the following: "I believe there are not a few who are more or less skeptical as to the doctrines they listen to every Sunday. But so far as I can judge, they lack either the courage or inclination to search for truth at any cost. As for myself, not long ago, I was superintendent of an Episcopalian Sunday-school; to-day I am a liberal of UNITY type, or rather this is what I aspire to,—the breadth, the courage, and withal the reverence which characterizes it. * * * I consider the stand UNITY has recently taken is a right and noble one. * * * Your efforts will not be fruitless. Press on!"

WE greet the dear Doctor whose face has so long been sunlight on the Boston streets, and whose word has so long been a quaint, prompt rally for the right and true and free,—Dr. Cyrus A. Bartol. His friends on March 1 joined to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his pastorate with them, and the one hundred and fiftieth of their church. A strayed angel in an old cloak, a stranger might say, meeting his figure on the sidewalk; a very shrewd reporter from some spirit-world picking up facts and comments in this one, friends have found him. In other words, outside and inside have tallied well. The fifty years' errand, since as a boy he first stepped to the pulpit side of Dr. Lowell, the poet's father,—is it over? We hope not; but if he rests, still some men go on errands sitting down. We congratulate "the West Church of Boston," too, on its long illustration of freedom in religion. A hundred and thirty years ago it led that cause in Boston, which is saying that it led it in America. Jonathan Mayhew its minister, was so free that his comrades, the other city pastors, declined to assist in his ordination. "His thought was more precise, and his words more clearly matched his thought, than was common at that time in the pulpit. Where his brethren disapproved, he denounced, creed-making; where they practiced the right of private judgment in religion, he strenuously urged the duty; where they disbelieved, he boldly denied, the doctrines of total depravity and justification by mere faith." That was in the fifties of the last century. May the church in some form live to see the fifties of the next, and all the way along keep on making their old tradition new history!

GOETHE, speaking of the ancients, says, that "with all their heart and soul they threw themselves on the present; hence, it would not be difficult for writers who were filled with a kindred spirit to make such a present eternal." Edward Caird, speaking of Goethe, and referring to this view, calls the Greeks the people "who were most at home in the world," and he concludes, as Goethe does, that this fact is the foundation of the glory and supremacy of the Grecian literature. This is worthy of thought, and connects literary beauty of form with pure and simple religion; for what does such religion but enforce the divinity of the present, and teach us in the highest way to be at home in the world?

THIS week it is our church at Bloomington that mourns the loss of a faithful and long-serving member in the death of Jesse Fell, a man whose long career in the state is interwoven with all that is best and most thrilling in its history,—a colleague of Lincoln and David Davis and Ichabod Coddington. He helped shape the state, build its railways, found its great University at Bloomington. He fought the battle for freedom to the colored race, and was fighting the battle for the higher freedom of soul. He died with the words of Pope's universal prayer upon his lips. He was a representative of the material out of which many of our liberal churches have sprung. With such material how shallow and flippant seem many of the charges that are ignorantly made against these liberal churches of the West.

FROM a friend we have the following high and right thoughts on immortal life. Many a saint and sage has said the same, but it cannot be said too often or in too many ways: "Life should be worth as much here as elsewhere. Acts should be their own reward. By doing our best, we make sure of the present, and if life continue, as we firmly believe, then we are in line for whatever is vouchsafed. Here, there, everywhere, we should do right for its own sake, regardless of consequences. We should not hire others or ourselves to be just, kind, self-sacrificing. There should be no barter on earth or in the spheres. Certain consequences follow all acts. Let us see to it that we do not distort or becloud principle by driving hard bargains in thrones, crowns and upper seats, in the realms unseen. The humility which encourages us to be content with a low seat, saves us from mortification, envy and heart-burn. Others may have position, fine raiment, precious stones, all that heredity, rank, superior ability can give. We are glad if they merit and enjoy them, but we can do without, and yet appropriate what is germane, robs no one, and suits us better. God and heaven, as we term them, are rock, object, inspiration. Minus both, right and wrong would be the same and worthy our grandest efforts, Humanity is worth all our pains as integer or group. We could not soberly ask the question, 'Is Life worth Living.' We will add, as our friend would, that, however, God and heaven cannot be parted from right and wrong. For righteousness is living, and life is blessedness.

J. V. B.

ONE of the most attractive features in the interior of the Manistee church, the dedication of which is spoken of elsewhere, was the cozy, sumptuous way in which the parlor is furnished. This was done without any investment of funds on the part of the building committee, but by contributions in kind, by different members of the parish. This gentleman brought an easy chair, that woman a rug, one a vase, another a picture, here a bracket, there an easel, and yonder a stand. Pretty chairs, crickets, anything that would make home-like this common home. This is a suggestion for many of our churches, whose so called "parlors" are cold, raw, barn-like things for want of these home touches. Try it, friends, only let there be some central source of taste and authority, that will secure that blending of effects and harmony which bespeaks refinement as well as liberality.

IN Robert Browning's last book he describes the good Painter-Priest Furini, as one who prompt would supply a picture which throngs would crowd to witness to any little parish in his valley that

"felt qualms
At worship offered in bare walls, without
The comfort of a picture."

Second even is the architectural grandeur of the churches of Europe to the art treasures which hang or have hung on their walls within. Why is it, then, that the wooden prejudice of modern Protestantism still excludes from the walls of the churches the art of all arts that both decorates and educates, feasts at once the eye and soul, the art that expresses itself in pictures? What can so effectually change an auditorium into an oratory, thereby translating the listener into a worshiper, as a proper use of the faces historical and ideal that are most nearly related to the Ideal Life? We were glad to see at Manistee the faces of Channing, Parker, Bellows, Emerson and others suspended on the walls of the audience room. The first two were excellent crayon wrought by local artists. We hope that this example, also, will be followed by others. When our churches reach after the real art, they will soon outgrow the flashy, oarse, sham art of the "decorator" that to-day compels so many would-be cultured souls to worship under what Lowell calls the "vaulted roofs

Of plaster, painted like an Indian squaw."

THE event of the season in Chicago was the visit of James Russell Lowell. He came as the guest of the Union League club to help them celebrate in a fitting manner Washington's birthday. In the evening he was banqueted in the elegant new building of the club, as he was subsequently by the Harvard and Commercial clubs. In the afternoon he made his only public appearance before as cultivated and enthusiastic an audience as was ever gathered in Chicago. The great Central Music Hall was crowded. The audience came expecting to hear him speak on "American Politics," a subject that was widely advertised. But, as all our readers know, at the last moment, he concluded to change his topic and gave a literary criticism, in which he argued the non-Shakespearean authorship of Richard the Third. The disappointment of the audience was keen. At any other time, or if duly announced, it would have been equally glad to do him honor, in listening to his matchless English in the essay given. After the disappointment has worn away, Chicago people will still be glad to believe that James Russell Lowell is easily the first of living Americans: noble in scholarship, authorship and patriotism,—the man who would be our next President, were it not for the fact that the United States never uses first-class material to make Presidents of, except by accident. However, this Chicago experience shows that great men, as well as small men, cannot with impunity tamper with their public engagements.

Volume Nineteen.

Another birthday. With this number UNITY begins its tenth year. Sobered by the hard work, and sometimes saddened by the knocks and pinches these nine years have brought, it still looks rejoicingly forward. The hard work was anticipated, and the knocks and pinches have not been greater than must be expected, by those who accept the unpopular and choose to work for and with the minority. UNITY confidently faces the future; it believes the cause for which it came into the world is still in need of an advocate, and for this cause it will continue its "unhastening" and "unresting" work. So far as it lies in the power of the senior editor, he will hold these columns steadily to the enforcement and interpretation of our motto, to the emphasizing of the non-doctrinal basis of fellowship, the inseparability of religion and morals, the identification of the kingdom of truth, righteousness and love, with the kingdom of God; and to the fostering of all organizations and co-operations that seek to further these ends. We will continue our efforts to apply the sanctions of religion to the triumphs of mind, in art, science and letters.

Mindful of our defects, grateful to the friends who have generously helped us with suggestions, criticisms, and contributions, in the past, we go forward on lines already established, craving the patience, persistence and push of all old friends, and many new ones. Our intentions in the future cannot be better indicated than by reiterating previous proclamations. On March 1, 1878, in the first number ever published, we said: "It will be our aim to make each number stand for real Freedom of mind, for real Fellowship between differing minds, and, as most important of all, for Character, as the test and essence of religion."

On March 1, 1879, we said: "The theologic doctrine of the unity of God, from which the name came, has led logically and historically to a belief in the unity of all religion, and of the race. So we have long been wont, in pronouncing the word Unitarianism, to pass lightly over the arianism, and lay all the emphasis on the Unite. And now, gladly dropping the ism and every trace of sectarian hiss, and returning to the root of the word, in which its historic meaning and real spirit lie, we proclaim our faith in Unity. . . . Our paper aims to be faithful to this rising truth: the unity of religions in righteousness, the unity of men with each other and with nature, and the unity of all in God. For this truth of unity will in turn prove itself a gospel, bringing a larger charity and a wiser life to men. But though thus proclaiming the broadest religion, UNITY will not the less assert its own opinions. Its charity will not be 'the mush of concession,' but will seek to give 'manly furtherance' to the right and 'manly resistance' to the wrong. Being unsectarian, it will necessarily be to some extent anti-sectarian. Seeing the necessity, rights and value of sects, it will not the less oppose the pretensions of sects who claim a monopoly of truth and salvation. It will contend not only against injustice and vice, but against narrowness and shallowness. This, too, its name demands. In doing this it will be helping to confirm the religion of truth, justice and human brotherhood, and to bring 'the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.'"

On March 1, 1885, we said: "The great words it placed upon its banner seven years ago, of 'FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION,' are still its inspiration and its justification, and though in some quarters they may suffer as 'Aristides the Just' did from too frequent mention, they still represent to us the central things in religion, and imply all the essential elements of true piety. There is no danger of too much emphasis being placed on any one of them. We shall refuse in the future, as in the past, to enter the field of dogmatic controversy. . . . We decline, not because there is no fight in us, but because we remember how the Christian centuries have been burdened, and to a certain extent blighted, by theological controversy. We will not willingly increase the amount of useless discussion. We have continued sympathy with truth-seekers, but none with chronic debaters. We hope in a small way to continue to help the former, and we intend to continue to disappoint the latter. We shall continue to have great interest in the Unitarian movement, little interest in the Unitarian sect. We shall continue to emphasize its principles of free thought, inclusive fellowship, practical righteousness, and progress much more than its doctrines concerning the Trinity, atonement, or interpretations of Bible texts. Glad and proud of its history, UNITY is by no means contented with the present attainment of the Unitarian fellowship. It is far from being the inspiring, consecrated and consecrating movement which its principles demand. We shall continue steadily to oppose any attempts to narrow its boundaries or to set up dogmatic fences to keep its piety in, or to keep honest thought and earnest inquiry out. As with the word 'Unitarian,' so with the words 'Christian' and 'Christianity.' We gladly, gratefully recognize the fact that we are in the rich stream of Christian inheritance, by far the noblest stream of historic religion that has ever flowed through the fields of humanity. We revere its founder, would magnify the beauty of his life and the breadth of his sympathies. We expect great victories yet to be won under these names and this teacher, and we want to do our part in the struggle. We wish to enlarge its 'hunger and thirst after righteousness;' but we resent any tendency to use these words as dogmatic barriers to faith, or as a doctrinal test of the religious life; we will not use them to sever us from the kindling prophets of other religious movements; we will not enter into a war of syllables; we much prefer the thing without the name to the name without the thing. If love, justice, truth, practically applied everywhere, and always, among all men and in all religions, is Christianity, then we are Christian; but if Christianity is this with a dogmatic 'but' and a sectarian 'if' attached, we reject the 'but' and the 'if.' If to believe in the Golden Rule, to emphasize the Beatitudes, and to feel the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man, is to be followers of Jesus, we humbly desire to be worthy such fellowship; but if in addition to this we are expected to assent to certain theological formulas regarding his exclusive claim, miraculous power or super-human nature, we refuse, preferring the faith of Jesus to any such a faith in Jesus. We are well aware that in choosing this line of work UNITY accepts the harder and more solitary road. The interest in doctrinal discussion is still greater than in moral culture, and it is much easier to write entertaining editorials about the Athanasian Creed or the Pope at Rome, than it is to interest any large number of men and women in kindergartens, temperance, civil-service reform, the poetry of Lowell and Emerson, the maturing and the building and maintenance of churches that are to be high schools of character, academies of moral culture and colleges of goodwill to all men. It is well to arouse an antagonism to error, and in our small way we will do our best at this; but it is better and far more difficult to create a hospitality to truth, and this will be our prime end. To this work UNITY pledges itself anew, and asks the continued patronage and forbearance of those who believe that this work is worth doing."

Shame!

A gentleman of the Unitarian Club, in Boston, has again been caricaturing the men and women who, last May, in Cincinnati, voted that "The Western Conference bases its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all thereto who wish to join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world." "The western movement," which may be summarized in this act of fellowship and its defense, this man describes as that of "a large body of men who scout at the very name of the Almighty," . . . "a body who try to build up a church as Unitarian, which denies God, Christ and Christianity." We quote the Boston Herald's report. And his sentences to this effect were received, the paper says, with "applause." With applause, we do not doubt, by some; and with silent shame, we are sure, by others. We think that in that club there should have been at least one voice to utter at the time a cry of "Shame!" at the slander,—slander none the less that the speaker spoke probably in ignorance, not in malice. The truthless word disgraced the speaker, the applause disgraced the club, and the echoes disgrace and hurt the Unitarianism these men would fain protect. If our chief misrepresentatives, the comrades to whom we owe our trouble, have ever said this thing, so much the worse for them; but we think they in set words have denied it. This, however, is the effect of their misrepresentings on the minds of the less thoughtful part of the Unitarian public, whom no words of our own, except as "snippets," reach. Not what the Western Conference and its friends have said so much as what others have said of us, has furnished the new arrow-points to orthodoxy and the new epitaphs it will write for Unitarianism.

And just in proportion as that applause was general and significant and illustrates the Unitarianism of to-day, should we at the west speak, speak until we are understood, speak till we convert. Not silence, but speech, is the need. We should be statesmen and not politicians in this trouble; should look for permanent, not passing, cure; should try to settle it in a way that will be more acceptable next year than this, and far more accepted ten years hence than one year hence. Let us bear quietly the caricature and misrepresentation—quietly, but not dumbly; be careful to give none back; explain and re-explain as need be; stand firmly by our faith, work for a high peace, not a low peace,—and wait the ten years for our thanks.

W. C. G.

The Relation of Doctrine to Life.

Coleridge said, "The false doctrine does not necessarily make a man a heretic, but an evil heart can make any doctrine heretical." This puts heresy where it belongs—in the motive. Fundamentally it is in the bad character, not in the bad logic. There have been abundant instances of bad thinking and right living; false and irrational creeds clung to with all the desperation of narrow-minded fear, and yet really lying outside the motives of daily service, worn only as the picture of some dead relative, or as some charm is worn—outside the blameless heart. And on the other hand there have been those accepting doctrines true enough, enlisted perhaps in some sort of defense of them; but in the great world's scramble for greed and power, it did not appear that these doctrines had any influence to restrain their speech from the too common custom of untruthfulness and deceit, or their hands from over-reaching and injustice.

"As is the worth of the individual so is the worth of his religion," is quoted from Amiel's "Journal." A New Testament apostle seems to imply that not even devils are destitute of religion. They may even have orthodox views of God. But that does not help them, or make them one whit better—because it can find no entrance or lodgement in their life. The devils believe in God—they cannot help that; but like the English socialist, they are against Him. They tremble and shake when they think of him, but they go on as devils all the same.

Matthew Arnold utters the same thought when he says: "The worth of what a man thinks about God and the objects of religion depends upon what the man is." Valuable as right thinking is (and we are the last to underrate it), and essential as it is as an ally to the highest form of life, yet in religion the question of motive, of character, is supreme and unavoidable. No matter what you can tell me about God or the great mysteries of time and eternity, of life and death, I shall measure all that profound and incomparable knowledge or faith of yours by its effect upon your life. If it has not helped you to become any better man,—if it has not absolutely compelled you to be a better man, I have no assurance that it will help me or anybody else to be a better man; and from a religious standpoint I am indifferent to the result. I may just as well keep my poor old crazy creed with all its shortcomings and falsehoods, so long as I can find any excuse for assenting to it.

It is not difficult to see what responsibility this puts upon men to prove their faith by fair conduct, by deeds of humble and true living. And when they make profession of interest in character as the object of our church life, it must make us seek and find its realization in those sentiments of honor and fidelity, in those acts of self-denial and service, which reveal character at its best.

Our attitude in belonging to a new movement in the religious world makes it necessary for us to dissent from the theological opinions of those about us. We do not do this in any reckless way, or in any boasting spirit. We do not dissent for the sake of dissent. We should rather be able to agree; and but for the sake of sincerity and the interests of truth as we see them, we should have no distinct organization of our own. Nevertheless any benefit which we can receive from the position we occupy, and which many are now coming to occupy, will always depend upon what we are. Do we see the value to life of the great truths entrusted to our keeping? Do we see what joy and relief and inspiration they will yet pour into souls that grope and struggle after that freedom which we have inherited or won? Mr. Frothingham has told us that "to reject consecrated opinion demands a consecrated mind." Yes, this is true. Departing from the old and hallowed is a solemn thing. It is like worship. Rejection of error must be an act of reverence, an act of the deepest sincerity,—especially when it is an error about which cluster sacred associations running back into the mists of time, perhaps dating from those nights when first we knelt at our mother's knee.

We read that God was not offended with the offerings, gross as they were, in the old Jewish worship, but with the offerers, with the men who could go straightway thereafter to their extortions and their sins. So God is not displeased when we reject any falsehoods, however long taught or venerated under the name of religion. But if we take this divinest gift of truth with no deep sense of its importance, with no purpose or longing to realize it in life, or share it with those who are thirsting and perishing for it, He will not hold us guiltless.

J. C. L.

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES.

Out to the Sea.

"Out to the sea! Out to the sea!"
Sing the waters of inland rivers;
From source to mouth
In the sunny South,
The liquid stream-song quivers.

"Down through the blue! Down through the blue!"
Sings the moonlight's silver sheen;
"Thy breast must bear
No greater care
Than purest light e'er seen."

"Sisters are we! Sisters are we!"
In a harmony sing the twain.
"Toward ocean we float,
Nor sail nor boat
To guide us toward the main."

"Careless are we! Careless are we!"
Of shores we pass in flowing.

We bid them smile
As we pass the while,
But cannot stay our going."

"Oceans are vast! Oceans are vast!"
And the currents playing among them
Forbid us to stay,
But call us away;
Think of our songs—we have sung them."

"Lessons are learned? Lessons are learned?"
From the waters and moonlight flowing
Out to the sea
In harmony;
Like sisters in their going."

EUGENE ASHTON.

The Free Method of the Harvard Divinity School, and Doctor Channing's Endowment of it.

It is an interesting matter to us to-day who love liberal religion to know somewhat more of the history of theological instruction at Cambridge.

The present Andover contention gives occasion to us to recognize anew the leadership of the great and rare man to whose genius liberal Christianity owes so much.

At the institution of the Divinity School of Harvard University, in 1826, there was an earnest liberal movement among the New England churches. There came a united protest of the educated clergy against the uses to which the orthodox majority were trying to bind down sound learning and original investigation.

Does not history repeat itself? Doctor Channing spoke at the dedication of Divinity Hall in unsurpassed sentences of wisdom. "The mind grows by free action," said he. "Freedom is the nurse of moral and intellectual vigor. To free inquiry, then, we dedicate these walls. We invite into them the ingenuous young man who prizes liberty of mind more than aught within the gift of sects or the world. Let heaven's free air circulate and heaven's unobstructed light shine here; and let those who shall be sent hence go forth not to echo with servility a creed imposed on their weakness, but to utter in their own manly tones what their own free investigation and deep conviction urge them to preach as the truth of God."

The Divinity School of Harvard College had a rare founding. The school as shaped under Channing deserves the most earnest publication of its nature and offices. Its basis is a ground and rock and pillar of the future American church. The foundation of instruction in theology at Harvard College especially encourages the unsectarian method. The peculiar conditions of admission to the Cambridge Divinity School are these: Students must bring testimonials of serious character; must know a certain amount of Latin and Greek; and beyond these things are absolutely invited to be free. During the sixty years of the existence of the Cambridge Divinity School some of those graduated have owned the Covenant of the Orthodox. But the great body of the Divinity Alumni are Liberals. And a popular though incorrect impression prevails that a sect name is indissolubly associated with the Divinity School professorships and endowments. This condition of things arose of necessity. At first, there were none to be found emancipated and enlightened to the degree of supporting the principle of free and thorough investigation; none ready to say, Christianity has open questions, has unsolved truths; more light is yet to break out of the study of the works and the Word of God.

The denomination known now as Unitarian found itself obliged to nurse, to foster, to own, the teachings of the Cambridge Divinity School. American Unitarians, suspected of heresy, ecclesiastically disowned, for sixty years owe two-thirds of their educated clergy, and as in some sense, the intellectual party of the church, to this school. Unitarian theology is precisely the outcome of the free method at Cambridge. By the very laws of their existence, the now venerable theological schools at Andover, at Newton, at New Haven, at Princeton, enthrone, or authorize, a narrow, unscientific study and intellectual discipline.

It fell to William Ellery Channing, even as a very young man, to lead the protest of the intellectual activity and moral independence of the New England of seventy-five years ago against dominant ecclesiastical shackles and bonds and bigotry. The facts connected with the rise of the liberal cause are now most interesting.

It is true, that old England had prepared this genesis of free inquiry. There was an English and also a French literature of liberal religious thinking to which the unbelieving or the truth seeking-minds of seventy-five years ago looked. But it fell to Cambridge men to begin the fermenting of the New England church controversy. Out of our modern Cambridge sprang the American Liberal theology! Is not that method indispensable? Suppose all the Protestant sects try to-day to educate for the church. What they do at their very best as religious believers disappoints the urgent necessity of the enlightened human mind. Do not Presbyterianism, sectarian Congregationalism, Methodism, as such, set at naught the principles of sound learning? Is not sectarian Christianity ineffective?

Here are the qualities, and here is the spirit of it. It always says "to doubt is to everlastingly perish." Young persons who are applicants to theological schools must begin as believers, as converts, as born again, as pledged to a creed, as advocates of a creed. If they seek for foundations, if they would delve as miners, picking to pieces the very substance of thought-systems and Bible lore, they are undone as strict Baptists, or sound Presbyterians, or true Methodists, or right Congregationalists. The Sects, as it were, of primary necessity must assume premises, own a derived spiritual life, speak by the book, or the hierarchy. The orthodox conception of religion may be likened to ocean transportation; the Evangelical "scheme of salvation" suggests our lines of steamships on the high seas. The distinctive business is that of celestial ferriage.

Religion as a spiritual education, religion as true use of earth, religion as the process of giving the nature of manhood to mankind, is almost wholly dismissed. But the great satisfaction of studying the laws of moral and spiritual disease and health; the exalting of what we may become; the quest of the true origin, conduct and destiny of man: this is a great matter. It signifies something.

As soon as we say all is revelation whereby we know God, or see God, the sundry times and divers manners by which God has spoken are great. Augustine's time, or Athanasius's or Calvin's manner, sound learning, sound doctrine, are death smitten. There are, as Doctor Channing enumerated and proclaimed in his great sermon of the "Christian Ministry," certain conditions and sources of effectiveness. The average Christian ministry is of a wide education. These are the great essentials of an able ministry, and an enlightened church. The necessity of the adequately furnished and strong ministry are these, as Doctor Channing specified them: (1) free inquiry; (2) supreme love of truth; (3) religious feeling; (4) faith; (5) the spirit of reform; (6) independence; (7) moral courage; (8) the spirit of self-sacrifice.

Is it not the office of theological education to inform and emancipate a man with these? No sectarianizing Divinity School dares to write over the doors and to proclaim, "Think, O young inquirer, for yourself! Prove all things; obey nothing on the 'I say so' of the church!" What can be called free inquiry, transparent honesty, the verification of facts, the forming of opinions, isolated quest, individual study, are the very opposite of seminary drill to make the sect prosper. The offers of the sects to the mind, the deliberate choosing to acquire or to master systematic Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist or Baptist theology, tends to intellectually confine and constrain. It belongs to the traditional church systems to encourage and approve distrust of original discovery, private individual exploration. "Hear this, believe thus and so, O, soul on fire with high affection!" Are you about to study the Bible, or to become a church member, or, "to live for Christ," as it is called: "Refuse to act in your own strength!" "Know that your reward is in proportion to your intellectual fears and your self-distrust. "See to it that you content the mind with our safe mental yokes." "Here under our pious authority are your enclosures: we keep you; we conduct you; we prescribe for you."

If liberals only, if Unitarians only, support the principle of liberty, it is because the constitutional fears of the great churches so ordain it. And here comes in an incident of ecclesiastical Unitarian history.

Twenty or thirty years ago there was an untoward church-tremor, a spirit of fear abroad. Fear of free-reason was so influential as to even seriously afflict the very churches that, of determined good will and trust of the soul, endowed Harvard University Divinity School. A crisis came to the specific working of the principles indissolubly associated with this wisely planned institution for the furnishing of the clergy. For a time, "Cambridge Divinity" was openly condemned, of its own constituents (so to speak). The cry came that the college ought to disown, to repudiate, a school without a Christian creed. And that crisis was all that the Unitarian church itself could endure. The voices that prevailed were, "You pledge to nothing." "See your infidel bad fruits," and the sectaries had grievances such as influenced.

In 1829 Ralph Waldo Emerson entered a city pulpit (the offending transcendentalist). He grew up in the very church which founded the Cambridge Divinity School. Of the Divinity Class of 1836 came Theodore Parker; in 1843 John Weiss was graduated. There were graduated from 1845 to 1848, Francis P. Appleton, O. B. Frothingham, Samuel Johnson, Samuel Longfellow, Thomas Wentworth Higginson. These spirits (men of excellent gifts), more or less apostates, plagued the church's content with the principle of not limiting religious free inquiry; of supporting full and thorough investigation of religion. Considering the outcome of it all, how gratifying to the immediate new period to look back.

Thirty or more years ago, that sect-desire, that sect-hardening in and about Cambridge, worked its perfect work. In it was the fulness of the old ways. It was the trying ordeal of the superior wisdom, the intrinsic excellence of trusting in the soul. That season seems to have been a kind of bowing of the heavens of our church to its earth, its tabernacle of flesh. Heaven be praised for the open fact that Doctor Channing's works, Doctor Channing's rational sayings, confounded these alarmists, these retrogressives, this conscript, dry Unitarian ecclesiasticism. All that the history of the Cambridge Divinity School has produced, for the time being morally unwelcome, called in its day the ill-seasoned, the untimely fruit, Doctor Channing gloriously anticipated.

"Teach the young man," he said in 1826, "that the instructions of others are designed to quicken, not to supersede his own activity; that he has a divine intellect, for which he is to answer to God, and that to surrender it to another is to cast the crown from his own head and to yield up to another his birthright." "Encourage him," he said, "in all great questions to hear both sides, and to meet fairly the point of every hostile argument. Guard him against tampering with his own mind, against silencing its whispers and objections, that he may enjoy a favorite opinion undisturbed. Do not give him the shadow for the substance of freedom by telling him to inquire, but prescribing to him the convictions at which he must stop."

"I know the objection to this course," he continues. "It puts to hazard, we are told, the religious principles of the young. The objection is not without foundation, the danger is not unreal. But I know of no method of forming a manly intellect, or a manly character, without danger. Peril is the element in which power is developed; remove the youth from every hazard, keep him in leading strings, lest he should stray in forbidden paths; surround him with down lest he should be injured by a fall; shield him from wind and storms, and you doom him to perpetual infancy. All liberty is perilous. Freedom of will is almost a tremendous gift; but still, a free agent, with all his capacity for crimes, is infinitely more interesting and noble than the most harmonious and beautiful machine. Better expose the mind to error, than to rob it of hardihood and individuality."

Are there through the years, oracles inside of Liberal Christianity so weighty, so comprehensive, so adequate to hope and belief, to the utter rout and rupture of conservative fears?

To-day there are unsectarian Protestants. To-day the new wine is in the new bottles to be of use, and to be tasted of choice. To-day the faith of the liberal folds, the faith of unsectarian churches, administers the reconciling, the authoritative, the ascendant religion. Only the irrational, or the sacerdotal, ritually-rigid types of the instituted Christianity of Christendom, work misgivings, fellowship their fears, doubt human progress, the ascent of the soul, of the moral nature, since time began.

WILLIAM H. SAVARY.

My Prayer.

O Spirit! who to all doth bend
With the sweet comfort of a friend,
And heed the cry for help to meet
The hard ways that beset their feet.

On me a peace so true confer,
No noise of this harsh life may stir
Its deep serene, or bring one cloud
Of other lives the sun to shroud.

Give me a faith my thoughts to buoy
Upon a silent sea of joy,
Whose unseen tide may gently flow
To bless the barren lives I know.

Oh, for a love so near divine
No dearth of love may lessen mine!
No word so rude, no deed so mean
The God within may not be seen.

With these the power to see and speak
Thy helpful truth to all who seek,
In words to win, persuade and bless
That none may be left comfortless.

O Spirit! who to all doth bend
With the sweet comfort of a friend!
How vain to ask what is so free,
Have we not all in having Thee!

SARAH E. BURTON.

What Is a Noble Life?

A TRIBUTE TO DOCTOR ELIOT.

[From a sermon preached by Rev. A. J. Rich on the life of Doctor Eliot the Sunday following the announcement of his death.]

* * * And now to illustrate the daring courage and the brave manliness of Mr. Eliot, in his early ministerial life: It was more than forty years ago that what I am going to relate happened, and I have it first hand from the Doctor himself, in a long letter of a dozen pages. All will remember the name of Henry Giles, the hunchback Irish orator, who, in the days of lyceum lectures, thrilled the crowded halls in many a city in this country. It was my privilege to have him for a parishioner several years, while in Hyde Park, where Mr. Giles spent his last days, and to officiate at his funeral. That had been his quiet home ever since he had broken down while delivering one of his Lowell Institute lectures. Having been invited by the editor of the Pilot to prepare a sketch of the life of this somewhat famous author and divine, as well as leading lyceum orator in the land, I wrote to several of his intimate friends for facts of his life, and among them to E. P. Whipple, W. R. Alger, Doctors Livermore, Corder, Morrison and Eliot, since in looking over his correspondence, which, with his MSS., was committed to my care, I had found them to have been his most intimate friends. The letter from Doctor Eliot to me was an account of his personal relations with and estimate of this brilliant Irish orator. I should hardly feel justified in giving to you this statement, were any of the family of Mr. Giles living, although it reveals nothing new to his most intimate and esteemed friends; yet after all it is a testimony in the end to the nobility of the man whose evil habit it mentions, quite as much as to the friend who dealt with him so kindly and so bravely. These are the facts: Mr. Giles was to make a western lecture tour, and was to start with Chicago. There he had friends who entertained him, as it would seem, too hospitably, in some directions. In appearing on the platform, he showed signs of abnormal exhilaration, which the large and cultivated audience interpreted as the effect of a too free use of drink. The next day the papers reported the exhibition made, and the sad fall of the finest orator the nation had ever welcomed from the old world or had produced at home. It traveled far and near. It went on swift wings to St. Louis, where he was booked to lecture the next week. He made his way tardily to that city and to the study of the young minister, by whose efforts he had been chosen to fill an evening in the lecture-course. On Saturday afternoon the door-bell rang, and a short man, not five feet high, dressed in bearskin coat, cap and gloves, stood before him, in his study. His first words were: "Well, I am here, and I suppose you have heard all about it. I meant you should before I got here, hence my delay." "Yes," said the host for the hour, "I am sorry to say that I have read all about my friend's trouble; I have weighed the matter, too;" then taking him by the hand, and looking him in the face, added—"But you are to lecture on Tuesday evening, and to preach for me to-morrow. It is all arranged and notice is widely spread." Giles was silent for a moment with pent up emotion, and mingled surprise and gratitude, and then replied—"Eliot, you have saved me! I shall obey orders." "But," said his friend, "on this condition, that you are not to stop at the hotel. I have provided entertainment for you at a friend's house, and after tea with me, we will go over and I will introduce you to most agreeable parties." That night a heavy snowstorm came, and notwithstanding the bad roads, the church the next day was crowded, and the pastor was a listener. The Doctor's account of the services in this letter was most glowing, and he said, such a prayer he never heard from mortal lips, notwithstanding it was written out and read—probably written that very morning under the inspiration of that brief interview in Eliot's study.

The lecture, too, delighted the most cultivated audience which this live city of the west could provide, and not a sign of undue or abnormal eloquence gleamed from the enchanter's lips. What counsels the saddened, silver-tongued orator received from his friend I cannot tell; or what the influence in particular was that lived as a controlling power over the habits and character of the man, it is not for me to divine; but from that day forth, for over twenty years, this weak and sorely-tempted once-fallen man went from city to city, all over this land, from Bangor to San Francisco, and spoke before the best audiences to be secured, and never again, that I can learn, was he led into temptation by which his audience or his friends were called upon to apologize for his behavior. But the point is this: Doctor Eliot, then plain Mr. Eliot, just well established as pastor of a church where all confidence was placed in him as a wise, high-toned discreet man, had done something which might bring a cloud upon his bright dawning day. He had encouraged a man in disgrace to address the public; worse than that, he had put that same man into his pulpit, while the papers were full of talk about his behavior on the platform in a state of intoxication in a neighboring city. The other churches in the city would be only too ready to take it up and make a hard handling of it for him; his own older brother ministers might look upon it with distrust; then, too, he was at that time, as all along to his death, one of the strongest advocates of temperance,—his son, by the way, in Dorchester, nobly perpetuates this active interest in temperance,—and then, he had the best of excuses for canceling it all, and sending quietly out of the city this man who had thoughtlessly betrayed his friendship, and brought disgrace upon the cause of morality and religion, as well as disappointment to the hearts of other friends who had introduced him to the American pulpit and platform. But he seemed to consult the interests and well-being of the fallen man alone, and what was to become of him; and so he said to himself, we can imagine, "Here is a man of genius—author, preacher, lecturer, and he has a weakness growing out of the customs of his race, his physical infirmity of a nervously organized hunchback, and the temptation of his associates of his own nationality, whose convivial habits at the hotel the night before had swamped this unsuspecting brother; now, shall I crush him, or try to save him? It is a responsibility which seems to be thrown upon me, and I must act, and act promptly. Perhaps I can put him once more upon his feet, and reinstate him in the public confidence." And so he did, and in the act showed himself to be most noble and singularly heroic, and as unselfish as he was brave and true, and no one ever questioned this perilous course. I have said that he was the St. John of the denomination. He was indeed saint, seer and savior, all together. He was as tender as a woman, but as courageous as a lion. He was the beloved disciple, son of thunder, good Samaritan and Gamaliel rolled into one, and no less a patriot than a saint, as the war days proved. He did not need to be so eloquent of tongue, or so profound or learned, as other ministers, but even here he took high rank; for he carried the finest and most persuasive gospel in his face, his voice, and his native, beautiful, old-fashioned courtesy and shrinking modesty. He went about doing good, like his Master. He was eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, a friend to the friendless. There was not a street in the city too vile for him to enter, not a garret or a cellar too foul for him to visit, if he could be of any service to the lowest and most wretched. He was a father among the poor, and little children in rags flocked to him, and men and women in trouble and distress made him their confidant and counselor. Here is a man who did not think it beneath the dignity of the preacher, nor inconsistent with the duties of a church, to interest himself in works of charity wherever a brother or sister in sore distress might be relieved. It was not by brilliant sermons, but by heart-sermons wrought out of his experience with suffering humanity outside his own flock, that made his pulpit appeals so effective, and his example so contagious, for the whole city felt the mighty throb of his heart pulses, as his love for humanity leaped from street to street on missions of mercy; and when he would build a university half a million dollars flew to his hands from the rich as freely as sunshine from clear skies in open day. O, my friends, in the light and glow of such a life, how insignificant seems much that is done by ordinary mortals. Who, in measuring the greatness of such a man, whose whole life was a psalm, and whose character was so benignant and Christlike, can have the heart to say that he was neither profound nor progressive, and that his theology would have gained much by a closer devotion, on his part, to scientific study? Let each be true to his own mind and methods of work. Our dear apostle was that, and to few has it been given to fulfil a nobler mission, or to preach or live a diviner gospel. We cannot all be Eliots, nor would it be best if we could; but to be noble we have only to be true to the gifts and the opportunity afforded us. True nobility is not so much in what we have as in what we are and do. It is in the use we make of what talents we have. It is in unselfish devotion to others. It is in recognizing the fact that we are our brother's keeper. It is in carrying out the true spirit of the gospel as shown in the life of him who came not to be ministered unto but to minister. It was the inspiration of that life which gave to our sainted Eliot power to make his own life sublime.

The Fellowship of the Spirit.

"Who is and who is not a Unitarian it [the A. U. A.] leaves the National Conference to say."—Address by Rev. Howard N. Brown before "Unitarian Club," Christian Register, Feb. 17, 1887.

Should we wonder that the cords of ecclesiasticism have toughened with the centuries? Less than fifty years after the death of Channing the above proposition is taken for granted in high places of Unitarianism. If the National Conference is to say who is a Unitarian, from whom shall the conference take the key, that there be no mistake? From Parker or Channing, or from Jesus himself?

Sources satisfactory, no doubt. But to whom did Parker and Channing go? To whom did Jesus go, as sponsor for his faith? From the deep of their own hearts came the voice. They listened, obeyed. Their fervor deepened while they went into the outside world; but they studied the experiences of living men rather than the precepts of dead men. Would Parker, or Channing, or Jesus have consented to abide the answer of a conference, however charitably given? Loyal were they and unselfish. They might have willed to give the examination a conscientious test. But the voiceless revelation that came to them out of the infinite was at once a decision from which an appeal to the human world could not be taken. Is not our great faith safest when we follow those powerful examples?

J. N. SPRIGG.

Friends Known and Unknown.

A BIT ABOUT UNITY CHURCH, DENVER, COLO.

Lately we printed a paragraph of good news about this lively church. Now the pastor, Thomas Van Ness, sends us an article from the Sunday News, of Denver, about which Mr. Van Ness says: "We do not know the author, but it shows us that we have a champion somewhere among the people who is educated and willing to use his pen in our favor." We give here the greater part, as much as we have place for, of this true and appreciative article. After mentioning a late sermon by Mr. Van Ness, entitled, "For what does Unity church stand?" the writer says that he wishes to offer a word about "the general movement known as American Unitarianism," and proceeds thus:

"A distinguished writer says: 'The religion of a nation ought to be the embodiment of its highest intelligence and in harmony with the outcome of the deepest thoughts, the deepest experience, the widest culture, the finest intuitions, of the best and wisest minds that the nation counts among her children.' This is essentially a Unitarian ideal. Unitarianism represents the American ideal church, both in form and in religious doctrine, in a manner which no other church approaches. It does this because it is a product of that same social and political evolution which gave us our nationality with its constitutional liberty.

"Unitarianism stands absolutely and without qualification for 'liberty, equality and fraternity.'

"First—Liberty: liberty of thought, perfect freedom to follow whithersoever truth leads, regardless of whether the path has been previously trodden and pronounced safe or not. In pursuance of this idea it refused to be bound by any creed, book of discipline, or council of bishops in the past, believing that the biddings of divine inspiration are as true, as good, as safe, to-day as at any time in the past, and better adapted to our needs than any rigid adherence to the thought or belief of by-gone centuries.

"Second—Equality: the essential equality of all men before the high spiritual law, regardless of name or nationality. The Infinite is parent of all, in fact as well as in name; hence there is no arbitrary election or damnation for any one, no arbitrary everlasting punishment; 'whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap;' no escape from the just consequences of what he is, and what he does, through any arbitrary pardon or atoning blood of another.

"Third—Fraternity: The Unitarian church vents no anathema upon any church differing from itself; it turns no cold shoulder to Catholic, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Universalist, or Agnostic, for all are children of the one Infinite Spirit; all sharing a common nature and a common destiny; but each seeking to realize the best ideal within him in a manner more or less peculiar to himself; hence it is impossible to adopt any rigidly fixed creed as a test of fellowship. For this very reason it has incurred the reproach of many people, who say: 'You have no creed. I don't see how you can possibly have any bond of union.' To this we may reply in the language of Rev. Robert Collyer: 'A creed? Certainly I have my creed; but I want it stamped like my railroad ticket, "Good for this day and train only."'

"In sending out its young men to become ministers, the Unitarian church says to them: 'First of all, be yourselves men; be true to yourselves, and you can never be false to any trust reposed in you. Aim to be scholars; diligent in search of all truth and good affecting the condition and relations of humanity. We say not to you, preach this or that doctrine; but preach and live the truth as you see it. Seek not to be lords over God's heritage; seek rather to be the servant of all, to be helpful to all around you; comfort the afflicted, encourage the despairing, lend a hand to the fallen; be as fearless as Nathan in his encounter with David, and as uncompromising as fate; but let all be done with love, for the right and the truth, by which you must stand or fall.'

"Upon this broad, firm basis we presume Unity church and its young pastor stand, and we would bespeak for them a fair field in which to show what they can do for the good of our beautiful Queen City of the Plains.
w."

THE STUDY TABLE.

Sir Philip Sidney. By J. A. Symonds. New York: Harper & Bros., Franklin Square.

A comely volume, good paper, tasteful binding, of 186 pages, in eight chapters, called "Lineage, Birth and Boyhood," "Foreign Travel," "Entrance into Court-Life and Embassy," "The French Match and 'The Arcadia,'" "Life at Court again and Marriage," "Astrophel and Stella," "The Defense of Poesy," "Last Years and Death." It is written in a very lively and clear style, and goes over the facts with a rapid movement which carries the reader along. The chapters on "The French Match and 'The Arcadia'" and on "Astrophel and Stella" are especially interesting, and the closing chapter is very good. Sidney's quaint and nobly ethical definition of "right poets," given on page 148, is worth knowing—"which most properly do imitate, to teach and delight; and to imitate, borrow nothing of what is, hath been or shall be; but range only, reined with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be and should be." The author admires his theme, the gentle and courageous Sidney,—as who must not? He says of him, on page 145, "His end was not writing, even while he wrote. This is certain; the whole tenor of Sidney's career proves his determination to subordinate self-culture of every kind to the ruling purpose of useful public action"—surely a noble effort in any man. On page 184, "Converse with men seemed to him more important than communion with authors in their printed works." Of his early and resigned death, the author says: "He was withdrawn from the contention of our earth before time and opportunity proved or compromised his high position. Gloriously he passed into the sphere of idealities, and as an ideal he is forever living and forever admirable."

Recollections of Eminent Men, with other papers. By Edwin Percy Whipple, with Introduction by Rev. C. A. Bartol, D.D. Boston: Ticknor & Co. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co., 117 to 121 Wabash ave.

It has been said of Mr. Whipple that he was "distinctively an essayist, a critical essayist. The foundation of his fame was laid in 1848 with an essay on Macaulay, which, it is just praise to say, was worthy of the distinguished name which formed its title." Whittier has written of him, "With the possible exception of Lowell and Matthew Arnold, he was the ablest critical essayist of his time, and the place he has left will not be readily filled. Scarcely inferior to Macaulay in brilliance of diction and graphic portraiture, he was freer from prejudice and passion and more loyal to the truth of fact and history. He was a thoroughly honest man. He wrote with conscience always at his elbow, and never sacrificed his real convictions for the sake of epigram and antithesis." Mr. Bartol says in the introduction, "Macaulay, whom Mr. Whipple lauded, forged his earlier style. But his wit and humor were all his own,—the one a flash of lightning, the other a drop of dew." When writings by such a man are collected, and include personal recollections of men like Choate, Agassiz, Emerson, Charles Sumner, and essays on such as Motley, Matthew Arnold, etc., they make a volume which all can use and most will enjoy heartily 385 pages in large type, on good laid paper.

The Story of the Normans. By Sarah Orne Jewett. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co., 117 to 121 Wabash ave.

Again we chronicle a volume in the series of Stories of the Nations, which G. P. Putnam's Sons are carrying out worthily. This volume has a topical table of contents and an index of seven pages in double columns. The style, as Miss Jewett's name would assure us, is simple, earnest, straight-forward and clear—of the kind which makes reading easy and pleasant. She treats of the Normans from the ancient Northmen, the men of the dragon ships and vikings, down through their history in France, Italy, England, until they become merged in the English stream formed by their union with the Anglo-Saxons. In the concluding chapter the author says: "Here at the beginning of the Norman absorption into England I shall end my story of the founding and growth of the Norman people. The mingling of their brighter, fiercer, more enthusiastic and visionary nature with the stolid, dogged, prudent and resolute Anglo-Saxons belongs more properly to the history of England. * * * It is the Norman graft upon the sturdy old Saxon tree that has borne best fruit among the nations—that has made the England of history, the England of great scholars and soldiers and sailors, the England of great men and women, of books and ships and gardens and pictures and songs."

Through the Gates of Gold. A fragment of Thought. Roberts Brothers, Boston.

This little book belongs to the psycho-theosophy-mind-cure class, but is one of the very best of its kind. The writer would seem to have gone through periods of phrenology, vegetarianism, blue glass cure, and to have dipped into Swedenborgianism, Buddhism, and the philosophy of Schopenhauer, but has so far outgrown and seen the vanity of so many isms, that he does not dare to speak out and say exactly what are the Gates of Gold, or how he may enter or pass through them, but deals altogether in abstract and general propositions. If there is any point to what he says, if the book has any definite meaning, which the reader is likely to doubt, it is that man may, by mental or spiritual power, cease to feel pain, put an end to his miseries of all kinds, this in passing through the gates of gold. Certainly no harm will come from trying it. Indeed, great good will often come from a faith like this, and no better lesson can be taught than that it is simple duty, always and everywhere, to resist pain and evil, within and without, in all its forms and phases. The book is very well written, and it is altogether probable that if the author had given his name, instead of publishing his fragment of thought anonymously, that he would have been obliged to treat him with greater reverence.

College Songs. New and revised edition. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

This is the best collection of college songs we have seen. It contains many of the old favorites, some of the best of the jubilee melodies, and in addition there are some new and pleasing songs. A desirable book.

Song Classics. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

A beautifully printed book of selections from modern classic writers. The songs are of a high order. Where needful, both German and English words are printed. We find many of our favorite songs in this book.

The Sunday-school Helper. London: Sunday-school Association.

This prettily bound volume contains the monthly issues for 1886 of a magazine which seems to be all its name implies. It is designed for the use of teachers, parents and scholars. There are no illustrations. The tone of the book is earnest, thoughtful and devotional; the lesson stories for the little ones aiming at instruction rather than entertainment. The lessons on nature are delightful; the lessons on religion, historical and critical; and the short chapters of literary history are excellent. The notes and queries show that the same difficulties we meet in our own schools are felt, and anxiously discussed, by our English brethren.

Young Days. A monthly illustrated magazine for children. London: Sunday-school Association.

This magazine is a medium for stories, bits of natural history, short accounts of various arts and manufacture, and a few very simple questions in Bible history. The stories are good. Mrs. Parker and her friends may not be anxious about the "Little Rag Dealer," whose story is copied in this magazine, for he is in excellent company, and will make many faithful little friends, though in a foreign land.

THE HOME.

Hand Stories.

In a very old ballad of the death of King Arthur, it is told that the king, lying deadly hurt, gave his famous sword, Excalibar, to a knight. "Sir Lukyn," said the king, "now take my sword, Excalibar, that hangs so freely by my side, and throw it yonder into the river." The knight went to the river, but there threw in his own sword and kept back Excalibar; for the finest steel was in the blade, and the hilt of precious stone. "Alack," said the knight, "must such a sword be thrown away?" Then back he came to the king, who said, "Sir Lukyn, what did you see?" "Nothing, my liege, save that the wind blew fair and free over the water." Then the king knew what the knight had done and said, "Go again, Sir Lukyn, throw my sword into the river, and keep me not here in pain." Again the knight went and threw in the king's scabbard but kept back Excalibar once more, and hid it under a tree. Then back he went to tell the king, who said, "Sir Lukyn, saw ye aught?" And the knight answered as before, "Nothing, my liege, save that the wind was now grown wild and fought with the waters." "O, Luykn, Luykn," cried the king, "twice hast thou dealt deceitfully with me. Alack! Whom may we trust when such a knight can be so false? Go again and throw my sword into the river." The knight, all ashamed, made no answer but went again to the river and this time threw the sword into it as far as he could fling it; but as the sword fell to the water, a hand came forth, met it and flourished it three times in the air, then drew it down beneath the running stream. This time when the knight returned, the king was gone. Was it Arthur's own hand that was stretched forth from the river to seize his trusty sword? The story says not. But from that day he was seen no more; and it was believed that "King Arthur was not dead but conveyed away by the fairies into some pleasant place where he should remain for a time, when he should return again and reign in as great authority as ever." Hands without bodies are not rare in popular legends and folk-lore. I have read in a fairy story how an adventurous knight, gaining entrance into an enchanted castle, was served by hands which led him where he wished to go, prepared the table, and waited on him. The grave Bunyan disdained not this same invention; for when Christian had fought with Apollyon, "there came to him a hand with some of the leaves of the Tree of Life, the which Christian took and applied to the wounds that he had received in the battle, and was healed immediately." This is like the story of St. Thomas' hand, of which I have told you before, which never perished, because it was the hand that explored the Master's side after he had arisen, but gave judgment for the people in their causes by holding fast the bill of a good cause but throwing away a bad one. In Bible stories, also, there is the like. A hand was let down to Ezekiel to give the prophet a scroll, which he had to eat that thus he might take into himself the Lord's commands. At the feast of Belshazzar a hand of flame wrote on the wall, as you may read in the book of Daniel. To Moses on Mount Sinai were given "two tables of stone written with the finger of God," as you may read in the book of Exodus.

Now, all these different stories that came from the English, and are in the stories of many other countries, and also in the Hebrew Scriptures many hundreds of years before, came not from each other; but all use the hand in like manner, because this is natural. Stories use also other features, especially the eye, the ear, and the foot; but none so much or so beautifully as the hand. Now, the hand in stories is one part of the story language, as I have explained before. As this story language is not like English, or French, or Latin, that is, a tongue confined to one place, but like gestures or motions of the mouth or of the eye, a language known everywhere, so the hand, being in that language, is found in it everywhere, in England and in many modern countries that have their own stories, and just the same far back among the ancient Hebrews.

Are these stories true? Surely they are; like all the stories I have told before. But how are they true? We know well that no hand could dart from the river and seize the falling sword, and no hands could fly about in the air waiting on a knight in enchanted castles; nor a hand be let down from the sky with a scroll in it, as Ezekiel describes it; nor fiery fingers suddenly come forth and write on the wall as Daniel tells us. Of course, such things do not happen, because it is not the way of nature that they should happen. Yet these stories are all true in one way, because they all mean the beauty and wonderful miracle of the hand. What were we without the hand? One ancient sage gave the hand as the main cause of all our progress and of all the wonders man has done. If man had the mind of an archangel but the paw of a bear, he could do nothing. But the paw and the mind never could be found in one; so work the outward and the inward, the soul and the body, together, like one thought. As in stories, so in many other ways, man has shown reverence for the hand. It is even said that all the future is hid in it, and that a man's fortune can be told by reading the lines on his palm. The hands are used to make many signs; to pour water over the hands has been a sign of obedience of a servant to a master; to wash the hands is a signal of innocence. We have a saying, "We wash our hands of it," meaning that we have no part in the matter and nothing to answer for. To lift up the hands toward Heaven is a sign of a solemn promise or declaration. To stretch out the hands or to lay them on the head of another is an expression of blessing; and to give the hand or clasp it, a sign of comradeship and love. As the hand is such a wonder and greater than any instrument in the world for beauty and power, it has become a part of story-language, as I have said, to express different meanings. One meaning I gave in the story of the hand of St. Thomas. In other stories, the meaning is the beauty and miracle which is in the hand itself. J. V. B.

ON a sun-dial which stands upon the pier at Brighton, is inscribed this hopeful line: "'Tis always morning somewhere in the world."

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Unity Club, in connection with All Soul's church, continues its interest in "Emerson" and "Les Miserables." Last Monday evening some sixty members were present at the Hugo section, and an unexpected pleasure was a biographical sketch by Mr. A. F. Brooks, one of Chicago's best known artists, who accompanied his sketch with a beautiful crayon portrait of the great author, which he presented to the club. Arrangements were made to have it suitably framed, and it will soon hang in the club room of the church.

—The Union Teachers' Meeting was held Monday noon, as usual. Mr. Jones led, the subject of the lesson being chapters 27 and 28 of Ezekiel (chapter 28 ought to be included). Attention was called to the practical information shown by Ezekiel in this lesson. He was not a monk-like prophet in the least. He had an eye to the facts of trade, manufactures, geography. He seems well informed about Tyre. How did Ezekiel learn it all in these turbulent times, when intercourse between distant cities was so difficult, slow, and often even dangerous? These chapters, indeed, form our best and oldest authority and source of knowledge about the mercantile details of Tyre. Ezekiel was full of wrath towards Tyre because that city thought to profit by the downfall of Jerusalem.

Manistee, Mich.—It was with dread of snow-storms and visions of blockade that the senior editor left Chicago on Tuesday evening, February 22, for this more arctic point than Chicago. Nothing but the dedication of a new church of the liberal faith, or some other chance to put in a word for the Unitarian gospel, could have induced him to have taken the venture. He reached there Wednesday afternoon and proceeded directly to the church. The first of the four dedicatory meetings began with a sermon from J. T. Sunderland, of Ann Arbor, on the "Unities of the Unitarian Faith," among which he emphasized the unity of all religions, the unity of all races, the unity of all Christian sects, the unity of morals and religion, the unity of this life and the next, and the unity of all in the unity of God. It was a broad, catholic, earnest interpretation of our Unity word, and we should be glad to see it printed in our "Unity Mission" series. In the evening the dedication service proper was held, James De Normandie, of Boston, preaching the sermon, which was a strong historic study of the origin, growth and present potency of Unitarianism. The dedication prayer was made by Mr. Sunderland, and a responsive service prepared by the pastor was read by the minister and people. On Thursday afternoon Mr. Jones, of Chicago, read a paper on "Worship, or why Pray?" and was followed by a brilliant and prophetic address by Rowland Connor, entitled, "Possibilities." In the evening the last service was a platform meeting, during which Mr. De Normandie gave the greetings of the American Unitarian Association. Mr. Sunderland spoke of the prospects of Unitarianism, Mr. Connor on the church as the center of the humanities, a philanthropic workshop; Mr. Jones on the prophet and the prophetic church, while Mr. Walkley gave an account of the growth of the building, and closed with warm and eloquent words, thanks and anticipations.

—What of the church building? Cozy as a bird's nest, every corner of it as serviceable as a Yankee's jackknife; a church of the new architecture, for which some of us have been pleading and working so long; an auditorium containing some one hundred and eighty folding chairs, with a parlor at one end that would afford an extension to the audience room for one hundred chairs; a snug little parsonage of eight rooms at the other end, all furnished and occupied; church dining-room, kitchen and heating apparatus in the basement; the interior finished in native black ash; the front in Ohio stone; the roof of slate; the whole situated in a large lot (a possible luxury in a town where there is plenty of out-doors), and all at a cost of about twelve thousand dollars. Essentially the same accommodations might be secured in the more modest, but not to be despised, and ever beautiful pine, for possibly five thousand dollars. We believe the building is practically paid for, and it has all been done in a year. Mr. Walkley and his associates deserved great credit, and other places ought to take cheer and do likewise. We left Manistee knowing more about salt-wells, how elm logs are shaved into barrel hoops at the rate of a hundred a minute, with many pleasant glimpses of hospitality and prosperity, which made the dreary ride we took in a rickety buggy through thirty miles of pine woods, one Saturday night five or six years ago, in order to speak next morning in a dingy hall, seem a thing of the last century.

Denver.—The following is a description from a Denver paper of the new Unity church which is to be, on which we heartily congratulate our Denver brethren:

"The new Unity church is now being put under roof. When completed it will be one of the most solid and substantial structures in the city. The architecture is broadly Romanesque. The auditorium is in amphitheatre style. The basement floor is cut up into quite a number of rooms so as to accommodate certain new features in church work. The tower room of this story and the room adjoining will be used as a library and reading-room. These rooms will be open every evening to the public. Back of these is the general Sunday-school room. During certain evenings of the week it is hoped to give lectures and local entertainments in this room. A small movable stage, giving opportunity for amateur plays, will be provided. Back of the main Sunday-school are class and toilet rooms and a kitchen. The tower and second story lobby will be fitted up in ladies' parlors. In these parlors will be held the meetings of the Ladies' Aid Society, the Women's Auxiliary Conference, fortnightly sociables, and the ethical class. Above in the fourth story of the tower is the pastor's study.

Mexico.—Rev. Anna J. Norris, recently of Fort Collins, Colo., has joined forces with the Owen American Co-operative Colony of Sinaloa, Mexico, on the Gulf of California. A private letter from her shows that in her novel situation as one of the pioneers of a new industrial and social experiment, she is still able to do work for the rational gospel for which our word stands. We quote: "I had the ill taste to fall into the gulf going aboard the steamer at Guaymas, and was fished out by the captain and a Mexican sailor, who jumped in after me; since which event they call me Baptist, and it prepared and resigned me to all we have gone through since, or that the future may bring. * * * The work of the colony is divided into departments. Each department or group elects its own foreman to supervise and keep the time of its workmen. Every man and woman is paid equally three dollars per day for every working-day, and is allowed to enter any department in which he or she is qualified. I have passed through every vocation incident to pioneer civilization since we arrived two months ago, and now have charge of the children. My school-room consists of two tall, broad, shady mesquite trees, with store boxes and benches for seats. My children, English and Spanish, range from three to sixteen. * * *

The young people are allowed their amusements and we old folks our religious liberty. We clear out the pavilion or dining hall and dance on Saturday evenings, and last Sunday we started what we hope to make our regular Sunday service, in which I gave a brief reading and talk, together with some hymn-singing from our Unitarian Hymns and Tunes."

Humboldt, Ia.—Our Unity ladies have just treated us handsomely by giving us another original piece of amusement, called a "Dialect Entertainment." There were readings, recitations and songs in many dialects. It fortunately happened that Miss Clara Berkheimer, from Sioux City, was here visiting friends, and the ladies were able to enlist her rare and beautiful voice for two solos. This announcement greatly aided in bringing a crowded house. With the twenty other members on the programme, the entertainment was a great success, and every one agrees that the ladies of Unity church know how to make people happy.

We are looking forward with pleasure to the Spring Iowa conference, to be held here in May, and hope a large number of our friends will visit us then. w.

Luverne, Minn.—Rev. S. S. Hunting is preaching here with most encouraging results. On Friday evening, Feb. 25, he began a series of popular lectures on Protestant leaders, his subject being Martin Luther. These lectures are to be given at Armory Hall for the benefit of the Luverne Library Association.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

CHICAGO CALENDAR.

CHURCH OF THE MESSIAH, corner of Michigan avenue and Twenty-third street. Pastor, Rev. David Utter. Services at 10:45 A.M. Sunday-school at 12:15. The study section of the Fraternity meets Friday evening, March 11. Subject, "James Fenimore Cooper."

UNITY CHURCH, corner of Dearborn avenue and Walton place. Minister, Rev. T. G. Milled. Services at 10:45 A.M.

THIRD UNITARIAN CHURCH, corner of Monroe and Laflin streets. J. V. Blake, minister. The third in a series of Sermons on Religion as related to the Elements of Time. Subject, The Present, at the morning service at 10:45. Evening lecture at 7:30. Tuesday, March 8, at 8 P.M., the Musical Club. Wednesday, March 9, at 4 P.M., the Social Section; at 8 P.M., the Longfellow Class. Friday, March 11, at 8 P.M., Sunday-school Dramatic and Musical Entertainment, operetta, etc., for benefit of Western S. S. Society

ALL SOULS CHURCH, corner of Oakwood boulevard and Langley avenue. Pastor, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Sunday, March 6, Mr. Jones will preach at 11 A.M., subject, "Ruth, a Lesson of Loyalty." Sunday-school at 9:30

A.M. No evening service at the church. The Emerson Section of the Unity Club meets Monday evening promptly at 8. Teachers' meeting Friday evening at 7:30.

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL, State and Randolph streets. Next Sunday evening, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones will deliver the second of the following series of three sermons on

THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

February 27, "What is Spirituality?" March 6, "The Spiritual Poverty of the Prosperous Classes." March 20, "The Uplands of the Spirit."

The singing will be conducted by the People's Church Quartette of male voices. Doors open at 7:15; services begin promptly at 7:45 P.M. All are cordially invited.

UNION TEACHERS' MEETING at the Channing Club Room, 175 Dearborn street, room 93, Monday noon, March 7. Rev. Mr. Utter will lead.

A Guilty Sacrifice

should never be made, but ambition and enterprise deserve reward. Wherever you are located you should write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, and learn about work that you can do and live at home, earning thereby from $5 to $25 and upwards daily. Some have earned over $50 in a day. All particulars free. Both sexes. All ages. Capital not needed; you are started free. All is new. Those who start at once cannot help rapidly making snug little fortunes.

Children Starving to Death

on account of their inability to digest food, will find a most marvelous food and remedy in Scott's Emulsion. Very palatable and easily digested. Dr. S. W. COHEN, of Waco, Texas, says: "I have used your Emulsion in Infantile wasting. It not only restores wasted tissues, but gives strength and increases the appetite."

Hoarseness Promptly Relieved.

The following letter to the proprietors of "Brown's Bronchial Troches" explains itself:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, April 12, 1884.

"Gentlemen, The writer, who is a tenor singer, desires to state that he was so hoarse on a recent occasion, when his services were necessary in a church choir, that he was apprehensive that he would be compelled to desert from singing, but by taking three of your 'Bronchial Troches' he was enabled to fully participate in the services. Would give my name, but don't want it published."

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are sold only in boxes, with the fac-simile of the proprietors on the wrapper. Price, 25 cents.

SOME cards have recently been published by the Western Unitarian S. S. Society, having on one side the TEN COMMANDMENTS, Bible version, and on the other side, the same in rhyme. These are sold for 3 cents apiece, or 30 cents a dozen.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

All books sent us for review by publishers will be promptly acknowledged under this head, and will receive as soon as practicable such further notice as the interests of our readers and the state of our columns may determine.

Dr. Channing's Note Book Selected by his Granddaughter, Grace Ellery Channing. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 110. $1.00
A History of Education, by F. V. N. Painter, A.M. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Cloth, pp. xix. and 385. $1.50
The Will-Power. Its Range in Action. By J. Miller Fothergill, M.D. New York: James Pott & Co., 14 and 16 Astor Place. Cloth, pp. 184. $1.00
The Story of Persia. By S. G. W. Benjamin. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, pp. xiv. and 304. $1.50
Sociology. By John Bascom. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Cloth, pp. xii. and 264. $1.50

California Excursions.

Our next Pullman Palace-Car Excursions for San Francisco will leave Chicago March 8th and 22d, and Kansas City and St. Louis, March 9th and 23d. The former includes City of Mexico. The Southern route. No storm region or snow blockades; no high altitudes. The tourists' favorite. Tickets good for six months. No charge to return different route. Very lowest rates. Send for circular. JNO. E. ENNIS, Passenger Agent Missouri Pacific R. R., 86 Washington street, Chicago, Ill.

A BIG OFFER. To introduce them we will give away 1,000 Self-Operating Washing Machines. If you want one send us your name, P.O. and express office at once. The National Co., 23 Dey St., N.Y.

CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY'S

STANDARD BOOKS OF RELIGION.

THEODORE PARKER'S LESSONS FROM THE WORLD OF MATTER AND THE WORLD OF MAN. Compiled from stenographic notes of unpublished sermons, by Rufus Leighton. A book life-helping rather than theological or philosophical. Cloth, 12mo., 430 pages. $1.25.

"It makes a veritable book of eloquence, from which one draws inspiration, feeling indebted for every page. Poetic beauty and rugged sense look out by turns from Theodore Parker's sentences."—Chicago Tribune.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY. By LEWIS G. JAMES. Treats of the natural evolution of the Christian Religion, according to the historical method. Revised edition. 319 pages, 8vo., cloth, gilt top. Price, $1.50.

"An exceedingly creditable venture. The unpretentious and lucid simplicity of style, the fulness of information, and the evident conscientiousness and painstaking for thoroughness of exposition, which is the special distinction of the book from the beginning to its close, entitle this work to high praise."—Christian Register.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF SCIENCE: Or Contributions from Science to the Hope of Immortality, and Kindred Themes. By JACOB STRAUB, A.M. With an Introduction by Hiram W. Thomas, D.D., Pastor of the People's Church, Chicago. 1 volume, cloth, 8vo., 435 pages. Price, $2.00.

"This volume seeks to prove that science, not 'falsely so-called,' instead of teaching materialism, really affords proof of a future life for man. Over the wide fields of science Mr. Straub has been a patient, careful and laborious gleaner, and from nearly every one of its departments has brought an immense amount of evidence in support of his position. These proofs, he has, in the main, judiciously arranged, and thus arranged they are clearly and forcibly presented."—The Interior (Presbyterian).

THE MORALS OF CHRIST. A Comparison with Contemporaneous Systems. By AUSTIN BIERBOWER. Paper, 16mo., 200 pages. Price 50 cents.

"One of the most notable works of the period, remarkable for its uniqueness as well as high literary character. It may be doubted if another so thoroughly non-controversial work on Christ's teachings can be found in the entire range of the literature of the Christian era."—Chicago Inter Ocean.

THE FAITH THAT MAKES FAITHFUL.

Eight Sermons by W. C. GANNETT and JENKIN LLOYD JONES. Subjects: Blessed be Drudgery, Faithfulness, "I had a Friend," Tenderness, A Cup of Cold Water, The Seamless Robe, Wrestling and Blessing, The Divine Benediction. Square 18mo., 187 pages. Imitation parchment, 50 cents; Cloth, full gilt, $1.00.

"In these times, when the tendency of religion is to run into sentiment of faith, to stop short of practical effect on the life, there is great good in such a series of addresses as that published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., of Chicago, under the title The Faith That Makes Faithful. It is a series of pregnant, pointed and pithy addresses by William C. Gannett and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, which we take for sermons, though not all of them are in the conventional pulpit form which starts from a Bible text."—New York Independent.

 Any of these books may be obtained at leading bookstores, or will be mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

The Social Status of European and American Women.

By Kate Byram Martin and Ellen M. Henrotin.

"Characterized by close observation, a keen sense of the peculiarities of the various classes, and practical intelligent thought on the relations of women to the different forms of social order in which they are placed."—Chicago Evening Journal.

Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

STANDARD BOOKS IN BELLES-LETTRES.

THE LEGEND OF HAMLET, Prince of Denmark, as found in the works of Saxo Grammaticus and other writers of the twelfth century. By GEORGE P. HANSEN. With portrait of the author. Square 18mo., laid paper, pp. 59. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

"A neat little pamphlet, by Mr. George P. Hansen, late U. S. Consul at Elsinore, where (as also at Copenhagen) he had access to public records and rare manuscripts, and collected the material on which the brochure is based. It gives many facts not within the reach of ordinary readers in any cheap form."—Prof. William J. Rolfe in the Literary World.

ESSAYS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE. Subjects: Choice, Faculty, Public Education, Happiness and Time, Vainglory, Luck, Seeing Good Things, Side Lights of Intelligence, Individuality, Questions of Heroism, Praising, Censure, Flattery, Government, Handwriting, Knowledge, Meditation, Common Sense, Requit, Anger, Judgment of Others, Patience, Enemies, Immortal Life, Death, Emergency, Conscience, Character as a Work, Superiority. Cloth, 12mo., red polished top, uncut edges, paper label, 216 pages. Price, $1.00.

"The essays of Mr. Blake will surprise and delight all lovers of good English prose. He has made a contribution of lasting value to our literature in a form so condensed and so original as to inevitably attract and hold the attention of thoughtful readers. One is reminded not only by the brevity of these essays, but by the cast and mould of the sentences, and the plain, fine, discriminating language, of Bacon's condensed wit and sense."—Chicago Tribune.

POEMS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE. Ninety-five in number, ranging in length from three lines to sixteen pages. Cloth, 12mo., 188 pages, uniform in style with the author's essays. Price, $1.00.

"A new essayist and a new poet, and strange to say, both in the same man; especially strange when we are compelled to add that when we read the essays, he seems a born essayist, and when we read the poems, he seems a born poet."—New York Evangelist.

APHORISMS OF THE THREE THREES.

By EDWARDS OWINGS TOWNE. Cloth, 16mo, gilt top and side stamp. Price, $1.00.

"The Three Threes is a social club of nine Chicago gentlemen, who dine together at stated intervals at a downtown restaurant. Meeting every ninth night after the first night of each and every of the nine months following the ninth month of the year, and seated in three at three three-legged tables, these nine wise men of Chicago spend the evening in discussion. The drops which distill from their lips Mr. Towne has caught in this little book to the number of one hundred and sixty-two."—Literary World.

BROWNING'S WOMEN.

By MARY E. BURT. With an Introduction by Edward E. Hale, D.D., LL.D. Cloth, 16mo., gilt top, 286 pages. Price, $1.00.

"A patient and loving study of some of Browning's characters is given to the world in this gracefully written volume, and it will doubtless add interest and life to the reading of the poet's works, and help readers to a clearer understanding of some obscure points in them. * * * Miss Burt will win many admirers by her style, which is very graceful and clear. * * * It is not too much to say that every lover of Browning will wish for, if he does not possess, a copy of this new and dainty volume before the year is over."—Chicago Tribune.

If you think of expending fifty or one hundred dollars in advertising send us a copy of your advertisement, and we will tell you (free of charge), what will be the best possible investment for you to make. Send 10 cents for our 176 page pamphlet. Address, GEO. P. ROWELL & CO.'S NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING BUREAU, 10 SPRUCE STREET, NEW YORK.

250 UNITARIAN BOOKS, BY SUCH WRITERS as Clarke, Savage, Martineau, Hedge and Chadwick, are included in our Loan Library Catalogue free. Any book lent for 21 days on receipt of 10 cents to prepay postage. Address MARY H. GRAVES, Secretary, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

10 GREAT NOVELS. A GUIDE TO THE MASTERPIECES OF FICTION. New edition just ready, 10 cents, postpaid. Charles H. Kerr & Co., Publishers, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

BROWNING'S WOMEN.

BY MARY E. BURT.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY EDWARD E. HALE, D.D., LL.D.

A patient and loving study of some of Browning's characters is given to the world in this gracefully written volume, and it will doubtless add interest and life to the reading of the poet's works, and help readers to a clearer understanding of some obscure points in them. * * * Miss Burt will win many admirers by her style, which is very graceful and clear. * * * It is not too much to say that every lover of Browning will wish for, if he does not possess, a copy of this new and dainty volume before the year is over.—Chicago Tribune.

The study of Browning has been with Miss Burt a genuine enthusiasm, and of all efforts that have been made to make Browning intelligible to the ordinary mind, this seems to us by far the most successful. * * * Every Browning club would do well to make this book a text book, and every student of Browning should well and carefully digest its contents.—Saturday Evening Herald.

Into the preparation of this book the writer has put much loving care. The work is conscientious throughout. It has a personal flavor, which in a book of this kind is an advantage. This is not the commonplace of class-room instruction, but an informal discussion of characters concerning whom opinions may sometimes differ, but in whom the interest never fails. Still the analysis of characters is generally just, and the position taken has always been carefully considered. The book will win its own way with all who read or want to read the poet.—Unity.

Cloth, 16mo., gilt top, 236 pages. Price, $1.00.

For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

ESSAYS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE.

SUBJECTS:—Choice, Faculty, Public Education, Happiness and Time, Vainglory, Luck, Seeing Good Things, Side Lights of Intelligence, Individuality, Questions of Heroism, Praising, Censure, Flattery, Government, Handwriting, Knowledge, Meditation, Common Sense, Requit, Anger, Judgment of Others, Patience, Enemies, Immortal Life, Death, Emergency, Conscience Character as a Work, Superiority.

The volume of this [gnomic] wisdom is properly the world's Bible, and every sentence, every fragment of it is precious beyond price. Mr. Blake has given us in this little book the condensed result of the thought of his best hours—hours spent, and a great many of them, in study, reflection, observation, calm, careful meditation upon the great problems of life and of being. The fruit is a rare work of wisdom; a neat volume full to the brim of enrichment, suggestion, stimulus; a very encheiridion, a vademecum to carry amid all passages, the varied experiences and exposures of our earthly life. Every one will find something here to feed upon, permission to carry for the waste and solitary places in his journey—song of conquest, notes of the battle cry for successful conflict and victory.—Charles D. B. Mills in Unity.

The essays of Mr. Blake will surprise and delight all lovers of good English prose. He has made a contribution of lasting value to our literature in a form so condensed and so original as to inevitably attract and hold the attention of thoughtful readers. One is reminded not only by the brevity of these essays, but by the cast and mould of the sentences, and the plain, fine, discriminating language, of Bacon's condensed wit and sense. The quaint, clear English, like that which has come down to us from other days, is, however, the only thing in the book that is not modern. This writer reflects the culture of to-day. He respects individuality; he is humane; he is not afraid of the truth; he believes in the future, and that justice and mercy must prevail.—Chicago Tribune.

The quality of these essays which impresses us throughout is one for which we can find no better word than charm. There is something in their manner which is pleasing and delightful to a very high degree. Their quaintness, their archaic simplicity of manner and turn of phrase, have much to do with this. Very likely a critic here and there will say that the style is artificial and affected, but if the impeachment cannot be denied, it is certain that the artificiality is agreeable, and the affectation wonderfully pleasant. We do not imagine that Mr. Blake has chosen any of the great essayists for a model. But it is evident that, like all the essayists, he is a lover of his kind, that he has read them carefully and lovingly, and some of the colors from their palettes have been floated off upon his own. Perhaps it is Bacon more than any other who is subtly echoed here and there. But Mr. Blake is a lover of them all, and quotes from them with generous admiration. Nor has he hesitated, in two or three instances, to revert to subjects which the genius of Bacon has already touched and beautified—praise, anger, death, vainglory. It would be a daring thing to say that Mr. Blake's essays on these subjects are much better than those of "the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind," but "a consensus of the competent" would probably assign to them a greater value relatively to the needs and problems of the present time.—The Index.

1 volume, 216 pages, including full index. Cloth, dark-red polished top, uncut edges. Price $1.00.

For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

THE SOCIAL STATUS OF EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN WOMEN.

BY KATE BYAM MARTIN AND ELLEN M. HENROTTIN.

"A brochure bearing the title 'The Social Status of European and American Women' is attracting much attention * * * and will no doubt attain a wide popularity among thoughtful people of all classes throughout the country. It proceeds from the allied pens of Miss Kate Byam Martin and Mrs. Ellen M. Henrotin. The first portion of the little book is devoted to European women, French, German and English women being indicated by the phrase, and is written by Miss Martin. The second part relates to American women, and is written by Mrs. Henrotin. The descriptions of women named in both parts of the work are characterized by close observation, a keen sense of the peculiarities of the various classes, high ideas of female manners and morals, and practical, intelligent thought on the relations of women to the different forms of social order in which they are placed.

"Miss Martin's sketches of French, German and English women are taken from life and have a verisimilitude that is indisputable. * * * Mrs. Henrotin's sketch of American women is an effective picture of the women of the United States. * * * Many of its suggestions afford topics for profound thought, some for a slight degree of apprehension for the social future, and all are an incentive to labor and study for the advancement of the civilized agencies and for the success of all the means that may be adopted to render American girlhood, womanhood and motherhood the ripest and most consummate products of human culture and enlightenment.

"Each of these writers has a graceful style, clear as crystal, bright with the polish it has received, possessing extraordinary vigor, but the vigor of a cultivated female mind, not of a virile mind, and charming in its grace and simplicity. Women of cultivation and refinement who possess the taste, the understanding, the literary capacity and the leisure to place the results of their studies in social and domestic life before thoughtful readers of their own and the other sex, render an essential service to society and to women when they exercise their power in this respect."—Chicago Evening Journal.

Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

MANUAL TRAINING IN EDUCATION.

BY JAMES VILA BLAKE.

WITH A PREFACE BY PROF. C. M. WOODWARD, DIRECTOR OF THE MANUAL TRAINING SCHOOL OF ST. LOUIS.

OPINIONS:

"The tendency of thoughtful and observant people is well shown in this modest little volume of Mr. Blake's. He has here given the result of his own vigorous thinking on what he has observed in himself and in others. We were students together at Harvard, and through widely different personal experiences we have reached the common ground of a belief in the universal value of manual training as an element in a truly liberal education."—Prof. C. M. Woodward.

"Through the hand to the mind is the educational route now pursued with great success, and experience has shown it to be the natural method, and the one most truly uniting and developing the mental and manual powers, by making them mutually dependent. Mr. Blake presents the facts logically and carefully, with a view to gain new converts."—Book Chat.

"The little volume, from its style and from the new point of view from which the author treats of manual training, deserves to be widely read."—Omaha Republican.

"Not only timely, but specially interesting."—Grand Rapids Eagle.

"May be heartily recommended to all who are interested in the subject."—Wisconsin Journal of Education.

"The author writes clearly and forcibly, and his views deserve attention."—Worcester Daily Spy.

"A convenient and well digested presentation of a vital topic."—Michigan Christian Advocate.

Price in paper, 25 cents; in cloth, 50 cents; postage free.

CHARLES H. KERR & Co., Publishers,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

APHORISMS OF THE THREE THREES.

BY EDWARD OWINGS TOWNE.

EXTRACTS FROM PRESS OPINIONS.

"A neat volume."—Boston Daily Advertiser.
 "Attractively gotten up."—The Current.
 "Very entertaining."—N. Y. Christian Union.
 "A bit of surprise."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.
 "Original, sparkling and full of instruction."—The University Voice.
 "Solid chunks of wisdom, dished up without sauce or condiment."—Chicago Tribune.
 "Many of its Aphorisms are witty and original, and some are very shrewd and wise."—Saturday Evening Herald.
 "A neat little volume of Aphorisms or short pithy sentences containing great, practical truths. . . . Many of them are original, sparkling in wit, and good to remember."—Inter Ocean.
 "The very process of finding fault with some of its always pithy and suggestive sentences, will help us to new and fresh gleams of thought."—Chicago Times.
 "A thoughtful little book, to which we can turn with much pleasure and profit, although our tables are covered with gems of fine thought from the writings of the mighty dead, or the illustrious living. From the unsatisfactory, incarnate negation of the Emersonian Don Quixote, with his foreground of sophistries, and his background of selfishness, it is a pleasure to turn to the old-fashioned, frank, plain Aphorisms of Mr. Towne, with their Baconian ring and stamp. They remind us of the time when men were simple, when they spoke commonly in grand sentences, and had not reasoned treachery into a virtue. . . . In Mr. Towne's book there is no speaking according to precedent, no aim at tallying with a 'Cid.' Many of his Aphorisms are indeed the 'sum of long reflections,' and all of them are thought-provoking."—Unity.
 "'The Three Threes' is a social club of nine Chicago gentlemen, who dine together at stated intervals at a down-town restaurant. Meeting 'every ninth night after the first night of each and every of the nine months following the ninth month of the year,' and 'seated in threes at three three-legged tables,' these nine wise men of Chicago spend the evening in discussion. The drops which distil from their lips Mr. Towne has caught in this little book to the number of one hundred and sixty-two."—Literary World.

PRICE.—In silk cloth, gilt top and side stamp, $1.00.

For sale by leading booksellers, or will be mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

THE MORALS OF CHRIST.

A Comparison with Contemporaneous Systems.

BY AUSTIN BIERBOWER.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

An admirable example of the scientific treatment of a historical subject, almost as systematic as a treatise upon one of the great sciences.—Daily News.
 A remarkably suggestive and striking treatise. Mr. Bierbower has done the work which needed to be done.—N. Y. Independent.
 One of the most notable works of the period, remarkable for its uniqueness as well as high literary character. It may be doubted if another so thoroughly non-controversial work on Christ's teachings can be found in the entire range of the literature of the Christian era.—Inter Ocean.
 The book is one of great suggestiveness.—Critic.
 The whole is written in a crisp, epigrammatic way that serves to keep the reader's interest closely through the whole inquiry.—Chicago Times.
 The book has many striking excellencies.—Interior.
 The work is exceedingly well written. The pointed, epigrammatic phraseology, in which the rich contents are placed before the mind of the reader, is an insurance against weariness and security for unflagging interest.—The Standard.
 An interesting and forcible book, in which the author undertakes to differentiate Christ's morality from the Jewish or childish, the pharisaic or ecclesiastic and the Graeco-Roman or worldly. Much of the distinction is of value.—Atlantic Monthly.
 Mr. Austin Bierbower, the author of this book, writes in commendably clear and telling sentences, and many will be attracted to his chapters by this style. . . . It is suggestive and stimulating, and it approaches its subject from an unusual direction.—The Congregationalist.
 We like to look often into Mr. Bierbower's "Morals of Christ." The titles in the table of contents form a suggestive syllabus of ethics.—Unity.
 Mr. Bierbower is known as a very independent and suggestive thinker. . . . His book we can cordially commend as stimulating and thoughtful, and likely to be useful to readers who are accustomed to do their own thinking.—Christian Union.
 The book, a note-worthy one, abounds in strikingly suggestive headings. . . . The points are fine and strongly taken. It draws such sharp distinction that it may be charged occasionally with over-statement. But here is the accretion of a remarkably clear, fresh, discriminating and sententious style.—The Advance.
 Mr. Bierbower's timely book is just what was needed. His comparison of Christian with ancient secular ethics is at once scholarly, scientific and eminently judicious. . . . Mr. Bierbower's method of attack is bold and spirited, his analysis keen and searching, his style unconventional, breezy, fresh, and the treatment systematic from the first to the last. The work is both scientific and popular.—Mind in Nature.

Paper, 200 pages, 50 cents, post-paid.

CHARLES H. KERR & Co., Publishers, 175 Dearborn st., Chicago.

A VOLUME OF VITAL, VIGOROUS AND VARIED VERSE.

HEART'S OWN:
VERSESBY
Edwin R. Champlin

SOME OPINIONS:

(Wholly unsolicited.)

There is not enough of it, but it is very good as far as it goes.—ANNA BOWNTON AVERILL.

It is poetry founded upon a rock—the rock of deep feeling; this is a good foundation for the palace of thought, and certainly thought is not wanting. . . . "A Day" is very fine. I like "Growth" very much, and "The Gift of Years" especially.—FRANCES CAMPBELL SPARHAWK.

These poems commend themselves to me as bright, original, thoughtful and interesting, and, what is better still, are purity itself, in tone and expression throughout. . . . I like the book very much.—CAROLINE DANA HOWE, author of "Leaf by Leaf the Roses Fall."

The hymns are very simple and sweet.—LIZETTE WOODWARD REESE.

I admire the original simplicity of thought which the poems show, and their freedom from modern word-jugglery. . . . The lines entitled "Defense" strike me as being very imaginative.—JASPER BARNETT COWDIN.

NEWSPAPER EXPRESSIONS:

Some expressions in it ("A Faded Flower") are as fine as the sentiments of Rossetti. . . . Those who love Emerson's poems will find much to charm them here in the purity and simplicity of these sentiments and hopeful aspirations.—Coudersport (Pa.) Journal.The volume contains but 60 pages, and its longest poem has but nine stanzas. These are all marked by fine sentiment and graceful touches.—Toledo Evening Bee.Many lines are true and good.—The Current.This book is something of a departure, and altogether an exception. It is written in a style quite its own, and with a force spent on an original line. . . . "Dying at Eighty" is terse and strong. "A Day" is keen and sharply spent. "A Victor's Message" and "On Seeing a Boy Playing Clappers" are strokes of original emphasis. "Vanished Lights" is exceptionally fine.—Portland (Me.) Transcript.

PRICE, In Silk Cloth, 16mo. Beveled Edges, Gilt Top, 75 Cts.

For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

THEODORE PARKER'S

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

Selected from Notes of Unpublished Sermons, by Rufus Leighton. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 480 reduced from $2.50 to $1.25.

"It has been a great comfort to me often to think that after I have passed away some of my best things might still be collected from my rough notes and your nice photograph of the winged words. The things I value most are not always such as get printed."—Theodore Parker to Rufus Leighton."This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. . . . The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

This volume, edited by Mr. RUFUS LEIGHTON, was first brought before the public in 1895. It ran through several editions, but for a number of years has not been regularly upon the market. We have just concluded an arrangement with Mr. LEIGHTON by which we shall have the exclusive sale of the book. True price, originally $2.50, we have

REDUCED TO $1.25.

The book contains 430 large duodecimo pages, and is substantially bound in cloth. The general divisions of subjects are as follows: The Material World and Man's Relation Thereto, the Nature of Man, Traits and Illustrations of Human Character and Conduct, Phases of Domestic Life, Education, Human Institutions and National Life, the Power and Endurance of What Is Noblest in Man, Human Progress, Jesus of Nazareth, Man in His Religious Aspect. Each of these divisions is subdivided into from seven to forty sections; for example, the chapter on Human Progress is subdivided as follows: Man to Make His Own Paradise, the False Idea of Man a Hindrance to His Progress, Man's Progress not by Miracle but by the Use of Natural Forces, Power of the Human Will Over Circumstances, the Necessity for an Ideal, Death a Blessing to Man, the Founders of New England—the True Way to Honor Them, the Prophecy of the Past to the Future, the Next Half Century.

The book is copyrighted, and no portion of it is accessible in any other form, except a single section which has been used in the recent volume published by the American Unitarian Association.

* * * The book is for sale in Boston at Roberts Brothers' Book Store, and may be obtained through the trade generally, or will be mailed on receipt of price ($1.25) by

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

MOST PERFECT MADE

Prepared with strict regard to Purity, Strength, and Healthfulness. Dr. Price's Baking Powder contains no Ammonia, Lime or Alum. Dr. Price's Extracts, Vanilla, Lemon, Orange, etc., flavor deliciously.

PRICE BAKING POWDER CO. CHICAGO AND ST. LOUIS.

Clearance Sale of Books

We have the following named books, somewhat well-worn, which we offer, postage paid, at greatly reduced prices, to make room for new stock:

Channing and Alken Correspondence. Edited by Anna L. Le Breton.	$.60
The Perfect Life. By William Ellery Channing.	1.00
Channing: a Centennial Memory. By Charles T. Brooks.	.60
Ways of the Spirit. By Frederick H. Hedge.	1.00
The Genius of Solitude. By William R. Alger.	1.00
Heroines of Free Thought. By Sara A. Underwood.	.90
The Rising Faith. By C. A. Bartol.	.50
Divinity of Christ. By a Clergyman of the Church of England.	1.30
Life of Jesus. By Carl Hase.	.60
Ingersoll and Moses. A reply by Rev. S. I. Curtiss, D.D.	.67
Sacred Poetry. By Sir John Bowring, LL.D.	.60
In the Clearings. A Story for Children. By Kate Gannett Wells.	.55
Father Gabrielle's Fairy. A Story for Children. By Mary C. Peckham.	.55
Faithful to the Light. A Story for Children. By Ednah D. Cheney.	.55
Forest Mills. A Story for Children. By Louise M. Thurston.	.55
Luther Miller's Ambition. A Story for Children. By Lillie Montfort.	.30
Two Saxon Maidens. Two Stories. In the times of Alfred the Great and of Baeda. By Eliza Kerr.	.60

Western Unitarian S. S. Society,
175 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Protectionists

Who wish to diffuse a general understanding of their principles can find no better compendium than the American Protectionist's Manual, by Giles B. Stebbins. The Chicago Inter Ocean says: "It collects the largest and most valuable and the freshest and most readable fund of information ever brought together in so short a compass upon economic subjects. It is more instructive than any book of like dimensions ever issued in England, France or America." 192 pages, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 40 cents, postpaid. CHARLES H. KERR & CO., Publishers, 175 Dearborn St., Chicago.

TEN VALUABLE BOOKS FREE!!

The Publisher of City and Country, a twenty-eight page publication containing from twenty-five to thirty illustrations in each issue, in order to increase its circulation, make the following unparalleled offer for the next few weeks: To everyone who will remit by Postal Note the amount of the regular yearly subscription—fifty cents—he will send postpaid any ten of the books in the list below and City and Country for one year. These books are published in neat pamphlet form, many of them handsomely illustrated, and all are printed from good type upon good paper. They treat of a great variety of subjects, and we think that no one can examine the list without finding therein many that he or she would like to possess. In cloth-bound form these books would cost $1.00 each. Each book is complete in itself.

1. The Widow Hedott Papers. This is the book over which your grandmothers laughed till they cried, and it is just as funny to-day as it ever was.
2. Winter Evening Recreations, a large collection of Acting, Charades, Tableaux, Games, Puzzles, etc., for social gatherings, private theatricals, and evenings at home; illustrated.
3. Back to the Old Home. A Novel. By Mary Cecil Hay, author of "Hidden Perils," etc.
4. Dialogues, Recitations and Readings, a large and choice collection for school exhibitions and public and private entertainments.
5. The Standard Letter Writer for Ladies and Gentlemen, a complete guide to correspondence, giving plain directions for the composition of letters of every kind, with innumerable forms and examples.
6. The Frozen Deep. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, author of "The Woman in White," etc.
7. Red Court Farm. A Novel. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynne," etc.
8. The Lady of the Lake. By Sir Walter Scott. "The Lady of the Lake" is a romance in verse, and of all the works of Scott none is more beautiful than this.
9. In Cupid's Net. A Novel. By the author of "Dora Thorne."
10. Amos Barton. A Novel. By George Eliot, author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," etc.
11. Lady Gwendoline's Dream. A Novel. By the author of "Dora Thorne," etc.
12. The Mystery of the Holly Tree. A Novel. By the author of "Dora Thorne," etc.
13. The Budget of Wit, Humor and Fun, a large collection of the funny stories, sketches, anecdotes, poems and jokes that have been written for some years; illustrated.
14. John Bowerbank's Wife. A Novel. By Miss Mulock, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc.
15. The Gray Woman. A Novel. By Mrs. Gaskell, author of "Mary Barton," etc.
16. Sixteen Complete Stories by Popular Authors, embracing love, humorous and detective stories, stories of society life, of adventure, of railway life, etc., all very interesting.
17. Jasper Dane's Secret. A Novel. By Miss M. E. Braddon, author of "Aurora Floyd," etc.
18. Fancy Work for Home Adornment, an entirely new work upon this subject, containing easy and practical instructions for making fancy baskets, wall pockets, brackets, needle work, embroidery, etc., etc., profusely and elegantly illustrated.
19. Grimm's Fairy Stories for the Young. The finest collection of fairy stories ever published. The children will be delighted with them.
20. Manual of Etiquette for Ladies and Gentlemen, a guide to politeness and good breeding, giving the rules of modern etiquette for all occasions.
21. Useful Knowledge for the Million, a handy book of useful information for all, upon many and various subjects; illustrated.
22. The Home Cook Book and Family Physician, containing hundreds of excellent cooking recipes and hints to housekeepers, also telling how to cure all common ailments by simple home remedies.
23. Manners and Customs in Far Away Lands, a very interesting and instructive book of travels, describing the peculiar life, habits, manners and customs of the people of foreign countries; illustrated.
24. 57 Popular Ballads. Same size as sheet music. All the old and new songs.
25. Called Back. A Novel. By Hugh Conway, author of "Dark Days," etc.
26. At the World's Mercy. A Novel. By Florence Warden, author of "The House on the Marsh," etc.
27. Mildred Trevanion. A Novel. By "The Duchess," author of "Molly Bawn," etc.
28. Dark Days. A Novel. By Hugh Conway, author of "Called Back," etc.
29. Shadows on the Snow. A Novel. By B. L. Farjeon, author of "Bread and Cheese-and-Kisses," etc.
30. Leoline. A Novel. By Mary Cecil Hay, author of "Brenda York," etc.
31. Gabriel's Marriage. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, author of "No Name," etc.
32. Reaping the Whirlwind. A Novel. By Mary Cecil Hay, author of "Old Middleton's Money," etc.
33. Dudley Carleton. A Novel. By Miss M. E. Braddon, author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.
34. A Golden Dawn. A Novel. By the author of "Dora Thorne," etc.
35. Valerie's Fate. A Novel. By Mrs. Alexander, author of "The Working Girl," etc.
36. Sister Rose. A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, author of "The Woman in White," etc.
37. Anne. A Novel. By Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynne," etc.
38. The Laurel Bush. A Novel. By Miss Mulock, author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc.
39. Robinson Crusoe. A thrilling narrative by Daniel De Foe, describing the adventures of a castaway on an island in the South Pacific Ocean.
40. How to Make Poultry Pay. A practical and instructive series of articles by Mr. F. H. Jacobs, Poultry Editor of "The Farm and Garden."
41. Parlor Magic and Chemical Experiments, a book which tells how to perform hundreds of magic tricks in magic and instructive experiments with simple agents.
42. Gems of the Poets, containing eight charming selections from Tennyson, Longfellow, Whittier, Byron, Shelley, Moore, Bryant, and others.
43. Building Plans for Practical, Low-cost Houses, a full description and plans of Eight modern houses, ranging in price from $500 to $4500.

Immediately upon receipt of subscription price, the ten books you select will be sent you, postpaid, and also special terms by which you can make from five to ten dollars per week with little effort, if you choose to do so. THE ENTIRE LIST of 43 books and City and Country for one year will be sent—all postpaid—on receipt of ONLY ONE DOLLAR. Accept this generous offer at once ARE WE RELIABLE? We refer to W. S. Ide, Pres't Fourth Nat'l Bank; F. C. Sessions, Pres't Commercial Nat'l Bank; Judge J. H. Collins; Columbus Buggy Co.; Hon. DeWitt C. Jones. Postmaster and ANY business house in Columbus. Every book is complete, not abridged in any way. ORDER BY THE NUMBER. Address: WILL C. TURNER Columbus, O.

Strengthen confidence in the Estey Organ. Its tone, the perfection of material in its construction, and the painstaking care given to every detail are reasons for its leading position. Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

ESTEY ORGAN CO.,
Brattleboro, Vt.
ESTEY & CAMP,
188 and 190 State Street, Chicago, Ill.
916 and 918 Olive Street, St. Louis, Mo.

Vaughan's Seed Store OUR 1887 CATALOGUE
TELLS THE WHOLE STORY
FOR THE GARDENER—THE FARMER—AND THOSE WHO LOVE PLANTS—AND—FLOWERS. SEND 2 STAMPS.
J-C VAUGHAN—42 LA SALLE ST.—CHICAGO.

A Dictionary of Synonyms and
Antonyms. With an appendix of varied information
Prepared by Dr. SAMUEL FALLOWS. Cloth, pp. 512.
Price, $1.25, post paid. Mailed to any address by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE,

WEST BRIDGEWATER, MASS.

For Girls and Young Women. School Course, Collegiate Course, Teachers' Course.
HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal.
Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newham College, Cambridge, England.

UNITY

FREEDOM. FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MARCH 12, 1887.

[NUMBER 2

EDITORIAL.

ALLUDING to the tobogganing craze, the Lever thinks that the surest and quickest way of riding down hill is on a jug.

ROME has recently added fifty-four English martyrs in the time of Henry VIII. to its calendar of saints, among which is Thomas Moore.

WILLIAM M. PAYNE, in the Dial for February, speaks of Goethe, Hugo, Milton, and Landor, as belonging to the "glorious company of those whose high hope has remained undimmed in extremest age."

A PATENT heater full of fire was purposely dumped the other day over a bridge near New York. It fell forty feet into a pile of combustible matter, and it did not burn anything. This is the way the railroad authorities are groping toward safety. Patience will bring it. Persistency and ingenuity exercised in the search for safer railroad transit may offer a lesson to the preachers.

THE second number of The Open Court contains the brilliant article entitled "Possibilities" by Rowland Connor, a part of which we listened to with great interest at the Manistee dedication, referred to in our last number. In this article Mr. Connor predicts the early success of submarine and aerial navigation, of the "electroscope," which will enable us to see distant objects, as now we hear distant voices through the telephone, and the perfection of the new glass recently invented in Germany, which will immensely extend the power of the telescope and microscope.

HENRY WARD BEECHER is dead. The land is in mourning, and the press is crowded with tributes to the memory of the greatest pulpit orator America has ever produced. The final summing up of his life will find him a Great-Heart. All his instincts were humanitarian. He was always a willing advocate of the oppressed of every kind and condition. His influence has been a mighty power for liberal things. All honor to the great preacher, and all sympathy to the bereaved family, and to the thousands who depended upon his weekly ministrations for their best help in the life of the spirit.

JAMES K. HOSMER, of the Washington University, is at work upon a new life of Sir Henry Vane. Last summer he spent in London, accumulating materials for the same. In a recent number of the Literary World he gives an interesting account of his literary explorations and discoveries abroad, in which article he indulges in the following prophecy. Who dare say that it may not come true?

"I heard Sir Wilfrid Lawson in Parliament shout out that he 'belonged to a society for the abolition of the House of Lords,' and there were loud cheers. Few doubt that disestablishment is near. As England grows more and more like us, her great dependencies, Australia, New Zealand, the Cape and Canada, already being like us, what is to hinder the coming together of the English-speaking world sometime into a great federation? Dependence was once a good thing; without it colonial America would have fallen to France. Independence was and is a good thing, for us and for England too. But inter-dependence is something yet finer, and I think it is not unreasonable or Utopian to anticipate a time when ancient prejudices will be mitigated, and a desire to come together into a brotherly bond manifest itself. Vane is a name to come together under. I wrote the life of Sam Adams, the main agent in splitting England and America apart. I am glad, also, to write the life of Vane, under whose name we may come together again."

THE Congregational ministers of this city at their meeting last Monday halted and divided over a resolution of sympathy with Mrs. Beecher in the hour of her great sorrow. They hesitated lest it might either endanger somehow their own doctrinal reputation, or threaten the truth of the doctrines themselves. Still the humanities overlay the divinities, and the heart of Congregationalism is bigger than its theology. In the light of history, no one can doubt which will finally triumph. The time will come when these would-be exponents of Jesus, who withhold the hand of sympathy on the brink of an open grave, until they settle the theological bearings of that hand grasp, will be ashamed of themselves; or at least, when a loving church will be ashamed of them.

"YESTERDAY, when at work at my desk, I heard my little four-year-old boy singing in the nursery, 'For the Truth and the Right and the Love.' Over and over sounded the refrain, till the older children caught it, and at last the whole chorus sounded through the house. Yes, you were right in thinking we needed these songs. I thought not at first. But we have only been singing them here a little while, and every one is catching them. I find them a great help in new congregations, as at Rock Rapids." This word from a fellow-worker out in the field, referring to our revised "Moody and Sankey" song-tract, the one called "Love to God and Love to Man," and containing forty-seven songs adapted to revival tunes. It is No. 28 in the "Unity Mission" series of tracts. Five cents sent to this office for it will perhaps set your nursery, your Sunday afternoon circle, your little home-church around the piano, chorusing.

MR. SIMMONS, of Minneapolis, has been preaching on Tennyson's last poem. Reported by the local paper, he says: "Tennyson's dark fancies and fears for society are corrected by facts, and Gladstone wisely says that the poem is 'purely subjective' and does 'not deal with the outside world at all.' To the poet's picture of children soaking 'soul and sense in city slime,' the ex-premier replies that 'for one such child now there were ten, perhaps twenty, fifty years back.' Tennyson's grim figure of attics where 'the smouldering fire of fever creeps across the rotted floor' must be modified by the fact that such are passing away; and I recently read in the London Lancet the surprising statement of Sir T. Spencer Wells, president of the sanitary congress, that the average duration of human life in Great Britain had apparently increased about fifty per cent. in the last half century. To the poet's lines about the human brutes of to-day we will assent, and remember how recently the spectators of a prize-fight in Minneapolis were described as the largest gathering under one roof here; but we will also remember the worse times when even parliament adjourned to honor the champion of England with a public reception.

"In the midst of our temperance reform this winter, it is also encouraging to look back to the last century, when in Virginia even clergymen often got drunk; and Part says the best Christian in New England saw nothing wrong in buying negroes for rum and selling them for West India molasses to make rum to buy some more. To Tennyson's picture of the workers' wrongs must be added Mr. Giffen's proofs of their improvements, too, and their worst wrongs to-day seem small compared with those we saw in France a century ago, where so many starving millions still pay three-fourths of their taxes to support the luxuries and vices of the nobility. To Tennyson's question, 'When was an age so crammed with madness, menace, lies?' history can calmly answer, 'Never so little so as now.' Better than even in the first 'Locksley Hall' do we see that 'the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.' And, in view of the growing desire for international peace and arbitration, which even the British Gladstone admits, we can have undue faith that all battle flags are yet to be 'furled in the parliament of man, the federation of the world.' Even religious animosities are lessening. The new poem says, with most stinging satire:

'Christain love among the churches
Looked the twain of heathen hate.'

"But we can reply that it looks less so to-day, and that the most evangelical churches are giving promise that they will yet become Christian, and dissolving all bigotry in the universal brotherhood, will see that among the heathen, also, love is the true religion."

M. J. SAVAGE has recently bloomed into a three-column poem, which was published in the Boston Sunday Globe of February 27. It is an answer to the poem of James Russell Lowell, published in the Atlantic of February. It is written in an easy, lilting style, which may disturb the guardians of "form" and the "Superintendents of Verse Making." But these lines are crowded with good sense, which necessarily is good philosophy and good religion. No literary power, or acquired prestige and fame, justifies a false note of the spirit, and when Tennyson or Lowell miss the serious intentions of this very serious age, they ought not to be allowed to go unchallenged. Mr. Savage has succeeded beyond any man in our fellowship in reducing the best thought and latest science of to-day into the vernacular of common life. These lines of his are just in that direction. We hope to see them circulated as a campaign document. The following are the closing lines:

Behind us is the dawn; before
The day is broadening to morn;
And man, the child of all the past,
Approaches man's estate at last.
"Now are we sons of God!" nor see
But glimpses of the yet to be—
The glory that shall come to birth
When man's at one with God on earth!
Then, Lowell, let thy latest lay
Be not a wail of dying day;
But let us hear thy bugle-horn
Ring welcome to the rising morn.

EVERY live church has a face of its own, like a person, and its Year Book is the annual photograph. The 1887 picture of Charles Ames's Philadelphia society, just received, tells of a year of earnest living and high thinking. Here is a hint or two for all of us: "Our building has been in use during the year 199 times, besides the free kindergarten's daily sessions,"—one half the kindergartner's salary being paid by the church. "A congregation must learn to do its own singing or be ashamed of itself," so twenty-two persons have become the choir to lead the way. "Thirty-four children, each bringing permission from the parents, joined the new temperance society." Philadelphia is nearly without free libraries, so the church has made a small beginning in this direction. 700 volumes, uniformed in red jackets by the young folks and duly cross-catalogued, are three or four times a week made free to all: "Number of persons drawing books, 215; many of them hard-worked people of little leisure." Perhaps, as with the free kindergartens started in private corners but just taken by that city into its school-system, this corner book-shelf may prove an acorn to a public oak. One of the best features of this Year Book is the dozen pages wherein some best bits from the preacher's sermons of 1886 are put past forgetting. We hope to enrich our paper with some of these fragments, and in another column print what is said about the Church Covenant.

Ethical Culture.

In ethics people are taught, not by what is told them of virtue and its consequences and rewards, present, temporal, eternal; they are taught by what, in various ways, they are brought to feel. Feelings, the sort of permanent emotions that we call convictions, principles, are produced chiefly through experiences. "Experience is a dear school, but fools will learn in no other," saith the ancient proverb; and it is ever more nearly true the larger we make the proportion of fools to the entire population. Seldom, if ever, are abiding convictions formed through knowledge that is communicated by word, written or spoken, however deeply reflected upon or philosophically considered. Moral education is, therefore, a matter of the life; it includes all that goes to the formation of character. In the phrase, "placing children under good influences," we have a word of wisdom that is worth far more than all the modern talk about the necessity of teaching morality in the public schools, worth more than a good deal that we hear in regard to ethical culture. Morality is taught in the public schools, no doubt, and in the street cars, also; in the dry-goods stores, everywhere where people associate together. But does any one imagine that he can improve the morality of people to any great degree, that he can educate people into virtue through instructing them in regard to what is right and what is wrong, and why people should do thus, and should not do so? It is a vain conclusion, an unfruitful fallacy, how vain and unfruitful we might be convinced by visiting our jails and state's prisons. We would there find people from almost every rank in life, and every one of them with abundant knowledge of all the central principles of ethics which they have transgressed. If a shorthand writer should take down from their lips their real beliefs in regard to ethics, and should sift and average these, he would have a very fair code of morals. What these people have lacked is not knowledge of morality, but the sort of training in life's experiences that reconciles to God, that makes satisfied with right living, that establishes the empire of righteousness, the kingdom of God, in the heart. Such training may be assisted in some small measure by the word fitly spoken in some crisis of experience, but there is nothing so likely to be effectual as the example of those admired, loved, looked up to, as worthy of imitation. Association with good people is the nine-tenths of moral training; admonition, preaching, the one-tenth, or some smaller proportion. This is why a church is so much the better sort of society for ethical culture. The influence of a church is largely through the religious feelings that are fostered there, through association, example, through their expression in music, ceremony, sermon and prayer. We believe religion to be a great reality. If it is a reality at all it is a great reality; even if it is a delusion it is something of a real thing still. Many delusions in the past have been mingled with religious faith and feeling, yet beneath all we believe there lie the deeper realities of our nature. Believing this, we cannot be indifferent in regard to them, nor fail to see the wide gulf that separates the religious society, or the Christian Church, from a society formed for ethical culture that excludes religious methods and ignores religious motives. The heartiest of fellowship should surely exist, should be cultivated, between churches and societies for ethical culture; they should in every way bid each other Godspeed, as working for the same ends. But this is not accomplished nor helped by forgetting the very real differences between the two. We believe in our methods and are upholding them firmly and conscientiously. To some of us it seems clear that ethical culture cannot be much promoted by admonition and instruction alone. It is with the heart man believes unto righteousness, and the heart is cultivated through the religious emotions, through church and family life, and all its associations. To leave religion and religious association out of the account is to cut off one of the most important factors of all higher ethical culture. U.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Thirty Thousand.

TO E. B. C.

Eighty years old on Dec. 9, 1886.

"Thirty thousand," said the Fates,
Mixers of the days to be,
As she passed the mystic gates,
Little Quaker baby she!

Thirty thousand days and nights—
That the dower with which she came;
All their sounds and all their sights
Vested in the tiny dame.

Thirty thousand dawns to print
Junes, Octobers, on the lands!
Title-deeds to every tint
Brought she in her rosy hands.

Thirty thousand flocks of stars
Pastured in the upper skies,
Sun-sets for their pasture-bars;
Title-deeds were in her eyes.

And a thousand moons had she
In her right of royal breath.
Ah, the dues they laid on thee,
Dainty Queen Elizabeth!

Price is high for royal dowers;
Thee must earn thy golden state;
Spend-thrift gods fling out the hours,
Miser gods keep count and weight.

Day and night and night and day,
One by one, as moments flee:
Lady of the Yea and Nay,
Thou hast earned thy queenerie!

Earned it as a noble should,
Dauntless, tireless, gentle-strong;
Giving Yea to every good,
Daring Nay to every wrong.

Thou dost leave a sweeter earth,
Less of poison, less of fen,
By thy precedent of worth
Stablished in the world's Amen.

Thou art part of all uplift:
One tint brighter rises morn
Henceforth, ever,—that thy gift
To each child that shall be born.

Not in calendars thy fame,
But secrete in happy prayer;
Men shall bless thee—not by name—
Thanking God for daily care.

"Thirty thousand," said the Fate:
But who draw the royal breath
Into lives the "days" translate,— Quaker Queen Elizabeth!

w. c. g.

The Teaching of George Eliot's Novels.

George Eliot's "hopeless novels!" This is the verdict we so often hear. Miss Woolson's estimate, admirable as it is in many ways, declares that her heroines never reach their ideals, and hence are disappointing. But that seems a superficial view only that pronounces these great works hopeless. And those who are disappointed in her heroines, because they are not let to reach their ideals, lose sight of the great good they do reach—that good which is of the highest value to us struggling human beings.

People clamor for successful endings to novels; if these are not had, they declare the novelist fails. They want to see something tangible accomplished. They fail to see above the material wreck a spiritual consummation, priceless beyond any other attainment. People really have not gotten far enough ahead of the novels where heroes come out of some tremendous dilemma, crowned with worldly glory, and happy in the possession of a beautiful bride and a great fortune. Their spiritual discernment is not clear enough, as yet, for them to see that any such success is a low success compared to what may be, and that a truly "hopeful" novel may leave the hero reviled of men, forsaken by love and fortune, or the heroine with her high ideals yet unattained.

There is one great lesson the individual is set in this world especially to learn: to attain victory over self, to curb selfishness and learn to live for others. Herein lies his greatest development; and we are developing creatures. George Eliot has chosen to set her heroines amidst the most painful situations, places more calculated than any battle-field to "try men's souls;" but can any one of them be pointed at as having failed to achieve that great victory of self-conquest? Every species of anguish is dealt out to them—the ingratitude and faithlessness of kindred, idols supposed to be made of pure gold disclosed as only of basest clay, the forcing of a sensitive soul to see day by day base living, yes, to be a partial partaker of it, to that soul's supreme disgust,—indeed her special effort seemed to be to choose those forms of pain most pervasive to the spirit and hardest to be borne. To make the situation more effective, women not of the strongest type are chosen thus to suffer.

Charlotte Brontë took the lofty-spirited, self-determined woman as her heroine. She suffers, and our sympathies are acutely enlisted; yet we know that she will be given the courage to endure, and will herself rise supreme to all obstacles whatever they may be. Therefore a sense of exaltation blends with our sympathy. This heroine of Charlotte Brontë conveys the highest lesson. We see what this conscious purpose to overcome, to do right though the heavens fall and we with them, can do. We, too, would be self-determined.

George Eliot's heroine, by nature, is of a more yielding, clinging type. She is one we instinctively love and long to help. With her it is, she would be much, not that she will be much. While Charlotte Brontë's heroine is often a force to mould circumstance, George Eliot's is moulded by it. Hence our hearts are wrenched at the exhibition of her sufferings, and instead of the lofty certainty that she will conquer, we cry in despair, How can she survive?

George Eliot's heroines are true to the larger class of women. Few, as yet, have learned self-dependence. Hence she has many readers; and while Jane Eyre, so far as kindredship to them is concerned, may be as far off as Hypatia or Zenobia, Maggie Tulliver and Dorothea Brooke are very near. In the life of one of these, the reader lives again her own life, meets her trials as shrinkingly, saddens with her disappointments, and with as impotent hands stretches out for the good she sees, but which forever eludes her. The sweet woman who finds life to be this!

Would that this living woman could but catch the lesson George Eliot with her unerring powers portrayed. Not in vain were the trials and disappointments, not fruitless this shattering of idols, loss of faith, withdrawal of every support that clinging nature demanded.

"I shall not die," cried Gwendolen in her hour of anguish, and though we are given no further vision of her, we know that we leave her a truer, greater woman than when we found her. Maggie's last act was her truest and bravest; what, then, if the pitiless waters did go over her? Romola! How many must have risen up to call her blessed! Sweet, womanly, beloved Dorothea, if her lot became that "common" lot of the ordinary wife and mother, is it so much less than that of the saint who would suffer in order that many may be saved? Surely modern science shows us what a force is the home to be in the amelioration of mankind. If all woman's endeavors outside the home are not in reality to help make that a more perfect institution, then they might as well be left unattempted. To the higher success that was granted Dorothea, "to suffer and be strong," was added the other, to be the beloved wife and true mother.

George Eliot shows us the spiritual growth of her heroines. She leaves them fuller and richer in character than when she took them. Sadder? The process sometimes brings sadness, but if growth results, shall we say sadder? When mastery of self is attained, does there not come something greater even than happiness? During the struggle we see the sorrow; after it we know there must be peace, else it were better not to grow!

Are such lessons "hopeless"? To those who understand not the consummation, they certainly are. But to those who perceive what has been won, they speak the highest kind of hope. We remember Gwendolen with her youthful ambitions, wayward desires, uncontrollable spirit, and we know her at last as the chastened woman who will "live" that she may help others. Is that hopeless? Whoever says yes, must demand that she should have married Daniel Deronda, or that some flaw in Grandcourt's "settlement" be discovered, and she left in complete possession of his property, or that she developed a talent for the stage!

That book is not hopeless that leaves the reader assured that the characters are spiritually passing upward and onward. Humanity has not progressed far enough for the mass of individuals to come into possession of this inheritance except through the thorny road of suffering. Those who find fault with George Eliot's "succession of misfortunes," must find fault with the world as she found it. She read the secret of life but too truly, but her teachings are not without hope. On the contrary they are full of hope. Whoever can show us that pain, and disappointment, and loss, and blight, are not blind forces to crush us, but means toward our spiritual development, he is our faithful, wise helper, and hope is the very feeling with which he has inspired us. Let those who decry the hopeless element in George Eliot's books examine their own creed of life and see in what it consists. Possibly they may find that the Philistine's doctrine has crept in, unaware. In "Middelmarch," Caleb Garth is made to say—these are not the exact words—"I hold that no man has a greater opportunity than this, to have it in his power to make more hopeful the condition of many of his fellow beings." Through her great gifts, George Eliot had just this opportunity through teaching them the truth. But it may be that not until later in this generation will her readers' eyes become unsealed to the fact.

There is a further popular misconception that is almost amusing. Why are her novels so hopeless? is asked, and the answer is given, Because she had no religion!

George Eliot had a religion, though, so far as we know, it was confined by its practical workings to this life. With her religion as duty, "stern and unyielding duty," and her creed "Love ye one another;" she recognized that Law that abideth in all things, and paid reverent homage to it. No religion, when her life was a consecration to truth? More and more we are learning that religion consists not so much in belief, as in life. If religion be the "tie that binds man to God," what constitutes that "tie"? Surely a loving devotion to the welfare of his fellow man. "Most of all," said George Eliot once, "I desire to influence young men." She wrote her novels for the good they might do. And if her religion did not embrace an hereafter, she certainly tried to live like one who had begun an immortal existence. We who declare our faith in that life, must certainly admit that there was a majesty in her attitude the believer can never attain; for she taught and gave a divine obedience to that Law the world manifests, even though great suffering became involved, without the consolation that all will be righted in the hereafter. Added grandeur is given to the teaching, when Duty is thus taught.

To some, George Eliot appears at her highest here. Is it not comparatively easy for the seer, with his eyes fixed on the stars, to say, "What of your ills and woes? they are but of a day. Bear them; live the good, though even greater privation is thine; for thou art infinite." But she! She had not her eyes on the stars; she watched the unceasing round of the weary earth, and knew the wretchedness and loss of her kind. Yet she said, as peremptorily as Wordsworth or Emerson, Do thy duty! As she was a woman, with the clinging nature of her own heroines, the spectacle became sublime. The lesson, through the very conditions of its giving, becomes all the more imperative. The world needed it. It needed authority uttered from the simple plane of this life, and not clothed with insights into the everlasting life of the beyond. If we are moved by the thought of the solace denied her, we glow with the recollection that she had greatness enough to teach the lesson; we trust it may not be long before the world at large sees it in its truth; and all the lessons she taught, so that her unselfish prayer is granted, and she indeed

"May join the choir invisible Whose glory is the gladness of the world."

ABBIE M. GANNETT.

How we Got the Temperance Society in the Church.

A STORY OF WHAT MIGHT BE.

"How did you get that Temperance Society going in your church? Unitarians aren't good at such things."

"It wasn't hard. First, six of us, who wanted it, talked together. Then we sent out written invitations to thirty friends to meet and discuss the resolutions passed at the National Unitarian Conference in 1884, taking care to include some bright people who would be sure to object to them. The resolutions read:

'Resolved, That, under all the conditions of modern society, we believe that nothing short of a total disuse of intoxicating beverages can serve as a sure means of abolishing and preventing the miseries and evils of intemperance.

'Resolved, That, since it is agreed on all sides that such beverages form no part of a necessary diet for men and women in health, we affectionately call on those who may regard their moderate use as innocent to give up such use, out of compassion for their weaker brethren."

"And were they well discussed?"

"Until 11 o'clock that night! That was advertisement for us. People began to talk about 'That Temperance debate of yours.' The next week we sent out a printed invitation, inviting all interested in forming a Temperance Society on an open basis to meet and continue that debate. The basis read as follows:

'The purpose of this society shall be to work for the cause of temperance in whatever ways may seem to it wise and right; to study the social problems of poverty, crime and disease in their relation to the use of intoxicating drinks, and to diffuse whatever knowledge may be gained; to discuss methods of temperance reform; to devise and, so far as possible, to execute plans for practical reform; to exert, by its meetings and by its membership, such influence for good as by the grace of God it may possess.'"

"What, a Temperance Society without total abstinence, and without a pledge?"

"No total abstinence nor pledge required,—neither one made condition of membership. The invitation expressly said that; but it added, 'All who like the pledge-way will be free to use it.'"

"Well?"

"Well, eighty persons came that second time,—a dozen young men, strangers to us, who had heard of it, among them. And again we had taken care to have both views well represented, so there was a brisk debate. Things were kept earnest and friendly—no mere arguing. Both sides talked as people interested in temperance, and the idea was kept well to the surface that both sides could unite in temperance effort. That idea seemed to please it somehow; worked to make us all open-minded and fair to the opposite view. It sobered us to start with, and that was already a temperance gain."

"And what was the result?"

"That nearly all the eighty wanted to join a temperance society formed on that basis, and of the eighty, forty-seven favored total abstinence."

"And you all agreed to work together in real equality?"

"Yes. And then the pledge-question came up for us 'totals' to decide for ourselves."

"Right there, in that same meeting?"

"Certainly. The 'non-totals' sat by listening and smiling and evidently interested, as we tackled our conundrum. Some of us didn't want any pledge: if real, it gave a chronic feeling of bondage; and often it was not real, was lightly broken,—and so on. True enough, as we all knew. Three or four seemed to take it for granted that the only possible form of pledge was a life-pledge. But a little talk brought out a general feeling that life-pledges were unwise, because they bound one to-day to action ten, twenty, fifty years hence, however much his opinions might have changed meanwhile; and there was a very strong feeling on the part of some that for us to encourage or even allow the children to take such life-pledges was absolutely wrong. So before long the talk came down to a choice between two forms of time-pledge,—one for a definite period, say a year—the other a card-pledge, to expire whenever one chose to give back his card to the society. On the whole, the former seemed the cleanest, honestest, freest way of doing the thing. It left least temptation open on the 'breaking' side, for that formal card-surrender might not be a very pleasant or convenient business. And an annual pledge-renewal, some one suggested, might be made the occasion of a sort of festival and a new impression of our purpose on ourselves and on the public. Finally we all decided—we 'totals,' I mean—on a one-year's pledge of total abstinence, with annual renewals."

"And how did you take the pledge? How did you arrange things for the 'non-totals'?"

"With them, not for them. We did it very easily and pleasantly. That 'purpose' or 'basis' I spoke of was written in a book, and under it these words:

'We, whose names are written here, unite for the purpose set forth above. And as a means of promoting these objects, those of us who put the letter A against our names agree to abstain, through one year from the date of signature, from drinking wine, beer, cider, or other alcoholic drinks, except as medicine.'

"And then all signed, some with the A and some without?"

"Just so."

"How many altogether?"

"Sixty-eight."

"And how many A's among them?"

"Fifty-two."

"Why, you said that only forty-seven favored total abstinence; did more come in?"

"No, but five came over. The whole spirit was so fair and equal, and so earnest, that five more said, 'All right, we'll go in with you for a year, anyway.'"

"And I suppose the original 'six' winked at each other then?"

"Not visibly, but on comparing notes afterwards we found that we had all winked inside. Of course we were glad."

"How could you let tobacco alone?"

"Both anti-tobacco and the 'White Cross' work were spoken of; the 'Band of Mercy' pledge, too. And some one suggested grouping all the four things in a 'Bond of Self-Control.' We decided to limit the pledge to Temperance, however, and call ourselves a Temperance Society. But the society has taken such a broad name, the 'True Helpers,' and adopted two such broad mottoes,—'On Honor' and 'For their Sake,'—that almost any good cause of purity or chivalry practically belongs to us. Our 'True Helpers' are becoming a kind of Public Spirit Society, especially among the young folks of the church."

"How about them, the children? Do they form a separate branch, or join right in with you older ones?"

"Right in with us on the Book. We wanted to be together there. In several cases the father, the mother, and a child or two, signed in a group. It seemed to catch both ways,—the parents interested for the children's sake, the children interested because the parents were. But the children have a separate set of officers to some extent, and have special charge of certain meetings. We have two rules: no child under eight years old can sign the pledge; and no child can join without bringing the parents' consent on a consent-card furnished them. That binds the home and church together in this influence. The card says:

'We fully consent that our children (names and ages given) should join the 'True Helpers' Temperance Society; and we will assist them in keeping their promises to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as beverages.'

"What did the boys say to your cider-clause?"

"It made them think. It made the joining mean something to them. And doubtless it kept out some. But the others soon saw that that was the one bit of self-sacrifice about it—that that was all that made it 'for their sake.' And one of them made a song which they were singing all October, 'Not a drop of the cider more.'"

"You spoke of meetings: what do you do at them?"

"The society has four regular meetings a year, one every three months. Two of these are right in Sunday-school, taking the place of the usual session on those days; and the 'True Helper' children have special charge of these meetings, partly arranging their own programmes of recitations, songs, tableaux, and inviting the 'True Helper' old folks as 'honorable members.' They are given reserved seats, and then the other fathers and mothers are allowed to crowd the room. The teachers help, of course; perhaps one of them makes a short talk or shows a chemical experiment. For the service part we use one of the four new Temperance Services, with songs to Sunday-school tunes that all know; they come in a cheap pamphlet. The children really make a very good time of their two meetings."

"And about the other two?"

"Those we elders take in charge, alternating with the children's. Our mid-year meeting is perhaps a lecture—Mrs. Livermore came once, Prof. Weitbrecht and Dr. Richardson once, and once the Chief of Police and the Warden of the State's Prison spoke to us of what they knew about the saloon question. We make it something worth coming to; advertise it well, and the church fills full. And this time the child 'True Helpers' are all there in reserved seats as the 'honorable members.' Then the fourth meeting is the Festival, the Renewal meeting, when we again sign the book for another year of work,—some with the A, and some without. The society, both sides of it, grows larger; and some of those most interested are persons not otherwise connected with the church. We welcome all. One of the 'services' I spoke of just now is arranged on purpose for a festival. A short report for the year is read, and perhaps special reports of work needing to be done in town. The agent for the Associated Charities made a very effective speech at last year's festival."

"You speak of your work, but what work do you do?"

"Not very much, it must be confessed. But simple membership, this standing publicly for temperance, means something. The 'True Helpers' weigh in our church, and the church weighs more in the community for having it. Still, a little real work is done. Our members are active in the 'Law and Order League' and in the 'Coffee and Reading Room' down town, and in the 'Newsboys' Parlor.' For next November they are talking with the minister about a temperance month of meetings,—four Sunday evenings in succession to be given to the subjects: 'Alcohol in a Bottle,' 'Alcohol in a Man,' 'Alcohol in the Home,' and 'Alcohol in Society.' And the children's branch have had a good thought: each three months they take up some special thing to do, plan it, raise the money for it—out of us, if they can't get it by their 'Fair' and their 'Dramatic'—do it, and report upon it. For instance, in summer they keep an ice water barrel full in front of the church. The car-drivers know our street as the 'ice-water route' and it is a sight to see the tin-pail brigade, about six o'clock, stop for their drinks. The little men and women make all the arrangements themselves with the ice men, who are so pleased that the fifty pounds a day given is near a hundred. One of the boys fills the barrel regularly twice a day; for his work and superintendence—he is 'captain of the barrel'—the children pay him forty cents a week. Then, in the fall three months, they see to the Thanksgiving baskets and the Christmas gifts for six families we know—victims of some one's drink. In winter they adopt a baby, a temperance baby, and see that that baby is warm all winter long with clothes on its back and coal in the stove. And so on; each meeting sees a definite thing done and a definite thing laid out to do next. That has helped a great deal to make it all a real and lasting interest to the children. Some of us feared at first that it would be hard to keep up interest. We have found it just the other way: it grows more real to them."

"Isn't your church rather exceptional in having men and women for such work?"

"Not a bit exceptional, just a good fair average. But to try such work, earnest trying helps of course to make the men and women for it. Only you must have six to start it—six who really want it."

"That's it. We haven't got the six in our church, ready-made."

"Then one will do!"

"But if we haven't one!"

"Then make him!"

"Who make him?"

"You!"

The above is a little more than "a story of what might be," after all. For something like this is beginning to be in our Unitarian churches. At the last National Conference in Saratoga (September, 1886), the "Unitarian Church Temperance Society" was formed on the general "basis" above reported. The constitution says: "The office of the Central Society shall be simply advisory to the Branch Societies; and no vote passed shall be binding upon, or in any way interfere with, the work of these Branch Societies." On this general basis some twenty branch societies have already freely organized themselves in our churches, some in one way, and some in another—"the first one reporting from Maine, the second from Pennsylvania, the third from Kansas, the next from Wisconsin," and so on. It is hoped that as many more will be formed before mid-May, and that all will co-operate with each other to the extent of sending by that time a report of methods and successes to the Secretary of the central organization. In Anniversary week a meeting of the society will be held in Boston, to which each branch can send two delegates.

The Executive Board has lately issued an admirable pamphlet full of practical recommendations, telling how to organize, what to do at meetings, what such a society can do in a town, what publications and working-tools will help and where to get these. Our "story" above embodies many of these hints, but those interested should send to the secretary for the pamphlet, and for the address by the president, Christopher R. Eliot, called "Temperance Work in Unitarian Churches: Why? What? How?" Both are sent free. Cards of membership, etc., are furnished very cheaply; and the Four Services, called respectively "Self-Control," "Self-Sacrifice," "Temperance," and "the City of God" (the last the Festival Service), will soon be ready. The secretary's address is REV. J. L. MARSH, WINCHESTER, MASS.

In the fifty odd churches of the Western Conference can we not report fifty odd branches of the Temperance Society?

W. C. G.

Picture Reform in Sunday-school.

It is true that the age is a good deal as Carlyle represented it, in need of reform. But to bark and bite at all the crudities and errors of our social life, to write bitter criticism about men and women who differ from us, to put up ourselves as the invariable standard of all excellence, is the pitiful attitude of a cynic. We ought to be kind and good in all our attempts to tear down and destroy forms of religious, social and political life which are opposed to what may be called the higher test of knowledge, utility and beauty, and give the grieved thousands that nobler faith which will meet every exigency of life. There is a reaper whose name is Reason, who with his keen sickle is cutting down all the intellectual weeds which have choked the flowers of noble manhood and womanhood, and is giving our civilization a large field in which to grow plenteously and bear abundantly without the taint of poison.

This reaper has made his appearance in the Sunday-school. The lesson sheets are not so dogmatic as they used to be when every page was well illumined by the fires of hell. We sing sweeter and more practical songs—those touching the experiences of life and reaching out with lingering compassion after the beggar's child and the poor orphan. Sometimes, in Brooklyn, the orthodox Sunday-schools quarrel if the liberal schools happen to lead in the annual processions; but a H. W. Beecher scolds the officers and rebukes the teachers, and the conservative churches feel ashamed.

But yet in many Sunday-schools we see hints of superstition in the pictures which are hung about the rooms. Jesus is represented as a god, and little children wonder why he looks so terribly provoked. They wish to think of him as a friend, loving them and saying to them as he kisses them, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Big gaudy chromos they see on the walls representing Jesus on the cross, but they, in their weakness, perhaps, think of him as in the fields, playing with them and saying, "Consider the lilies of the fields or the fowls of the air." Then they wonder what all those mediæval pictures are, of angels flying and demons with forks. They are afraid of that portrait of some one the teacher says is God, and they want to go home to a loving mother. Now these things are not exaggerations, and one's mind is certainly refreshed by attending the school-rooms of some of our more conservative churches. If Jesus is to be the ideal of children, let us represent him as loving them, as their friend, as being one who teaches us of a God who dwells not in a house made with hands, but who is a power working in laws of righteousness to help them to be happy. Let us hang upon the walls pictures of happy children sharing with each other their sweet-meats, leading a blind man across the street, kicking a banana peeling from the sidewalk, washing dishes, helping sick Nellie into the carriage, or carrying mother's bundles. Let us put on the walls the pictures of birds and flowers, of good men: Longfellow, Channing, Luther, Whittier and Florence Nightingale. Then we shall give the superintendent a material help, as necessary as the lesson to the children. And when the rooms are prettily furnished, we shall have, even in this generation, grand Sunday-schools, because they are more inviting than the toy or doll the children love so well.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

George Elliot's Ideals in Real Life.

"Aren't the ideals of George Eliot too high for realization?" was asked of Rev. J. Lloyd Jones last week, and his answer came promptly, "Why no, they are beaten in Quincy every day." And quickly to our mind came the image of a young woman whose life history had recently come to our knowledge. When she was a little girl the home of hard-earned labor was mortgaged for one thousand dollars in the interest of a reckless and dissipated brother. After a little time, the brother and the money gone, the mother and several young daughters set themselves to work to support the family and clear the home of this mortgage. The girl of our thought, then but eleven years old, milked a cow and walked miles each day, poorly clad and in all sorts of weather, to carry milk to customers. And this was but the beginning of years of bitterest drudgery. Penny by penny, by washing, house-cleaning, carpet-beating—labor that bent the back and wore the fingers to the bone, was the family kept together, and the money, with its accumulated interest, paid dollar by dollar. This girl had no childhood, no school days. There was no bright ribbon on her hat, no ease or gayety in her youth. Subjected at times to rough words and sensual looks, which she could not resent save in her pure and honest heart, she had no time for friend or lovers. Putting aside with stern hand the natural pleasures and hopes of girlhood, she bent every thought and energy to her task, and early and late, finding no work too hard or rough, she toiled on, not for one year or two, but for eleven long years, allowing herself but the barest necessities of life. Always polite and kind, with quick sympathies and natural humor, she has made no complaints, has asked no grain of help, for she is as proud as Lucifer, but has gone on her weary way without the thought occurring to her that she could do otherwise than she has done. The single purpose of helping the home people, of saving the home, has ruled her life. The hope that the servitude was nearly over, that if she worked harder than ever the last payment on the mortgage could be made in a few months, was more than tense nerves and tired muscles could bear, and while a few bitter tears were brushed shamedly from her ~~1784~~ face, the writer learned the repressed longings, the passionate protests, the full history of the years that heretofore had been known but in part. The composed figure with its shrewd gray eyes and sensible face is familiar to not a few, but how many even imagine that beneath the plain shawl beats a physically strained heart that has carried self-denial and renunciation—though she probably would not use these words—almost beyond the power of endurance.—Quincy Optic.

Our Covenant.

FROM THE 1887 YEAR BOOK OF THE SPRING GARDEN UNITARIAN SOCIETY, PHILADELPHIA.

In his recent book entitled "The Chautauqua Movement," Rev. Dr. Vincent describes in prophetic vision the religion of the future as it will be embodied in a Holy Catholic Church, where believing souls of all denominations will bend at a common altar and become "one at that sacred shrine where the Christ of humanity is exalted and his spirit imparted." He adds, "Their motto shall be, 'In the freedom of Truth, and in the spirit of Jesus Christ, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man.'" This language was first publicly used in 1881, when it was adopted as the Covenant of our Society. It has since been taken, in substance, as a basis of union or as a motto, by ten or more congregations, widely scattered, including some of the oldest and largest in New England. They seem to have shared our desire for something simple, brief, positive, inclusive, unmistakable; something exactly in a line with what is best in all churches, all religions, and all souls, but which should impose no yoke of human authority, and put no obstruction in the pathway of progress.

This is our aim: To make fast at the center to the universal verities of religion, yet leaving every mind perfectly free;—to secure the benefits of union and fellowship, yet setting up no binding standard of beliefs;—to revere the wise and good of all ages, and to welcome instruction and help from past and present, yet calling no man master;—to keep open-minded to all holy and helpful influences from seen or unseen sources, yet proving all things by the light of reason and experience;—to become a home, school and workshop of humanity and righteousness, yet not confounding our own imperfect organization with that Kingdom of God which is wide enough to include all faithful souls.—Charles G. Ames.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Practical Piety. Four discourses delivered at Central Music Hall Chicago, by Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 80 cents.

This is not lute-music, nor choir-chant, nor the priestly intone of sacred psalm; but the quick sharp ring of the bugle that wheels the ranks into battle-front before instant danger.

The student of literature will note the clarion ring of the closing sentences in each sermon. There are four sermons in all in this little book of sixty clear-typed pages,

Fortunate are those to whom the living voice bore the glowing sentences; but stripped of the charm of personal delivery—which may sometimes make a poor thought seem a fairly good one—the ideas burn with a living fire that warms heart and brain, and incites to do and dare. It is this ringing quality which makes these sermons eminently fit for a crowded Music Hall, with its subtle play of electricity between speaker and audience; the very stragglers and camp-followers in this march of life, hearing these trumpet-calls, must feel even their jaded souls stirred to join in the "rush to the front."

Small as the book is, here is the strength of a dozen classics boiled down and put into portable form—like that tiny jar of Liebig's Extract which holds sufficient beef essence to keep alive an Arctic traveler a fortnight. Here is a "Holy Living" which makes certain a holy dying; a "De Imitatione Christi," which leads the soul out from chill cloister and dark cell into the free air and sunshine; a "Saints' Rest," which proves conclusively that

"Rest is not quitting
The busy career;
Rest is the fitting
Of self to one's sphere."

Here is a piety that means practice; the religion of everyday life—Religion, who walks no longer in her silver slippers, but, in worn sandals of the wayfarer, journeys with us along the dusty highway of our work-a-day world.

It is curious, too, to note how inevitably earnestness of thought results in the perfection of literary style. If "the obscurely uttered is the obscurely thought," here is proof that clear thinking leads to eloquence of speech—there is not a platitude, a forced metaphor, a dull sentence in these pages. To those who have not read his previous words we may say: Here is the latest thought of the age, the last results of all science, the deepest truths in all poetry, the highest aspiration of all souls, past and present—passed through the alembic of a thoroughly well-balanced mind, freed from all that is superfluous, and reduced to the compact form fitted for the trim, soldierly bundle which is all we can afford to carry in our forced march from the cradle to the grave.

Who shall dare, in the face of the pulpit literature of the last decade, repeat the old taunts: "Liberalism has no beliefs," "Unitarians are coldly intellectual"? Our day of negations is done; our affirmations thunder through the land. Reason goes hand in hand with fervor, logic sweeps unconsciously into rhythm, the theologian is transformed into the seer and the prophet.

A. W. B.

LITERATURE, even more than science, is destructive of sectarianism. It is cosmopolitan. It appeals to universal sympathies, and it reflects the wants and aspirations of the cosmopolitan. The literary club and the literary worker are to-day bringing together in most fraternal fellowship those of widely different theological sympathies. These thoughts have been suggested by an examination of Denton J. Snider's two-volume Commentary on Goethe's "Faust." The volumes are "Privately Printed," and are, we suspect, used chiefly as adjuncts to the class work and parlor lecturing, which Mr. Snyder has conducted so successfully in many of our cities. The sub-title is in itself a mind opener,—"a Commentary on the Literary Bibles of the Occident." These volumes are helps where help is necessary. Fortunate is the class or the individual that by means of this help will find the life-expanding power of this great classic.

Susanna Wesley. By Eliza Clarke. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

This well printed, neatly bound volume of some 300 pages is well worthy of its place in the "Famous Women" series. It is written with "the sympathetic admiration of one in whose veins runs some of her [Susanna Wesley's] blood," and is a valuable addition to the biographies of the Wesleys. Mrs. Wesley's letters, of which about forty are given, are very interesting for the clear insight which they give us into the character of that noble, self-denying woman. Those written to her sons are full of good advice. In one full of good counsel addressed to her son John at Oxford, she writes this: "Believe me, dear son, old age is the worst time we can choose to mend either our lives or our fortunes. If the foundations of solid piety are not laid betimes in sound principles and virtuous dispositions, and if we neglect, while strength and vigor last, to lay up something ere the infirmities of age overtake us, it is a hundred to one odds that we shall die both poor and wicked." This is but one of many equally good sayings that are worthy of thought. The book will be warmly welcomed by all lovers of the Wesleys.

THE HOME.

A Granite Man.

The day Daisy slipped her hand into her mother's for a little walk over to Aunt Amy's and back, was a particularly sunny one and savored of coming spring-time.

"The park really begins to look like itself again," said mamma, "we can take our way through it this morning, my Daisy, instead of keeping to the street sidewalk."

In the center of the park stood the noble statue of a man whose life had blest many other lives with generous deeds. The two had almost passed it when Daisy suddenly dropped her mother's hand, turned back and threw herself against the pedestal of the statue; reaching up she gave a cordial hug to the granite toes of the mighty man, whispered hurriedly, took off her mitten to pat him gently, then sprang back, and looking up in his face, laughed a regular peal of a "we-understand-each-other" kind of greeting. Then, recollecting herself again, she slipped on her mitten and demurely trotted away. Her mother, who at first had walked slowly on, having turned to see what delayed her, was just in time to catch the friendly nod and laugh which closed the greeting.

"How is it that you and Mr. A— happen to be such good friends?"

"I dreamed a nice dream about him once, and I've always liked him ever since," Daisy declared with the utmost freedom, as if it were quite the natural thing. Then after a serious moment in which the dream was evidently creeping back into her mind, the infant philosopher added: "Really, you know, it must be very lonely for him to stand up there all the time and see everybody have such good times around him, while he can't come down himself nor go 'round the least little bit, and he's just as cold when you touch him!" "Yet you took off your mitten to pat him." "Yes, 'course he likes my warm hand best! I wouldn't like to say, 'scuse my mitten,' to him, as folks do about their gloves. Prob'ly he wouldn't mind, now its cold weather and he's so kind, but I like him 'nough to take it off. Last summer just on the side the sun was shining, he felt hot, and he looks shiny now on that side, but on the shady side he was cold and didn't shine; so I liked his shady side best hot days, and his sunny side cold days." "I remember looking from the window last summer, when you and the children were out, and I always liked to see you playing around the 'granite man,' you were pretty sure to be there, too. I remember wishing that the good man's spirit might in some unconscious way bless your dear little lives."

The face which Daisy turned up to her mother was glistening with interrogation points, but they were the kind which get their answers in some other way than words, for her expression took on a quiet satisfaction, and she returned to the talk of her last summer's playtime.

"It was just truly lonesome out there playing without Willie and Bess before I could go to school, until after I got acquainted with the granite man. Then I liked him, so I didn't mind." "How did you get acquainted with him?" "Just trying to see how long I could stand it on his hot side one day. I 'most baked! I was cross that day and didn't want to stay out anyway. I guess I was so uncomf'ble inside I tried to be so outside too. After I gave it up on the hot side I just curled all up on the grass 'round the shady side and went to sleep. That was when I dreamed he talked to me about his self." "Can you tell me what he said?" "Well,"—Daisy hesitated—"I can't tell it as the dream did. I guess he wouldn't mind if I only told my mother! But all I remember, truly, is how I liked him for being there, and how sorry I was he was to stand all alone; whether it's raining or not, winter and summer; no matter how many nice people come and look at him and think him so grand, or how many boys and girls play round and don't mind about him 'tall—he likes them best,—he knows of course he's only stone and must keep on looking away off over their heads same as the sculpture-man made him look. He can't have any of their nice love for himself, because he just stands there to mean something, and 'course they can't really love stone, you know. I felt like he was a new friend of mine, and every bit of the mad had gone out of me when I waked up."

It was curious how the child's chatter carried so much more to the mother's thought than Daisy herself could have understood. It comforted the mother to follow the little one's dream and fit her own thoughts to it. She remembered how both the shady and the sunny sides of any one who is compelled to stand firmly at a post through everything, yield protection and exposure by turns to the way-farer at his feet; how he must be with them yet not of them, and keep looking beyond. "Do you s'pose, mamma, he ever will come down?" Her thoughtful way of putting the question disclosed another glimpse of the dream, rather than any fear of the downfall of the statue. "He does come down to any one who thinks about him, as you and I know, for he has come very close to us, and I am sure we shall never lose him quite out of our lives now that he has entered into them." "But that is different from what stays up there." "Yes, different and yet the largest part of it, —our part of it, and the best for us. Surely it would be rather dreadful, especially for any one standing under, if the granite man himself should come down."

R. T. L.

A Word and a Deed.

A little spring had lost its way
Amid the grass and fern;
A passing stranger scooped a well,
Where weary men might turn;
He walled it in, and hung with care
A ladle at the brink;
He thought not of the deed he did,
But judged that toil might drink.
He passed again, and lo! the well,
By summer never dried,
Has cooled ten thousand parched tongues,
And saved a life beside.

A nameless man, amid a crowd
That thronged the daily mart,
Let fall a word of hope and love,
Unstudied from the heart;
A whisper on the tumult thrown,
A transitory breath;
It raised a brother from the dust,
It saved a soul from death.
O germ! O fount! O word of love!
O thought at random cast!
Ye were but little at the first,
But mighty at the last!

—Charles Mackay.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

A Liberal and a Professional Faith.

A SERMON PREACHED BEFORE THE CHURCH OF THE UNITY, ST. LOUIS, MO., FEBRUARY 27, 1887, BY REV. JOHN C. LEARNED.

Published by the Congregation.

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeded out of the mouth of God."—MATT. IV. 4.

"Religion is the passion for all good."—W. M. SALTER.

When we speak of a liberal education we mean a broad, generous education, we refer to a course of study embracing many lines of research, making the mind many-sided and free. Ordinarily a liberal education has been associated with a college training; for the time was when in universities alone could men gain access to the stores of wisdom and knowledge gathered from all races and times. Then whoever had shared these unparalleled advantages stood superior to the less fortunate of his generation. He was larger-minded, clearer-sighted, better furnished with facts and the higher skill to use them. He knew what was to be known of science. He was familiar with several languages. He had followed down the great streams of human history. Nature with all its changes and its infinite variety had a meaning for him. Society was known to him in all past civilizations as well as in his own time. And what had been thought and said about God and his dealings with his children, as well as the laws of all substance and being, had some place in the furnishing of his mind.

To-day, valuable and even indispensable as the college still is, one may be liberally educated outside of college walls. Matthew Arnold tells us that culture means a knowledge of "the best that has been thought and said in the world." But the best is now fortunately within the reach of all. We need not longer try to read all works. It were still more vain and foolish to seek to know all that has been said and done. The best is all that is required, and the best is so little that any man in earnest can make it his own. What was in the dead languages has been translated into living languages. The press of our times places the great thoughts of all times in the very circles of our homes. The magazine and the newspaper publish the last observation of the scientist and student, making every aspect of nature or society a subject of instruction and inference.

It still remains, however, that no man is liberally educated who is not acquainted with the best that has been thought and known in the world. And he who knows that best is an essentially different man from him who knows it not. We have a right to expect some things of him which only by chance and by exception can we find in another. The liberally educated man may lack some things. As such he is no specialist, no professional man as yet. A liberal education is not and never was the means to a livelihood. It was to train the faculties, to develop the energies of the mind, to enlarge the thinking powers. High culture standing by itself will not keep a man from starvation; of course it should be supplemented by practical skill, coupled with some form of utility, with some technical calling. It should be followed by some branch of the "bread and butter sciences," as the Germans say. Yet we may safely assert that the time will never come when it will not be the supreme object of the best minds to gain for themselves and to secure to others the choice treasures of learning which constitute culture; which have been, and will continue to be, the surest foundation of intellectual greatness.

Of course it would not do to overlook the instances of intellectual greatness, even amounting to genius, which have sprung up under forbidding and adverse circumstances; fed with the poorest literary aliment; apparently setting at naught all the rules of sound learning; yet exerting a great influence in some field of thought or affairs. All praise to the self-made man who rises to usefulness and eminence! But too often we may find that these defects of early education, which it was the province of the liberal studies to correct, are always afterward bitterly deplored, never quite overcome, or they leave the man, in spite of his extraordinary powers, unequal, one-sided, narrow, or unreliable.

One evidence of a good education is a good judgment, a certain balance of mind. But a good judgment implies not only a large and manifold outlook into life, but that discipline of faculties which instinctively perceives the relations of persons and things, and groups all facts under their proper laws.

Undoubtedly we must concern ourselves with the "utilities" of life, as they are called. There must be the manual industries as well as the mental. There must be the lucrative education as well as the liberal—that which shall help men win something more from life than they spend. Yet when society gives itself wholly to muscular and mercenary pursuits, its tendency is downward and sordid. The mind has necessities and rights as well as the body. The imagination must be fed, the affections called forth and exalted, the reason exercised, the soul inspired; men must be generalists—to coin a word—before they are specialists. They should have some perception of how broad and deep and varied life is; they should have a measure of their own powers, before they settle down into the limits of a vocation which brings them bread and shelter. They should handle and gain some knowledge of the use of many tools, before they select the one tool which is to carve their way to fortune. The boy may make more money, and in that sense a greater success, by early entrance, with little schooling, upon some business or trade; but he will make more of a man and live a happier life if he stores his mind with some things not to be found in his narrow vocation. That mechanic is a better husband, father, citizen, who, when the day's work is over, can enjoy his newspaper or a book, than he who then must twirl his thumbs or go to bed, or seek his recreation in eating and drinking. He whose occupation is to point needles, or saw clothes-pins, or turn bobbins, is a better man for that early education which led him through the mazes of mathematical thought; which in geography and history took him sight-seeing through many lands, showing him the different peoples of the world, and brought the ancient and modern times into contrast and comparison. There is a certain amount of drudgery connected with every occupation in life. There are duties in our profession which we should gladly be rid of, and which at times become very irksome. The minister, lawyer, physician, statesman, teacher and merchant has his unyielding routine as well as the clerk, or cook, or day-laborer. There will be seasons of weariness, when the rational mind revolts at anything which seems to fix us down and so abridge our liberty. But on the whole the rational man, the liberally educated man, ought to bear his necessary confinement, and even the reverses of life, best. For while the hands are bound the mind is not. Lydia Maria Child said, while on her knees scrubbing her steps, "Well, duty may tie my hands, but nothing shall confine my mind from soaring free!" Such a one from the higher outlook may reconcile himself best to the law of circumstances. He can see in the hour of close routine the way and means to better things. He looks forward with hope and rejoicing to the leisure awaiting him when he can give the mind those gracious and blessed privileges of recreation and companionship which to the cultivated seem the very crown of existence.

Many have misunderstood the significance of that general training of the schools of our own time to their great harm. They have somehow thought that this knowledge of the textbooks was to free them from work and bring them easy fortunes. But when we learn that this training of the mind is not at all to release the hands from labor or our days from wholesome care; that it is only to make us the wiser to choose and the more efficient in what we undertake, and better and more manly men in all respects; then a readjustment will set in and the fanciful follies of so many vagrant young people will cease, who now are vainly looking for easy and genteel places with nothing in particular to do. We must have this general education for all classes. The American idea in this respect is no mistake, and will not be lightly abandoned. The whole people must be lifted up intellectually and well informed if our present form of government is to continue. Its chief dangers lie in the power of the impostor or the demagogue to excite and sway the ignorant masses. The hope of the impostor and the power of the fanatic, political or religious, lie in the increase of that class which will follow blindly or obey without thinking. Without reason, intelligence, culture, there is no limit to the influence which intrigue, fear and revolutionary schemes may have over them, turning all their prejudices and selfishness against the public weal.

There is no more a real conflict between education and labor than between capital and labor. Go into any agricultural district, into any manufacturing community, and nothing is truer than that the greater intelligence in either will disclose the greater thrift and the higher morality. Neither the farmer nor the mechanic is less industrious or frugal, or neat, or well-to-do, or more discontented, because he has received a good education, reads his daily or weekly paper, and has access to a well-selected library. Contrast the illiterate population of any land or state or city with the best communities that you and I know, and say if there is not something in mental training and the higher education to temper the passions and prejudices, to elevate the reason, and to refine the character and tastes of men.

Now what a liberal education is to a purely utilitarian or mechanical education, such seems to me the liberal faith is as compared with traditional and current systems. Orthodoxy is strictly utilitarian and professional. As the liberal education stands for the improvement of the man, the whole intellectual man waking up and testing all his faculties, enlarging his view of the field of life as the fit and necessary preliminary to a wise choice of vocation, so the liberal faith seeks to awaken all a man's spiritual faculties, opens the whole field of religious thought, but leaves the man unpledged except to reason and to truth. But the method of the popular faith is to start in with the specialty. It trusts to no man the privilege of choice as to what he will be or believe. It hastily shuts the doors if they open into the fields of inquiry or speculation, or heaps distrust if not contempt upon all peoples and doctrines lying outside the limits of a sect. It is not to be denied that this serves some very real wants. And it may be better for all those who want to be ruled, who crave authority more than they do truth, who dare not trust themselves in matters of faith, and whose chief concern is to escape some personal danger. It puts a certain check upon religious vagrancy. There are men without spiritual or rational balance who keep roaming about, not knowing what to think or do; and tired of this useless, unsteady life, are at length glad to find something definite and settled, even if false. Such persons are willing to dismiss their thinking powers henceforth for the sake of a local habitation and a name.

Yet it is in the light of these very services that orthodoxy merits the distinction of being a bread-and-butter religion. It is practical, not speculative; fixed, not progressive. The more orthodox, the less expansive and rational—distrusting reason. These qualities recommend it to many. Its type is those educators who would have a boy from the first put to a trade, with the feeling that it is of no consequence about the culture and development of his mind or his individual choice, there being a suspicion that all he could gain from books or thinking would only fill his head with fancies and follies to unsettle and ruin him at last.

In the one definite object of traditional religion lies its popular strength, and that is very great.

That object is "to save the soul;" and it seeks to make its scheme for this as definite as its object. This makes the motive utilitarian from first to last; and its method is a method of expedients. Its effect is not to develop the faculties, for the salvation of the soul has nothing to do with the faculties; but it gives self-satisfaction, complacency, and peace. It does not by any necessity develop virtue; for by its theory there is no merit in virtue. It has even heaped all manner of indignity upon morality—calling it the "filthy rags of righteousness." Intellectual culture, the powers of reason, have been ruled out, not merely as being no aid or means to salvation, but as a snare to the feet. To be saved the man must submit himself to what the scheme requires. He must simply use the tools put in his hands as he is told to use them, eat the bread set before him, asking no questions. He must make the proper declarations, in the proper phrases, read the prescribed works, observe the established rites; and coming to all these with the right dispositions he will certainly settle the theological problem in the authorized way, receive the promised rewards, make the spiritual profits, and thus gain the great end of life—the salvation of the soul.

But in the liberal faith the mind is not first and last and constantly directed to this specialty or professional result of getting the soul safe lodged in the secure blessedness of another life. It is not always thinking of rewards and possession of heavenly good to be meted out hereafter as the compensation of some strict conformity to a salvation scheme here. Other aims are involved in the personal and present conditions. The objective or traditional faiths seek by any and all means to lodge the soul in the heaven of God. And by their methods, no matter what a man has done or left undone; no matter what the soul is wanting in the true discipline of life; no matter what it is worth, lacking all the acquirements of virtue; no matter how mean in intellect or reason or self-control—though this were its own fault; one sigh of contrition from the dying thief, or the life-long libertine, one word of confession from the murderer under the gallows, is adequate to secure the favor of God, rescue the soul from danger, and command the supreme object of life. In contrast to all this the liberal faith seeks first to make the soul worth saving; seeks by all enlarging and rational views and knowledge of the truth and exercise of virtue in this life to fit it for any higher sphere or enjoyments which await us forever in the hereafter. If its thoughts are less on the future life than on this life, it is because here are our imperative duties; here are our golden opportunities.

If all our faculties are duly exercised; if our mental, moral and spiritual natures are guided and developed as they should be (and we are enjoined to love God with all the mind as well as with all the heart); if the present state is sacredly prized and justly improved, the soul will grow and be in health. It will be worth saving, and will be saved as the natural consequence of its fidelity and earnestness. In other words, if we do our duty in the present state we have no occasion to worry over our salvation in any future state. And the chief object of the liberal faith is, not to exalt schemes and creeds and forms of confession, not rites and sacraments or any style of ecclesiastical millinery, or labor-saving mechanism, but to commend active and receptive thought, freedom from prejudice and love of truth, pure souls and virtuous living.

Mr. Lowell tells us that between the two great poets, Dante and Chaucer, there was this religious distinction: "With Dante the main question is the saving of the soul, with Chaucer it is the conduct of life." Now these two expressions may mean the same thing; but more often, as in our time, they do not. For ourselves we feel that the health of society demands of us to appeal to men in behalf of the conductal life. And as intellectual culture gives to the mind longer range and a truer perspective, lifts one above a certain narrowness and pettiness of judgment; so the liberal faith, whenever it really exists (for what is called that may often be spurious), enables a man to estimate more broadly and fairly the great religious problems which agitate the world. He will be little concerned for schemes of salvation, it may be; he will be only concerned for their bearing upon the conduct of life. Moreover culture, mental or religious, enables men to suspend judgment and refuse to dogmatize where the want of culture is forever insisting upon definite and decisive answers. It is how often the sign of a childish mind that must have, at once, an authoritative statement, where the disciplined mind well knows that no such statement can be honestly given. The problem is very likely beyond human power to solve, or the evidence is as yet insufficient for a clear solution. And he who has not yet learned to distinguish between what he believes or hopes, and what he knows, is not yet fitted to instruct men either in virtue or in truth. The trouble with the man of traditions is, he must have his fixed and formulated answers at hand to meet all cases of doubt or inquiry, or he is distressed; while the man of liberal faith is perfectly content to leave many questions as he finds them—not only unanswered, but unanswerable in the light of present knowledge. He only wonders at that audacity and assumption which professes to settle, easily and once for all, and as if by divine commission, so many things that all fair reason and investigation must refuse to justify, being incompetent to determine.

Dogmatic answers are often a great comfort to a person overcome with a commission of doubt or a panic of fright; but what satisfaction can they afford to a man in his senses, rational and thoughtful? He is rather offended by that form of treatment. Unless there is greater pleasure to be gained from that stultification of the mind, which loves inactivity and prefers to be fed with what Matthew Arnold calls "claptrap," than in that calm pursuit of truth which is the privilege of the unfettered reason, then a liberal faith is best for those who are able to adopt it. This permits us to displace our poor creed of to-day with a better one to-morrow, if we can find it. We are bound only to seek and accept truth—truth of thought and of life. We would make our powers of mind more vigilant, every sensibility of right more keen, every fact of God more instructive. If life raises problems where certainty is impossible, men who claim to have it only betray thereby the paralysis which has struck their intellects. Man's destiny and sphere are dwarfed, the outlook of soul is belittled, the moment we are told that these are closed questions. We want them open—at least until the arrival of more sufficing testimony. The wing of fancy droops, aspiration dies, free-will faints and is powerless, whenever these windows out into the free, into the infinite, are barred and blinded by imprudent affirmation.

The soul will be saved if the soul is worth saving—no doubt of that. What shall we do then but mould it, build it as far as we may in the likeness of God? Let his life of reason, truth, holiness, flow in. Let it share in the unprofaned touch of his infinity. A French philosopher (Malebranche) said, "If I held truth captive I should let it fly, that I might have the pleasure of capturing it again." And surely it was not the sprig of hay or the wreath of olive leaves that rewarded the victor at the Olympian games. It was the long preparation, the discipline, the contest, in which were developed the highest results of national genius. So the true value and test of religion is not something beyond or external to the man, but something within him. Nothing outward or objective is his true measure. He shall not live by bread or for bread alone. He is not to be judged by the accidents of dress, food or shelter. He is not to be judged by the equally accidental rites he performs, nor the post he keeps, nor the prayers and professions that he makes. The attempt which he makes by some act of spiritual magic to cast the balance of his soul's fate on the side of salvation, may count as much against him as for him. But what the man is in himself; what he is at heart and by just reason; what he has made himself by the discipline of self-control and lofty aims; the faithfulness with which he has employed his powers and opportunities; the effort by which he has sought to realize in himself the perfections of God; the desire for truth, the love of equity, forgetfulness of self in the service of others; the heart responsive to all goodness, the mind open to all light;—these do indeed determine the character and the value of a man—a man's manhood—in the sight of God as really as in the sight of humanity.

We may not quiet our desires by satisfying them, for they grow faster than we can satisfy them; but we can pit one desire against another, and the greater will conquer the less. The permanent desires may, in ideal natures, conquer the transient ones. Among criminals there are no permanent desires; they have no ideal to which they strive, but they follow their animal desires without regard to consequences. The central point of character is the ideal; from that point character grows.

W. W.

BROWNING'S WOMEN.

BY MARY E. BURT.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY EDWARD E. HALE, D.D., LL.D.

A patient and loving study of some of Browning's characters is given to the world in this gracefully written volume, and it will doubtless add interest and life to the reading of the poet's works, and help readers to a clearer understanding of some obscure points in them. * * * Miss Burt will win many admirers by her style, which is very graceful and clear. * * * It is not too much to say that every lover of Browning will wish for, if he does not possess, a copy of this new and dainty volume before the year is over.—Chicago Tribune.

The study of Browning has been with Miss Burt a genuine enthusiasm, and of all efforts that have been made to make Browning intelligible to the ordinary mind, this seems to us by far the most successful. * * * Every Browning club would do well to make this book a text book, and every student of Browning should well and carefully digest its contents.—Saturday Evening Herald.

Into the preparation of this book the writer has put much loving care. The work is conscientious throughout. It has a personal flavor, which in a book of this kind is an advantage. This is not the commonplace of class-room instruction, but an informal discussion of characters concerning whom opinions may sometimes differ, but in whom the interest never fails. Still the analysis of characters is generally just, and the position taken has always been carefully considered. The book will win its own way with all who read or want to read the poet.—Unity.

Cloth, 16mo., gilt top, 236 pages. Price, $1.00.

For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

ESSAYS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE.

SUBJECTS:—Choice, Faculty, Public Education, Happiness and Time, Vainglory, Luck, Seeing Good Things, Side Lights of Intelligence, Individuality, Questions of Heroism, Praising, Censure, Flattery, Government, Handwriting, Knowledge, Meditation, Common Sense, Requit, Anger, Judgment of Others, Patience, Enemies, Immortal Life, Death, Emergency, Conscience Character as a Work, Superiority.

The volume of this [gnomic] wisdom is properly the world's Bible, and every sentence, every fragment of it is precious beyond price. Mr. Blake has given us in this little book the condensed result of the thought of his best hours—hours spent, and a great many of them, in study, reflection, observation, calm, careful meditation upon the great problems of life and of being. The fruit is a rare work of wisdom; a neat volume full to the brim of enrichment, suggestion, stimulus; a very encheiridion, a vademecum to carry amid all passages, the varied experiences and exposures of our earthly life. Every one will find something here to feed upon, permission to carry for the waste and solitary places in his journey—song of conquest, notes of the battle cry for successful conflict and victory.—Charles D. B. Mills in Unity.

The essays of Mr. Blake will surprise and delight all lovers of good English prose. He has made a contribution of lasting value to our literature in a form so condensed and so original as to inevitably attract and hold the attention of thoughtful readers. One is reminded not only by the brevity of these essays, but by the cast and mould of the sentences, and the plain, fine, discriminating language, of Bacon's condensed wit and sense. The quaint, clear English, like that which has come down to us from other days, is, however, the only thing in the book that is not modern. This writer reflects the culture of to-day. He respects individuality; he is humane; he is not afraid of the truth; he believes in the future, and that justice and mercy must prevail.—Chicago Tribune.

The quality of these essays which impresses us throughout is one for which we can find no better word than charm. There is something in their manner which is pleasing and delightful to a very high degree. Their quaintness, their archaic simplicity of manner and turn of phrase, have much to do with this. Very likely a critic here and there will say that the style is artificial and affected, but if the impeachment cannot be denied, it is certain that the artificiality is agreeable, and the affectation wonderfully pleasant. We do not imagine that Mr. Blake has chosen any of the great essayists for a model. But it is evident that, like all the essayists, he is a lover of his kind, that he has read them carefully and lovingly, and some of the colors from their palettes have been floated off upon his own. Perhaps it is Bacon more than any other who is subtly echoed here and there. But Mr. Blake is a lover of them all, and quotes from them with generous admiration. Nor has he hesitated, in two or three instances, to revert to subjects which the genius of Bacon has already touched and beautified—praise, anger, death, vainglory. It would be a daring thing to say that Mr. Blake's essays on these subjects are much better than those of "the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind," but "a consensus of the competent" would probably assign to them a greater value relatively to the needs and problems of the present time.—The Index.

1 volume, 216 pages, including full Index. Cloth, dark-red polished top, uncut edges. Price $1.00. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,
J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—Last week the Woman's Club held its annual meeting, and a large amount of good work accomplished was reported. Through the influence of this club, a woman physician has been appointed at the State Insane Asylum, another at the County Infirmary. A free kindergarten has been maintained throughout the year. Important legislation, both municipal and state, has been accomplished, or put in the way of accomplishment. The report of the "Protective Agency for Women and Children" shows that one hundred and twenty-seven complaints have been attended to. The detailed report of these cases is exceedingly interesting. We know of no more active or wholesome influence in the city than that exerted by the Woman's Club. Mrs. Lucretia Heywood is President and Mrs. E. E. Marean is the Recording Secretary-elect.

—The Chicago Women's Unitarian Association held its February meeting on Thursday, the 24th, at the Church of the Messiah. There were nearly one hundred ladies present. An excellent paper was given by Mrs. F. A. Johnson; topic: "Evolution of Religious Freedom." The discussion was opened by Mrs. Marean and became quite general. A good many ladies spoke briefly, and Mrs. Effinger and Mrs. West quite at length. The meeting adjourned at the usual time to meet March 31st, at the Third Church.

MRS. GEO. D. BROOMELL, Sec'y pro tem.

Boston Notes.—The daily papers report Rev. James Freeman Clarke with a hope of soon being about town again.

—Our Benevolent Fraternity of churches are holding, in the chapel in Parmenter street (a decayed section of our city), popular Sunday evening meetings, with much solo and chorus singing and instrumental accompaniment.

—The fiftieth anniversary of its present ministry under Rev. C. A. Bartol, and the one hundred and fiftieth of its foundation, was, on March 1st, celebrated by prayer and hymn and by addresses from all our oldest ministers, and from some prominent ministers of other denominations.

—In 1737 Boston had a homogeneous and a semi-patriarchal population.

—February 22d is, in Massachusetts, a legal holiday, and in city and suburbs it is quite generally given over to church festivals, with marches, dances, or historical exhibitions for the juveniles.

—Rev. Edward E. Hale will spend March in Florida and other southern states.

—The valuable Public Adult Schools closed March 11. It is stated that in 1754 the first Adult Schools were organized in North Wales. Lessons in reading the Bible were given on Sunday evenings in the parish chapels to pupils from six to seventy years of age. In 1811, in Wales, children and adults were taught separately. In 1812 the first English Adult Schools were opened in Bristol—Bible reading was taught. In 1813 writing was added as a study amid fierce opposition and large withdrawals of subscriptions. The first American Adult Schools were opened by the Warren Street Chapel, Boston. They are now made into public schools in many cities and towns in the United States.

—Rev. William P. Tilden partially supplies the pulpit of Rev. J. F. Clarke, who slowly improves in strength.

—All theatrical shows have during Lent retreated to the extreme northern cities, according to their well-known business rule for March, April and May. A movement is already making towards unusual inducements and an unusually large attendance on our Boston anniversary meetings in May.

Philadelphia.—The Mr. Gilbert who recently came out from the Methodist church speaks for Mr. Ames on the morning of the 6th.

—It is probable that Reynolds from Boston, Camp from Brooklyn, and all the liberal teachers in Philadelphia, including Weston, will participate in the dedication ceremonies and conference near at hand in Camden.

—Thomas B. Harned has read a paper on Walt Whitman before the Unity Ethical Association connected with Haskell's church.

—Mr. Ames has been preaching a series of sermons in delineation of his spiritual experiences on the journey from orthodoxy upward. They are replete with the homely, wise sayings which one may always expect from him.

—Weston has given two addresses on Buddha, and has been listened to by audiences generous in size and weight.

—Miss Porter, who edits Shakespeareana, is about to read a paper before the women's section of the Ethical Culture Society.

—The Emerson Circle at Germantown continues its readings. The average attendance is more than twenty. At present they are considering "English Traits."

—Although Unitarians and Universalists here pretty freely fellowship each other, there is one of the Universalist preachers who refuses to regard Unitarians as Christians, and consequently holds himself aloof from association.

—An attempt made at the Academy of Natural Sciences to frown down the free utterances of lecturers in the direction of evolution led to a very ill success. H. L. T.

Humboldt, Iowa. Here is a neatly printed calendar for Sunday evening services, running from the last of October to the first of June, giving titles of lectures and special services, in which sixteen different members of the parish take part, many of them young men and women, whom we recognize as having grown up in this parish work; for instance, we notice that the "Children's Christmas Service" was to be in charge of Miss Edith Prouty; that March 6th there was to be a "Service of Freedom," with a paper on Harriet Beecher Stowe, by Mary Taft. April 3d, the paper will be on John Howard, by Minnie Avery. It seems to us but yesterday when in our campaigning days these were three little girls in the Humboldt Sunday-school, who listened with delightful attention to what "Uncle Jenk" had to say. Among other topics are found Gladstone, Emerson, Victor Hugo, "Religion in Art," etc., etc. If there is another Unitarian parish east or west who can and will show such a corps of lay-workers on high themes as this little parish far out on the Iowa prairie, UNITY and its readers are anxious to hear from it. Why is it so? We answer: 1. Humboldt was planted upon an idea. S. H. Taft founded his colony there with religion, morals and reform, on the banner around which the immigrants rallied. 2. The "Humboldt College," which so many Unitarians east and west mourn as dead, lives in the power that makes this programme possible. We wish those who mourn ill-invested money in that institution which was born out of a great prophetic dream, might each have a copy of this programme, and that they might be able to read between the lines what the present writer can. 3. The two pastors which this church has had, have believed in ideas, and in working for them during the week-days, as well as preaching them on Sunday. 4. These two pastors happened to be women. This has had something to do with it. How much?

Women's Western Unitarian Conference.—The fourth quarterly meeting of the Directors was held at the office on Thursday March 8. Present: Mrs. West, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Dow, Mrs. Hilton, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Marean and Miss Graves. The minutes of the December meeting were read and approved. The treasurer read her report, which was accepted. Letters from absent directors were then read. The general expression was of interest in the work of the conference and hope for its continuance and increase. Mrs. Savage was "grateful" for the Post-office Mission as "another up-lifting power brought to bear upon the human race—a power whose extent and capacity are yet unmeasured." Mrs. Dow and Mrs. Hilton spoke from recent intelligence of the zeal and activity of the women of the church in Denver. Mention was made by the secretary of a box received in February from the Women's Auxiliary Conference—branch of the Church of the Disciples, Boston—containing for the Loan Library ten volumes, 884 pamphlet sermons by Doctor Clarke, twelve volumes of Old and New, a large package of Registers, copies of UNITY, with a number of miscellaneous pamphlets—all excellent for distribution. Voted, that the secretary should send the thanks of the W. W. U. C. to the donors. Some time was next devoted to the discussion of a programme for the annual meeting in the afternoon of Tuesday, May 17, which it is hoped to make attractive and of practical value.

M. H. G.

Luverne, Minn.—Less than six months ago the Western Secretary gave the first Unitarian sermons ever heard in this enterprising town, and to-day Brother Hunting writes: "We have a Sunday-school and a Bible class of twenty-five persons, adults, and a Unity circle of ladies, reading and working, and much enthusiasm. The weather has been very bad since I came—a hard storm every week and railroads blocked up, but I continue to go from Luverne to Rock Rapids, Sundays, sixteen miles travel; a Bible class and two preaching services. We will soon organize a Sunday-school here." S. S. Hunting is renewing his youth and the good work goes cheerily on in the Northwest. So may it continue until the flame of enthusiasm reaches Duluth on the North and Wichita to the South! From both these rapidly growing centers come calls to our Western headquarters for a forward movement.

Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio.—Rev. A. G. Jennings, Missionary Agent of the American Unitarian Association for the three states above named, drops in on us all aglow with interest and enthusiasm in his work. He returns from a somewhat extended tour of observation—through Richmond, Dayton, Knightstown, Westfield, Evansville, Louisville, Cincinnati and other places—with encouraging reports from several important centers, where the time seems ripe for organizing Unitarian churches. He has spoken in these cities and towns eight times, and is planning for a vigorous spring campaign with

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MARCH 19, 1887.

[NUMBER 3

EDITORIAL.

FROM a letter: This is one of our friends who feels in his heart his religious isolation, and lack of fellowship, in a community where there is no Church of the Spirit, but many churches of creed. He is one of a large army of such lonely souls in this great West. "I am making arrangements to leave this locality to get into a climate where there is more external, internal, and eternal light."

WE believe in local organization and the development of home resources, and so we welcome the Unitarian Record, a prettily printed eight-page monthly that is to be the organ of the North Middlesex Unitarian churches in Massachusetts. The general editor is Rev. J. A. Chase, and Chelmsford is the place of publication. Subscription, 25 cents per annum, or clubs of ten for $10. Let other conferences go and do likewise.

ATTENTION has already been called in these columns to Dr. Lewis G. Janes's "Study of Primitive Christianity," but the appearance of a second edition bearing the imprint of Charles H. Kerr & Co., of Chicago, warrants the reiteration of the fact that it is a painstaking, scholarly study of great value, the reading of which will put at rest many of those in whose thoughts the ideas of Christ and Christianity are ill adjusted to their reason, and their knowledge of science and modern thought.

THE poet Longfellow wrote in his journal at Genoa: "The Strada Nuova, the most beautiful street I ever beheld,—a long succession of palaces. But what misery at their gates." This is a dreadful sight that all kind 'eyes see. Luxurious waste jostling gaunt want! The palace and the hovel. Oh the pain, the terror of having very much when "there is not enough to go round!" At Florence the poet wrote of Demidoff, a "Russian count of immense wealth, living on an income of a million dollars a year,—about two a minute."

IN the early training of children, spiritual courage, which is the most pressing of the needs of man, is rarely taught at all, or, when touched upon, is never presented except in the sense of being an adjunct to the heroism of the individual corporeally. Perhaps the most radical change needed in all popular educational methods is that which will bring about a concession of this as of the first importance. That which men may need most in early and after years it is a first duty to impart. The specific facts will come soon enough, but the spirit will never develop if the native love is maltreated.

AN important demonstration took place at Central Music Hall, this city, last Sunday. It was a joint meeting of the Clerks' Union and several Assemblies of the Knights of Labor, in the interests of Sunday closing of stores, barber-shops, markets, etc. Some fifteen-hundred people were out. Addresses were made by a large number of laboring men, and C. C. Bonny and John V. Farwell as representatives of the business men, and Messrs. Barrows (Presbyterian), Lorimer (Baptist), and Jones (Unitarian), for the clergy. The speeches were temperate but earnest; all the speakers based their plea on social and economic grounds. The demand was for a rest-day, leaving the conscience to determine its worship habits. A petition was extensively signed, asking for better legislation. The request is reasonable, and ought to be granted. Jews, Catholics and rationalistic Germans were recognized on the platform.

WE have the following from a friend: "Twenty years ago at Ann Arbor, I heard my first Unitarian sermon preached by C. H. Brigham, of sainted memory, in the old Court House. Descended from a long line of Puritan ancestors, on the mother's side, a series of ministers of the strictest sect, it was a long struggle to break away, but slowly and surely by help of Emerson and Parker especially, and the evolutionary views of Darwin and Spencer, a very glorious vantage ground has been reached, from which I can at least look over into the promised land. Pardon me for this much about myself, but I wanted to thank all UNITY workers for the comfort gotten monthly, and now weekly, from your pens."

A NEW York journalist has been investigating the latest thing in the way of "reception dresses." They are to be trimmed with jet. One of the specimens weighed 34 pounds, and another 49 pounds. These are being prepared in Lenten obscurity, but the true penance will begin when the dresses will be worn with a patience and submission such as old time devotees were wont to exercise when they wore hair shirts, or slept on naked stone. The later penance is done in honor of the goddess Fashion. If one of the ladies who will voluntarily carry this load of jet through an evening had to carry a 50 pound sack of flour home from the Grocer's, the charity organization would want to send her a "friendly visitor" in order to give her strength and encouragement.

UNITY's motto is "Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion;" and the first of these three principles we have always supposed referred to what is otherwise called "free inquiry," "free thought," "freedom of the mind," "intellectual liberty," or, more specifically, as our paper has once or twice defined it, "freedom in religion, i. e., the method of free reason in reaching religious convictions, as against the method of tradition or outward authority transcending reason;" "the intellectual method by which, as Unitarians hold, men ought to reach their intellectual convictions, whatever they may be." We had further supposed that this principle, so understood, was one of the commonplaces and household words of Unitarianism, and that not one thoughtful Unitarian could be found, even among those who valued tradition most, who would not say, "Yes, Freedom in Religion, in just that sense, is a first and fundamental principle with all of us; we value tradition and scripture, certainly, but only as sanctioned and confirmed by reason. Nothing transcends that, nothing is co-ordinate with that." But it seems we have been mistaken. A pamphlet has lately appeared, signed by ten Unitarian ministers, which repudiates our definition. That is not what Unitarians mean by their principle of Liberty; that is "an extreme and dogmatic rationalism," and "extreme rationalism has never been a Unitarian essential." The true Unitarian principle of liberty means "simply that character should not be tested by doctrines," and that one has "the right to speak his convictions without danger of personal obloquy;" so say the Ten Signers, and they are very thoughtful men. We have felt of late that a little more of their kind of Unitarian liberty would be a good thing too; but some of the sentences in "Doctor Channing's Note-book," just published, so well illustrate our own mistaken conception of Freedom in Religion, that in another column a few of them are printed. If not profitable to our brethren "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," they at least give ourselves some comfort. But then, not all persons are Channing Unitarians.

NUMBER 10 of the tracts in the "Social Purity" series, published by the "W. T. P. A.," is written by Anna Garlin Spencer, and is entitled "Literature and Vice." It is one of the most timely utterances we have seen for some time. After calling attention to the amount and character of pernicious reading, she speaks of the duty of parents in the following vigorous terms:

"There are two inflexible rules which every parent should obey and make the child obey, in respect to all reading outside of that required and suggested by a competent and trusted teacher in connection with school work. The first rule is, get the best and widest knowledge possible to you in respect to mentally and morally desirable books and papers for your children to read. The second rule is, allow no child to read anything which you have not selected yourself understandingly.

"What would be thought of a parent who turned a baby loose upon a table of indigestible and poisonous foods and drinks prepared for feasting grown-up and depraved appetites, and let it eat and drink at will? Yet, inasmuch as the mind and conscience are more precious and costly than the body, to permit a child to range, unattended and unrestrained, through the field of literature, is far more murderous and criminal!

"There can be hardly one mother in all America so isolated from educated people, or so poor in literary opportunity, that it is impossible for her to get something good, wholesome and attractive for her children to read. Cheap editions of standard books, and low-priced magazines, free libraries, and friendly advisers among ministers and teachers and helpful people, abound. It is failure to appreciate at its full power the evil that is in bad or poor literature, rather than inability to find out and procure good literature, which is the real trouble. It is the failure of ordinary parents to appreciate the duty to control and protect the growing mind, as of the same binding importance as the protection and care of the little body, which is the real trouble in this matter. It is, deeper than all, a false taste and vitiated moral judgment in the parents themselves that leave the children a prey to bad and silly books and papers. Let the parents "begin at Jerusalem." Let them cultivate in themselves a refined taste, a discriminating mental choice, and a real elevation of moral feeling respecting literature, and then they can and will surround their children with reading matter which will be altogether helpful."

Saint Patrick.

On Thursday, March 17, was celebrated one of the most universal Saints Days in christendom. Not even the boasted tap of the British drum equals it in its universality. St. Patrick dates so far back that of necessity the details of his life are buried in obscurity, and his name is overlaid with florid growth of miracle and myth. But enough is known to warrant us in believing that beneath this growth there must have been a large-minded, great-hearted, and strong-handed man, who in one lifetime and without bloodshed essentially changed the religious tendency of a whole people. Humanity never yet deified a pigmy or glorified a spiritual dwarf.

This festival also leads us to a reconsideration of a strange and interesting people, a people that is represented by the electric O'Connell, the heroic Emmett, the wit of Sheridan, and the fancy of Moore, as well as the "Pat" and the "Paddy" which are associated with the whiskey bottle and the shovel, a people whose home once deserved the title of the "Island of Saints and Sages," a people who have been the pioneer's schoolmaster in all English frontiers, for many centuries, and for the tardy recognition of whose wrongs a permanent glory gathers around England's great statesman—Gladstone.

Back of the people is the mother-church, which demands our attention. St. Patrick's own connection with Rome was very slender if there was any at all. He probably represented that Christianity that reached the British isles before Romish ecclesiastics did; but still St. Patrick to-day belongs to the Romish church, which is the most stupendous projection of the human mind and heart into an outward organization known to history. So sublime is it in its ideals; so comprehensive is it in its realization; so cosmopolitan is it in its communicants; so majestic are its cathedrals; so stately its rituals; so magnificent its art; so searching its standards of self-abnegation; so present its restraining power over the lives of men; so divine its actual charities,—that all combine to silence quibbling and grumbling. It is a stupendous though imperfect model of that actual catholic church, the church universal toward which all true thinking and high living depend.

Back of the church this festival suggests an inquiry as to what constitutes true sainthood. We know not what secures admission into the calendar of Rome; but the real saint is made not by credulity but by inquiry. Investigation as well as submission is a road that leads to the power of God. Archbishop Hughes boasted that Ireland had no Hierarchy, but if this is true, so much the worse for Ireland. He is the true saint who is manly, who has the power to shape circumstances, who keeps serene in the face of danger, and sweet in the presence of hatred. He is the saint who carries heavenly grace here on earth, who traffics in the humane instincts, who has refinement of mind, and delicacy of soul, to whom nothing human is foreign, nothing lowly is ignoble, nothing common is unclean. He is a saint who disarms hate with love, drives error off the field, with weapons of truth; he is a saint who makes the Lord's business his own, and then minds his own business. That man or woman is saintly that is gentle, and still strong; free, and yet reverent; independent, and yet devout. No vote of cardinals is necessary to admit this one into the calendar of holy saints, i. e. whole men and women they are already apostles, and martyrs, priests, and prophets in the true catholic church that, without creed, and without pope, is now the church universal, that commands universal respect, whose communicants already link the centuries and encircle the globe.

Facts.

Charles D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, New York, writes us, with his usual wide and warm wisdom: "A high place is to be assigned to works that speak to the imagination in the young mind—in all minds for that matter. It is this element, the beautiful symbolism found oft there, that gives for me the charm to studies of mythology, and the 'Thousand and One Nights' is a great storehouse of quickening suggestions, full of stimulus and enlargement to the soul, as we penetrate the meaning of this magnificent oriental imagery. I find very much the same in Norse, Greek and Hindu mythology; yes, even in the mythic conception of savage races, as I am able to get access to them." These are wise words, we say, and in some quarters needful, for we have met grown men and women who either were so little of children at any time of their lives, or have so far ceased to be children (which is the same as being far from the kingdom of Heaven), that they actually despised everything but what they called "facts" in the education of the young. But a thing may be fiction and yet fact. A picture is the very embodiment of truth, if it be a good picture, albeit it is neither a creature nor a landscape itself; but it is a presentation of these same by the human mind, and what the human mind adds thereto is a very great and instructive fact, indeed. What is a fact? Is it merely a thing! Surely not. Is it merely relations between things? Something more than these; for an expression of the relations is itself a fact, ay, an important fact. And if that expression be in glowing and imaginative forms, I know not but the expression itself may be a fact every whit as important as the truth expressed. Our revered and learned teacher, Doctor Noyes, advised us, long ago, to have fiction and poetry in ample proportion among our few books. Whoever lets his imagination lie shut, how wide-awake soever his reason, is like a person with one eye—he never sees quite straight, and some things that require two eyes he never sees at all. It is a truth and even a blessed truth, that an imagination well stored with beautiful images is as wholesome to the soul as a memory filled with scientific knowledge, or a mind ripe with reason. One kind of knowledge, very valuable for happiness, the reason never will reap alone in its fullness: I mean the knowledge to judge justly and move wisely toward others in life. For imagination and reason must serve each other like sisters, and both be handmaids of the heart, which is ill served if either be wanting. No one will judge another well, or help him best, who has not quick imagination to put himself in another's place and weave in his own mind a map of another's mental and moral journey, albeit he has set no foot in it himself. This is akin to that power which Galton calls "visualizing"—indeed in many situations it is the same thing, and this power Galton sets very high, and says it is rare. No doubt it is rarer than what are called understanding, reason and the like—which is one cause of the lack of sweet wisdom among men, while knowledge so much abounds. Let him who would know events keep his eyes open, and him who would use them keep his mind open; but let him who would gather them into a unity be open in all faculties, and fill his soul with pictures. Let the children have fairy lore, and enchanter's enchantments. And woe be to him from whom this tide has ebbed and left him dry. He is like a crab who faces the sea but has forgotten it, and walks backward up arid sands.

J. V. B.

Orthodoxy and Ethics.

Among the several addresses heard from Phillips Brooks during his stay at Philadelphia, there was one in which the ethical constitution of the universe was so beautifully and generously interpreted that a listener of radical faith could have felt nothing but gratification in being so confirmed. It was as though Emerson had at last given root to orthodoxy, and Gannett had been echoed in a land heretofore under his reproach. It did, indeed, seem proper enough for Brooks personally to project his thought beyond lines of orthodox custom, but that the fashionable assemblage about him should have been asked to look upon such a picture is unusual and happy. And yet this is not an assumption that Brooks took the most advanced position, but simply the remark that he reached out towards it, in terms to some extent theological, but with human sympathy ever in the foreground. Such incidents are evidences of religious growth. In the presence of a Presbyterian clergyman recently discoursing of the love of God, some of us were much struck with a curious impression he left upon our minds. We found that when he spoke of God, he put up barriers, seemed to encourage dissension, sought out differences, enforced hatred, outlined in a time-worn fashion certain things of the spirit as though they were lost and forsaken; but when he had turned from his speculation to the love he knew to abound in human hearts, he was all generosity, inclusiveness, gentleness, invitation. Now, this man endeavored to philosophize an identity of his two moods, with what dismal effect, to one who might deeply ponder it, may be imagined, yet the real divine force for which he appealed must reside in his larger rather than his narrower definition, for the love thus outgoing turns again to the ethical significance of the universe. It is not whether you can comprehend the ultimate circle of things, but whether you rightly estimate your relationship to it all and really respond to such conditions. Because man knows so little of the world at large, it need not follow that his impression is altogether unreal. It is a strange front the orthodox lines present at this day. With every practical bent in the drift to affirm the purely ethical basis of life, there is a painful effort to make the new thing mean the old, as if there could be no weakness to follow upon that unnatural association. Goethe saw clearly enough in Faust the larger meaning of modern discovery. Science does not suppose atheism, pessimism, surrender to despair, but a vaster hope, a broader horizon, a gentler, profounder summoning of men to their duties. And Goethe, in discerning that this thought might never grow into definite shape, after any strictly pictorial manner, did not assume the necessity of absolute exposition. With the optimist's eye, who may not see to God? And though the lips dare not utter the name, how often the heart arises to it when venturing all for the moral law! And this is the recognition for which the Radical faiths, in common with Brooks and our Presbyterian fellow-believer, are pledged, whether nomenclature is united upon or not. All ripe thought at this day has the one direction. It is not orthodox Christians alone who feel themselves present to a scene pulsing with ethical influences. Many, who disclaim any desire to be of the current faiths, are allied with them, in so far as they are mutually invested with reverence for "the law of duty within." And the religious outcast may well feel that he, too, participates in a larger purpose than can be destroyed by the momentary stupidity or passion of men. Though none of the platforms indorse him, the universe is his if he be rightly sensible of its suggestions.

This is the topmost round of faith, and when we witness it, we have no need to put theological questions to its owner. The world is centered upon the cosmic men, who put themselves into instant relationship with universal ends. And the first step by which to gain that vantage ground consists in a realization of the infinite sway of beauty, law and justice. Orthodoxy could never wholly see this result, because it holds itself to the necessity for contradictions and dissensions. As the eye loses its passion and gains in sensibility to the universal, the inevitable conviction comes sweetly to human heart, and takes calm possession, just as if it knew the day had been waiting all along for its joyous arrival. When men once surrender everything to love—to justice—in their bearing one towards another, the fear of atheism in the word will die in a glow of divinity in the fact. Welcome to Brooks that he forefeels the larger day! Welcome to the sweet Presbyterian who dethrones his false God with love, and makes divinity manifest in seeming to deny it! The brain and heart of man are to come right, after the worst has been done and said that is possible to him.

H. L. T.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Uplifts of Heart and Will.

Uplifts of eager heart and earnest will!

Pulsings of soul!—

These, in their high, unintermittent surge,
Make Being whole.

Surgings of Spirit tow'ards the unknown source
Whence cometh all;

Surgings of Will to Duty, fair or hard,
Whate'er befall:

Ambitions high, to follow nobly out
The earthly Real;

Resolves no less to breathe heaven's purer air—
The far Ideal!

Struggling for self—to win and nobly use
Time's fairer good;

Strugglings sublime for others—to make fact
Man's brotherhood.

Not surgings for an hour to rush and roar,
And then subside;
But higher, holier surgings, that shall pour
In endless tide.

These are the Race, the Goal, the Home, the God,
In all earth's strife;

These are and shall be ever, soul of our soul,
Life of our life.

JAMES H. WEST.

The Spirit of Jesus.

BY AN ENGLISH LAYMAN.

"Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his."
—Rom. VIII, part of 9th v.

Dr. Norman McLeod once said, or wrote—I forget which—"As for church government, I always look on it as a question of dress, of clothes—or, rather, of spectacles. What suits one eye won't suit another." He might have said this of a good many things beside "church government." Half, nay, nearly all, the contests about religion and religious beliefs resolve themselves into the question of the mode of looking at these matters; and people will never get thoroughly to understand each other on these and kindred subjects until they recognize, more fully than they generally do, the standpoint of those from whom they differ. If you carefully study the controversies that are going on at the present time, or those that have recently subsided, you are pretty sure to find that the controversialists rarely grasp the fact that each side looks at the matter from an entirely different point of view to the other. It is this that makes nearly all controversy such a wearisome thing, especially to those who would like to see more of agreement than of difference. And yet controversy, particularly when it is between fair-minded persons, is a very useful thing. It makes one look into matters that are too apt to be lost sight of; it serves very often to confirm a faith too loosely held, or to destroy a false belief based on wholly insecure foundations.

There is, however, to controversy this unpleasing aspect, namely, that as a rule the subject matter is very trivial. This very triviality has a tendency to make the disputants veil their pettiness in big words and sounding phrases, and to give the controversy an appearance of importance wholly in excess of its real merits. The exact meaning of some particular word, the relative merits of some particular phrase, the value to be attached to some isolated act, call forth more animated debate, more searching into the pros and cons of the matter than it at all justifies; and all the time men lose sight of the spirit, the essential life, in the dust thrown about by the noisy rivals. For, be it remarked, the search for truth, which frequently can only be carried on by questioning, and refusing to take for granted all the beliefs that have had a long historical pedigree, is a very different thing from controversy. In the latter case the desire for victory over an opponent is regarded as of far more value than the establishment of the truth of some particular proposition: in the former, the skeptical attitude is assumed with the sole object of getting at the truth. I doubt then whether on the whole controversy is of much permanent service to the cause of truth, unless indeed it be carefully guarded, and the parties engaged in it be animated by the desire,—alas, too rare!—of thereby arriving at the truth. Bacon in one of his essays says: "As those wines which flow from the first treading of the grape are sweeter and better than those forced out by the press, which gives them the roughness of the husk and the stone, so are those doctrines best and sweetest which flow from a gentle crush of the scriptures, and are not wrung into controversies and common-places." And this expresses pretty much the view I have presented as to the merits and demerits of controversy.

It would be a nice calculation, were it only possible, for the theological statistician to ascertain what is the extent in time that the progress of religion has been hindered by discussions about the veriest trifles. If all the energy bestowed upon these could only have been spent in urging the claims of pure and undefiled religion upon the world, a very different spectacle would be presented from that which we now see around us. Even now we have not learned the full lesson that the life and example of Jesus have taught us, because of the controversies that have been carried on about his nature and person: even now there is more vitality displayed as to the right of certain persons to be called "Christians," than as to the best method of spreading the religion which Jesus sought to teach.

It is, I admit, very difficult to do that which it is of the utmost importance to do, namely, to get at the spirit of a thing and not to allow oneself to dwell too much upon the mere outward covering in which that spirit is enfolded. It is doubtful whether one can ever wholly shake off the prepossessions that education, or training, or temperament, give birth to. I don't believe in a thoroughly impartial historian: he will not be an effective one, depend upon it. I can conceive it possible that persons may be found willing to do justice to the opinions of others from whom they differ; but, unless they have no opinions themselves, in which case they will possess no merits as historians at all, they cannot be wholly impartial. It is better to recognize this at once, and to correct whatever mistakes we may be likely to fall into by making ample allowances for the standpoint of the author. In this way we may succeed in arriving at the truth.

There is another thing, too, which must be borne in mind, and that is, that in reading of the life of some great man, or the history of some particular period, you cannot in the latter case draw a fixed line and say, "here this period begins, and here it ends;" nor in the former case can you say that the man's life really ends when he ceases to breathe. For a man's life is not simply the vital principle by which he lives and moves and has his being: it is the spirit by which he not only acts himself, but causes others to act, by which he exerts an influence far beyond his immediate circle. It is not enough then to chronicle the date of a man's birth, what he said, what he did, and when he died, if you wish to find out all about him. All this may be very important to know, but it is not all that one should know. Just think for a moment how true this is of the life of Jesus.

There are four biographies of him which are extremely incomplete. What do they tell us? We get from two of them a sort of genealogical tree; we are told that the circumstances of his birth were very different from those of most children; numerous sayings of his are reported; there are stories told as to certain miraculous acts said to have been done by him; some beautiful parables are ascribed to his authorship; the circumstances which led to his death are told with some slight degree of variation; and certain manifestations are recorded of what took place immediately after his death. How meager, in one sense, all this is! We know nothing of him during the period covered from the cradle to his going to Jerusalem when about 12 years old, nor during the period extending from that time till the commencement of his ministry, when he was about 30 years of age. Does what we read in the four Gospels tell us all we feel to know about Jesus? Must not we know something of the history of the centuries that have elapsed since the body of Jesus was laid in the sepulcher hewn out of the rock, if we wish to get at his spirit, at the real influence he exerted? As a thoughtful writer has recently expressed it, "the real history of Jesus is found, not only in the Gospels, but in that sum total of all the influences which as inspirations from him have been, and still are, shaping the world's thought and life."

All this goes to show that when we fix our gaze upon one portion of his career, or on one special phase of his character, or on one particular act of his, we get a very incomplete notion of the man, his life and work. And here it is that creeds do so much mischief. Attempting to sum up very shortly all that is necessary to believe, they not only exclude much that it is important to take into consideration, but they tend to fix all thought upon just that which is included, and that only. Thus men come to regard all that is outside of the included statement of belief as calculated to do harm to the believer and to weaken his faith. Their whole strength is used to defend the creed from destruction; their whole object is to ward off attack; and they attain this by pains and penalties, restrictions and threats, so that thought, which should be free as the air, becomes "cribbed, cabined and confined," and truth is lost sight of in the desire to maintain a proposition, which, however tenable it may be, can after all contain but a portion of the truth.

(Continued next week.)

Death.

The gentle summons comes not late,
The darkness falls unsought;
We bridle not the ways of Fate,
Whose soul the heavens wrought.

There is no day too quick for thee,
Nor yet a night too dark;
Thy children wander by the sea,
And at thy will embark.

He who had faced the storms of years,
And paled not at thy tread,
Made deeds of days, and love of fears,
Till Life and Death were wed.

M. L. T.

Woman's Help to Women.

We hear much of the labor question, yet, perhaps, not enough. The stories of the hardships of sewing-women in New York and other large cities make one heart-sick. Every woman must wish to do something to better such a state of things, and I think it is possible for women to abolish many of these wrongs at once and directly.

For one thing, avoid the ready-made garments which are so alluringly cheap. Remember that, cheap as they are, they represent a considerable profit to jobber and merchant. They are cheap because of the starvation wages of the poor women who make them,—sometimes working sixteen hours a day for twenty-five cents. Deal directly with the working-women. Pay them for the value their work has added to the raw material. This alone would be a great benefit to them; but we can help them still more by simplifying our dress.

To the eye of a painter or a sculptor, our unhealthfully heavy drapery and profuse trimmings are distasteful. Can we not educate ourselves to this point? Can we not really believe that the highest outcome of culture is simplicity?

I recently heard a gentleman talking in this strain, denouncing in no measured terms the waste of time and strength involved in such dressing. A dressmaker present said: "What you say may be true, but remember that it gives employment to many poor women who could ill afford to have their income lessened." From her standpoint she was right, and many people justify their superfluities on this ground. But from an employer such an argument is absurd. If a woman can afford to pay ten dollars for an elaborately made dress, she can afford to pay ten dollars for one simply made. Indeed, she can better afford it, since the material costs her less. Her dress would thus occupy less of her time and thought, while to the dressmaker it would mean comparative leisure and possible culture. Is there anything to be said against it but the one word "fashion"? A few leading women could soon make this fashionable.

When your seamstress comes to do the family sewing, ascertain what constitutes a day's work on the ruffled, tucked, and puffed garments which your neighbor's children wear. If she can probably make two of their aprons in a day, she can probably make three or four of your simple ones, but she ought not to be allowed to do it. When the two garments are done, feel that she has earned her day's wages, and send her to browse in the library, to inspect your flower-garden, or to take a brisk walk in the open air. You owe this to humanity. No woman can sew continuously six days in the week, and week after week, without suffering for it. Whatever undermines the health of women, inflicts a direct and far-reaching injury on the race. To my mind, there is nowhere in the Bible greater wisdom displayed than in the exemption of the mother of the race from any command to toil, when Adam and Eve were expelled from Eden.

While this woman is beneath your roof, you can protect her from overwork, and you ought to do it. Depend upon it, her life will be brighter and better always for such consideration, you will be better for the thoughtful kindness, and your children will be better for the plain clothing. This is true charity—love—which, unlike conventional charity, detracts nothing from the independence and self-respect of the recipient.

Observe the time ordinarily required for your washing. When your washer-woman comes next time, instruct her in your new way of washing which greatly shortens the time and lightens the labor. She will look askance at this, naturally, for longer hours mean more pay to her, and this is her only source of income. When the work, which before took most of the day, is done at eleven o'clock, do not say, as many women do: "It is not worth more than fifty cents to-day," but rather think: "To this poor woman who supports her family by washing, the improvement in her craft rightly belongs; I can afford to pay her what I did last week." Is it not enough for you to know that you have given her a few more hours in the home which so sadly needs her? Better than money or baskets of groceries at Christmas is it to give the children their mother.

So in all departments it is possible for women of means and leisure to raise and help their overworked sisters,—not by charity suppers and balls, nor relief funds, however great, but by serious thought and inquiry into the best methods of work. When such methods and appliances are found, they must not be allowed to fail of their mission as the sewing-machine has done. They should be given to the working-women, and used not that the rich may save more, or enjoy more for the same money, but that the poor, by honest labor, may earn more and have more leisure.

LIDA MINNISS BROWN.

Freedom in Religion.

SENTENCES FROM "DOCTOR CHANNING'S NOTE-BOOK."

"To those here and across the water whose lives are bound up with all movements for freedom, this little book, as a voice for individual liberty, will carry its own special welcome; and to the friends of Channing everywhere it is offered."—So reads the dedication of the "Note-Book."

If there be one interest dear to me on earth, it is the freedom of the human mind. If I have found my existence a growing good,—if I have gained any large views of religion or my own nature,—if I have in any measure invigorated, I know nothing to which, under God, I am so indebted as to my freedom. This has been breath of life to me.

Worlds should not tempt me to bend my mind to the yoke which Christians here bear. I owe too much to intellectual liberty. If I have made any progress,—here the spring.

We want no limits to the range of the human mind.

The veracity of reason can neither be proved nor disproved, for we must use reason for the process. To doubt whether reason be credible, is it not equally unreasonable?—for doubt is an act of reason.

Freedom is the well-being of a rational nature. To take it away is to violate the essential law and aspiration of that nature.

I am to live listening to the voice in my own soul, and to no other but as sanctioned by this.

He who adopts conscience, the opening law, as his guide, breaks all other laws both of thought and action. Prejudice is renounced. Unbounded truth is his aim.

We cannot chain our future selves—this is well. We might obstruct growth, fix permanently our present weaknesses or narrow views. But in following present conscience as conscience, we are doing much towards determining our minds to future following of it. The true loftiness is a feeling that there is a divinity within us—a law superior to outward authority—a self-directing, according to the voice of God within.

What may be right for me to-day may be wrong for me to-morrow. Some new impression, knowledge, power, may entirely vary my duty. No other is the judge.

The care which I take of my own mind would be usurpation if extended to another. Each is to act from his own inward law.

It were better for a man to do a wrong act in obeying his own conscience, than a right one in obeying mine.

I am sure Christianity will endure because it is founded on man's nature—answers to his deepest wants—his essential and noblest wants. I do not say that what we now call Christianity is to live forever. I think not—I hope not. Christianity is obscured—almost lost.

The church is meant to make the free spirit, to aid its flight to God, not to subject it to man.

We have no forms in domestic life. Friendship has none. Is not religion more free? The heart has its own mode of utterance, free, spontaneous. The soul is too great for forms—to bring it out is the end of churches—machinery keeps it in.

It is as incongruous to profess religion as to profess benevolence.

The adoration of goodness—this is religion.

Man would confine Thee to his church—would subject Thee to his interests. We adore Thee as Infinite.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Home Life of Great Authors. By Hattie Tyng Griswold. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. 1887.

Though it may seem that this book has received tardy notice at our hands, it has not been for lack of interest in it. It has been written chiefly for those busy people who have not time for much reading and yet feel sufficient interest in great writers to wish to know more about their private life and personal experiences. There is, of course, no attempt to give complete biographies of these thirty-four authors, all but four of whom wrote in English, but the story of their lives is told with running comment and contemporary gossip that is sometimes amusing, often pathetic and always interesting. We never look over a book of this kind without a certain feeling of sadness. Will those who read of the faults, even sins recorded here, remember, too, the offsetting virtues and the peculiar temptations? Dr. Hedge has spoken of the way some people read biography. "Burns drank; Coleridge took opium; Byron was a rake; Goethe was cold;—by these marks we know them." Mrs. Griswold has touched on the frailties with a light hand, and shown that tenderness of the truer appreciation. She was fortunate, too, in finding so many great authors for whose private lives she needed to seek neither excuse nor explanation.

It seems ungracious to criticize even slightly a book in which almost everything is well done, but we cannot help wishing that the sketch of Goethe had not been the first one in the book. Instead of a picture of Goethe in his home life, we have chiefly an account of the different women who at one time or another exercised a fascination over his errant heart. Hardly a word is said concerning his relations with others. No account is made of his life at Weimar, and there is not a single mention either of the sister or the friends, whose influence helped him and without whom his private life can hardly be guessed, much less appreciated. This criticism would be entirely unnecessary except for the fact that Goethe's character is too often looked at in this light alone.

We hope that this book will stimulate its readers to go to these writers themselves to discover the secret of their influence; otherwise it would fail of the higher purpose which Mrs. Griswold doubtless had in mind as she wrote it. That young man who "knew all about the German philosophers except their philosophy," might have enjoyed this book, but he certainly would not have deserved it. It will have a better fate, and minister to those who will know books better because of this acquaintance with their writers. It is well worth possessing, too, by those who have already well-filled libraries, for the reason that it presents in small compass those facts which one often wishes to verify.

E. E. M.

Doctor Channing's Note Book. Passages from the unpublished manuscripts of William Ellery Channing. By Grace Ellery Channing. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

"They did all eat and were filled; and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baskets full." The old story comes to mind as now, nearly fifty years after Doctor Channing's death and more than fifty since his word has been passed about as bread of life among the multitude, this little basket full of "fragments that remained" is offered us. They are simply sentences gleaned with careful study from his unpublished manuscripts, and reproduced without change or revision, notes jotted down in "the absolute unrestraint of self-communion," as he read and thought in his study—there on the other side of 1842. The title of the book just fits it. Here and there a broken sentence shows the pen poised while the thought flowed on unworded. In the "Life" of Channing we find this picture: "If he is reading, he studies pen in hand, and his book is crowded with folded sheets of paper, which multiply as trains of thought are suggested. These notes are rarely quotations, but chiefly questions and answers, qualifications, condensed statements, germs of interesting views; and when the volume is finished, they are carefully selected, arranged, and under distinct heads, placed among other papers in a secretary. If he is writing, the same process of accumulating notes is continued, which at the end of each day or week are also filed. The interior of the secretary is already filled with heaps of similar notes arranged in order, with titles over each compartment. When a topic is to be treated in a sermon or essay, these notes are consulted, the reflections, conjectures, doubts, conclusions of many years are reviewed, and then, with treasures of memory orderly arranged he fuses and recasts his gathered ores under the warm impulse of the moment." Probably to that secretary we owe this "Note-Book." To read in it is like surprising Channing at his work; it is to watch a prophet getting his inspiration. In our modern days note-books go, as they ought, before the oracle, and after the inspiration comes the interlineation. Witness Emerson in both respects. Channing himself said it: "I have great faith in inspiration; but it is a fruit and reward of faithful toil, not a chance influence entirely out of our power."

The folded sheets have now become a hundred pages of dainty paper, print and binding, in which the sentences are grouped under forty-nine subjects—subjects moral, social and religious, not theologic. Some of the sayings are but a few words long; none more than ten or twenty lines. If there is nothing very new or striking, there is much that is very noble and characteristic, and now and then a crystal of expression. "Home—the nursery of the Infinite." "Many traverse Heaven without meeting God there." "There is never so much novelty as when the new is seen in the old." Did the grave eyes smile at all as he wrote: "A man might pass as insane who should see things as they are"? Did he think of himself—for he had a true worker's sense of vocation—as he wrote: "There is one great office in life—that of Soul Quickener"? He did not think of himself, though his test of genius suggests himself to others, as he wrote, "That is a work of genius which partakes of the eternal and unchanging; which associates itself with all that we see and is confirmed by the development of time and our own nature. Shakespeare is as a prophet whose writings are fulfilled by all which takes place." Himself again in a portrait of "the true manner:" "Perfect self-possession—arising not from high opinion of ourselves, but from moral superiority to opinions—this is the true manner. This is carrying reverence for virtue into common movements." And here is Channing's thought of the sources of joy and peace: "Joy comes from having great interests, not from idleness; from great affections not from selfishness; from self-sacrifice, for this knits souls; from great hopes." "There is indeed a peace on earth—but it is not the peace of inaction, of prosperity. It is the peace of him who accepts the conditions on which life is given, who girds himself for the conflict, who has a clear strong faith that conflict is wisely ordered, and who has an earnest, in the energy it calls forth, of the perfection of his soul and the triumph of a higher world."

We group a series of sentences on "Fellowship and Service." Here is the Good Samaritan generalized: "How near must a person live to me to be my neighbor? Every person is near to you whom you can bless. He is nearest whom you can bless most." "Not a being should pass through my mind without moving some love, good wishes, prayers—without some union with him. Let this be the case when rivals or enemies enter. "When I meet a being whom I cannot serve I know my ignorance." "Is not the mind to be made strong by exposure? Let it associate with the wise as friends, but, like Jesus, dine with sinners." "He does not understand self-sacrifice who does not desire to conceal it." "Is any class of men to be so honored as those who espouse the cause of the most friendless and who can gain nothing but reproach, who make no compromise with opinion?" "Infinite, endless punishment would make hell the most interesting spot in the universe. All the sympathies of heaven would be turned towards it."

Truly, as one writes of these same hundred pages, "To lovers of this high soul (and who is not his lover who knows aught of him?) this little book will be like a friend's hand."

W. C. G.

Love's Ladder: A Novel. By W. De Witt Wallace. Chicago: Belford, Clarke & Co. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 253. Price $1.

This story—evidently the author's first book—indicates thorough understanding on his part of the manner in which, in many places, so-called religious circles are made to serve Satan under pretense of serving God. Its chief interest centers in Julia Somers, a poor working-woman deserted by her husband, against whom the pastor, his wife, and most of the session of the Presbyterian church of Marbleville, fired by a set of malicious gossips of the missionary society, set themselves until they not only bring reproach upon her, but drive her into an insane asylum, and finally cause her death. The sentimental portion lies mainly between Charles Marshall, a thoughtful but not orthodox young man, and Charlotte MacGregor, only daughter of a member of the session—not herself orthodox, however. These become innocently entangled in the net-work of scandal which the gossips create, and between such embarrassments and Miss MacGregor's difficulty in convincing her father that her lover was a good man if not orthodox, they have lovers' usual share of trouble. The picturing throughout is vivid, and usually natural; there is very little exaggeration, only at the close is the story melodramatic; the style is reportorial, yet dignified enough for readers of the best literature. The dress of the volume is elegant and tasteful.

E. R. C.

THE HOME.

Grandfather's Inscription in Ethel's Bible.

May no vain thoughts thy mind harass;
Let faith and hope thy soul possess.
The truth within this volume lies
But 'tis not bound to earth nor skies.
Let not the letter thee affright
The secret's in the spirit's light.
Fear not to search the sacred word
Tho' guarded by an angel's sword.
No truth was ever yet found out
That was not offspring of a doubt.
Guard well thy speech, give no offense
To those who see not with thy sense.

GEORGE DOW.

A Bird Sermon.

The very first snow of the season had come; just enough to slide on, without going in over your boots. It was a sunny November day, and Ted and Mamie were out on the terrace, all ready for fun. Mamie wore her blue hood, and red mittens; her eyes matched the hood, and her cheeks matched the mittens. She wanted the first slide down the terrace.

"Oh, please let me, Teddy!" she begged, in a happy flutter.

"No," said Ted; "I'm going to slide first, 'cause I'm the oldest. Sides, it's my sled."

"Then you're a mean boy," said Mamie.

"Say much, and I'll slide all the time," answered Ted, coolly.

Wasn't it a pity that a quarrel should cloud the beautiful bright day? Mamma thought so. She had opened the window to get a handful of fresh snow, and she heard it all.

"Ted! Mamie!" she called, "I'm going to give Tony and Cleo a bath. Don't you want to see?"

They came, hanging back a little.

"O yes!" cried Mamie.

It was yet one of her delights to watch the new canaries bathe. Ted didn't say anything; he didn't care much about such fun himself; but he looked on while mama took off the cage-bottom and set the cage over a glass dish full of water on the oil-cloth mat. Tony hopped to the lowest perch with an eager flutter, and dipped his yellow bill in the water. Then all at once he seemed to remember something. He looked up at Cleo.

"Chip! Chip! Chip!" he said.

Cleo understood. "Che-up!" she answered softly. Then down she came, and into the water she went, while Tony stood by and sang as if he meant to burst his little throat. When Cleo had finished her bath he took his, scattering the water-drops like rain. Mama looked at Teddy. "What do you think of it?" she asked, with a twinkle.

"I think Tony's a little gentleman," answered Ted, promptly. "And I'm going to be one, too. You can slide first, Mamie."

"No, you can," said Mamie.

It was to see who shouldn't be first, this time, But Teddy conquered.—Youth's Companion.

"Not Worth a Pin."

The saying, "Not worth a pin," is common among us. But this expression would not have suited our great-grandmothers. They knew the worth of a pin. Metal pins were first used by English ladies about the beginning of the sixteenth century; they were so expensive that a lady was very glad to have one given her for a New Year's gift. This is why a sum of money was settled upon ladies at their marriage for the toilet and called "pin money."

Fifty years ago it took twenty people to make a pin—one to draw out the wire, another to straighten it, a third to cut it, a fourth to point it, a fifth to grind the top, and so on. The pins of to-day are made by machinery: consequently, they are cheaper than ever. The value of a pin is as nearly nothing now as anything can be. A noisy, rattling, snappy little machine turns out between two and three hundred pins every minute, so quickly that it is impossible to count them as they fall.—Scattered Seeds.

"KINDNESS, like grain, increases by sowing."

"Mind's step is still as death and all great things Which cannot be controlled, whose end is good."

"Earth is in the very midst of heaven!
And space, though empty, feels full of God."

"Truly to love ourselves, we must love God;
To love God, we must all his creatures love:
To love his creatures, both ourselves and him."

"Peace hath more weight than woe: high brows are calm;
Great thoughts are still as stars; and truths, like suns
Stir not, but many systems tend around them."

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,
J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Monday noon teachers' meeting convened as usual at 175 Dearborn street, Mr. Blake, leader. The lesson was upon the chapters of Ezekiel xxxiv to xxxvii, including the vision of the Valley of the Dry Bones. The shepherds spoken of in the thirty-fourth chapter were the unworthy or oppressive rulers. The chapter in regard to them is one of the most impressive and beautiful pieces of ethical prose in the Bible, and will prove most excellent Sunday-school material. In this connection the tender and beautiful dialect poem beginning was recommended for reading in younger classes.

"The massa ob de sheepfold Dat guards de sheepfold bin"

The vision of the valley of dry bones shows the very vivid imagination of the prophet. Its meaning is simply that Israel is to be reunited and restored to their own land; Jehovah will do this for his own name's sake, although it now looks so impossible. Mr. Utter spoke of this chapter as possibly being the origin of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, though Ezekiel meant nothing of the kind by it.

—An interesting touch of inter-denominational courtesy and sympathies occurred at All Souls church last Sunday. The pastor spoke on St. Patrick. On the pulpit was a basket of bright and well arranged paper flowers which an old Catholic lady, house-bound, had prepared and sent with the request that her tribute might thus be recognized on the altar of a Unitarian church. Several Catholics were in the audience, and the manuscript of the sermon was borrowed to extend the word into Catholic homes.

Philadelphia.—On the eve of the dedication of the Camden church it looks as though matters would proceed to some excellent effect. With Furness, Calthrop, Clifford, Ames, Weston, Mangasarian, Reynolds, Camp, May, besides James Shrigley, who are Universalist in sentiment, and one other whose faith is unknown to me, it is expected that the evening and day may be filled with the good things of the spirit.

—The young men's section of the Ethical Culture Society, in having semi-monthly instead of monthly meetings, alternates its studies at present between Socrates and Co-operation, the latter as interpreted by Mill.

—The Hindu lady, Pundita, is to speak at the next meeting of the Contemporary Club.

—The lecture course adopted for Unity church, Camden, will open with Chadwick's story of "Thackeray." Other speakers are to appear later on, among them Mr. Ames, who will relate some of his Californian experiences, and Walt Whitman, who is to deliver his lecture on Lincoln.

—A little circle of Unitarians at Woodstown, New Jersey, has succeeded, through meetings of their own and through securing speakers from other cities to assist them, in establishing a sentiment which may get into more effective organization in time. An effort made several years ago in Media, Pa., to do a similar thing met with ill success.

—Weston holds a memorial talk on Beecher this day (the 13th) as I write. Haskell, over in Camden, is having the same subject under consideration.

—Clifford, in a recent discourse on "Happiness," confirmed to me my persistent conviction that under adequate treatment subjects often thought commonplace may be made to yield us beauty, justice and universality. For as all things have the large relationship, commonplaceness consists in nothing more than in failing to see them so.

—Mary Grew, aged with many summers and winters of toil for man, is, I hear, severely ill, though not seeming to be in anything like a precarious condition. I do not think the world at large can ever leave to Unitarians a monopoly of love for her sweet and heroic character.

H. L. T.

St. Paul, Minn.—Much cheery news from many voices about the new minister, Mr. Crothers, and his work. Among other items is this: "Our Post-office Mission has won quite a triumph this year. At the annual meeting the people adopted it by unanimous vote as part of the missionary work of Unity church, pledging it their financial support. I have made one discovery that I hope may prove valuable,—an educated Iclander, who wants to translate some of our tracts into the Icelandic language and circulate them among his countrymen. He will give time and labor, but needs financial help in getting them published. I have put him in communication with Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Janson, and hear that the work is in progress. So we may soon have another helper and another language in the field. I have fewer Unity Mission tracts to use than I wish I had, because I cannot afford to buy many, and the W. W. U. C. furnishes almost none at all this year. But I have used the UNITIES quite freely this past winter, receiving each week a package of sixteen copies direct from the office,—these paid for by a friend especially for my work." If only tracts would print themselves! Should anyone overhear this St. Paul word and send us the $10.00, the worker there shall have ten dollars' worth of tracts. Should anyone overhear the word and send us $500.00 to use in this year's distribution, all the Post-office Missions round shall share.

Free Religious Association.—The following resolutions, lately passed by the executive committee of this body, are here published by request of its secretary, Rev. F. M. Holland:

"Resolved, That, in company with all friends of progress, and admirers of purity and independence in journalism, we regret deeply the inevitable discontinuance of The Index; and, that we are satisfied that this is not due to any lack of fidelity, energy, or ability, either in its noble and gifted founder, Dr. F. E. Abbot, or in his successors.

"Resolved, That we hold the names of its recent editors, Messrs. William J. Potter and B. F. Underwood, who have conducted it most ably under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, in gratitude and honor; and that we now render our warm thanks, not only to them, but to all who have aided with pen or purse."

Keokuk, Iowa.—On the evening of the 8th inst. the Keokuk Unitarian church held a jubilee over its emancipation from a debt which has hung over it like an incubus for several years. A Keokuk paper of the 9th says: "There was a large attendance at the Unitarian jubilee last evening. A splendid supper was served in the parlors of the church from 6 to 8 o'clock, after which exercises were held in the auditorium." Addresses were given by Rev. O. Clute, Prof. W. D. Gunning, Rev. Robert Hassall, Mrs. C. P. Birge, R. B. Ogden, I. M. Sheffer and others. It is to be hoped that this is the beginning of a better day for this pioneer church of our faith. Being now, through heroic effort, free from financial embarrassment, with its beautiful church edifice and devoted people, it must arise and shine as in days of old.

The Ministers' Sustentation Fund is the rather formidable name of a most important missionary fund among the Unitarians in England. Nearly eleven thousand dollars have been expended in helping out the salaries of faithful ministers working on small salaries, in obscure places.

Rock Rapids, Iowa.—Mr. Hunting is busy as ever; recently he has been lecturing on John Calvin, speaking to the whole town on temperance at the skating-rink, leading a Bible class of twenty-five adults, and doing about the same thing at Luverne, Minn.

There is Room for Both originality and art in advertising, and we should be glad if we could impress upon our advertisers the value of tasteful and well-conceived advertisements. Some advertising agents understand this. For example, Mr. Joseph H. Richards, who has done business with us for many years. Look at his cut of the Estey Organ in another column. It is neat and attractive. Such advertisements bring customers, and one reason of the success of the Estey Organ is the constancy with which it has been presented in these passing advertisements in the Observer and elsewhere. —N. Y. Observer.

A Good Reputation.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" have been before the public many years, and are everywhere acknowledged to be the best remedy for all throat troubles. Mrs. S. H. Elliott, Ridgefield, Conn., says: "I have never been without them for the last thirty years. Would as soon think of living without breath." They quickly relieve Coughs, Sore Throat, and Bronchial Affections. Price 25 cents. For sale everywhere, and only in boxes.

More Money for Your Work.

Improve the good opportunities that are offered you and you will receive more money for your labor. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, will mail you, free, full information showing how you can make from $5 to $25 and upwards a day and live at home, wherever you may be located. You had better write to them at once. A number have made over $50 in a day. All is new. Capital not required; Hallett & Co. will start you. Both sexes; all ages. Grand success attends every worker. Send your address at once and see for yourself.

Children Starving to Death

on account of their inability to digest food, will find a most marvelous food and remedy in Scott's Emulsion. Very palatable and easily digested. Dr. S. W. COWEN of Waco, Texas, says: "I have used your Emulsion in Infantile wasting. It not only restores wasted tissues, but gives strength and increases the appetite."

MODERN UNITARIANISM.

Essays and Sermons.

By REV. JAMES FREEMAN CLARK, D.D., REV. JOSEPH HENRY ALLEN, REV. SAMUEL R. CALTHROP, REV. BROOKE HERFORD, REV. JOHN WHIT CHADWICK, REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE, REV. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, D.D., REV. THOMAS R. SLICHER, REV. HOWARD N. BROWN, REV. ANDREW P. PEABODY, D.D., REV. ROBERT COLLIER, REV. JOSEPH MAY. 12mo. Extra cloth. $1.25.

Mailed, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price, by

WESTERN UNITARIAN S. S. SOCIETY,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MARCH 26, 1887.

[NUMBER 4

EDITORIAL.

So far as Unitarianism is anything but the noblest truth, the noblest life, the universal and permanent in religion, do we want Unitarianism? And the same of Christianity.

THERE is nothing too great or too good to be believed, but many things too little or too bad. That we must say "Lord, Lord" of Christ, or "God, God" of God, in order to be religious, is one of the things too little to be believed.

MONTESQUIEU said: "If Europe is to be ruined, it will be ruined by gaming." May not the same thing be said of America? The speculative spirit that expects to get something for nothing, or, what is about as bad, that expects to get the best things for the cheapest prices, will slowly but surely disintegrate the foundations not only of the individual character, but also of the state.

THE man who feels the present unpoetical is the unpoetical man. Let him study the case of the humblest individual he knows until he discovers the hidden beauties there, thus beginning the development of the wanting faculty. If he continues faithful, he will begin to see around him as much marvel and glory as ever graced the imagination of a great poet, for every age is thus rich, though it takes eyes that have been opened, to see.

"THERE was a man—some thought him mad;—
The more he gave, the more he had."

So quotes the International Record. We reprint it as a text for Sunday-school, teacher and preacher, and commend it to those who like everything pertaining to the church better than the subscription list. He who goes to church to receive, does well; but he who joins the church that he may give, does better.

Few see that men, in worshipping idealized Mankind, in worshipping the God incarnate in Man, in worshipping the "personal" God, are really worshipping one and the same object; are really saying, each and all, that the highest human is the highest divine we know,—that Man and God are one. Perhaps still fewer see that this is but to say, that the nature of Man is the nature of Things,—that, through and through, the world is but enstructured Soul.

THE following were the dedication words spoken by the minister and people at the dedicatory services at Unity church, Camden, N. J., on Wednesday of last week. May the high words find noble realization:

"To the Supreme Being, the All-Father; to the True, the Good, the Beautiful; to the God-love in human hearts; to the Christ ideal; to that ministry which enlightens the ignorant, counsels the erring, strengthens the weak, comforts the sorrowing; to the ministry of good will and good deeds, we dedicate this building."

"THERE are two Theodore Parkers now: one is dying here in Italy; the other I have planted in America. He will live there and finish my work." They were his own words, as he looked up from his death-bed into a friend's face. "Of course I am not afraid to die, but there is so much to do!" Had he known, he might almost have said: "There are three Theodore Parkers: one is growing in India." At least, we judge so from the frequency and reverence of the words about him in one of our most religious exchanges, the Indian Messenger, a Brahmo Somaj paper published at Calcutta. A "Life" of Parker in one of the native languages has recently appeared.

Sending some of these notices to a friend who knew him closely, this word came back: "I made those notices of Theodore over to one whose enthusiasm for everything connected with him is undying. She has placed, all uniformly bound, in the Boston city library, fifty handsome volumes relating to him and his work; and still she increases the collection as material accumulates. I can recall no recognition of him which gave him pleasure so deep as the earnest acceptance of the 'Discourse of Religion' by some Brahmins of Calcutta; the living reverent voice from the Far East came as sweetest music among the jarring discords of orthodox denunciation and Unitarian aversion."

NEVER has Mr. Howells made so true a stroke of nature as in the last section of his story, "The Minister's Charge". Lemuel Barker desperately tells of the ignominy of his past life—as he believes it to be—to the lady he loves, fearing that she, without knowing it, will think better of him than he deserves. Instead of letting him fall in her estimation, she says, in a glow, How little we know of the real bravery of those we meet day by day! How insignificant my trials seem when I think of what you have borne! And so Lemuel forgets his humble birth, his eccentric mother in her "bloomer" costume, his menial service,—all, that had seemed so heavy upon him the moment before, and feels the man that he is.

TO INSIST on a creed for fellowship shows that, after all, one only half believes. To believe your truth wholly, believe it as the inevitable Fact, and you will know that another's and all others' creeds are their best approximations to that same inevitable Fact, the one which you believe in; they mean your Fact, but see it best under a differing symbol. And knowing that, both mind and heart refuse to longer say, "No fellowship except under my symbol." The man who limits religious fellowship by sacred rite, or sacred name or sacred doctrine, excommunicates himself more than he does the other man. The only fellowship worth caring much for in religion is that which no man can confer and no man at his best will care to deny.

CHICAGO is on the eve of another political tumult. Last Saturday the republican convention put in nomination John A. Roche for mayor of this city. Mr. Roche is a gentleman from the west side whose name and face are very familiar to many of our UNITY readers. He is an active member of the Third Unitarian church, one of the officers of the Channing Club, and is serving his second term as the President of the Illinois Unitarian Conference. In all these relations, Mr. Roche has displayed an ethical earnestness and religious sensibility that bespeaks qualities that will make any city fortunate that finds them embodied in its mayor. We recognize no party allegiance, and deplore sectarianism in politics as we do partisanship in religion; but in the interest of morals and decent government we will sincerely hope and earnestly work for the election of John A. Roche to the mayoralty of Chicago, because we believe him to be a man with "clean hands and a pure heart".

"I WOULD not be a timid friend to truth." So said Dante to his great-great-grandsire, the martyr-soldier of the crusades. The poet met him as he made the upward journey through Paradise. For Dante had told his ancestor that messages had been delivered to him by various spirits touching the eminent ones of Florence, which, if he bore them, would kindle great resentment against him, yet "he would not be" timid friend to truth"! This is the manly attitude of the truly loyal soul, whether of the thirteenth or the nineteenth century. Yet, fearless as is the great soul in defense of truth, it is not unsensitive to the rebuffs and misrepresentations and wrath dealt against it. How pathetic are Dante's words, when, realizing that he must lose country, home, friends, for the cause he stands for, and the suggestion coming that his loss may be yet more complete, heart-loneliness creeps in and he exclaims, "If I should lose all others by my song!"

THE Concord School of Philosophy this coming summer takes as its subject, "Aristotle and his Philosophy in Relation to Modern Thought." Already the students are preparing for their work. Mr. Edwin D. Mead has led a Boston class over the foot-hills of the subject, and now Mr. Thomas Davidson, assisted by friends, announces courses on Aristotle's theory of Education and his theory of Art. These lectures, some thirty in all, will be given at St. Cloud, on the summit of Orange Mountain, near New York. They begin June 20th, and last three weeks. It is in short a Summer School of Philosophy for the New Yorkers, who, of course, need one as much as the Bostonians. Perhaps Chicago has not yet reached the need of such a thing. The country holds few such masters of philosophies and classics as Mr. Davidson. He is the translator of Rosmini, "the greatest philosopher of Italy and the Roman Church since Aquinas"; and of a "Dante hand-book" by "the first of living Dante scholars, Scartazzini",—which contains "everything the student needs to study intelligently the supreme Christian poet, 'the voice of ten silent centuries.'"

WE welcome the Reporter of Organized Charity, to be issued monthly by the Charity Organization Society, edited by the secretary, Alexander Johnson. The first number contains a column setting forth the different enterprises and departments, and the officers, of the Charity Organization Society, and giving advice what to do with beggars, and where help may be procured for certain classes of cases. The third and fourth pages are filled with short articles about legal protection of the poor, safeguards for children, various charities and illustrative cases of the C. O. S. work, two of which cases show how important investigation, with registration added, is, before charity be given in a great city like Chicago. Under the head of "Legal Protection for the Poor", we are very glad to notice that Messrs. Dunlevy & Whitman have offered their services free as attorneys of the society, and that in this capacity they have already rendered important service in defending the defenseless from imposition and wrong. All the articles are marked by a style equally lively, earnest and condensed; no words are wasted. In the prospectus the secretary says that "Charity Organization has come to Chicago to stay", which is not to be doubted, seeing that this method of charity is a scientific certainty, and that now Chicago has a man with equal ability, heart and experience to administer it. Four things are mentioned as "Some of the objects of this little paper", namely: (1) to give knowledge concerning the C. O. S.; (2) to give in general "the world's ripest thought in matters of charity" in all directions; (3) to report "items of local charitable interest"; (4) to "warn the benevolent public against the more flagrant of the numerous impostors who apply for aid" and to make known "cases of distress for which a larger measure of aid may be needed than the usual relief agencies can afford". The Reporter will cost but 50 cents a year. It is not too much to say that every household ought to have one, and hardly a house but would save money by having it, since the inmates would be saved from unwise and hurtful alms-giving. The April issue will be of 8 pages instead of 4, and 10,000 will be printed.

Is The Western Conference Ready to Give Up "Executive Functions"?

Last week's Christian Register contain a seven column editorial entitled "Unitarian Missionary Work", in which is advocated, if we understand it, the abandonment of executive functions and missionary work by the Western Conference, and the referring of all such problems and responsibilities to the A. U. A., with its headquarters at Boston; this in the interest of a "national Unitarianism". The editorial is most fraternal in spirit, and represents, as we know, the judgment of a considerable number of our friends, east and west; but by its ignorance of the history and methods of our Western work it affords another illustration of the need of greater familiarity with facts before our eastern friends can properly diagnose the western case or prescribe a remedy for what some think is a disease. We hope a generous correction of certain statements in the article will be made in the columns of the Register itself. At present we content ourselves with begging those who favor the dismantling of the Western Conference to consider the following points:

(1) Missionary forces are not primarily money, nor even the men that may be specifically commissioned to take the field; but the enthusiasm and co-operation of the churches, the laymen and settled pastors already in the field. If the West is ever to be evangelized by the Unitarian gospel, it must be mainly by western interest and western instruments. Everybody here must feel that the primary responsibility rests upon him. Himself must speak, himself must go, himself must pay; and whatever weakens this sense lessens the result.

(2) There is a geographical limit to the sense of comradeship, which has so much to do with waking personal enthusiasm. You cannot establish the same vital relationship between an Iowa parish and the headquarters at Boston that you can between that parish and the headquarters at Chicago.

(3) It is not easy to break, nor economic to undertake to break, lines of historic development; not economic to throw away dearly bought experience and helpful traditions. The history and experience of thirty-five years which belong to the Western Conference should not be lightly estimated, and cannot be readily transferred.

(4) Centers of religious activity must follow centers of trade and travel, and the Unitarianism of America, instead of having a single capital city, a single center of independent and executive action, must have several. Signs are not wanting that such centers are already growing in Philadelphia, San Francisco, and most plainly of all in Chicago. One may be looked for some time in the South. [In our vast country these are natural working centers, intermediate between the states and our religious "Washington". This as a simply practical matter. And these centers can better be developed independently by local needs and local forces than by external superintendence. We believe much in a "national" Unitarianism, but it must come by growth, not by manufacture. Too much haste in this direction will surely retard. An artificial allegiance will end in practical indifference; undue insistence on allegiance may end in something worse. The "national" Unitarian interests will be best developed and served by the growth of a few independent metropolitan centers. Home rule in Australia contributes more to England's prosperity than management of Australia by a London parliament with a few Australian delegates sitting in it; and yet the British Empire is. Rather, thereby it is.

For the Western Conference to abandon the purpose of making Chicago such an independent center would probably result in a loss of much of the enthusiasm and self-sacrifice that in these last years has made our headquarters of vital value. To ask for such surrender is to ask for the abandonment of certain tools and tool-users, without any probability of their place being made good. To make the surrender would be likely to seriously lessen the contribution of western men and churches to missionary work.

(5) The existence of such a center is made more necessary by the existence of the State Conferences, whose work we consider all-important, and the creation of which is directly traceable to the inspiration of the Western Conference.

(6) Previous to 1885 there was no serious embarrassment of administrative relations between the A. U. A. and the Western Conference. Existing methods were working well. The present friction does not arise from either practical or organic difficulty, but from theological distrust. If the Western Conference has rendered itself unworthy the confidence of the A. U. A. by its Cincinnati resolution in behalf of a non-doctrinal fellowship, certainly the State Conferences cannot claim that confidence, for nearly all of them have always been on that basis. And if existing State Conferences be ignored or set aside, then the individual churches and ministers will be challenged, as some of them have been already.

(7) Is not rather this the thing to do? Quietly, lovingly, to work on, A. U. A. and Western Conference, each in its own way, if in any way they really differ; each helping the other all it can, to be stronger and more useful; both seeking by consultation and experiment all possible means of better co-operation—heartily we counsel this; both waiting for time to prove, as we have abundant faith to believe it will, that the deep verities, large sympathies and inspirations represented by the word "Unitarian", are equally dear to all of us, and that to this name the western churches are the more, not the less, entitled on account of the spiritual confidence and the Christly inclusiveness of the Cincinnati resolution—is not rather this, we say, the thing to do? Let east and west work on, and prove their faith by their works; loyalty, anywhere, strengthens the cause everywhere. Success in service anywhere, is success for all. It is not western pride or bluster that leads us to dream of a time when in Chicago we will have a Unitarian building, a Channing Hall, potent and vital like that which Boston now rejoices in. Aye! we will not only dream, but work for it. But if it ever comes, it must come largely from western men, and western resources. To develop these, we conceive to be our largest "national" duty.

Dissent Without Disfellowship.

It is a question that interests all the Congregationalists of this country, whether dissent from the prevailing creed may be allowed, or whether dissenters should be disfellowshipped. Certainly it has been the practice among Congregationalists, especially of late years, to allow, at least in the way of ignoring, great latitude of opinion in all minor matters, if not, indeed, real heresy upon central points. Among Unitarian Congregationalists this practice has probably been more open and extensive than among our orthodox brethren. The results of this practice among us most of us would pronounce good; what the results have been among our stricter sister churches is more doubtful. But what has been practiced among us until it might perhaps be truly spoken of as a custom among us, has never been formulated as a part of our faith or polity. The Rev. Mr. Judy, however, at Cincinnati last May, made an earnest speech in favor of legitimatizing dissent, and to him, also, credit is due for the phrase we have made the caption of this article, "Dissent without Disfellowship." He urged that what we have openly practiced for perhaps all the years of our history with good results, should be formulated as a sort of law among us, or at least declared as our custom and approved. And this indeed is almost exactly what was the real intention of the Cincinnati resolution.

This resolution, stating that "We condition our fellowship on no dogmatic test, but welcome all who wish to work with us for truth, righteousness and love in the world", has been much objected to and ably defended, and it has also been variously interpreted. To understand what its meaning and force really is, and also to see whether it is possible or would be profitable to legitimatize dissent, we must first consider what we mean by fellowship. This is a word of quite extended meaning. In its broadest meaning it differs little from mere friendliness, or a disposition to agree with everybody on as many points as we can find in common, and to dispute as little in regard to our differences as we can, without in any way compromising our own position. But this sense of the word has nothing to do with the case in hand. The word fellowship has at least three other meanings, or applications with meaning somewhat varied. First, it may mean counting a person in as a member of a Christian church or congregation. Secondly, it may mean counting a minister in as one of our denomination. And thirdly, it may mean the counting in of a church or society as a member of a conference, that is, recognizing its rights to be represented by its officers and delegates.

Now little or no difficulty has ever been experienced among Unitarians from counting in anybody and everybody, in all these ways, who wished to join us and work with us. Perhaps the only sort of disfellowshipping that has ever been found necessary has been in the way of rejecting ministers by individual congregations for reasons that seemed to them sufficient, whether doctrinal or otherwise, and the withholding of fellowship from certain ministers who had made application to join us, on grounds perhaps always purely ethical. This custom of free and open fellowship, welcoming all and rejecting none who wished to come to us, has undoubtedly worked well, and would probably continue to work well in the future. But when it comes to legitimatizing it, it has to be logically considered. And when it is so considered, it will be found to fall short of a consistent and rational scheme of organization. Think first of a religious society, an individual church or congregation. While it may practically receive members of various shades of belief or unbelief, so long as it is understood that the church itself stands for certain things, yet, for such church to say distinctly, "Everybody is welcome to join this church, no matter what his belief or unbelief may be", is to stultify itself. It is equivalent to saying, "This church stands for nothing and allows its character to be determined by the persons who may, for whatever reason or whim or fancy, see fit to join it. It may be taken possession of by the Roman Catholic or the Calvinist or the Agnostic, we have no choice; and when the majority see fit to change its name, after having changed its character, they are welcome also to do that."

In the second place let us think of our ministry. While practically we may, with benefit to our cause, use very great tolerance toward earnest young men desiring to enter our ministry, or towards those already ministers who become heretical, as we might count heresy, yet, do we not stultify ourselves when we say that a person of any belief whatever may be a Unitarian minister? The Unitarian ministry in the past has stood for as definite a body of belief as the ministry of any other denomination, or nearly so. But that is no matter. We wish to be broad and free, and suppose we say we will throw down all barriers and be absolutely free. Any man of good character who wishes to come among us and preach may be a Unitarian minister. Is that what the Cincinnati resolution means? Is that what it means to legitimatize dissent, and if so, is it not a foolish thing to try to do? It leaves the character of our ministry to be determined altogether by chance, or by those who choose to come among us and take the name Unitarian. And, as was said in regard to the church, logically nothing would stand in the way of even a change of name by the majority by and by, and thus the Unitarian ministry might become extinct, root and branch.

And the same principles apply to our fellowship of churches within the bounds of a Conference. Practically we may be broad and tolerant of dissent in dissenting churches who have worked with us, or radical or peculiar societies that may wish to join us. But, for us to say that any society whatever that wishes may join us and be Unitarian, is equivalent to saying, "We stand for nothing; Catholic or Protestant societies, Charity Organizations or Knights of Labor, may send their representatives, may come in and take possession and make of us what they will."

Legitimizing dissent, then, upon the whole, is as irrational, when logically considered, as it would be for a government to legitimatize treason. The ideal of a free and open fellowship is a grand one, because the ideal of tolerance and breadth of opinion and the feeling of brotherhood, regardless of minor differences, is grand; but the ideal is to be realized only as we have realized it in the past, by standing for certain ideas in so far as we are organized at all, and then ignoring dissent in so far as it may be possible without too far interfering with our practical aims and the accomplishment of our purposes.

And for one, I am no more in favor of a statement of these purposes, or a statement of the doctrines for which the Unitarian church stood, and stands, than I am in favor of legitimizing dissent. Whether we shall make any kind of statement or not, as a Conference, is purely a matter of policy; and since all experience among Unitarians proves it is bad policy, the experiment should be abandoned. What we stand for is known and read of all men in our churches and in our work, and it has not been, and is not at all necessary that we should in words try to say it, and since trying to say it is so sure to make us trouble, let us give it up. And for exactly the same reasons if for no other (though I think I have shown others that are unanswerable), should we abandon the attempt to declare in conferences by majority vote, that we are the most liberal religious body on the face of the earth.

U.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Dover.

Mouse-hole in December,
 Quiet little Dover!
 What shall I remember,
 Now the days are over?

Snow in hushes falling;
 Blue days creeping by;
 Trees in still processions
 Etched upon the sky;
 And a silent village
 Where the grey stones lean,
 Whispering of a Dover
 They alone have seen;
 And one home of kindness,
 College of the heart,—
 Living for its lessons,
 Loving for its art!

This shall I remember
 Now the days are over;
 Mouse-hole in December,
 Quiet little Dover!

DOVER, MASS., Dec. 20, 1886.

W. C. G.

The Spirit of Jesus.

BY AN ENGLISH LAYMAN.

Continued from page 39.

I think if you carefully consider the spirit of the life of Jesus, you cannot fail to see how utterly foreign it was to his character that he should seek to impose any sort of creed upon his followers. The system of religion which he found existing in his own country was a dogmatic one, and it had followed the invariable tendency of all dogmatic systems in degenerating into mere formalism, dead and dry as every kind of formalism is. Doctrine and legality were supreme in that Jewish church at the time of Jesus. It was no part of his work to set up a rival dogmatic system; the failure of such a method to meet the real wants not only of the time but of all times, was only too apparent to him. Whatever of system Jesus sought to establish was individual; he troubled himself very little with method, but sought to enforce the end to be aimed at. And that was to be the establishment of the kingdom of God in the heart and soul of every man, every brother and sister of his in the world: in other words, to attempt to make goodness and not evil the preponderating, the conquering influence in life. And this was to be obtained not solely by intellectual assent to any dogma or set of doctrines, however true these might be in themselves, but by any righteous means. If a certain belief really made a man better, such belief would not be excluded from consideration in the great purpose of his life, but it would not be insisted upon for all. Jesus, therefore, would welcome all who were prepared to carry out the great work he had in hand, no matter if they did not quite fall in with his method. You remember the answer he gave to one of his disciples who had told him that on seeing some one casting out devils in his name, he had forbidden him to do so "because he followeth not us." "Forbid him not," said Jesus, "for there is no man who shall do a miracle in my name,"—in other words, no one who tries to do good as I seek to do—"that can lightly speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is on our part." There was no setting up of a creed here, no demand for correctness of belief, no insisting upon any dogmatic system of theology as a basis of fellowship. It was enough that the man was working in the same spirit as he was. No question was asked as to what church he belonged to, what sect he favored, whether he was a Pharisee or a Sadducee, whether he believed in God or not, whether he felt assured on any one of the numerous questions which theologians delight to put in order to test the soundness of those they pester with their inquiries. It was a fellow-worker for the kingdom of God that was welcome, not a mere fellow-believer.

And take any of the parables of Jesus; the same thing is apparent. I do not recollect one in which any sort of attempt is made to teach the importance of belief, but I do recall more than one which seeks to enforce goodness and purity of life, and the essential need of being possessed by the spirit of holiness. The Priest and the Levite were no doubt orthodox enough in their creeds, but the Samaritan excelled them, in that he was filled with the spirit of love and tenderness, which puts all questions of opinion into a secondary place. The rich, orthodox and respectable Pharisee who thanked heaven he was not as other men are, occupies an entirely inferior position to that of the humble, heretical, and outcast Publican.

Is there not here a lesson for us at this day? Is there not in this method of Jesus something for us to study? It seems to me that we may do well to consider if in some of the plans that are recommended to us there is not a danger of our following, not the method of Jesus, but of those who, seeking to set up an organization after his death, did so much to contradict the spirit of his life. Forms and ordinances, churches and societies, are admirable institutions in their way, so long as people continue to recognize them as no more than forms and ordinances, churches and societies; but the moment that they begin to be looked upon as the all-important means to an end, they cease to be admirable: they are no longer helps but hindrances. But how are we to know that these forms and churches have had their day? Is there any sure sign of their loss of vitality, and their start-in on the downward path? I think there is. It is when men begin to try and crystallize the forms, to erect barriers around their churches, to impose tests and statements of faith, to regard all outside their circle as beyond the pale of fellowship. These are all signs that the spirit of Jesus is being lost sight of, and that the spirit which animated the false prophets against whom he warned his disciples is in the ascendant. I do not think, I never did think, that there is any probability of our branch of the Free Churches ever adopting any creed or authorized statement of belief. Nor do I think that the open avowal of one's opinions has necessarily a tendency to credalism. To believe firmly, and to insist on others believing as you do, are two very different things. But one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact that now and again attempts are made to define, in an informal sort of way, who are, and who are not, in fellowship with us. Ministers are regarded as "sound" or "unsound"; men are called "advanced" or "conservative;" in some quarters there is a tendency to set up belief as of more importance than character. It is insisted that there can be no fellowship between those who call themselves Christians, and those who prefer from various motives to be known by the name of theists. In some quarters we are told that we are to have no dealings with agnostics or secularists, that it is wholly inconsistent for persons who worship God to join with those who do not recognize the existence of God. I for one cannot assent to this; I do not think that this is the spirit of Jesus. It is scarcely necessary for me to say where my sympathies lie; I have already said enough to indicate that. But I cannot lose sight of the fact that there are many agnostics and secularists who are far better than many theists; and that there are hundreds of theists whose lives are just as sweet and pure as thousands of good earnest Christians; that, indeed, the difference between them is purely one of name, and not one of substance. I do not feel called upon to abate one jot of my own private opinions, but I rejoice to belong to a religious body which is so free and open that the exclusion of any person from it is not the act of the church, but that of the person who excludes himself. I do not consider it at all necessary to give up my freedom of worship in order that another man, who no longer believes in that worship, shall not be offended; but I see no reason why I should insist upon every man worshipping as I do, or else that he should forfeit all claims to fellowship. There is, or should be, only one test of fellowship with us, as there was with Jesus. Are we seeking to spread the cause of righteousness, of truth, of honesty, of purity? Then, we should welcome all who are trying to do the same thing. I call that advancing the kingdom of God. Others may call it what they will: the name is of no matter; the fact is all important. We may differ as to methods; we may think one better fitted than another to effect our purpose; all that may be left to the teachings of experience: it is not upon such things as these where real differences should exist.

It is well that we should now and again look back over the centuries that have passed since Jesus died, and see how the spirit which animated him became dulled and crushed under the mass of formalism, officialism and organization which grew up soon after his personal influence began to grow faint. It is still better to observe what was the spirit of Jesus. Is it possible that at this time that spirit can animate us? Or has it been so crushed out by the efforts of churches to crystallize it into creeds, by the quarrels of rival sects, by its apparent neglect in the dealings between man and man, nation and nation? On the contrary I believe that we may see in much that is going on around us a very real manifestation of that spirit, which proves how powerful and enduring was the influence Jesus exerted, and how unique in the world's history this man was. Wrong-doing has not ceased from the earth; wretchedness, misery, and sin still exist; but side by side by these there are to be found institutions whose sole aim is to grapple with them and if possible to alleviate and destroy. It is not right to dwell upon one aspect of the question only, and point, with the pessimist, at the evil side of life, while all along there is another side.

I see, too, and rejoice in, the broadening spirit of the churches. You may say, and say truly, that there is still much ignorance, and bigotry, and exclusiveness in them. But there are not wanting signs that here and there this exclusive spirit, which is not the spirit of Jesus, is losing its hold. Just run over in your memory some of the measures which during the present reign have been passed by parliament for the relief of Jews, Roman Catholics and dissenters from the oppressive restrictions and harsh enactments that led, either to dishonest evasions, or to suffering for conscience's sake. Is there not in all these ameliorative measures an evidence of a broader spirit among us? You may say that all these came from outside the churches and not from within. I reply, that it matters little for my argument where the spirit exists so long as it does exist. But cannot you call to mind other evidences of liberality existing in the churches themselves? I do not mean that the churches are all coming over to our position, and intend to view things from our standpoint. A Quaker lady was once talking with the late Frederic Davison Maurice on the subject of war, a subject on which, as you know, the members of the Society of Friends hold strong opinions. Said she, "Won't the world come to think with us some day?" Maurice's reply was a wise one: "They will be brought to think rightly on the subject, though it may be very differently from either you or me." No, it is not merely that there is a spread of rational thought in some of the churches that I say there is more liberality—I am glad to see that; but it is good to know that there is an increase of that spirit of kindness which enables men of strong views to recognize the good that exists in others of equally pronounced opinions. Various circumstances have contributed to this state of things; one of the chief of these is the increased means of knowledge that men can now have, not only of each other, but of their differing thoughts. We owe much of this to the printing press, the steam engine and the electric telegraph; still, these are but correctives of the unhappy results of centuries of misapprehension and wrong. The spirit that is at the bottom of the newer life is that which animated Jesus, and for which we may well thank God. Oliver Wendell Holmes has said, "The only Broad Church possible is one that has its creed in the heart, and not in the head,—that we shall know its members by their fruits, and not by their words." This is a church, call it what you will, that is filled with the spirit I have spoken of. But it has no bounds, no fences, no big gates to get open. It has no geographical limitations; it is simply wide as humanity. "Where is the Christian's Fatherland?" asked Dean Stanley. "Is it in Palestine, or Greece, or Rome, or the land of Luther, England, or America?" he asks, and then he answers:

No, Christian! no. Not even here,
By Christmas hearth, or churchyard dear;
Nor yet on distant shores brought nigh.
By martyr's blood or prophet's cry—
Nor Western pontiff's lowly name,
Nor Eastern patriarch's hoary fame—
Nor e'en where shone sweet Bethlehem's star:
Thy Fatherland is wider far.

Thy native home is wheresoe'er
Christ's spirit breathes a hollier air;
Where Christlike faith is keen to seek
What truth or conscience freely speak—
Where Christlike love delights to span
The rents that sever man from man—
Where 'round God's throne his just ones stand—
There, Christian, is thy Fatherland!

Yes, friends, would we but know it, it will not be defining overmuch; it will not be simply by proclaiming our opinions far and wide, though I do not think that that is a useless operation; it will not be by reviving old forms and ceremonies; nor by shrinking with dread from every new form of thought; nor by erecting barriers to thought; nor by excommunicating those who cannot pronounce our shibboleth; nor by refusing our fellowship to those who seek it, that we shall help to build that great church of the kingdom of God that Jesus strove to found. That can only be done by working in his spirit; in the spirit of love, of peace, of faith, of hope. May it be ours so to work that in the time to come, when the great church of the future shall be coextensive with the kingdom of God, there may be some evidence of our labor, some sign that the spirit of Jesus has animated us with a zeal for righteousness, a desire for the good of others, a longing for the realization of those hopes, which the good of all time have firmly held!

Hebrew and Other Religious Growth.

In connection with other movements having a similar direction, the impulse in Hebrew circles that makes havoc of traditional associations is one that should be studied in its broadest relationships. It is not always recognized among liberals that the modern "come-out" Jews have, in spite of present want of organization, a profound reason for their development. The statement that now seems wanting will come in its own ripe time. Even at present such a convention as that which assembled a year or more ago at Pittsburg is able to express some united sentiment on the question. The importance of the fact, however, is aside from any possible formal utterance of it. What leads it forth? What is to explain its origin, and to what end does it work? All that is serious and interesting centers there. We look abroad upon the fields of thought and see the growth of the Ethical cause. In all searching religious aspirations the world is coming upon a recognition of the moral meaning of life. Even as Emerson predicted, a drift of man toward the affirmation of the sublime truths affecting human justice is becoming more and more powerful, till soon it must hold everything in its grasp. The Hebrew seers of modern days are as conscious of this evolution as any others in Christian or alien association could be. Indeed, the tendency is world-wide. Talking with a Japanese scholar now here on a lecturing tour, the writer was assured that the same leaven was at work in the East. There the visitor believed was the contest by the identical forces—the one content only with the external assistance, the other convinced of the immanence of the divine; the one stript of self-dependence, the other full of it: the one regarding justice as something of time and place, the other living in atmosphere of perpetual ethical significance. That this present dividing line is calling upon us for all emphasis of life and speech cannot be questioned. And yet the world seems about to break with old bonds and welcome this necessary step forward. It is altogether the finest proof given this modern mind of an immediate presence of something strong and saving in the soul of man. Even while men turn to Hebraism and become critics of its formal thought, Hebrews step forth and declare themselves not justly to be so accused. And in Andover an old-time impeachment is met by a disclaimer from those presumed to be Calvinistic. And amid all the shows and gew-gaws of Episcopacy, Brooks and Newton give shame to any general external criticism. And alert in certain moral problems, we find even Catholicism entering protest against being believed averse to the general current of life here. And right among nearer associates, in Unitarian circles, the grand ethical consciousness is asserting itself as never before. What does it all mean? Man is struggling for the light. Our general charges of delinquency against any one sect are no longer just, and are therefore of no avail. Everywhere word comes of unity on the basis of the infinite moral beauty necessary and possible to man. That gives us daybreak for all dismay.

H. L. T.

Need.

Through need the soul doth climb
Toward heaven and light,
And mount the heights sublime
While yet 'tis night.

Yearn, soul, for God, and bring Thyself to rest,
A tired child slumbering
Safe on his breast!

MINNIE STEBBINS SAVAGE.

Rev. E. L. Rexford and Universalists.

Mr. Rexford is a prominent Universalist clergyman of Detroit, Mich., whose reputation extends into the cities and villages of the east, and who has been identified with Universalism for years. Recently a sermon of his, called "Loyalty to Christ," came to my notice, and by reading a foot-note I was informed, much to my surprise, that the sermon was refused publication by the organ of Universalists under orthodox management, the Christian Leader. Any one perusing the sermon would be struck with its thoughtfulness, clearness, vigor and seriousness. He wrote it out of a deep mind and a true heart. He wished honestly to tell the little he knew about truth, and confess ignorance of what he did not or could not know. He repudiates all fetish notions of Jesus, and wishes men to realize as they ought that universal man is a religious creature. Hence, he boldly yet rightly declares that we ought not to be seclusive, saying, "We are God's chosen people." He maintains that all people have a glimmer of truth at times, and that they have "their New Testaments and Old Testaments, though not often the pattern of ours, but meaning the same." He argues forcibly that "Christ" or "Christos" is not the name of a person, but indicates a moral quality, and that good people everywhere are Christian. "It is," he adds, "a larger word than Jesus, * * * as the word 'water' is more comprehensive than the word 'lake,' Therefore to be loyal to Christ should, in a literary and religious sense, mean to be loyal to righteousness, truth, justice.

Denominationally we walk around in our peck measures, digging in exhausted mines, battering on a moor, and are reluctant to climb over sectarian fences to cull truth in the broad field of universal reality. We sit in our studies or churches, bowing to and worshiping our impartial, insipid and little almighty, never realizing that God in nature is the God of all alleged revelation, if by revelation we mean "moral evolution." Therefore it is high time, as Doctor Rexford suggests, that we drop our conceits, our pride for name, our pretended love for truth, and indicate the nobler aim of being by trying to be truth seekers.

The word "Universalist" ought to be sufficiently large to be inclusive and universal. We claim it is, and we are working to make it mean more than an "ism." To parcel out the denomination into rings or cliques, making them masters of all the denominational literature and press, is an imposition and imperialism for which there should be a speedy opposition and redress. One half of the denomination protest against such "Russianism," and intend to make the cause of Universalism mean the most for humanity and God. Doctor Rexford has the heartfelt sympathy of all those who like him dare to tell the truth.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

Post-office Mission Work.

A FEW EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS RECEIVED BY MRS. E. R. STEVENS, ST. LOUIS.

From Gainesville, Texas, comes this word: "The statement of belief on card sent found a hearty response in me. It expressed a belief I thought I was the only possessor of, as I had never once heard a statement of Unitarian belief before, and I am 45 years of age and have lived from Boston to Texas. Your post-office method of evangelization is a grand one and will do much good. Wishing you God-speed in the work, I remain, yours, etc."

From a young man who addresses us as "Kind Lady" comes a very interesting letter. He begins the letter with thanks, adding: "I shall ever be grateful for the favor." When quite a little boy he was converted and joined the Southern Methodist church. But when he became old enough to reason for himself (as he is but 19 years of age now, it shows that his mind has worked quickly in this matter), he could not conscientiously endorse many of its leading doctrines, so severed his connection with that body. In his own words I give what follows. "In the meantime I have been lingering in doubt and fear." By accident he saw a copy of Our Best Words. The motto attracted his attention, he read the copy carefully, and for the first time learned of Unitarian thought. "To say I am favorably impressed will not express it. I am already convinced. What can I do for the dissemination of this Liberal Faith? Am but 19 years of age, and teach school for a livelihood; would like to enter the ministry."

From Linn county, Missouri, a gentleman writes: "I am delighted in the perusal of the various sermons sent to me. James Freeman Clarke's sermon, 'Has Unitarianism done its work?" removes many doubts from my mind. I am happy to say that a number of my neighbors agree with me. I have distributed the tracts and sermons, and am requested to say that a very favorable impression has been made. I would be pleased to receive anything you have for distribution."

From another point in Texas a school-teacher writes: "I am too poor to buy what I would like to read, but really would like to see what way out of the labyrinth the Unitarian offers." He has in the beginning of the letter expressed himself as one so torn up by the contending sects that he is half way tempted to cast himself "into the heathen abyss of Nihilism, or leap backward into the arms of Rome, and by either rid myself of all this bother."

A gentleman from Kansas writes after this manner: "Having been brought up in strictly orthodox faith it is somewhat of a difficult matter to get rid of those early ideas; but I must confess my faith is rapidly undergoing a change. Should you be pleased to still further furnish reading matter, believe me it will be given due consideration."

From Missouri one says: "I have read with much satisfaction, and have read to some of my neighbors who are dissatisfied with the orthodox faith. I know so little of the nature of Unitarian publications that I cannot specify what I would like, but will say I am much interested. Yours, gratefully."

A young man writes he would like to subscribe for UNITY, yet cannot spare the money, as he has small means, and parents to support. "The tracts and papers sent I have read diligently, and it is the first that I have ever read of the Unitarian doctrines. I like them very well, and if you have any that relate to future punishment, would like to read them. I have loaned to my neighbors those already received, and will continue to do so. I belong to the Cumberland Presbyterian church, but do not hold to all their belief."

An old lady writes from Texas, that many years ago she heard a Unitarian minister preach, and from that knew with whom she stood. Is now thrown in a strictly orthodox community, where a wide-spread revival has taken nearly everyone into the churches. "You can't turn a chip over but you find a church member." A clergyman whom she met on New Year's day at the house of a friend, told her she would never reach heaven; wondered where she had lived all these years "that she had never been converted to God." The old lady would be glad to be able to hear a Unitarian sermon every Sunday.

The mother of five children writes from a small town in Missouri, saying: "Your kind letter is at hand, and will say your kindness is manifested by the excellent reading that the papers which you have sent to me contain; and more particularly the interest and solicitude of the letter at hand. I belong to no church, and I am truly delighted with the progressive ideas advanced in the papers and tracts sent. Some of my children are very fond of reading, which is a satisfaction to me. My love to you as a friend; will always be pleased to read anything you wish to send. I leave the choice to you. Thanks to you for your kindness. Your sincere friend."

For the Last Time.

(PLYMOUTH CHURCH, FEBRUARY 27, 1886.)

The preacher's evening task was done;
The crowd had gone away;
But something pleaded with his heart
A little while to stay.

For him alone the organ pealed;
For him alone the choir
Sang soft and low, in sweet accord,
The song of his desire:

"I heard the voice of Jesus say,
'Come, weary one, and rest.'
What prophecy for him was there
How little any guessed!

As lovingly he lingered there,
Ere yet the music died,
There came two urchins from the street
Unfearing to his side.

The old man bowed, and lifting up
A soiled and homeless face,
He kissed it as a mother might,
Then turned to leave the place.

On either side the urchins trod;
And on the left and right
A loving hand on either pressed:
So out into the night.

Out, little thinking as he went
That never any more
His willing feet should inward go
That sacred threshold o'er.

And it was well: more fit good-by
No genius could devise;
No thoughtfulness of loving hearts,
No wisdom of the wise.

The "little ones" had always been
His chiefest joy and care:
With them alone let him go forth—
And God be with them there!

And down the future he shall go,
And through the enfranchised land,
A loving smile upon his lips,
A child on either hand.

—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Union.

The Liberal Church of To-Day.

In every society and sect, and outside them all, there are men and women whose religious life is independent of any records or dogmas; who aspire to live above the plane of controversy, where truth shines with its own light, and is its own sufficient authority; who "accept the universe" as a realm of moral order, and are not dismayed by its unanswered problems, though they never give over asking; who hold their minds open to new intelligence from all quarters, and recognize no break between past, present and future. They attach little importance to profession; their religion subsists in simple loyalty to all received instructions.

They are known by a certain mental hospitality and teachableness; by breadth of sympathy; by freedom from prejudice and bigotry; by a manifest desire to be fair toward all people, parties and opinions; by a quick faculty for perceiving the truth in things erroneous and the good in things evil, and by their tenderness toward that truth and good which are found in bad company; by hating only what hurts or darkens or degrades humanity. With faces to the future, they easily forgive the failures of the past, including their own.

And all this, not because they are indifferent, but because they aim to be just. If they have one passion stronger than love of truth, it is the desire to apply truth to life, to make it the first working power in the world, so that henceforth men shall follow the better way, not from selfish hope of reward or fear of punishment, but from clear vision and glad choice. They do not destroy, they build.

Without knowing it very well, yet with gradual approaches every year, these people constitute a spiritual brotherhood,—a fellowship and communion of faith and faithfulness. They are the Liberal Church of To-day, they bear the germ of the Catholicity of To-morrow. They may be zealous churchmen or radical non-conformists; they may cling with tenacity to the Christian name, or they may be too intent on things to care for names; their vision of God and immortality may be clear or clouded; but they are held fast by the living law and the Holy Power, and they love all the good they know, and love it with heart and soul and might and strength.

To me these are the true brothers and successors of Jesus, the children of the New Covenant. The same blood is in their hearts, and they lay down their lives in the same cause. They belong to the company who have washed their robes and made them white; they are a "peculiar people, zealous of good works."—Charles G. Ames, in the 1887 Year-Book of the Church in Philadelphia.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Shelby Seminary Memorial. Printed at the office of Our Best Words, Shelbyville, Ill.

It is a loving tribute to a "dear old Seminary", by one of the old boys,—the story of the lighting of a candle in a dark place, thirty-odd years ago, with glimpses of the lighters. Five thousand such candles, some larger, some smaller, some older, some newer, make together the light that we call "the higher school system" of the country. Our chief interest in it is in the little sketch given of Jasper L. Douthit, the editor of Our Best Words, and the man who has done his up-hill best these last two years to overthrow the "Unitarianism" which UNITY would fain illustrate and establish. His school-mate, Wendling, the anti-Ingersoll lecturer, and an Episcopalian, writes the sketch, but Jasper has to furnish a few facts. Our readers will be touched by this:—

"I was born four miles from Shelbyville, Illinois, October 10, 1884;—raised to hard work on a farm;—went to school winters, about nine months altogether;—left home against my father's will in eager search of an education;—attended the first day the Seminary opened at the old Methodist church;—swept floor and built fires to pay tuition, and worked nights and mornings for my board till I began to teach in the primary department;—left the Seminary in 1886 and went to Wabash College for six months;—boarded myself while here and lived mostly on bread and baked potatoes, and stopped because of failing health;—always puny from birth and inclined to suffer from nervous prostration, and have not got over it, although I do more mental work every year;—tried the drug business and failed in 1887, about a month after being married to Miss Emily Lovell, of Abington, Mass., by whom am father of four children, two sons and two daughters—circle unbroken and all at home. My parents were Hardshell Baptists, but I worshiped with the Methodists after going to the Seminary, until 1862, when I made the acquaintance of, and was ordained to preach by, the Unitarians. In 1864 I entered Theological School at Meadville, Pa., and graduated three years later;—preached a while at Princeton, Illinois, and then began missionary work in Shelby county, Illinois, where I have labored ever since 1867 to do all the good I can to everybody I can. Must regret that I have not done more. You know the rest. But I beg you, my brother, make it brief and simple. I only want credit for good motives through life's battle so far; but candidly, I don't feel that I deserve any praise."

There Wendling takes it up:

"Yes, many of us 'know the rest.' And that 'rest' means seventeen years, long years, since 1867, of self-sacrifice and ceaseless toil in sunlight and by starlight, and upon my word I do believe he suffered it all and did it all for Christ's sake. For seventeen years this sickly sort of a man has been a poor Unitarian preacher here at our doors. This poor Unitarian heretic went his quiet way as I saw him year after year, lived down a senseless prejudice against his church, erected a beautiful place of worship in our town, and gathered about him a large congregation, most of them sadly needing the influence of a good man (almost to the same degree as other congregations in our town), and now has a splendid Sunday-school, maintains a country mission, edits a pure newspaper, and I will testify everywhere that his whole life, work and example in this county has been an evangel of peace, temperance and purity. It is the life we lead more than the isms we hang to; and so I write it down as my calm judgment that Jasper Douthit, by his pure, self-sacrificing and unostentatious life, has furnished a better example of genuine heroism and nobility than any man our county has given birth to . . . The best of all the boys our dear old Seminary sent forth"

High praise that from one who has known a man "year after year", and agrees with him neither in politics nor religion. And most of us who know Mr. Douthit would echo heartily that kind of word about him. It is a pleasure here to print it. And as to things far less important than life and character and self-forgetting, he would smile if he knew how trustingly we look forward fifteen or twenty years (should he live so long, and may that be!) to a feeling on his part,— "Well, I thought I was right, and that it was serving truth; but I didn't see as widely then or as deeply as I do now, and I am sorry for some of my old insinuations on names in religion, and sorry for some of the words I used.." W. C. G.

How Shall my Child be Taught? Practical Pedagogy, or the Science of Teaching, illustrated. By Louisa P. Hopkins. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

In this book the author gives the actual results of a year's work in a home school with a class of little children whose minds are fresh and unspoiled, and having had the previous awakening of a wisely directed kindergarten. Measured by public school attainments the result seems an exaggerated impossibility, because with the present conditions of the average primary school, where suppression takes more time than direction, and the controlling thought of the latter is too often to have the wheels on the right track for the grammar school examination, it would be so. Mrs. Hopkins uses the "natural method," and it is beautifully illustrated in the chapters giving lessons with the children. With the wisdom of the true teacher she satisfies the natural restlessness of the childish mind by leading it into the beginnings of all sciences. Reading, writing, numbers, etc., receive due attention—because these are the tools with which the child is to work; but in the meantime, while learning the use of these, he needs food, else the task will be drudgery and his class-room a prison-house. He sees a thousand phenomena before him, and he is inwardly impelled to find out something about them; if hindered, the mind is stultified and the child becomes dull; or if the activity does survive it will be used in the wrong direction; oftentimes a child becomes vicious by being kept from learning what he has a right to be taught. One sees in these lessons how the little minds, led by the magnetic influence of a consecrated teacher, unfold; how observation leads to thought—thought to learning in a harmonious, orderly way; no forcing or cramming, but it is all children's work done in children's way. One chapter is an address to primary teachers, in which she urges the importance and magnitude of their work. She says: "To usher a young mind upon the infinite vista of human learning is a great task for a great mind."

The last chapters are given to the science of teaching. The book is wise and inspiring. Its readers should be many, especially among primary teachers. J. J.

Shakespeare's Insomnia and the Causes Thereof. By Franklin H. Head. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co. $1.00.

Probably few heads in Chicago knew as early as last year that, among the Southampton papers now in the British Museum, some letters addressed to Shakespeare had recently been discovered,—among others some from the Rev. Walter Blaise, clergyman at Stratford-on-Avon, from Messrs. Shallow & Slender, London lawyers, and from Mordecai Shylock, a Fleet-street money-lender; one or two concerning "Nicholas Bottom, whom you brought from the Parish workhouse in Stratford", another concerning Mistress Anne Page, etc. The letters breathe of trouble, threatening law-suits, such as might well breed bad dreams and cause insomnia. And our author has ingeniously woven from these letters an explanation of Shakespeare's frequent and feeling reference to the charms of sleep and the horrors of sleepless nights. If any one doubts the authenticity of the letters, Mr. Head can produce more letters from the same source, to which he has access by a sort of patent right. Since the first edition he has added, for instance, a letter from Bacon in reference to his authorship of the plays. Not many men can tell a story more steadily than Mr. Head. The title historian cannot be awarded him, for that is reserved for the shining ones; but he has parts. He invents well, and every historian needs imagination. G.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

Retribution and Reward.

A SERMON PREACHED BY REV. ARTHUR M. JUDY, AT DAVENPORT,
JANUARY, 1887.

Published by the Congregation.

"Say ye of the righteous, it is well with him; for he shall eat the fruit of his doing."—ISAIAH.

"He who does a good deed is instantly ennobled."—EMERSON.

At one time in their wandering the children of Israel began to faint for water. In their weariness and want they bewailed their folly in having left Egypt, and upbraided Moses for having led them forth. Moses, who had before borne with their unreasonable and ungrateful fault-finding, at this time lost all patience, and in a burst of wrath berated them roundly. It was for this burst of wrath, according to the historian, that Moses was not permitted to enter the Promised Land.

What, we may ask, could have led the historian to such a conclusion? For Moses to have borne the anxieties of leadership for forty years, to have given up all the advantages which awaited him as a member of the royal court of Egypt; to have devoted his great genius to this wearying task of leading his people into freedom, to have done all this, and then at the very last to have missed the joy of entering the Promised Land,—and for what? Why, for one outburst of anger. Was not that a sad, hard fate?

Did Grecian or English dramatist ever conceive a retribution more severe, more tragic than that?

The Greeks had a wholesome fear of their Nemesis; they taught in splendid form the doctrine of retribution; but in no drama or story of theirs which I recall did they depict so severe a punishment for so slight an offense.

But now, severe as the punishment visited upon Moses is represented to have been, I believe that as a parable, as an illustration of moral principle, it is true—tragically, not melodramatically, true.

To translate the parable into plain language, it means that every wrong act shuts us from some enjoyment.

But mark, I do not mean to say that each specific misery we suffer is due to some specific wrong we have done. It is not true, for instance, that a person is always to blame if he is maimed in a railroad accident; and it is not true that a person who suffers from the hatred of another is always to blame. This parable of Moses' exclusion from the Promised Land cannot, then, be taken to justify the universal proposition that all suffering is due to sin. It would be a sorry consolation to tell a virtuous and loving parent that his child had died because he had sinned: a sorry consolation to go to a Socrates in prison or a Christ on Calvary and say—Behold, you sinned, and now you suffer.

But while it will not do to say that all suffering is due to sin, it will do to say that all sin brings suffering, that each burst of anger, for instance, does keep us from some promised land. Emerson must have believed so when he wrote: "He who does a good deed is instantly ennobled." For this saying, of course, carries with it its corollary: "He who does a mean deed is by the action itself contracted." The one statement cannot be true unless the other is, and I believe both are true, and I believe that it is just this truth above all others which needs to be preached in this day. To my apprehension the church has been preaching an injurious view of retribution. For wrong doing she has preached either punishment by prodigy, or punishment in hell: punishment by law and punishment in the every-day life she has preached all too little. I am inclined to believe that there is a large class of people who would say, "Well, then, God does not punish us at all," if I should say I do not believe he punishes us either by lightning flashes or by hell fire.

The gentleman who exclaimed the other day, "Oh! I don't care anything for the church; I'll take my chances of hell," must have held this idea of the retribution.

Now, I do not claim that the church has preached this doctrine of retribution alone, but it is on this doctrine that she has thrown the emphasis of her preaching; it is to this doctrine that the fundamental schemes of Catholic and orthodox salvation are adapted; it is in this doctrine that the mass of her followers believe. Of course, along with the loud preaching of this doctrine, the church has been insisting that happiness of the individual, the home and the state, depends upon righteousness. But this insistence has been mild, indifferent, compared with the furious stress which has been laid upon the tortures of hell and the terrors of catastrophe.

It is high time for the church to change all this. The melodrama of hell and catastrophe is practically played out. Men now know that the lightning has a preference for the church rather than the saloon, and that hell is something to be smiled about, as one smiles about the Greek Hades, or Dante's Inferno.

But is the doctrine of retribution also played out? Not in the least: never was it so capable of demonstration and of forcible presentation as to-day.

But the doctrine must be presented in a new shape: it must be declared that punishment is by law and not by prodigy; that it goes on in all places and times, and not in one distant place in the remote future.

Emerson struck the keynote of this new preaching when he wrote: "He who does a good deed is instantly ennobled." That is the gospel this age needs to have preached; a gospel which the great astronomer-poet of Persia preached when he declared: "Hell is but a spark of the useless troubles which we have given ourselves."

And yet, smooth though this new doctrine of retribution sounds, there is something exceedingly terrible about it; something unescapable, more relentless than Nemesis, more implacable than hell. If a person does a good deed he is instantly ennobled thereby; if he does an evil deed he is instantly degraded thereby. Think what that means; illustrate what it means. A child puts its fingers into the fire; it is instantly burned thereby. So when a man puts his soul into any moral fire, does any wrong deed, his soul is instantly burned thereby; Christ cannot help it; nothing can help it. Throw yourself from a precipice and you must fall; so step from any height of righteousness and you must fall. Your soul will be bruised in one case as certainly as your body will be in the other.

But let us face this thought not in figures and generalizations merely, but rather in details and in facts.

You are at a party and give way to a fit of envy. Is not the punishment, the degradation, instant? Is a state of envy a happy, a noble, condition? Contrast that state with one of loving admiration. Relatively speaking, is not one a hellish, the other a heavenly, frame of mind?

Likewise contrast a state of lust with a state of love. From the height of love look back upon the depths of that lust. Consider the merciless selfishness—disregard of mother, society, God—which that lust implies; consider, too, the deceit which it necessitates, the dark night, the hypocritical face, the lying answers; consider, farther, the deprivation which it occasions; moments when you are without noble thoughts, away from great books, lost to true friendship,—yes, consider the merciless selfishness, the despicable deceit, the sad deprivation into which lust instantly, necessarily, brings one, and then tell me, is there not retribution, certain, sure retribution?

So, too, with other sins. Can a man cheat and escape punishment? Look back at the cheat's state from some height of sterling integrity. How foul it shows in the contrast! In the cheat's home, something is lacking to the highest love between husband and wife; children, neighbors, books yield not their highest delights; birds, flowers, sunlight, keep back something. In one chamber of the cheat's soul is an ugly secret; around that chamber must be thrown a thick, gloomy wall. Through that wall the tenderest whispers of love, the sweetest words of reverence, the highest voice of nature, cannot penetrate, and the very moment the cheating is done, the foundation of that wall is laid, and on that foundation the wall will rise as certainly as the coral reef rises where the coral dies.

The inevitableness of punishment—the inevitableness of reward—that is the great thought.

But first, there must be no false notions as to the kind of reward or punishment which comes. Every creature brings forth after its kind, we know. So does every deed.

If your good deed has been one of friendship, then be content to receive the fruits of friendship; do not ask for the fruits of financiering.

To expect that all goodness will issue in some tangible, material benefit, is to take the falsest view of this great question of retribution. Some persons speak as if goodness must be unprofitable if it does not make a man rich. Now there is a dependence of riches upon goodness, as one can easily demonstrate by citing the history of nations; but in the case of the individual, riches do not necessarily follow because a man is good in one or twenty ways.

Kindness does not necessarily bring riches, neither does honesty, neither does reverence, neither does generosity. All these qualities and more help to riches, when certain other good qualities are present, such as industry, shrewdness and economy; but they cannot separately or collectively insure riches, and riches will often come when they are wanting.

No, what each virtue insures is not some reward extraneous to itself, unlike itself, but a reward germane to itself, in its own line.

The rewards of honesty, for instance, are the delights of honesty. I name but one of those delights, that of trusting and being trusted. Is that a trivial delight, a small matter? Nay, a great matter, something sublime there is in a large, generous trustfulness. Just consider what a factor trustfulness is in civilization.

The savage ventured a few miles from home at the peril of his life; the civilized man travels through continents with little fear. The savage had dealings with few men and in few ways; the civilized man deals directly and indirectly with millions, and with those in ways innumerable.

Now think what a demand for trust these large dealings and these extended journeys require. Indeed trustfulness, the joy of trusting and being trusted, is a strong leaven, a sweet odor, a genial sunlight penetrating, gladdening, lightening the whole life of the civilized man. Conscious of this great joy he may not always be,—but there it is, the unnoted benediction resting upon the soul.

If trust be such a factor of civilization, think what it is in the life of the individual. Where would be the joy of a thanksgiving reunion without trust, and is not that joy greater in proportion as the company is trusted and trusting? Where, too, would be the blessing of a family but for that heavenly trust which holds between parent and child?

Facing, then, the full significance of trust, all of the joy and delight and peace which it implies, who but will say that honesty, the sure fruit of which is trust—who but will say that honesty is rewarded, that it does bring a man to a Promised Land? that he is instantly ennobled thereby?

And as with honesty so with every other virtue, its reward is sure after its kind; its promised land is reached—not some other, but its promised land.

Just at this point we must criticise the parable of Moses and the Promised Land.

That Moses was punished for his impatience, I doubt not; that he was shut out from the Promised Land for one burst of anger, I do not believe. That would have been punishment not after its kind. The reaching of the Promised Land was something material, and it depended upon hundreds of conditions—not upon the one condition that Moses always keep his temper. To say that Moses suffered for his bad temper in this material, sensational way is to make a very rough, though striking exhibition of the law of retribution—something to catch the attention of children, but surely nothing to satisfy a careful student of morals; nothing, either, in the line of which a great institution like the church ought to conduct its teaching.

The church must have a truer statement of the law of retribution than that.

Men see to-day that dishonesty does not keep them from riches; that riotous living does not exclude them from the good society; that lying, hypocrisy and deceit are quite compatible with good health and immunity from calamities.

But what men do not see is, that while dishonesty may not keep them from riches, it does keep them from something of infinitely greater value than riches—a noble character, a beautiful manhood.

To say it roughly, lightning and earthquakes and pestilence do not care a snap whether a man is honest or dishonest. They go by a law which concerns itself, but remotely with such things.

But there is a something which does concern itself with these moral qualities, that is, manhood. The growth of manhood is something as actual, as awful, as lightning or earthquake.

The laws that made those grand characters whom we revere under the names of Christ and Socrates and Epictetus and Emerson—are not the working of those laws something to be dreaded, respected as much, yea more, than the laws of lightning and earthquake?

Well, those are the laws which care whether you are honest or dishonest,—those the laws which decide whether you are to enjoy the supremest happiness.

Oh! why can we not be forever done with this teaching which degrades morals by making reward always a matter of dollars and cents, or of a front seat in heaven?

Has the poor man whose unspotted life and tender heart make for him a home where love and reverence abide—has not such a man his reward? Yea, even if the earthquakes were to swallow up that home to-morrow, or want find lodgement there, would not the man still have his reward; still have entered his promised land? Not a land where everything is perfect, but a land where each good quality is rewarded after its kind; not a land where an apple-tree can be made to bring forth every good fruit under the heavens, but a land where every apple-tree does bear apples.

Now, friends, when you come to look at the question of rewards and punishments from this point of view, I think it will acquire a dignity and significance for you which it has never had.

You will look about you and say, See that sweet but firm temper—is not that a promised land? how is that to be reached? by the money-making road? by the road of religious speculation? Nay, but by the road of self-control; by the way where love gives the strength to mount on stepping-stones of your dead self to higher things.

And following this same line of thought you will say, Consider that life of Christ—so arduous in its labor, so sad in its ending, and yet, how many promised lands were in it—what purity, what gentleness, what love for others, what trust in God, what assurance of deathlessness!

Can I attain those promised lands? Yes. Stop the angry word as it springs to your lips; shut out the impure thought by a pure one; go forth and do the kind deed to some suffering neighbor; force yourself to read, to think of noble lives and noble things; acquire the firm-set habit of being severe with yourself—of honestly seeing yourself as you are; and then cultivate the beneficent habit of devout longing and aspiration—of seeing yourself as in God's eyes, and lo! one by one you will enter the promised lands of a beautiful character.

You will not enter all the promised lands at once. No, just as you are getting happily into one such land, lo! another will appear, and yet another, and another.

But do not be discouraged, rather rejoice at that, for it is that which tells you how endless in grand possibilities is this soul of yours. Be as great as you can to-day—as true, kind, devout—to-morrow you can be greater, and the next to-morrow greater still, and the next, and the next.

Numberless, numberless, are the promised lands of the soul, each a more beautiful land than the former. In that thought lies the inspiration of life here, and the joy of the life to come. In that thought, too, is seen the source of our highest reward, namely, that each height we gain puts us in a position to gain a higher. As the reward of the child who learns his alphabet is not a knowledge of the alphabet itself, but the possibility of learning other things which that knowledge brings, so the highest reward of doing what we see to be right at any moment is not the satisfied conscience of the moment, but the possibility of right-doing, of a still higher order, which that good deed brings.

Yes, all things are prospective, preparatory. The little good which the child does is prospective of the splendid deeds which the man can do in consequence of the start made in childhood. So, too, the little good which we men and women on earth can do is but prospective of that untold doing of good to which we shall be helped in the heavenly life by the good done on earth.

THE HOME.

Raiment of Light.

Once—so runs an ancient story—the clothes of men were made of light. There were only two to be clothed, for this was when there were no human beings but Adam and Eve in Eden. The common story is that these two were left unclothed, and this is the elder story as it is in the Bible; but after this, as if men were not pleased to think of their early parents all bare and unmantled, there rose another story, also very old, that they had robes made of light, beautiful scarfs and kirtles of sheen vapors falling from neck to foot in graceful and swaying folds. These we may believe were put on and off as Adam and Eve willed; and there were night garments as well as day robes, that the happy pair might sleep in a softer and veiled glow. Now if thus our first parents were draped in the raiment of light, of course their faces must have shone also, for their faces, if they had not beamed, would have seemed very dark and dull in the midst of that shining dress. Thus their eyes and all features gave out rays even brighter than their garb, so that they were creatures of light clothed with light. After they had sinned, as the story is, and were driven out from their lovely Paradise, they no longer had this apparel, but had to find clothes for themselves of common materials. Yet a little of their former bright raiment clung to them, and became the finger nails, which, though no longer giving light, yet still remained so much like the light that the rays pass through them, so that they are transparent.

Of this story I ask, as of many others, Is it true? And I answer, Yes, it is true. What then—do I mean that there were two persons called Adam and Eve living alone in a paradise, and that they had garments actually made of beams of light, woven or felted together in some way, and draped around them? No, I mean not that. Who ever saw such raiment? How is it possible to believe it? But this is only a language, a very ancient and primitive language which tells by images, imaginings and wonders what the people were thinking of. It was the ancient and child-like tongue in which they said that innocence makes all things full of joy, and that it is clear, pure, transparent. In truth, the words that belong to light apply so well to goodness, and so often are used to express it, that in writing this last sentence I had to be very careful not to say that innocence was bright, shining, glowing, beaming, radiant, illumining, sunny; for these are the words that came first to me by which to describe the blithe and sweet cheer of innocence. And if I were speaking not of innocence only, but of great, strong, faithful goodness, such words as luster, splendor, glory, effulgence, would come to me. Light is everywhere the symbol of goodness and of the joy that comes of goodness. We call a smile bright, and happy eyes bright; the eye, also, we say, flashes, and the face, we say, lights up. There must be something that is like light, that is of its kin and moves us as light does, in these expressions of the soul in the face; for why else should we call them bright, shining, light-giving? If we love any one very much we even say, "He is the light of my eye"; and we can hardly think of warm things except as shining things, so that we speak of a glowing love, and also call it a flame or a fire, and speak of love-light on the face or in the eyes. Now all these things were seen and felt by men thousands of years ago, and their way of telling it was in such stories as this of the garments of Adam and Eve made of light. In the same way they thought of the face of God as being light. This, you know, is found in the beautiful benediction given to Moses, as told in the sixth chapter of Numbers, whereby to bless the people,—“The Lord make his face to shine upon thee;” and in prayers, as in the fourth Psalm, “Lift up the light of thy countenance upon us”; and in happy expressions of trust and joy as, “They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance.” In the little book called the First Epistle of John, in the New Testament, in the first chapter, is written,—“We declare unto you that God is light and in him is no darkness at all”; of which thought a very beautiful image is given in the book called Revelation, the 21st chapter, where the heavenly city is said to have “no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it;” and the gates of the city are not to be shut at any time because there is no night and so they need not be closed. Now, as thus God is called light, so he has made creatures of light. The angels have shining faces, as we read all through the Bible, and even shining bodies; and men were to have the same; they were to become again bodied with light as Adam was robed in it. This is Paul’s meaning when he says (1st Cor. xv. 40): “There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body.” For I think Paul conceived this as a body made of light, or full of light. In like way, some of the Arabs say that all spirits were made by God of the fire; the good angels of the light of the fire, and some not so good, of the flame; and others, that were bad, of the smoke. As light in this ancient story language meant goodness and joy, so darkness meant evil and pain, as you will find in many places in the Bible and in many stories out of the Bible. A sad and frightful use of darkness in men’s story language is what some people said of the fires in the awful pit called hell, where (so little did they know of infinite goodness) they said the bad men were to be tormented. Some said that the flames which burned them were not bright like most flames, but dark flames without light, which made the pain of them worse, and the horrors of the place more dreadful.

Now, is not the story of Adam’s clothes a true story? For, though it cannot happen just so, and no mantles are made out of sunbeams, yet this was the language in which men said that goodness is light in the world, and, like the sun shining on our path, shows us the way to go. No doubt those ancient men believed the story also just as they said it; but more deeply still they believed, and meant to say by it, that goodness is like light in the earth. So I say that story is true, and in the same way the Bible story about the heavenly city is true. This was another part of the ancient way of saying that goodness shows us all things like light.

J. V. B.

A Street Picture in Naples.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF PAUL HEYSE.)

Two beggar boys I noticed in the street,
Both clad in tatters, one with shoeless feet;
The other’s shoes so worn and ripped and rent
They scarcely held together as he went.

Yet his companion enviously eyed
His richer brother, strutting in his pride;
For though much mangled by Time’s keen-edged tooth,
The shoes had charms to tempt a barefoot youth.

And the first coppers begged from passers-by
He gave a boot-black, while his heart beat high,
Telling the world with a triumphant grin
The fortune that he happened to be in—
“The man with shoes can pay to have them shine; Nobles and princes wear such shoes as mine.”

—Our Youth

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,
J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Monday noon Union Teachers' meeting was held as usual in the Channing Club rooms, Mr. Jones, leader. Subject: Ezekiel, chapters xl to xlviii. This is the prophet's vision of the New Jerusalem, the renovated home of the Jews after the restoration of the people, by the power of Jehovah, forever. We are not to try to reconcile the vision with the known geography of Palestine. The features of the vision are wholly priestly, except the provision that the king must regulate the weights and measures honestly and exactly. Probably this was a very important and difficult matter in ancient trading. Ezekiel in this passage drops flatly into the priest. The only poetic touch is the river flowing from the temple. This dream of Ezekiel has had a vast effect on the hopes and faiths of the Jews—which fact has a pathos in it.

—Upwards of one thousand people were present at Central Music Hall last Sunday evening. The meeting was given to a consideration of the work of the "Moral Education Society". Addresses were made by Doctor Thomas, Rabbi Hirsch, and Mr. Jones; the first speaking of Heredity, the second of Environment, the last of the Will. Judge Booth and Professor Swing were prevented by sickness from attending. There is no subject more pressing than that of social purity, and none more difficult to speak of. This meeting was such a success that others ought to be undertaken.

Philadelphia.—Unity Church, Camden, has just had its successful dedication, and if the days to follow become as forceful as those past, its important future may be confidently counted upon. On the evening of the 16th, and all through the day succeeding till the sun had set, there were meetings and greetings, and songs and social comminglings enough for the hungriest mind. One could wonder, when casting thought back to the infant parlor circle of a year or less ago at which the project now hopefully afoot was bruited, how the few then in service should so soon have effected a lodgment upon that conservative community. Yet it was all there, with an evidence of determination which, wisely directed, can become a necessary adjunct to Camden's local life. For one who doubted Wednesday held the solvent. Through much music, aspiration, speech-making, their novel experiment was launched in appeal to a populace previously undisturbed by Unitarian affirmations. The sermon was from Mr. Grindall Reynolds, who gave a general review of the Unitarian's position in respect to the hopes of mankind and the need of a broader gospel than that commonly accepted. Clifford was given the prayer, Camp the invocation, the elder Hinckley the reading. Through all there was a happy interspersal of anthems and hymns, some of them from selected voices and some rendered by the entire audience. When the moment for installation came Mr. Haskell received his "right hand of fellowship" from Mr. May and his "send-off" from Mr. Ames, who, in what is called the "address to the people", introduced some felicitous illustrations which went to the mark and should have been cherished. Whittier's hymn, commencing "All gifts are Thine: no gift have we"—was sung with considerable unction, and the concerted reading of the dedication statement—"To the Supreme Being, the All-Father; to the True, the Good, the Beautiful; to the God-love in human hearts; to the Christ ideal; to that ministry which enlightens the ignorant, counsels the erring, strengthens the weak, comforts the sorrowing; to the ministry of good-will and good deeds"—was developed, as I thought, in a measure that became unconsciously musical. So the evening wore on, to the evident enjoyment of all. The morning introduced other exercises, first among which was a certain "Devotional Meeting and Communion," the latter attended with an explanation from Mr. May and Mr. Reynolds of its rationalistic adoption by Unitarians. The Rev. James Shrigley, Universalist, assisted in this ceremony. The essays that followed were from Furness, Calthrop and Reynolds, the first using Easter as his subject, the second treating of "The New Piety," and the third, together with the Rev. H. R. Wilson, of Wilmington, Del., touching upon matters of cognate interest. At this session the gentleman, Gilbert, who recently left the Methodist pulpit and caused some orthodox unrest in Philadelphia, gave a brief explanation of his present religious attitude. Mr. Mangasarian, who was announced to talk, was ill and therefore not present. Thus the hours came and went, the ladies furnished the delightful mid-day meal, and afternoon, with its Ethical studies, was upon the conferees. Clifford came here foremost, with a consideration of "Religion and Morality," Weston following with a paper on "The New Basis of Religious Fellowship." Then Camp had a thought upon "Organized Charities," Calthrop a brief word supplementally to his forenoon talk, Hinckley some gentle gratefulness for good things said there, and Ames, in his usual vein, a dream of unity with which to close the day's feast. Clifford spoke in his full, generous, philosophic way upon an interpretation of religion which made morality the subordinate power. Weston, in beautiful spirit, appealed for unity in human work, assuming speculative unanimity to be impossible, but a fellowship in the essentials of ethics to be idealistically within reach and necessary. Camp dwelt particularly upon the work done in his section for the humanization in the intellectualizing, as I read it—of charity. Hinckley congratulated the people upon the broad and inclusive programme arranged for the occasion. Ames dwelt upon the palpable harmony which subsisted between the many notes from various voices which had been struck throughout the celebration. During this sitting Clifford read a poem on "Aspiration", which had been contributed as fitting for the hour.

Now we have seen these people well-housed, genially welcomed by compeers in the similar work hereabouts, and sent on their way rejoicing. May it be a journey of sufficing helpfulness! All their good work has been done within a year. This fact was universally commented upon with surprise. They have there a church-building which gives them two large auditoriums, a parlor and a home for the minister, which is cozy beyond complaint. They have their two sermons each Sunday, a Sunday-school, an Ethical Association, a lecture course in preparation, and a regular Tuesday evening social entertainment for the public, which is literally sought by crowds with strangers. This is their opportunity, the invitation to spiritual work, the suggestion of what may be done to the enrichment of the moral sense in that newly-visited constituency.

—Rev. Charles G. Ames paid a running visit to Washington, D. C., last week, exchanging pulpits with Rev. R. R. Shippen, Mr. Shippen occupying the Spring Garden desk with a goodly gathering of the members of the society.

Woman's Work.—The first movement towards organic missionary work among Unitarian women in this country was made at the Western Conference at Toledo in 1877. In 1878 the women "resolved that they were not only willing but had an honest desire to share henceforth in the labors and responsibilities of their brethren", and steps were taken to organize the Women's Western Unitarian Conference. In 1880 the Woman's Auxiliary of the National Conference was organized, and now Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, Cincinnati and other places have their Women's Associations that hold monthly meetings for study and missionary work. The March meeting of the Philadelphia Association "brought together about seventy-five representatives of the congregations of Philadelphia, Germantown, Camden and Wilmington. A paper on 'Jesus' was read, and gave rise to remarks by many of the ladies present." Thus the good work goes on. The suggestion made at Toledo, that women might do something through independent organizations, was greeted by many with opposition, and even ridicule. "How far that little candle throws its beam."

Will Some one Answer.—EDITOR OF UNITY: Desiring very much to know what and where anything is done for the instruction of the deaf mutes in Chicago, I request those informed to give in the next issue of UNITY the facts of the case. There are those in the city who would be greatly pleased to hear of any relief work or teaching done for the benefit of the deaf mute children. It is a subject which is new to the thought of a large number of people of whom inquiry has been made.

J. CROSSETT.

A Deep Mystery.

Wherever you are located you should write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, and receive free, full information about work that you can do and live at home, making thereby from $5 to $25 and upward daily. Some have made over $50 in a day. All is new. Hallett & Co. will start you. Capital not needed. Either sex. All ages. No class of working people have ever made money so fast heretofore. Comfortable fortune await every worker. All this seems a deep mystery to you, reader, but send along your address and it will be cleared up and proved. Better not delay: now is the time.

Children Starving to Death

on account of their inability to digest food, will find a most marvelous food and remedy in Scott's Emulsion. Very palatable and easily digested. Dr. S. W. COBB of Waco, Texas, says: "I have used your Emulsion in infantile wasting. It not only restores wasted tissues, but gives strength and increases the appetite."

A Tribute to American Genius were the recent awards at Liverpool and Edinburgh of silver medals to Seabury & Johnson, Pharmaceutical Chemists, and proprietors of Benson's Caprine Plasters. These plasters are indorsed by 5,000 physicians and pharmacists as the only reliable external remedy for coughs, colds, rheumatism, etc. Beware of nostrums advertised by quacks.

For an Irritated Throat.

Cough or Cold, "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are offered with the fullest confidence in their efficacy.

UNITY

FREEDOM. FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, APRIL 2, 1887.

[NUMBER 5]

EDITORIAL.

Is there not a feeling in society that the changed conditions of life, rapid transit, the telegraph and the like, have done away with the need of the old-fashioned slow virtues of industry, economy and faithfulness, and the endeavor to build up a character by patient continuance in well-doing on one spot?

W. W.

As will be seen in our "Notes from the Field", our Holland friends at Grand Rapids have invested in the "Hamilton Vocalion" of which we have spoken before. The pastor, a man of fine musical tastes,—as all pastors ought to be,—writes us: "Its accompanying power is very satisfactory, and there are very lovely combinations for single playing. It is attracting attention, and many come to see it."

SAYS the poet Longfellow: "In the elder days of the Church, when the Presbyter invested with his singing-rob the Psalmist, he said to him: 'See that what thou singest with thy mouth thou believest also in thy heart, and that what thou believest in thy heart thou confirmest also in thy life.'" Not a bad text for a discourse on Church Singing. Compilers of hymn-books, too, might find here something to be regarded.

BEECHER will pass down into history as the man who won his popularity because he was always ready to lend his great gifts to unpopular causes. Did the slave need a friend; secession sentiment in England need a rebuke; did the Chinaman in San Francisco need a champion; the infidel Ingersoll a courteous introduction; did woman's suffrage need a defender; the republican party a rebuke from one of its own members; evolution an advocate in the pulpit—Henry Ward Beecher dared always to do it.

MR. HOSMER, of Cleveland, recently said in his pulpit: "While Colonel Ingersoll is not likely to be an applicant for admission to mine or any other church or religious society, yet were he to become a resident of this city and to be drawn to me and my people and our associated work, I would myself welcome him in the spirit of brotherhood. I am not personally an admirer of Col. Ingersoll. His methods are not my methods. I dislike in him what often to me seems want of reverence and tenderness for others' faiths. But if he, being as I suppose an honest agnostic, were to be drawn to my preaching, who am not an agnostic, and to this service where we have prayer and hymn and serious thought upon the issues of conduct and life, my basis of fellowship is, thank God, large enough to give him the hand of welcome; nor in so doing should we have the worst member, let me add, among the churches of this community, nor the least valuable. Indeed, were some of the ministers of this city to have him and others of his intellectual keenness before them every Sunday, it might conduce to the vigor and logic of their pulpit utterances. It would hold them from rash and reckless assertions, for they would then know that there were those in the congregation who would detect them. But the implication that this breadth on my part, or on the part of that fellowship of churches to which I belong, denies or overlooks the value and importance of men's beliefs, is the preacher's own hasty inference."

REV. JOHN C. KIMBALL, in his sermon on Henry Ward Beecher, at Hartford, Conn., tells the following story: "Beecher was confronted by an indignant conservative mob, who were determined that he should not preach his anti-slavery word. Every time he opened his mouth to speak they met him with a storm of hisses that overwhelmed every other sound. Smiling on them good-naturedly, as his wont was, he waited patiently for a lull and then managed in his drollest way to get in the words, 'Gentlemen, you remind me very much of my grand-uncle.' The curiosity of the audience was at once excited to know what the point of resemblance was between them and an individual apparently so far-fetched, and in a great hush he was allowed to go on. 'My grand-uncle', he said, 'was a blacksmith, and I am sorry to say, for family reasons, a very poor blacksmith, too. Once on a time, however, he got a fine piece of steel and said to himself, I will make a broad-axe out of this. So he put it in the fire and heated it, and took it out and hammered and hammered and hammered on it, but all in vain; it would not make an axe. Then he said, 'Well, I'll make a hatchet of it at any rate'; so he put it in the fire and heated it again and hammered and hammered, and hammered, but still all in vain; he couldn't make even a hatchet of it; and then,' said Mr. Beecher, 'my great-uncle got mad and seizing the red hot steel in his tongs he plunged it into a tub of water and exclaimed, 'Well, there is one thing I can do with it: I can make a plaguey good hiss.'" The audience saw the point and with a round of applause and roar of laughter, allowed him to pour into their ears one of the strongest anti-slavery speeches they had ever heard, conquered and won over as no denunciation or reason could have made them, by his good-natured tact."

WE are sorry that it is so hard to tempt our Minneapolis associate into our columns. When we can do no better we are glad to catch him on the wing. A local paper thus reports a fragment of a sermon on the "Blessedness of Breathing"; which he described as "burning out our substance and ourselves to produce warmth and work. Breathing is what most lifts the animal above the vegetable kingdom, and the higher animals above the lower. The tree only selfishly accumulates and stands still; the animal breathes and burns out his accumulations, and moves. The poorly-breathing alligator is cold-blooded, and dozes all day on the bank as if dead; but the swiftly-breathing bird becomes warm and so active that he takes a tour of a Minnesota county in the summer morning and spends his winters in Florida like a gentleman. So in all fields, not only physical but spiritual, higher life comes from burning out. Morality advances by consuming itself, just as a breathing animal does; and how many old moral standards and sentiments have had to be destroyed before the world could advance from savages making meals of each other to society giving meals to the unfortunate. So religion advances by breathing and consuming its old tissue;—and how many ideas of religious duty and of deity have had to vanish in smoke and ashes since Samuel ordered innocent women and children to be slain in the service of God? And warmth of heart and high religious life comes to-day only from burning. Christendom keeps the memory of a man who was ready to consume himself to warm the world. And whatever critics may think about the real facts of Jesus's life, Christendom keeps the memory of an ideal of love and self-sacrifice, which has been accepted by the civilized world as the highest and divinest ideal to follow. And such it is. Nothing else in the world is so noble as a generous deed; nothing else so divine as a life of self-sacrifice. Nothing so warms and consecrates us as to breathe deeply of the divine spirit of love and let it burn out our substance and our selfishness and ourselves in acts of helpfulness to others."

The Cincinnati Resolution—Was it Uncongregational.

If there be one thing which all Unitarians, from the beginning almost to the present day, have asserted with repeated affirmation and enthusiasm, it is that they are a church without a binding "creed": The Cincinnati resolution simply said that for the thousandth time,—"The Western Unitarian Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests." It follows then—it is no separate and independent affirmation, but it follows—that Unitarians, and of course the Western churches as a part of the body, and the Western Conference speaking collectively for that part, do "welcome all who wish to join them to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world". If Unitarians have any welcome at all to offer, and it is not based on intellectual assent to doctrine, what can it be based on save the spirit of truthfulness and right and love?

But this position has been attacked on two sides. First by a credal party—the party whose insistence at last brought the Cincinnati resolution into being as reply to their demand. This party—be it always remembered, we believe in their honor while they say it—says that it does not mean a "creed": it only wants the Conference to declare that Unitarianism "stands for" Theism and Christianity. But when they show what they do mean by calling these intellectual beliefs "essential" to Unitarianism; when they point to the open door and say publicly to ministers, Unless you teach them, your work ought not be named "Unitarian"; when they say of the Conference, "It voted down every resolution to describe its basis or purpose to be Christian or even Theistic: after this action the Conference had no right to call itself Unitarian" (the italics theirs); when some of them call our Cincinnati words an "atheistic resolution"; when they start a vigorous propaganda by paper, magazine, pamphlets and bands of printing ministers, to break up the Western Conference and split the churches that support it; and when, as condition of ceasing from their attacks, they offer the Conference the alternative, Either say those doctrinal words or surrender all executive functions,—in shorter phrase, the alternative of shibboleth or suicide; and when they do all this against brethren who, as they know well, are spending their lives preaching, worshiping, writing out, and trying to live out the faith of "Theism" and the ideals of "Christianity", but who do not hold and therefore will not say that these beliefs and terms are "essential" to the Unitarian name and fellowship,—we say, when they show in all these ways what they do mean, that meaning comes so near to being "creed" that we feel no sense of injustice in describing them roundly as the "credal party". If, as is claimed, "many Unitarian ministers give their cordial approval" to this sort of thing, then the more need for other Unitarians to give it a frank name and stand openly against it.

The Cincinnati resolution has also been objected to in behalf of a very different interest,—an anxious "Congregationalism". It is said to be "absolutely contrary to Congregational polity". A warning to this effect was sent forth last fall by Mr. Crooker of Madison. His pamphlet sketches the sturdy congregational liberty of the early Massachusetts churches,—that liberty untrammelled by presbyter, bishop, synod or liturgy,* in virtue of which the Calvinistic meeting-houses of the fathers gradually became the Unitarian meeting-houses of the children. It then describes the Conferences, purely consultative, not judicial, of these early churches,—reaching the conclusion, "No such thing as congregational statute-law is, in the nature of the case, possible." Then, more specifically summing up the functions of a Congregational Conference and applying them to the Cincinnati case, the pamphlet says:

"Such a Conference has no right to formulate a creed; much less to decide authoritatively what the religious opinions of any particular church shall be. It may report what views are taught; it may advise a church respecting the soundness or unsoundness of its pastor [!] but it has no right to declare what its beliefs ought to be. And in describing at any time the common beliefs and purposes of those churches, it must be careful not to coerce any particular church, and also not to take positions that shall in any way discourage freedom and growth." * * * "It may extend the fellowship of the associated churches to a church applying for it, but this must be done according to the principles and spirit of those associated churches. As such a Conference is not an independent ecclesiastical body, but the creature and servant of certain independent churches, it follows that it no more has a fellowship of its own to dispense than a pulpit of its own to fill. It has no power to legislate about fellowship, * * * no authority to make for itself a basis of fellowship"; * * * and "no position of its own to describe." * * * "Unitarianism cannot be made this or that by any action of that Conference respecting a 'basis' of fellowship. * * * Whatever resolution respecting a 'basis' of fellowship that Conference may adopt, each church will determine its own fellowship, and that is the only Unitarian fellowship there is in the west. The fellowship of these local churches makes that Conference, and the creature cannot dictate to its creator."

To which we reply,—All true, and well stated; but who supposes it is not true? Who supposes that the Conference has a fellowship, a basis, a position of its own as distinct from that of the individual churches which compose it? Who dreams that it can legislate about their fellowship? Who imagines that Unitarianism can be changed by Conference vote? Not we, at least. And what connection has all this with the opinion that the Cincinnati resolution was "absolutely contrary to congregational polity"? It may be contrary,—we will try to see if it be,—but if it be, then from something careless and coercive in its phrasing, and not because it is a resolution about fellowship. Mr. Crooker misses the mark all through his argument by forgetting the declaratory function of a Conference. He only forgets it, since in the sentences above, which we have put into italics, he expressly remembers and allows it: "the Conference may report what views are taught" by the churches,—"the Conference may extend the fellowship of the associated churches to a church applying for it." What more do we need than that to justify the Cincinnati resolution, provided it report the churches truly as to fellowship, and also to justify that twin resolution about the doctrines commonly believed among us, which was at Cincinnati rejected? If he stand by these, his words,—and surely he is right in them,—why should he drive so hard at the expressions "its basis", "its position", "its fellowship"? Nothing more is meant—except as he reads meaning in—than the position, basis, fellowship of the local churches uniting in the Conference and collectively declaring themselves through its voice; doing just what he says they may do. "After talking about what 'it' represents", the next step will be to dictate to churches respecting their own affairs": what justifies that inference, when he allows that "it may report", etc.? Our "it" and his "it" are the same. Poor little "it"! the Western Conference knows that it has no head of its own,—that its brains are all in the separate churches; no heart of its own,—that its love is all there in the churches; and as to "position" and "basis", that it has no more standing-power, nothing more to stand on, than a cherub!

Nevertheless a Congregational Conference has functions which no single church has, just because it is not a single church, but a body of churches. Using the long words, it has no legislative and no judicial functions; it had better rarely allow itself advisory functions towards its constituent members; but it has ample declaratory and, parallel with these, executive functions; and, of course, it has consultative functions. As to the "declaratory" power, that is largely what a Conference is for,—to voice the common mind of the churches composing it, in regard to spirit, aims, teachings, fellowship,—thereby to get inspiration and the sense of comradeship inside the circle, and to exert influence for good outside. And whatever it may say in common, it may do in common by agents and otherwise; whatever it may do, it may say. And what it may say and do in the concrete, it may say and do in the general: for instance, it may not only "extend the fellowship of the associated churches to a church applying for it", but it may formulate and announce the principle or terms on which it acts in so doing. Surely we must guard our congregationalism jealously, whenever men invade it; but we must not make our fort our prison, cutting ourselves off in the name of liberty from liberty and influence. There is such a thing as imprisoning ourselves in congregationalism: have, or have not, we Unitarians long done that very thing? There seem to be persons who really think that creedlessness, asserted by a Conference, thereby becomes a creed; that it binds us to declare together, We are free; that it would be uncongregational to say in chorus, We are congregationalists! We may simply confer, but to summarize results of conference in resolutions is to endanger local liberties. The position refutes itself. It would render impossible any associated expression of opinion on the part of Unitarians, and a fortiori any associated action; for if a Conference may not speak its common thought about theological beliefs and moral aims, it is still less legitimate for such a Conference to act out its thought through agents and publications in missionary ways. And why should this principle of illegitimacy end with our General Western Conference? It would apply as well to the State Conferences, and silence and kill them, too. Nay, why should this principle arbitrarily end on the outside edge of a congregation, instead of going on to apply within the congregation, resolving it into individuals and rendering even congregational opinion and action impossible? The position, stated out full length, refutes itself.

* Trammelled, however, by their own church-state which, in lieu of presbytery, etc., exercised ecclesiastical discipline: witness Roger Williams, Anne Hutchinson, Pynchon, the Quakers.

We are past this whole stage of individualism in our Unitarian church and Conference life. We are all confessedly engaged on measures of organization and extension of influence. We are trying to find out more efficient ways of making known the ideas and the ideals that we hold in common. Our problem is to guard our congregational and individual liberty,—and at the same time to get choral power. The ideal relation of Conference to congregation is not attained by making the Conference a mute. Rather we should learn to employ its voice as we never yet have dared to do.

But carefully. Mr. Crooker is right: "In describing at any time the common beliefs and purposes of those churches, such a Conference must be careful not to coerce any particular church, and also not to take positions that shall in any way discourage freedom and growth." That warning can not be too strongly emphasized. For instance, the National Conference in 1870 formulated and announced its terms of fellowship by Article IX. of its Constitution:

"Reaffirming our allegiance to the gospel of Jesus Christ, and desiring to secure the largest unity of the spirit and the widest practical co-operation, we invite to our fellowship all who wish to be followers of Christ."

That was both credal and uncongregational. Credal, because it replaced a previous Art. IX. passed two years before, in 1868, which read:

"To secure the largest unity of the spirit and the widest practical co-operation, it is hereby understood that all declarations by this Conference, including the Preamble and Constitution, are expressions only of its majority, committing in no degree those who object to them, and dependent wholly for their effect upon the consent they command on their own merits from the churches here represented or belonging within the circle of our fellowship."

Of course, to deliberately rescind that, against protest, and insert in its place "allegiance to the gospel of Jesus Christ", etc., meant "creed". And it was uncongregational, not because it stated terms of fellowship, but because the specific terms laid down coerced, and with knowledge aforethought coerced, the congregations that did not require those "Christ" terms as condition of their individual fellowship. Twelve years later, in 1882, the Conference returned, clumsily, to an uncredal and congregational position by adding to its second Art. IX. an Art. X., which reads:

"While we believe that the Preamble and Articles of our Constitution fairly represent the opinions of the majority of our churches, yet we wish distinctly to put on record our declaration that they are no authoritative test of Unitarianism, and are not intended to exclude from our fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our purposes and practical aims."

That is the old rescinded Art. IX. brought home again. Sometime our National Conference will reach a faith and courage large enough to take in hand its patched Constitution and make it over into an impressive charter of Religion, Liberty and Faith. The story illustrates the need of Mr. Crooker's warning.

And now to return to the Cincinnati resolution: "Resolved, that the Western Unitarian Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all who wish to join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world." It was passed after long debates by a large majority, 34 to 10. Do its terms violate "Congregationalism?" (1) By the "it"-ness of it? No; so far as that is concerned, they are the usual terms employed in any Conference resolution, and mean simply that the churches, speaking through their Conference voice, "condition", etc. (2) By its being a resolution concerning fellowship? No, that does not make it uncongregational, if what is said above be sound. (3) Then is it made uncongregational by the specific terms in which it tries to formulate the churches' fellowship? The writer—and he was the one who offered the Cincinnati resolution—frankly owns that now it seems to him too roundly put; that it probably does at present fail to represent all our congregations; and as that fact is not allowed for in its wording, to the extent by which it fails it is too coercive. We gladly add that, if it be not Mr. Crooker's argument, it is, in part, by thinking over his pamphlet that we have come to see this. It may be called coercive, not by exacting dogma, but by exacting none, when some would fain exact; coercive by seeming to require freedom, for which not all are ready yet.

Not that it is more coercive than any ordinary majority vote; but this is a matter for the most careful justice. And we must say again, that the resolution, just as it is worded, seems to us the simple affirmation of creedlessness which all Unitarians from the beginning have asserted with enthusiasm,—that affirmation, turned boldly inside out, so that we and all the world may see just what it means; and we believe that all Unitarians will yet have the full courage of their faith to say exactly this. But it has grown very plain this year that not all Unitarians, and not all those who have been in the Western Conference, do mean their creedlessness. That the large majority within the Western Conference mean it, is quite sure; but the faith-full and noble resolution, in order to be "congregational", ought to have been framed as simply the words of the majority. It doubtless would have been, had any one at Cincinnati thought of the suggestion. And if it ought to have been framed so then, it ought to be framed so now and at once,—that our Western Conference may not consciously stand one moment in the attitude in which the National Conference stood between 1870 and 1882. The change weakens the resolution, of course, takes out the full ring of it; but in the long run exactest justice always makes for strength. We Unitarians will yet pass that resolution with one heart and voice, making it thereby "congregational"; and in that day of jubilee we shall pronounce it with a full consciousness of meaning and of gladness in the meaning that few feel yet. Meanwhile that a large majority has a right to pass such a resolution, if explicit to claim it as only their position, coercing none, is certain. The Conference need not wait for the last reluctant voice before it begins to utter welcome to "all who wish to join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world".

Therefore we would suggest that, at the next May meeting of our Western Conference, the resolution passed at Cincinnati be reconsidered and again submitted, this time under such a preamble as will make it only the thought of the majority, binding none, and always open to revision.

In next week's paper the other resolution, we offered at Cincinnati in immediate connection with the one then passed, will be spoken of,—the rejected resolution concerning a declaration of the doctrines commonly believed among us. That, too, we earnestly trust, may at our coming meeting receive at least the thoughtful consideration for which last year we had no time, not so much as one moment. W. C. G.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Aspiration.

Written for the dedication of Unity Church, Camden, N. J., March 16th, 1887.

Wrapt in the slumberous fastness of the night,
We search for thee whose sacred stream is Truth;
We follow near the buoyant dream of youth,
And would have patience for the growing light.

While men may suffer with a nameless pain,
And hearts are troubled, and the dark is here,
We pillow Trust upon the morning's cheer
Which makes the hilltops ruddy from the plain.

In lands of love, kissed by the tender sea,
Thy spirit broods, through peace and through distress,
Till men uplift weak men in tenderness
To sweeter days which gather close with thee.

Out of the past, in countless deeds fulfilled,
Born of a hope that knew not all thy fire,
There came unseen to earth a wisdom higher,
And prophet-souls did know thee and were thrilled.

Thy music sought them in the halls of old,
Thy guests were fewer but their hearts were strong,
And days were years, and years then grew more long,
And morning came upon the human fold:

The keener morning! Men were children now
To live new dreams, to fix upon the skies,
Full-orbed in glory, worlds for eager eyes
Which see in beauty the celestial glow!

Unfathomed Presence! Thou whose latest day
Is new to virtue; 'tis of thee we ask
Such ardent strength to meet each fateful task
As made our fathers glorious on their way!

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

Is Unitarianism Adapted to the Masses?

The heresy implied in this question is widespread. The feeling that our gospel is for the few, hampers all our missionary work. Who are the masses? Do we mean the unlettered people who are doing the world's rough work? The overburdened men and women whose bodies are deformed by toil, and minds dwarfed by disuse? Are these the masses? The great unschooled, unwashed majority with sleeping consciences wandering in darkness? If these starving souls are vaguely reaching after something, they know not what, have we no food? If for all these "weary and heavy laden", Unitarianism has no rest, then so much the worse for Unitarianism. If ours is a philosophy for the cultured few, if we have to offer a rose-colored bed of ease for dilettantes in religion, if, instead of food for the hungry, we have only delicacies for epicures, then our end is at hand. Is our message so abstruse only the wise can comprehend it? Must it exclude all who are not familiar with the technicalities of science? There were never heresy so benumbing as this, that denies at once the divine in humanity and the power of God's truth.

The masses you will not trust may not know the latest discoveries of science. They have not read Spencer nor Abbot, but they have looked through nature up to nature's God, and will be glad for any revelation science has to make, and be careful how you dilute the truth for them. This weather-beaten man whose hands are so deformed by toil he can hardly turn the leaves of the book you read so glibly, has been thinking while you were reading, and although his data may be more limited than yours, it is life, not books, from which he has taken his facts, and his conclusions are vital ones. More than this, these hearts have known sorrow; these consciences have known remorse. When shall we learn that "We have all one human heart by which we live," and that the real needs of one class are the needs of all. I cannot believe with Mr. Brown that, "For a certain portion of the unchurched in this country, our form of faith is undoubtedly too simple and too much lacking in purely emotional power." Surely no form of faith ought to have the emotional power our sublime hopes can give.

Our simple message is intended for the weakest, most despondent children of the All-Father. I wonder not that they who believe in man's total depravity and fall, his everlasting condemnation, should hesitate to approach the lowest prodigal; but for us with our faith in man, with our message of hope and good cheer, where can we hesitate? Into the lowest hell of remorse we may go to cry, "Look up, you are God's child; there is hope, there is help for you."

Into the darkest night of sorrow we may take the light,

"God's in his heaven, All's right with the world."

Alas, how sad, if by our starfimering we fail to deliver the message for which the weary "masses" are waiting! If it fail to reach them let us blame neither the message nor the people, but our bungling delivery. "How did you like that sermon?" was asked a farmer of one of our church-door pulpit tracts. "Wall, the fodder was a leetle too high in the rack." Let us lower the rack, brethren, before we condemn the fodder.

ELIZA T. WILKES.

The Leadership of Jesus.

FROM A SERMON PREACHED AT ROCK RAPIDS, BY S. S. HUNTING.

What are the elements of character which constitute good leadership? This depends on the nature of the leadership, whether it is that of a general, a statesman, a poet, a philosopher, or religious leadership. What of the leadership of Jesus? Mohammed was a religious leader, so was Peter the Hermit. Both were enthusiasts of the superstitious order. At the opening of the Christian era the expectation of the Messiah among the Jews led them to hail any person who would lead them, as the one who would redeem Israel from Roman despotism.

The common people heard Jesus gladly. Was it from what he said? Was it how he said it? Was it not his personality which swayed their wills? When he spoke there was power in his speech. When questioned by his opponents he so answered that they ceased to question because unable to wrestle with his answers.

There are and ever have been Seers of a spiritual order whose visions are clear where others cannot see. While others are led by their senses, they see the realities of things. Such leaders are not understood in their day. Jewish history did not deign to give Jesus a passing notice, even the paragraph in Josephus being an interpolation; while Luther, dogmatic and controversial, made the history of his day. But Jesus was his master. Bonaparte ruled by sheer force of character by making his word despotic law, which was obeyed as the decree of fate, but heroes like him have a short career, their fame is bounded by a century and their worshipers belong to one nation. Not so with those who teach the world wisdom or reveal the secret laws of the better life. The disciples of the Grecian Sage are found among all people, and his fame is destined to be immortal on the earth. The spirits of the great and good command our hearts after they have gone; though dead they yet speak.

The religious leader fathoms deep after deep in the human spirit and reveals man to himself, because he is himself a man of like passions. Every great religion of the world has had a representative Son of Man who stands in the human forest like the mammoth trees of California among the small ones by their side. Great minds with love and thought in equipoise, having a fullness of life to impart to others, are as natural as the great trees, whose shade is a shield from the heat. It is reasonable to expect exceptional greatness in moral teachers as in other departments of life, and history confirms the reasonableness of the expectation. All must acknowledge that Jesus of Nazareth has been to the world such an exceptional leader. The Christ ideal has possession of Christendom. Beginning with the last half of the second Christian century, Gnostic speculations made a demi-god of the Christ, and the man Jesus Christ of St. Paul was eclipsed and buried, except to the few heretical sects who always clung to the Jesus of the Gospels. To such in these days Jesus is the grand man of Hebrew history and the perfect fruit of the religion of his nation. His life and teachings are a perpetual testimony to those spiritual qualities which are the sum and substance of true manhood and pure womanhood. His life is useful and appreciable only so far as it is rooted in the experiences common to all mankind, but as the God of Gnostic speculations he is only a useless idol.

Christendom is finding the real Jesus of Nazareth just as fast as it is rejecting the dogma that he was a God in some way subordinate or equal to the Father. So far as our ideal of that Father is love, Jesus had divine qualities of character; so have those who are like him; for, said Paul, "As many are led by the spirit of God, they are sons of God. If sons, then heirs of God, and joint heirs of Christ", and suffering as he suffered they are glorified with him.

The originality of Jesus is like that we find in nature on every June day. To have originality is to live near the sources of life and drink from its fountains of experience. In the records of all religions, we find that minds lifted to the same moral heights have taught the same essential views of moral truths.

That poet inspired by the life he finds in nature and in the human spirit, inspires us the most. Who can ever tire of reading that poem by Whittier on the "Goodness of God"? Jesus saw the same goodness in the flowers and the phenomena of nature. Jesus saw by the same faculties with which we see, only he was original in his perceptions like a true scientist, like a real poet. He came to man as he is and was, hence his words had life in them. Tempted like all others, he knew how to help his fellows. Touching the inner consciousness of man, and appealing to his nobler aspirations, he therein showed that he drank from original fountains.

In every child there is something that relates him to the Eternal Life of this universe. Reason in every person is the incarnate word, and it was no exception in Jesus, except in degree, and in the measure of its power.

The poet is not only in sympathy with his subject, but his mind moves in the rhythm of spiritual law, and he sees what no other sees in a less exalted state of imagination and emotion.

Thus Jesus leads the moral teachers of the ages, and while he originated no special precept, he put a new life into the old and gave a new view of worship. He taught mind-worship in opposition to body-worship, which is made by the postures of the body. He taught the living of truth in opposition to a form of worship. His life was set to a human scale, and we interpret it by other noble lives, as we interpret all music by one musical scale.

That we may appreciate the teachings of Jesus, we must live as he lived, trust as he trusted, act as he acted. We must live near realities that we may know the truth and be made free by it. We must have an ideal by which to mold our actual lives.

In their zeal for the fictitious Christ of the creeds, persons dispute about the supernatural, as the soldiers contended over the seamless garment of Jesus, greedy for their share of the plunder, while Jesus is crucified between their bigotry and superstition,—the two malefactors.

One of the durable qualities of a leader is fidelity, a characteristic which Jesus always possessed, being true to God and truth itself, even unto death.

If we carefully study the recorded career of Jesus, we will find that he was full of the love of truth, hence the teaching that the spirit of truth went out from him. If the church had kept to this beautiful idea instead of inventing the "Holy Ghost" of theology, people would be much more readily attracted to religion. The marvelous power which Jesus had over the honest-minded people is accounted for by his perfect sincerity and truthfulness which the humble could appreciate; hence the "common people heard him gladly".

The hope and trust which Jesus mingled with all his teachings must have had a peculiar inspiring power over the minds of those persons who were bearing the yoke put on them by a Pharisaical religion, just such a yoke as thousands of Christians are bearing to-day.

With all these and other characteristic qualities, we hold Jesus as our leader. With all his personal authority he did not oppress the conscience of his hearers, but told them to judge of themselves what is right. They were asked to test the truth of his word by doing the will of God—what a contrast with dogmatic preachers. "Truth for authority, not authority for truth", is a motto which Lucretia Mott drew out of the life of Jesus.

How can we gain an appreciation of the leader? Only by fidelity as he was faithful. Do we think we will be saved from our sins by trusting in his death? What greater delusion could possess the mind?

Said Mr. Emerson: "It is curious that we believe as deep as we live." This is what we read between the lines of the story of Jesus, when we see how he subsoiled human character and life, tracing all virtue to its roots in the motives of persons.

Jesus fathomed the life of the people of his day and was competent to answer the sharpest of the Rabbis. When the Roman coin was shown him and he was asked if it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar, what was the reply which involved a principle and a rule? "Render unto Cæsar what is Cæsar's, but unto God what is God's." Was there anything more to be said? As the words of a man they penetrate to the core of the subject.

What was the greatest assumption which Jesus made? It was that of the office of a prophet. In Luke, fourth chapter, it is reported that he preached in the synagogue of Nazareth and took the text, "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, for he hath anointed me." That was his christening. The spirit of God stirred in his spirit, giving an "enthusiasm for humanity." This is the Christ in whom we believe. For what was he christened? Hear him. To preach glad tidings to the poor—to bind up the broken hearted—to proclaim liberty to the captive, to open prison doors, to proclaim the year of jubilee for all the enslaved by every kind of slavery and of every nation. This is the Christ who was expunged from the creed of the church of the fourth century of the Christian era, and a monster of Grecian speculation was put in his place. Away with it all, and give us as our leader the Jesus of prophetic christening.

Must the Church be Protected?

IF SO, WHAT IS IT FOR?

Is it not a superfluous apprehension,—this apparent tendency to suppose that the average human mind does not know when it is in the wrong place, and in due time voluntarily withdraw itself? A clause in an editorial of UNITY's last issue, entitled "Dissent without Disfellowship", would so imply. A church stultifies itself by welcoming everyone who wants to stay. It is plain that one of two inferences must be drawn from such a statement. Either the person who wishes to stay in a church where he is considered out of place is one who has no moral character and cannot judge for himself, or the church which would wish to take measures to keep such an one out against his will, is, itself, of an unwarrantably frail moral character.

and does not dare to let him stay. Upon comparing these two inferences thoughtfully the average experience would be compelled to say that the former occurs more rarely than the latter,—a sorry confession to be made. What! a live, active church society, whose purposes are abundantly expressed, and with a strong current of human and divine fellowship, make objections to bearing upon its surface any craft that may seek to venture? If the craft is not endangered what else can be? If snags or shallow places exist to cause disaster, buoys are afloat, so that whatever intrusts itself to the current may be protected. But to fear to admit any who want to come and stay, not only implies that people have no minds of their own, but also seems an unwitting admission that the people are the current, and the church the craft to be protected. Then let the churches deepen and broaden their current, rather than make it narrower; dredge out the shallow places, remove the snags rather than multiply them. A church aims to stand primarily for the purpose of leading human beings toward a purer, more spiritual standard of life; not from shutting them away from such help as they can find. If, then, it has not a sufficient resolute spiritual life of its own to stand the test of a few temporary dissenters within its borders until they drop off voluntarily or are “converted”, it is stultified indeed. * *

Life's Gift.

My youthful years had passed,
With their lessons of joy and pain,
That slowly taught me to value life's gold
And to know it from glitter vain.

When Life one day said to me,
“Here's a treasure I sometimes give
To those who have learned my meaning deep,
To those who have learned to live :

“A casket that holds true love,
And pleasures that heart-ward tend.”
My heart was glad, for life had given
The beautiful gift of—a friend.

JUNIATA STAFFORD.

With an Eye to Perfection.

The advice of Lessing to a young brother artist was: “not to begin by painting twenty pictures, lest he should reduplicate and confirm his own faulty method; but to paint one picture twenty times, with an eye to perfection.” Might not this principle be somewhat applied by the writers of sermons? Instead of delivering time after time the same old manuscript, the preacher would do well, if he could, to write it anew every time he preaches it, so that the sermon may never become an old one, but may grow ever greater and better, in style, in substance, in freshness, in adaptation to new circumstances and needs.

But the proper growth or perfecting of a sermon does not imply increase of quantity, or length; but often condensation and curtailment. The true sermonizer, however, does not make his sermons short just simply in order to save time and labor. In fact, it requires more time and labor to write a short good sermon than a “good long” one.

Not always do readers or hearers realize the amount of scrupulous care and toil represented in the productions of the best authors and preachers. Yet the workman of true conscience is bound, all the same, to put in his utmost and best work. The case of the historian Gibbon presents a suggestive example. He first contemplated writing the “Decline and Fall” in the year 1764, and wrote the last lines of it in 1787, twenty-three years afterwards. After working at it seven years, he was tempted to cast the work aside; but fortunately for the world he persevered. And he thus describes his painstaking process: “Many experiments were made before I could hit the middle tone between a dull chronicle and a rhetorical declamation. Three times did I compose the first chapter, and twice the second and third, before I was tolerably satisfied with their effect. In the remainder of the way I advanced with a more equal and easy pace; but the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters have been reduced by three successive revisions from a large volume to their present size; and they might still be compressed without any loss of facts or sentiments.”

So of many a sermon; it “might still be compressed without loss of truth or sentiment”. Among the preacher's desirable arts, the often difficult art of compression is not the least important one to be studied and habitually attempted.

J. F.

Perseverance.

“Yea! though Thou slay me, still will I trust in Thee.”

To human eyes the path I tread is lonely;
Thorns choke the way, I pass with bleeding feet.
Yet I, who see the goal, cry, Lord, if only
I may press on, I still will name it sweet.

For high endeavor blesses all the doing,
Though men may scoff and women do me wrong;
O, none the less will I, Heaven's mercy sueing,
Strive still to join the ancient Prophet's song.

What tho' the sun rain down his fiery lances,
Or icy winds scourge me with whips of steel,
If but my soul a vision of Heaven entrances
And round my stony pillow angels kneel.

In burning noon if oftentimes I would linger
Beneath the palms that nurse some desert spring,
Stern duty points the way with warning finger,
I faint, hope fans me with her snowy wing.

I will go on, though danger be about me
And clang of arms, and tramp of charging steed;
No foe shall daunt, within me or without me,
If I but follow where my Captain lead.

MARTHA S. KIRBY.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Golden Justice. By William Henry Bishop. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

It is so much the fashion for our story-tellers to lay the scene of their narratives in the languid air of eastern cities, to concern themselves chiefly with the struggle between “new riches” and “blue blood”, or to dissect some other phase of the hydra-headed tyrant Society, that to take up a book which savors nothing of these is a delightful surprise. The cool breezes and clear atmosphere of our own “inland sea” are decidedly invigorating in story, whatever different tale neuralgic nerves and tender throats may tell in actual existence.

Mr. Bishop's new book brings before us with clear and graphic touches the town of Keewaydin, on the shore of Lake Michigan, which may be easily recognized by those familiar with the “Cream City”. The book opens with the story of the “Golden Justice”. David Lane, merchant, prosperous, popular, choleric and proud, betrayed by momentary passion into a deed which bears fatal consequences, and prevented by the universal incredulity from making open reparation, places a record of the circumstances and a confession of his share in the accident among the papers confided to the uncertain custody of a golden figure of Justice on the dome of the City Hall. This beginning prepares one to expect a powerful delineation of character, but the progress of the story is, unfortunately, tame, being an account of the chance arrival and sojourn in Keewaydin of a Mr. Paul Barclay, whose father was killed in the accident referred to. David Lane's daughter, married, but separated from her husband, is living with her father, and the history of her slow relenting toward Barclay, whom she had known abroad, is given at length. David Lane, stung by remorse, at first tries to prevent the attachment between the two, but during a severe storm the Golden Justice falls, scattering its contents, the momentous confession, of course, coming direct to Barclay. There is a general explanation and forgiving. The inconvenient husband kindly betakes himself to another life, and "all is merry as a marriage bell".

So much for plot, which is singular enough, yet somehow fails to make due impression. The treatment is rather disappointing. Here a description and there a touch of characterization of unusual power, and the rest mere shadowy outline. The best chapters are the first, already mentioned; the fifth, which gives a glimpse of a rich and hitherto unworked mine in the unfamiliar types and old-world quaintness to be found among the Polish element in our large cities; and the fifteenth, describing David Lane's midnight attempt to climb the City Hall dome in the windy darkness, in the hope of abstracting from the base of the statue the record of his crime. The latter chapter is particularly strong.

Mr. Bishop does not seem to be always aware where his best work is done. Had he kept to the chord first struck he might have given us in David Lane something to equal the finest character studies lately presented to the reading public. It might be that the rare character of a man with a conscience would be more inspiring than the minute analysis of Mrs. Varemberg's scruples, which occupies so large a part of the book. Certainly, in the latter field, Mr. Bishop does not manifest the power and skill which his readers have a right to expect from his pen.

Agatha and the Shadow. A novel. Boston: Roberts Brothers. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co. $1.50.

This book is full of quaint life and strong personality. Among the fervent exile Puritans of the seventeenth century, we become acquainted with fine nobility of character side by side with inevitable human weakness; "Agatha" is not unlike Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter", possessing much of its sympathetic power, as in the frenzied attack upon Bernard Anselm in the public square of Leyden by the Jewess Leah,—through all of which "Bernard stood with folded arms, quietly"; and in a subsequent chapter the portrayal of the humiliating public punishment endured by Rachel. Historic characters and situations are used which are accurate and well sustained. But the character of Agatha is in every degree admirable; and there exists between her and the ocean a tie known only to those higher natures which contain a reverberating chord, conversant indeed with the whole heart of Nature. It is elevating to meet, among the characters too many books contain, one whose life is so full of perfect beauty and purity.

S. E. E.

Nuttall's Standard Dictionary of the English Language. Revised, Extended, and Improved throughout by the Rev. James Wood, author of "Stories from Greek Mythology". London and New York: F. Warne & Co. Price $1.50.

This dictionary, which first appeared in 1870, is based upon the works of Johnson, Webster, Worcester, Latham, Goodrich, Walker, Craig, Richardson, Ogilvie and others, and embraces, besides the indispensable features of those works, an etymological section, a list of new words brought up to date (1886) and a list of foreign and classical phrases recently imported into the English language; also a considerable addition to the original list of scientific names, including classical names with their accentuation, and geographical names with their pronunciation. Those who have reviewed the earlier edition need not be assured of the clearness and fullness of the definitions. We know of no dictionary of its price which is more satisfactory in these respects. With all the other concomitants of the modern dictionary, and printed on new and fairly large type, it should not fail of general patronage.

E. R. C.

Romanism; or, Danger Ahead. The Reason Why a Good Roman Catholic Cannot be a Good Citizen of this Republic. By A. J. Grover. Chicago: Published by the Author.

We are free to say that we do not like Mr. Grover's little book; for, while there is unfortunately very much truth in what he says, his manner of saying it is coarse and heated. We are sorry for this, for we have no sympathy whatever with the doctrines of Romanism touching the relations of church and state, and we look with concern upon the increasing efforts of Romish priests to obtain control of American politics. We do not see how such pamphlets as this which Mr. Grover has written can do any good. If the author of "Romanism" will take the trouble to read a few pages of Bishop Spalding's "History of the Protestant Reformation", he may learn with what finished politeness the Romish pot may call the Protestant kettle black. A modicum of Bishop Spalding's scholarly finesse might make Mr. Grover's pamphlet fit to be read in the family.

C. D.

The Library Magazine. John B. Alden, Publisher. New York: 393 Pearl street.

This magazine is published either as a semi-weekly or monthly. The semi-weekly issue contains 22 pages; the monthly numbers average over 190 pages, in which form they have a neat cover—first issue of the monthly, March 1st. The aggregate number of pages of reading matter given in twelve months is 2,288. Price of either semi-weekly or monthly, $1.00 a year. The publisher declares that he means to deserve half a million subscribers. This magazine, like the Living Age, the Eclectic and others, gathers its reading principally from foreign publications. As a specimen of its contents we give the following titles: "Hill-Digging and Magic", "University Education in the United States", Gladstone's "Locksley Hall and the Jubilee" and "Rural Life in Russia".

THE HOME.

Cloud Land.

While threading this vale in a pensive mood,
Peering about for ambrosial food,
My ear caught the sound of a gentle neigh
Like a breath from the winged horse, gone astray.

Stretching my hand to the fiery steed,
He tried to respond to the kindly deed,
For he dropped his haughty head on my breast,
In his dumb way begging to be caressed.

I called him my sweetheart, I called him my friend,
Till his wild eyes softened and seemed to blend
With the dazzling light that about him played,
And his glorious birthright thus betrayed—

"Pegasus, my Pegasus, mount with me
Aloft to the shimmering, starry sea."
I flung myself on his quivering neck,
And we buried ourselves in the misty fleck

Of unbroken sunbeams of burnished gold,
And diaphanous pearls of wealth untold,
Floating round and about us everywhere,
And brightly radiating thro' the air,

Making shad'wy castles, and mystic curls
Of weird little ghosts of boys and girls;—
Nothing substantial above, or below,
My horse was plunging about in the snow.

Not a sound to be heard in this strange place;
Everything melted away into space;
Even the jewels, so lustrous and clear,
Dissolved themselves quickly into a tear.

Pegasus' mane congealed as he flew.
And I felt a frost stain over me, too;
The clouds dropped icicles one by one—
(Knowing my race to be nearly run).

I grasped at the nearest, spun myself round,
Then straightway fell headlong down to the ground;
Now groaning and humbled, and full of pain,
I never want to see Cloud Land again.

J. M.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Boston Notes.—The Unitarians of our city are active in a non-sectarian effort now making, viz., to place the Hampton Institute for educating Indians and Negroes on a safe financial footing.

—The Unitarian Club lately recommended a non-sectarian project which meets very general approval in the religious and secular newspapers, viz., to build at the north end a workingmen's club room.

—Young men, delegates from our Unitarian churches, have organized the "Channing Club of Boston", with the aim to promote intimacies, and to stand ready to aid our ministers in any active work. The membership is limited to one hundred delegates. Four regular meetings, with a collation in each, are planned for each winter. With commendable forethought, these young men are to qualify themselves to do the church work of their elders of to-day. All the club rules suggest enthusiastic, intelligent church work.

—A western custom is here coming largely into vogue, viz., to place on chapels, and as well on costly churches, a large, gilt, wooden sign, informing the public and stranger the name, sect, pastor's name, and the weekly work of the society. Until lately, no sign-board was usually permitted on any church, except a little shield giving name of the sexton, and possibly of the minister.

—A new horse car road company wants to tunnel Beacon Hill, and make its depot there a union of spur tracks to all our suburbs. Meanwhile, an elevated road is getting a short trial track located.

—Dr. James Freeman Clarke rides out every bright day. Dr. L. H. Hedge and his sympathizing wife are both feeble in health.

—It is proposed to initiate in Channing Hall normal classes in graded lessons for Sunday-schools.

E. R. B.

Grand Rapids.—The Liberal Holland church has recently been cheered by letters received by its pastor, Rev. F. W. Hugenholz, from Castalia, Dakota. A liberal religious society is being formed in a Holland community out of those who recoil from the very orthodox ministrations of the Dutch Reformed minister of the neighborhood. The new circle already counts 50 male adults, for the greater part fathers of families of from six to twelve children. Our correspondent says:

"They hold their meetings alternately in their residences, but they will have soon their own meeting-house. Although they are poor, —their only riches being the fertile grounds of their farms, promising the most splendid harvest if in the summer-time rain shall come in time,—still they have spared money enough to start a small church in the coming spring. In their meetings the principal religious and intellectual food is procured by our Holland monthly. Stemmen uit de Veeje Holland Sche Gemcents (voices from the Liberal Holland church at Grand Rapids). The articles are read with great interest and afterwards made the subject of debate. The remainder of the evening is sacred to general developments: addresses, lectures of every kind.

"Thus they do what they can. They give what they have, but feel deeply that it is not enough. They want a library, and more than that, they want a man who can lead their meetings and instruct their children. Of course we will assist our brothers in faith as much as we can, with books and perhaps with some other material help. Next summer Rev. Mr. Hugenholz will at their invitation visit them, strengthen their faith, and see what may be done to start a second Liberal Holland church in this county. I need add that all are very much pleased with our New Hamilton Vocation. Rev. Mr. Jones of Chicago first spoke to us of this new kind of organs, afterwards Rev. Mr. Hugenholz went to hear it in Chicago, and resolved to buy. Through the friendly help of Mr. J. Vila Blake, of Chicago, and Rev. Russell N. Belows at New York, we have a very fine instrument, which gives entire satisfaction. Monday night, March, 21, Mrs. Neill, organist of the Universalist church, gave a concert on it, attended by a large audience. All who see and hear it are surprised at so much variety and power for so small a sum of money. By this new acquisition the last lack is filled in our church, which gives us joy and thankful pride every Sunday."

Minneapolis.—DEAR UNITY: You will, I feel sure—since we belong to your family—be glad to know that the little handful of folk who several years ago listened for the first time to our Mr. Simmons, in a dingy up-stairs hall, now sit close to make room for the hundreds who gather every Sunday morning in the cozy basement of our new home church; and also glad to learn that the audience room is nearing completion, and we hope before many weeks to "go up higher". Though but a handful in our busy city of nearly 200,000 people, we are working with a will for ourselves, and when the church-home is furnished and paid for, we hope not to be drones in the larger hive of liberal workers. So by and by expect to greet us as co-laborers in missionary and benevolent efforts. About forty of the young people attending the State University here sought admission a few months ago to the Christian Association of Students connected with the institution, with the privilege of occasionally inviting liberal speakers to lecture. Being refused, they have formed a separate association and secured their own lecturers. The first lecture of the course was delivered—not as reported in the last UNITY, by Mr. Simmons, but by Rev. Mr. Shutler, associate pastor of the Church of the Redeemer (Universalist), and was listened to by an audience which filled the Second Universalist Church. Mr. Simmons, Kristofer Jansen and other liberal ministers are to follow, and thus is the good seed scattering.

Dakota.—A Second Holland Liberal Church. And now it is from Dakota that word comes of such an organization. Five years ago hundreds of Holland families settled in Castalia, Charles Mix county, Dak., not far from Yankton. Two churches were organized, but upon so narrow a basis and as espoused to a theology so medieval, that forty-four male adults formed a union for social gatherings and mutual edification. From this developed a Liberal Society. The articles of organization establish that at the opening of their meetings, at least an hour shall be devoted to the reading of religious literature, after which the meeting is open for general discussion or the contribution of anything not in conflict with good morals. In the meantime, as the gatherings are from house to house, the women offer a cup of coffee to the assembled congregation. It is the hope of these friends that they will have the funds for a little church by next summer. They need still more a pastor, but are not disheartened. Another great need is good literature—English and Dutch. Being pioneers, and withal poor, one copy of Stemmen, from Grand Rapids, does service for them all. One of their number, Mr. A. D. Franssens, contributes a letter to Stemmen, from which we gather our information.

Philadelphia.—Chadwick lectured in Camden on Thackeray.

—It is possible that the senior Hinckley may have Haskell's one-time place in the Vineland church.

—The ex-Methodist Gilbert has spoken from Mangasarian's platform. It is said of this man that he grew to his present sentiments without any aid from liberal literature or people; and that he never entered a Unitarian church till three or four weeks ago, when Mr. Ames yielded his pulpit to him.

—Professor Lesley lectured at Mr. Ames's church on Tuesday evening, the 22d.

—Professor Frances Emily White, of the Ethical Culture Society, delivered the address at the commencement of the Woman's Medical College.

—At the last meeting of the Contemporary Club, George Kennan, who has done some special traveling in Russia and Western Asia for the Century company, related certain of his experiences while upon that mission. As he knows Tolstoi and other Russian reformers personally—is, in fact, in personal communication with them—what he had to say of Russian political and religious disturbances was interesting and valuable.

—Miss Alice Ames is to read a paper respecting college incidents, at the next meeting of the Ethical Association of Unity church, Camden.

—There were Methodists here, too, who objected strongly to any united expression of condolence upon the death of Beecher, when that matter was brought up at a recent Monday's meeting of ministers.

—Miss Helen Hinckley, whose noble work in the charities of this city, and especially in those multiplied by the First Unitarian church, is everywhere recognized, and her sister, Mrs. Goodwin, whose parallel efforts for the poor boys under charge of the Society for Ethical Culture is entitled to equal applause, have met with a blow in the death of their mother, which only the remembrance of a nobly-rounded life and of the facts of that necessity which, as Emerson says, "plants the rose of beauty on the brow of chaos", can soften and explain. In the presence of the Universal, we dare all of us brave the years that pass and the duty that points the way.

H. L. T.

Hinsdale, Ill.—The Western Secretary, J. R. Effinger, preached in Music Hall, Sunday morning, March 27. In the face of a driving snow-storm there was a goodly attendance. A large number of those present remained to a business meeting, of which Mr. Herman Fox was chairman and Mr. H. S. Loomis secretary. By unanimous rising vote it was decided to continue weekly services. Looking to a more permanent organization, a working committee was appointed, consisting of the chairmain and secretary, Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Burt, Mrs. Temple and Mrs. C. T. Warren. A report from this committee is expected next Sunday morning. Earnest words were spoken by Messrs. I. Van Inwagen, F. Van Inwagen, Judge Tiffany and H. S. Loomis. The meeting was enthusiastic and full of encouragement.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, APRIL 9, 1887.

[NUMBER 6.]

Easter.

"For unto him all live."

"Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature."

*The fool asks, "With what flesh? in joy or pain?
Helped or unhelped? and lonely, or again
Surrounded by our earthly friends?"
I know not; and I glory that I do
Not know; that for Eternity's great ends
God counted me as worthy of such trust,
That I need not be told.*

*Believing thus, I joy although I lie in dust;
I joy, not that I ask or choose,
But simply that I must.
I love and fear not; and I cannot lose,
One instant, this great certainty of peace.
Long as God ceases not, I cannot cease;
I MUST ARISE.*

—Helen Hunt Jackson.

God, even our Father, who hath loved us and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, comfort your hearts and stablish you in every good word and work.

EDITORIAL.

THE right of anything takes care of the end of it.

IDENTIFY man with Nature, and you identify Nature with man. "Materialism", thought out, spiritualizes the universe.

"NATURE" names the Community of things: "God" names the Unity of things; and each is true name when the other is recognized, and neither is true if the other be not recognized.

A MAN can do anything he ought to do, can bear anything he ought to bear. It is not always easy to tell what that thing is,—but that, too, shall gradually open if one simply does the next duty to be done.

WHAT a melancholy thing it would be if there were no to-morrow to look toward. To sorrow to-morrow brings hope and a sense of relief. To the happy, more of happiness. The great trouble is that we cram to-morrow into a time bounded by twenty-four hours. The morrow which is so beneficial to all is the morrow which never is completed.

FEAR no hard things,—but fear the easy things.

"PERSONALITY is the lever of the world's history", said Bunsen. No: personality is the fulcrum, and idealization—the people's imagination applied to the person—is the lever.

THE heights of the Old Testament or the New—of all Scriptures—are those passages which look towards the identification of morals and religion. Try this test and see if it be not true.

I HATE myself when I find out that I have been thinking a man worse than he is. But a mistake the other way—thinking a man better than he is—does not much matter. Besides, it may not be a mistake!

It would be a good thing to remember at all times that at every meeting with friend or foe something is added to or taken from each other's life, and equally good to be the one to add to and not subtract from the other.

THE purest delight on earth comes when one we love achieves some surprise of goodness or of grace. It is the joy of discovery, of attainment, of reverence,—these three separate joys in one; and with oneself left wholly out, save as the after-thought occurs, "This is my friend."

THE newspapers say that a recent fire destroyed the ancestral home of the family of Confucius, with all its literary and art treasures. In the building, erected 600 B. C., generation after generation of the male heirs of the Chinese philosopher have dwelt in an unbroken line for 2,000 years.

"SELF-REVERENCE is not reverence of what we are, but of that higher nature, which reproves and condemns and abases us." This brings to mind the following, from Epictetus: "A man who was reproached for doing good to a shipwrecked pirate, answered: 'It was not the man I honored, but mankind.'"

"I AM sure Christianity will endure because it is founded on man's nature, and answers to his deepest, essential, noblest wants," says Channing, in his "Note Book"; and so say we: but that religion which insists on being called Christianity for fear it will not be recognized as such,—is it yet Christianity?

STRANGE to pray through another man, and that a foreigner! "A god"? Strange, then, to pray through a second god to a first God. But strange to pray at all in the sense of petition; you can have all you can take, and can only have it by taking. True praying—communion—is like truth-seeing, and has the same laws. It is truth-seeing.

THE election of Mr. Roche as mayor of Chicago, with a majority of 28,000, is one of the most encouraging signs of the times. For the first time in our memory partisan issues gave way to moral and practical ones. It was Law, Order, on one side, versus a mixture of rash enthusiasm and tempestuous lawlessness on the other. Socialism at its center is a crudely thought-out dream of Utopia, which when eliminated of the crudeness is the gospel of unity, the religion of human brotherhood; but at its circumference it is a rebellious discontent, without either the insight or the grace to see subjective defects or the real encouragements and the slow way forward. Mr. Roche enters his responsible office under enviable circumstances; he is not a mayor of a party, but of a people, and we believe he appreciates the solemnity of his responsibility, and will labor hard, and wisely, to utilize his opportunity.

IN answer to the question asked in a recent UNITY, "What is doing in Chicago for deaf mutes", Alexander Johnson, secretary of the Charity Organization Society, writes us that there is a Catholic school for deaf mutes at St. Joseph's Home for the Friendless, 409 South May st. The third season began September 7th, 1886. There are two teachers and a large suite of rooms. Instruction is given in both methods, namely, articulation and signs. The instruction is free and books are supplied. It is intended, by and by, to add instruction in the arts and sciences.

BANCROFT wrote of his father, the clergyman Dr. Aaron Bancroft,—“Age may have impaired his vivacity; but his last years were serene; and whenever it was discussed whether a man would like to live his life over again, my father always expressed himself so well satisfied with his career that he would willingly run it once more.” How few can make such a remark in good faith. For either we are deploring errors, or grieving over disappointments, or suffering from ambition, because all these feelings stand naked and alone. No one can speak like this clergyman but one who has robed all life's experiences with a humble and faithful piety.

MANY strange and interesting things happen between churches and ministers, which are worthy of psychological study. One of the most singular instances we have met is a story told regarding Dr. Zedekiah Sanger, one of the early Unitarians in this country. It is told that, “When the vote for giving him a call was taken, it was in fact unanimous, though one hand was raised in the negative. When the man who thus raised his hand was asked what he had to object against Mr. Sanger, his reply was,—‘Nothing at all, I voted against him to take off the curse; for the Scripture says: Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you.’”

“WHAT is the argument for the Immortality?” This chiefly: There has been much mind, and love and character on the earth,—what has become of it all? What has become of it,—that is a question! But that it has become somewhat,—of that there is no question. “Perhaps it is no longer you, a self.” Perhaps not; but how do I know it is not better joy to be a part of a god, or of God, than the whole of a man? or only part of all men, rather than the whole of one? or only a part in the future than a whole in the present? And truly, the only real joy of being at all is in being a part of larger being; if one can get more of that joy by remaining a self, then I want the personal immortality,—and quite surely shall have it; for the best possible will be. “Best Possible” is Nature's other name.

REV. CHARLES ELLIS, in a recent number of the Saginaw Evening News, gives an interesting account of Miss Elizabeth P. Peabody and her even more remarkable red sister, Princess Sarah Winnemucca of the Piute Indians, a tribe always friendly and devoted to the whites, both friends and foes—of the latter, alas, they have known most. Should the Indians judge us as we judge others by their treatment of us, we would, I fear, sink far below the Piutes in the scale of all that is honorable and Christian. Mr. Ellis simply tells the story of this red woman, who through untiring zeal and self-sacrifice has not only educated herself so that she is mistress of five languages, and published the story of her people, “Life Among the Piutes”, but has collected the remnant of them together, and on the 160 acres of land given them by Senator Stanford, built a home and school-house where she is trying to lift them into self-helpfulness through culture. In an appeal to her people she says:

“When I were a little girl there were no Indian schools and I learned under difficulty. Your children can learn much more than I know and much easier. There is no excuse for ignorance. * * * A few years ago you owned this great country; to-day the white man owns it all and you own nothing. Do you know what did it? Education. You see the miles and miles of railroad, the locomotive, the mint in Carson, where they make money. Education has done it all. Now, what it has done for one man it will do for another. You have brains same as the whites; your children have brains, and it will be your fault if they grow up as you have. I entreat you to take hold of this school and give your support by sending your children, old and young, to it; and when they grow up to manhood and womanhood they will bless you.”

Through the efforts of Miss Peabody and others, they have fenced in the land and secured the necessary appliances for irrigation, and this year hope to cultivate ninety acres of it. UNITY joins Mr. Ellis in an appeal to the hearts and pockets of all friends of culture and civilization for aid to this woman's work. Donations may be sent here, or to Miss Elizabeth P. Peabody, Concord, Mass.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE, in the Christian Record, admitting the limitation of the sermon, the stupidity of the preacher, and all that, still urges what seems to us an unanswerable truth, that the sermon is one of the most potent moral and spiritual factors in society. He says:

“But I say that the opportunity given to the listener, fifty times in a year, to know what a man of experience merely thinks, believes, feels and sees about the moral life of the world, is an opportunity which society cannot afford to throw away. I do not see that society finds just the same opportunity anywhere else. Whom do you know, outside the very nearest friend you have, who fifty times in a year goes to the very depth of his conviction or his feeling, and, from the very foundation, tells you what is? Where do you find, except in the church, the discussion of the life of your time and your own duty, based on the principles which are absolutely eternal? Certainly not in the newspaper press. It does not even pretend to discuss them on such principles.”

MUCH has been said in regard to hero worship in American churches. Perhaps none too much has been said against the tendency to go to church chiefly for the sake of hearing one voice, and the spiritual and mental imbecility that can find no worshipful communion and helpful meditation except under the leadership of the one chosen minister. But this tendency has never been carried so far, to our knowledge, in this country as it recently has been in London, where the Bedford chapel was closed during the temporary illness of Rev. Stopford Brooke, because no one else could be found whom the congregation cared to hear. That there should be great choice in preachers, and that church-goers should have the right of selection, is obvious; but it is also obvious that any congregation, with associations accumulated around a common altar, ought to furnish a nucleus which, with or without the minister, summer or winter, ought to find delight in keeping the door of the church open, and the Sunday welcome warm to each other and to the stranger that may be passing.

Easter.

We like the expression Eternal Life better than everlasting life, because it suggests quality, rather than quantity. Continued existence is no great boon; mere deathlessness may be a horrible thing to contemplate: witness the “Wandering Jew”. The eternal life must be measured by intensity, rather than by duration. Continuation is an attribute, not the essence, of the Eternal Life. The Eternal Life is the life in love, in truth, in righteousness; it is immortal because these are indestructible. To find Eternal Life, one must needs clothe himself with law rather than take advantage of a miracle. One is saved by growth and not by a spasm. Character allies one to God. Love and helpfulness are the gateways to Heaven. We believe in the immortal life because we believe in eternal things. We shall be immortal so far as we impersonate eternal verities. We do not wish for a spiritual life that is smaller in its spiritual dimensions than the one we now enjoy. Here there is a chance for us to do a little towards making the ignorant wise, and the vicious gentle. Here Florence Nightingale, Dorothea Dix, were permitted to walk as angels of helpfulness, through long aisles of mangled humanity. Here Doctor Howe was permitted to open the prison bars that shut in the soul of Laura Bridgeman, and to enlarge the cell wherein the idiot dwelt. We do not want to go where there will be less patience for weakness, less love for the sinner, and less opportunity to exercise these virtues. We deny that Jesus moved into a narrow circle when he rent the fleshly veil, and escaped the persecutors on Calvary. We believe in the endless life, because we believe in the Eternal Life, the life unconditioned by time and space. Jesus helps us into this eternal life of love and goodness by his life more than his death. New Testament parables are worth more to us than New Testament miracles. The writings of Luther and Cromwell, the imperishable words of Milton and Wordsworth, are finer "intimations of immortality" to us than the incoherent utterances in Indian dialect that purport to come from a disembodied spirit, or the perishable writings of planchette. In those, rather than in these, do we find the inspiration that enables us to live with eternal things. Emerson says: "It is not my duty to prove immortality," but it is our duty to deserve immortality by living now as immortal beings. We know of nothing more pitiable than to see men and women begging for immortality, when they ought to be busy in trying to deserve it.

Such thoughts as these lead us to the Easter festival of universal religion. The bequest of all nations, rather than the gift of one,—it represents the irrepressible longings of the race. The thanksgivings of all nations ring in its carols. The triumphant life of Jesus and all his Christly comrades enrich its devotions; and Nature, the ever unfolding book of revelation in swelling bud, and bursting flower, in greening grass, and singing bird, puts Easter tributes in our hands, Easter joys in our hearts, and Easter confidences in our souls.

"The Things Most Commonly Believed To-day among us."

We think our old comrades who have been doing so much this last year to maim the Western Conference, have been trying in a wrong and hurtful way to get a right and helpful thing. The right and helpful thing is a choral affirmation of what Unitarians usually believe. The wrong and hurtful way is the attempt to secure this by resolving on a few doctrinal words to be understood as "essential" and binding on all who take the Unitarian name,—binding in the sense that, if one cannot with pure conscience use these words, he can be pointed to a Conference resolution and warned off as a dishonest intruder. This intention to require and exclude was plain from the outset,—in fact, warnings to begone were echoing widely before any resolution was proposed; but it has grown still plainer as discussion has gone on. A recent announcement, for instance, is that "a statement of the beliefs of a majority would not express what is fundamental and essential in Unitarianism"; so that there is no reason for "surprise that the proposal of such a statement was not satisfactory to the Christian-basis brethren at Cincinnati". It does not better the brethren's case to concentrate their demand on two or three words, almost universally accepted among us, and say, We only require the "general ideas" denoted by these words, without any definition or explanation of them. For this is still a requisition, a "Thou must believe"; so that the generous vagueness really lands us in that least intellectual, least religious, least availing, and most dangerous form of creed, a Shibboleth, i. e., a test of religious fellowship by words and sounds, instead of meanings. This is our old comrades' wrong and hurtful way of aiming at a right thing. And their wrong way had at last to be sternly faced and negatived at Cincinnati for the good of all concerned, themselves included.

But bar out the compulsion, bar out absolutely all intention to test by doctrines and to exclude, and their aim becomes—a choral affirmation of what Unitarians usually believe. Amen to that! That may be right and safe and helpful. If on careful thought it seem so, let us all join in it; and do this, not for their sake chiefly, whom it will not satisfy at present; and not for the sake of publishing the meagre claim that we are theists and are Christians—the world knows that; but for the sake of answering effectively what the world does not know and keeps on asking,—“What is it that Unitarians believe?” Let us do it as missionaries, speaking aloud and together so that at last the world can hear.

It was to this end that, last year at Cincinnati, the resolution proposing open fellowship, which was passed, was rounded out by our second resolution, offered in immediate connection with the first. We quote the words of both:—

“Resolved, That the Western Unitarian Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all who wish to join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world.

“Resolved, That while the above expressly represents the basis and width of our fellowship, and while the Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind itself or any single member by a declaration of doctrines, it yet thinks some practical good may be done by setting forth in simple words the things most commonly believed to-day among us, the statement being always open to re-statement, and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority: and that to this end a committee of five be appointed to draw up such a declaration of belief, to be submitted to the Conference at its next annual meeting.”

This second resolution no time was left us to discuss at Cincinnati, and it was rejected by a vote of 24 to 20. Better so than to have been passed by a bare majority. Not until most of us favor such a missionary declaration heartily, has the time come to make it. But had the resolution been heartily adopted there at Cincinnati, or rather, had the “declaration” been then and there submitted and heartily adopted, we believe, and the belief has grown stronger as the year has passed and we have met men east and west, that nearly all this year of trouble would have been avoided, that our friends would have had hardly an inch of ground on which to stand, had they withdrawn, and that the misrepresentations of the Conference would have carried their own refutation and condemned their makers. And we think that much of the “issue” trouble would soon disappear, were we to make such a declaration now.

Yet no wonder that that resolution was rejected. A Unitarian's natural first thought goes straight against all joint declarations of belief. All our traditions point the other way, and they rest upon well founded fears. Does not the history of every creed-bound body warn us? was it not creed-pressures that drove us from our own mother-church seventy years ago? and right in our midst, as this year shows, are not creed-dangers lurking still? All very true is this. And yet the other thing is so true, too,—that Unitarians have always been signally ineffective in missionary work, and that of this crippling one cause, at least, has been the people's difficulty in finding out “what Unitarianism means.” In truth, this chronic question among outsiders has been a chronic question with not a few insiders too, the old as well as young. “Enter into thy closet to pray,” said Jesus, but “preach ye on the housetops!” Through our individualism we have always preached in the closet, too. Seventy years of this; seventy necessary years, perhaps. But now as we enter our third generation of church-life, now as we near the new century, now when the Spirit is beginning to stir deeply in us to carry our glad tidings unto others, now the question is worth asking seriously, Must the old tradition always cling? Must Dr. Channing's word forever be the Unitarian's watchword,—“Remember that I speak in my own name and no other?” Is there no way in which we can unite in affirmations of our faith and at the same time avoid credal dangers? We believe there is a way, and that it was suggested in the double Cincinnati resolutions: (1) Open wide the Unitarian fellowship; make its basis purely and frankly ethical, not doctrinal,—thereby fulfilling the fathers' glory and the children's pride, that “Unitarians have no ‘creed’”; eliminate the last remnant of that Credo element; and (2) Then begin, all credal danger past, to pronounce together the great Credo common to our hearts and minds. (Credo means, “Believe thou must!” Credo means an “I believe”). Pronounce that Credo, taking care anew, in justice to reluctant voices and to the helpful differences among us, to enstructure in the very words we use the fact that we utter what binds none, not even those who speak it—nay, that a face-fact of faith with us is expectation that to-morrow's vision will be larger than to-day's.

We hope the Western Conference at its coming meeting may be willing to consider the right, the safety, the advantage of such a declaration. The right and safety and advantage of it. That the Conference has the right,—that the declaration, made in that way, infringes by no shadow's fall on the congregational and individual liberties we all must guard,—we tried to make clear in the last UNITY.

As to the safety of it,—what are credal dangers? (1) The spirit of exclusion; (2) limitation set to intellectual progress; (3) shibboleth and evasive double-meanings, when creeds are reduced to a single word or two. Try by these three tests the thing proposed. How does it exclude? Its whole spirit is that of welcome, and it specifically says, "binding on none." How can it limit progress? Its whole spirit is forward-looking, and it specifically says, "our thought to-day," and "ever open to revision." And how can it tempt towards shibboleth and double-meanings, when its whole spirit is liberty? Let any credalist try to use such a declaration as a coercive instrument, and it would not even be a boomerang,—it would be a lively cannon turning round on its own center to hurl liberty-clauses at the recreant and protect the one he aimed at! Such a declaration, joining ethical fellowship and faith, the world would rank, not among the "creeds", but among the charters of religious freedom.

And that would be one advantage of it. The devil is but an angel out of place—an angel usurping functions not its own. Every devil has potentialities of good in him. To utilize the devil is the secret of each advance in civilization,—some obstacle is converted into aid, some danger into safe-guard. So it is with this thing called "Creed". In all its Crede forms it is devil: eliminate the Crede principle, and lo, an angel stands before us called Credo, potent to serve and bless! She waits to serve and bless through us. We ought to speed her on the way. When it becomes safe to join in affirmations of belief, it becomes our duty—a duty that we owe the world. We Unitarians must somehow learn to give out our faith more generously.

The first good, then of such a declaration of faith as we propose, would be its missionary service. Not that any great result from it will startle us. Much more than a choral affirmation it takes to touch men deeply with our, or any, faith: yet people will hear that who never hear our closet whisperings. It will help more than many preachings, more than many tracts, to answer that chronic question with which our ears ache, "What do you believe"? And made in the way proposed, it would exhibit Unitarianism in its true shape and proportions, i. e., as more distinctively a method and a spirit in religion than a body of religious doctrines. "Here are our doctrines", it would say; "but great, inspiring as they are, we hold them in that way". By what other means could our method and our spirit be so effectively illustrated? And should our Western Conference next May resolve upon this act of faith, the notoriety—for shame or glory—that our Cincinnati resolution has given us would make the word a far more signal announcement of what Unitarianism stands for than any it was in our power to make a year ago. That widened missionary service would be reward for the hard year.

Greater yet the good of such a declaration to Unitarianism itself. (1) It would lift us to a higher spiritual plane to base our Unitarian fellowship, below sacred name or rite or doctrine, solely on the deep things of the Spirit,—truthfulness and righteousness and love; trusting the sincerity and warmth of our free worship to generate whatever other atmosphere we need to draw our own to us, and keep those not our own away. It would make our theism, noble now, of a still nobler type to make it free, to treat it as the belief inevitable, to trust it, unprotected by one "necessary" word, to the thousand words which our unceasing speech and life should give.—(2) It would develop a freer, better-working kind of Congregationalism among us. Under our distre-sing individualism, both majorities and minorities are suffering; the former lose their rightful place to act,—the latter, as this late experience shows, are not protected against dishonoring challenge. The plan proposed secures the rights of both; to the former the due opportunity for influence,—to the latter, freedom of dissent without disfellowship.—And (3) it would exorcise by one operation the twin superstitions of our Unitarian heart, the two devils of fear that have so long possessed us, hampering us in every work from the beginning. "What are the two?" We fear uncredal fellowship,—and equally we fear a creed. But what danger in that open fellowship proposed, if with it comes the choral Credo which most of us believe? and what danger in that choral Credo, if with it comes the opened fellowship? We do not wonder that some friends were frightened at the Cincinnati work,—for we did but half the deed. Suppose that we had done the other half alone, then frightened friends, instead of "Atheism!" would have cried out "Creed!" The secret lies in bravely driving both our devils out together. Until we rid ourselves of both, Unitarianism is doomed to remain the paralytic church that it has ever been. When we have rid ourselves of both, we shall have less time to talk about "the Unitarian opportunity", for we shall be using it more. We shall be in attitude to use it. This brings us round again to that "missionary" gain. We set a Pauline yearning and a Pauline method against a Petrine fear and Petrine method. We long for ten years of the self-reliant self-surrender to which that double declaration would commit us Unitarians,—long for ten years of those "dangers!"

The plan proposed has nothing new about it, except its frankness and its fullness. In principle it is the plan on which the National Unitarian Conference is now organized. The doctrinal position of the National Conference was intentionally indicated by its founders in a few phrases ("the Lord Jesus Christ", etc.) inset in its Constitution; and by the last article, added to the Constitution in 1882, these phrases are, as expressly, declared to "represent the opinions of the majority of our churches", and to be "no authoritative test of Unitarianism", and to be "not intended to exclude from our fellowship anyone who, while differing from us in belief, is in general sympathy with our purposes and practical aims". In other words, the National Conference tolerates, where the Western Conference, by its act at Cincinnati, welcomes; the National Conference lets in dissenters at a postern-gate broken through the wall, while we have one front gate for all. The National Conference seems to make the spiritual fellowship subordinate to doctrinal beliefs, while we (were the plan proposed to be adopted) would be far more communicative and helpful as to the doctrines, and yet would distinctly make them subordinate to the spiritual fellowship,—which, if we mistake not, is the way the two things rank in the Supreme Courts of Religion! But in principle the two Conferences would then be organized alike, each indicating Unitarian doctrinal belief, and each declaring that belief to be the belief of only a majority and not a test of Unitarianism and the Unitarian fellowship. Whatever objection would hold against us on this score, holds against the National Conference already. But if frankness, explicitness and rightly proportioned emphasis be objection, we would have to bear that reproach alone for awhile. It ought, in fairness to the National Conference, to be added that its position has been affected by historic circumstances from which the Western Conference is free.

"But it would be hard to frame a statement of beliefs satisfactory to most; or, if done, hard to keep it satisfactory without constant change." Not so hard, and no such frequent need of change, as possibly we think: for, if framed in the way proposed, there is no longer need of exacting the precise shape and shade of one's own thought. "To set forth in simple words the things most commonly believed to-day among us, the statement being always open to re-statement and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority,"—is the thing suggested. If we meet ready in heart to do that thing, the noblest of the statements offered would probably command a large assent; for we surely do think very much alike. Or it might be well to agree upon two quite variant statements and let the vote for each reveal the Conference mind: that published variance would again illustrate the spirit and the breadth of Unitarianism. As to the kind of statement, we think it should be no two-word or two-line claim that we believe in this or that, nor the three or four lines which we might naturally use for a church-covenant, but something that would answer with brief fullness that question of 'inquirers, "What do Unitarians believe?"' It should be an effective missionary tool.

In the last UNITY a change in the "fellowship" resolution passed at Cincinnati was proposed in the interest of an exacter justice—a change that would place that resolution by the side of the declaration concerning doctrines, under the "majority" preamble. In some form or other we hope the Conference may be willing at its next meeting to consider all afresh, appending without farther delay the declaration of belief. If it should not only consider, but with one heart and mind, or nearly with one mind, should approve the measure, we think that, within ten years, all around our churches, west, east and English, some uplift would be felt from it; that our Western Conference deed would prove an object-lesson both in faith and in the missionary business; that it would tend both to the spiritualizing and to the organizing of Unitarianism everywhere.

The consolidated resolutions, two or three minor changes being also made, might fall into some such form as this:

Resolved, that while the Western Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member by declarations concerning fellowship or doctrine, it yet thinks some practical good may be done by setting forth in simple words the things most commonly believed to-day among us,—the statement being always open to re-statement and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority.

Therefore, speaking in the spirit and understanding above set forth, we, delegates of the Western Unitarian churches in Conference assembled at Chicago, May—, 1887, declare our fellowship to be conditioned on no doctrinal tests, and welcome all who wish to join us to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world.

And, inasmuch as many people wish to know what Unitarianism stands for, we, speaking always in the spirit above set forth, make the following statement of its past history and our present faiths.

To which preamble the "statement" should be added. Should the Conference consider these suggestions, more than one such statement ought to be submitted to it. We may ask our readers' leave to print in another UNITY such a "statement" as it seems to us desirable to make.

W. C. G.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Twins.

"I BELIEVE" AND "THOU MUST BELIEVE."

"Credo," "Crede," were two brothers,
Scarce they knew themselves apart;
One in voice and one in feature,
One in thought and one in heart.

While the boys still played together
Credo ever took the lead,
But the lusty fellow masked it,—
All was "Credo's" word and deed.

Many a prank he led his brother,
Into many a cruel shame;
Was it banning, was it burning,
Credo smote in Credo's name.

Oft he made his brother victim,—
Credo stood at Crede's stake:
Still the burner wore the halo,—
All was done for Credo's sake!

Thus to manhood: then the Angel
Dawned in Credo's noble grace,
And the Devil slowly faded
Even in dark Crede's face.

Burning now was all in dogma;
Banning only barred the door;
Credo sailed as missionary,
Pleaded in revival lore.

Credo died among his heathen,
Saying with his latest breath,
"I am Credo, brother Crede,—
It is Credo's day of death!"

Credo spoke in thousand voices,
Credo blessed by myriad hands,
Credo's benedictions showered
Gospels over all the lands.

Science, listening half-averted,
Mindful of her blackened youth,
Found his music shaping for her
All her boldest dreams of Truth!

Art anew plied stone and canvas,
Left her old cathedral tower,
Soared in poems, swept in anthems,—
Credo taught her hour by hour.

Duty heard her two commandments
Blending into deeper one:
Credo sang it, "Love of Neighbor
Is the Love of God well done."

Lands they listened! Lands they echoed!
Credo's chant of faith out-rung,
Organing as mountain-valleys
Thunder praise with mountain-tongue!

W. C. G.

Retribution.

The excellent sermon on Retribution, by Rev. Arthur M. Judy, printed in UNITY of March 26, reminds me of a noteworthy characteristic of Theodore Parker, on whose whole ministry in Boston I was a punctual attendant. I never heard him pray for forgiveness, the pardon of sin, and never heard him teach that it should be prayed for or desired. Believing, with various Scripture writers, that God will deal with every man according to his works, whether good or evil, he took for granted that chastisement would certainly follow sin, and that the wrong-doer must necessarily suffer for every unrighteous thought, word or deed. But, believing also, with another Scripture writer, that the rod as well as the staff of the Heavenly Father is designed for the comfort and welfare of His human family, Parker taught that His chastisement for wrong-doing was to be welcomed with thankfulness as a benefit, not deprecated as if harmful. To this effect are the following extracts from the published volume of his "Prayers":

"Are we weak,—and we know we are,—give us strength; sinners,—and our heart cries out against us,—chastise and rebuke us until we repent of our sin."—Oct. 6, 1850.

"We remember the millions of our brothers whom our fathers chained, and whose fetters our wicked hands have riveted upon their limbs. O Lord, we pray thee that we may suffer from these our transgressions till we learn to eschew evil, to break the rod of the oppressor, and to let the oppressed go free."—Nov. 27, 1856.

"O Lord, we pray thee that we may suffer for all the wickedness that we commit, till we learn to turn off from the evil of our ways, and execute thy commandments, and follow after the righteousness which thou hast written in our heart. We pray thee that thou wilt chastise us in our property and in our lives, till we learn to put away from the midst of us the yoke of bondage."—Feb. 22, 1857.

"We remember our daily lives before thee, the wrong things which we have done, and the unholy thoughts and evil emotions which we have not only suffered in our hearts but cherished there. We pray thee that thou wilt chasten us for these things, and that we may suffer and smart therefor till we turn from every wrong."—Jan. 31, 1858.

"Father, we thank thee for any suffering which comes upon us for wrong doings, knowing that thereby thou recallest us from the evil of our ways, and would save our souls from suffering yet worse."—March 21, 1858.

The view thus given of the dealings of the Heavenly Father with his human creatures still seems to me, as it did thirty years ago, the view most honorable and therefore most reverential to Him. By this both his justice and his love are vindicated. Instead then of supplicating for pardon and mercy, let us welcome the chastening rod which proves to us, through all the experiences of life, that we are worse off for every indulgence in wrong-doing; let us thankfully adore the love which shows us in this life, and no doubt will continue to show us in the next, that welfare can be attained only by righteousness; and let us cling with confidence to that highest view of God's purpose and action which assumes that He can and will permanently gain the victory over every instance of human depravity and perversity, letting no soul escape evil until it ceases to choose and to do evil. C. K. W.

The Origin of Snow.

Written for the Study Section of the Fraternity of the Church of the Messiah, Chicago.

Long, long ago, I dare not say how long,—
Perhaps the age of which the poet sung
That even Father Time was gay and young
And not yet settled down
To systematic work in months and days,—
Juno and Jove sat in a shady place,
Whiling away their time in various ways
On Mount Olympus' crown.

When suddenly, before their wondering eyes,
There came a blooming youth, in mortal guise,
Who in his hand held like some precious prize
A box of Russia leather.

Jove did not know him; but it was, in truth,
He whom we call "Old Prob", then in his youth;
And then, as now, his thoughts and words, forsooth,
Were all about the weather.

"Pedlars and agents are not wanted here!"
Said Jove; his tones were terrible to hear,
And Juno, though she tried to look severe,
Enjoyed the fun the while.

But young Prob stood before the astonished pair,
Serene as one who knew not fear nor care;
Tho' Jove began an awful frown to wear,
And Juno would not smile.

"Your Majesty", calmly responded he,
Producing as he spoke a silver key,
"I've something here that you may like to see,
"Although my own invention.
"Thro' many an anxious day and sleepless night
"I've labored, all unconscious of their flight,
"And the result I claim, is worthy quite
"Your Majesty's attention."

As thus he spoke, raising the box to view,
He turned the key, and up the cover flew;
Then with his breath a sudden puff he blew.
Before their wondering eyes
A flock of feathery flakelets, white and fair,
Whirled from the box and fluttered through the air,
Hither and thither, floating everywhere
Like white-winged butterflies.

They decked each tree and bush with blossoms white;
They fell on Juno's hair all glistening bright;
When she would catch them, vanishing from sight
In her white hand so warm.
She clapped her hands, and laughed aloud in glee,
And Jove forgot his wrath, and smiled to see
Her merry mood, while noting carefully
Each crystal's perfect form.

Then Juno took a handful from the ground
And shaped it to a ball, smooth, white and round,

And dropping Jove a courtesy profound
She turned with childlike pleasure
Where groups of goddesses her coming wait,
To show the wonder, and the tale relate.
Young Prob with Jove was thus left tête-à-tête
To urge his cause at leisure.

All that between them passed I must not tell;
Jove questioned much, and the youth answered well;
And tho' night's shadowy curtain round them fell,
And Juno was complaining,
Still in low tones went on their earnest chat
On the effect of this—the cause of that—
Till morning came, and there the two still sat,
Expounding and explaining.

They could not leave the fascinating theme
Till Prob related every darling dream,
From glacial epoch to vanilla cream,
And the toboggan slide.
He solved each knotty problem o'er and o'er,
And proved each step with scientific lore;
Probed every difficulty to the core
Till Jove was satisfied.

At last he rose—"I make but one request;
"Give me yon world, that I may try my best
"With practical experiment and test"

He cried with eager face.
Then Jove looked up, and, as it chanced, his eye
Fell on a bright young planet whirling by,
Fresh from the mint, and whizzing thro' the sky
To its appointed place.

"Granted," said Jove—"it's yours for good or ill.
"Mix up your snow, and scatter it at will.
"Here's rain, cold, wind and clouds, just take your fill,
"A million years from now
"Please call again, and your success report;
"If all goes well—your fortune's made, in short."
And Prob retired from the monarch's court
With many a grateful bow.

Did he succeed? Why, if you think so, yes.
So much depends on what you call success.
What pleases some, to others brings distress.

Then, too, we know not whether
The million years have passed. But this we know;
Taking the seasons as they come and go,
With frost and sunshine, wind, rain, hail and snow,
We get queer things in weather.

R. P. U.

Comfort.

Blessed be Nature's recuperative forces, stored in her beauty of sky and wood and river and meadow and wayside flower!—
in the very chemistry of her soil! And blessed be hard work!
It is that which saves and "comforts" us.

We are always surrounded by beauty, by helpfulness, by "comfort", if we but open our eyes! We do not need to soar for any of these, nor dive for any of them. We shall find them if we look about us near to. God's quiet, eternal stars are reflected, ever, in the river that runs by our doors.
The very God-life is in the throbbing, warm caresses of our children's hands and lips, and gleams in our mothers' smiles!

When once we begin aright to recognize that we,—all of us,—individually,—not a few high souls only over the world,— are capable of soul-perceptions, capable of thought-flashes, and helpfulnesses, which are direct gleams, always, in our souls, from out of the universal soul,—then shall we gladly disburden our lives of much of their "hoarded treasures of old rubbish", and be, thenceforth, free, serene, "comforted", forevermore. And strong, also.

We seek, too much, mere emotional drugs of being. There is such a thing as Heroic Bearing. And of a surety, in the very act of the self-striving, if done with the high, pure, purposeful intent of becoming a true, soulful conqueror under the universe's divine methods of operation, the loftiest heights of human peace, of human greatness, yes, of human-divine blessedness, become ours. Self-reliance links us to the strong forces of the worlds; to the developing energies of the spheres,—which forever work on as a Mighty Will.

"Strong and wise thou canst not be, Knowing naught of agony"—

nor yet if the lingering, frequent-coming, corroding obstacles and griefs of life be not led by us as captivity captive.

JAMES H. WEST.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Deaf-Mutes.

EDITOR OF UNITY—I see in a recent issue of UNITY a request for information regarding the deaf-mute schools in Chicago. Prof. P. A. Emery, 43 South May street, near Madison, is the principal of these schools in the city. There are schools for these people in every part of the city. By addressing Professor Emery as above, your correspondent will receive the desired information.

Respectfully yours,

W. S. WELLER.

Chicago, March 23, 1887.

"Blessed be Drudgery."

EDITOR OF UNITY:—One of your UNITY leaflets, by W. C. Gannett, has the heading "Blessed be Drudgery"—a good title to a good leaflet. I mean not a fairly good one, but one of the very best. It is short, but gold is less bulky than common rock. It is full of strength and wisdom, full of grace and wit and common sense. I wish a million of those leaflets could float away on the wings of the wind, as I used to see the elm leaves wafted freely and far from the great elms in my native New England. Far away in my early boyhood were those days when I lay on the grass, looking up into the lofty and wide-spread foliage and wondering how far those "elm blows" would float; but before taking time for this dreamy luxury all my blessed drudgery was first done,—the garden was hoed, the wood sawed, the wood-box filled, the water supply cared for, all the tasks and chores finished, and that finishing made the dreamy hour on the grass a boy's luxury. Blessed be the memory of the good father and mother who always trained me to do my work well and on time.

I call to mind the year spent as clerk in a large hardware store. Work and care were constant. Toil and moil among iron and steel and piles of heavy goods, book-keeping, and no end to the constant duties. Sometimes it seemed hard, yet I knew my employers were never unkind. I was only under a thorough training. Now, after a half century, I can say: Blessed be their memory! Habits of persistent and courageous industry, of order and system and promptness, formed or strengthened then, have made the labors of life easier, the joys of life sweeter, than would have been possible otherwise.

I am not going to write a dissertation, but only to call attention to what Mr. Gannett has said so well on the discipline of work and its high importance in forming character. To muster out work and not let it waste us, to do the drudgery of body and brain, yet not be drudges, to feel that culture comes of labor and not from idle dreams, that high thinking comes of plain living more than from luxurious ease, is the aim and idea. Let everybody, especially all the young folks so unfortunate as to have been "born with al gold spoon in their mouths", get this leaflet and read it thoughtfully.

Yours truly,

G. B. STEBBINS.

Detroit, Mich., March 14, 1887.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Progress from Poverty. By Giles B. Stebbins. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 25 cents.

This volume is little in size, for it covers only 64 small pages, but large in thought and effective logic. As an answer to Henry George's two works—"Progress and Poverty", and "Protection or Free Trade"—this performance has many claims upon the reading public, being short, timely, interesting, instructive, courteous, very fair, and powerful in argument. Several other reviews and criticisms of Mr. George's remarkable position on the land question have been published, yet not one has pointed out, as this one does, the great wrong and harm inextricably interwoven with his system—that is, its inherent tendency to place on the road to despair all who accept his opinions as true, with all the consequences which follow from desperation. The writings of Henry George cannot fail to cultivate a fierce discontent, bitterness and resentment of mind, distaste for steady industry, impatience with the slow gains of self-denial and economy, and a spirit of wrath and revenge, leading straight on to strikes, idleness, suffering, and acts of violence. A book with such evil influences cannot possibly be endowed with correct principles. Nothing worse can befall a man than to lose hope in the efficacy of his efforts. Perhaps it is for this reason that nature abounds with evidences of hope. The sun disappears only to rise in the morn; wintry death is succeeded by the rejuvenance of spring; the grave of the acorn becomes the cradle of the oak; the rainbow spans the skies with a joyous sign; and all the realms of phenomena are aglow with bright promises. It is thus with history also. Religious persecution was the badge of recent ages; now, at least in this country, there is perfect tolerance; serfdom has gradually eventuated in freedom; the houses without chimneys or windows have developed into abodes of comfort, where even the poor enjoy what was once beyond the reach of wealthy ancestors; the day's labor which, at the start of this century, was from sunrise to sunset, has dropped to ten, nine, and even eight hours. This radical idea of progress from poverty—this idea of an increasing betterment in the condition of society—is presented by Mr. Stebbins in many forms of argument and illustration, to prove that the facts deny Mr. George's theory of progress toward poverty. As adverse evidence is piled upon adverse evidence, until the array becomes formidable and then overwhelming, the reader is forced to the conclusion that Mr. George has built his hypothetical system upon a parcel of bold assumptions which have no support in experimental circumstances; and that he is only a closet-thinker—one who ranges through his mind and his library for his general propositions, without testing their accuracy by actual measurement with the outcome of long experience, or going out into the world of occurrences to make comparison with certainty. Mr. Stebbins shows very clearly that wages are not falling, but rising; that the tendency throughout the United States is, on the average, to decrease, not to enlarge, the size of the holdings of land; that wages are not high where land is low, but high where and is high, man and land thus increasing in value together; that advance in wages is not concurrent with advance in interest; and that capital is not produced by muscular labor alone, but still more by the directing power of mind, conjoined with industry, invention, self-denial, economy, and wise laws—all of which proofs flatly contradict Mr. George. It is also shown that the latter, in attributing poverty to private ownership of land, has left out of the problem some radical and indispensable factors, as drink, tobacco, gambling, and other costly vices, the expenditure upon which, if saved and applied to the betterment of workingmen, would suffice, in a few years, to raise them to a level of comfort never before attained, and at length enable them to own their homes and to be comparatively independent; all, too, in the presence of the two so-called robber systems—private land ownership and tariff protection—which are made responsible for the poverty of the manual toilers.

The second chapter of the work is devoted to a refutation of sundry assertions in Mr. George's "Protection or Free Trade." It is scarcely necessary to say that Mr. Stebbins, in that department of criticism, is an expert of eminence. For many years he has been engaged in studying all the various phases of the tariff question; he has often discussed the subject by tongue as well as pen; he is recognized as an authority; he is actuated by conscientious motives; and he would not stoop to misrepresent an opponent. Henry George never had a fairer reviewer; so, if he gets knocked down repeatedly by heavy blows from the logical clubs, fact and experience, he will have to attribute his discomfiture to his superficial statements and to his unfounded assumptions.

This little book deserves, and, be it hoped, will have a wide circulation and reading; for it is destined to carry enlightenment,—therefore to accomplish good, wherever it may go.

D. H. M.

Hints on Writing and Speech-Making. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co., 134 and 136 Wabash avenue.

This little book of 70 pages contains two articles by Mr. Higginson, one being "A Letter to a Young Contributor", from the Atlantic Monthly, and the other, "Hints on Speech-Making", from Harper's Magazine. It is needless to say that both are treated with the author's own lively directness; both also contain wise and useful counsel. The following are good sayings from the first essay: "Goethe says that if a person once does a good thing, society forms a league to prevent his doing another. His seclusion is gone, and therefore his unconsciousness and his leisure; luxuries tempt him from his frugality, and soon he must toil for luxuries; then, because he has done one thing well, he is urged to squander himself and do a thousand things ill." "Above all, do not seek to encourage yourself by dwelling on the defects of your rivals; strength comes only from what is above you." "To-day is a king in disguise, and this American literature of ours will be just as classic a thing, if we do our part, as any which the past has treasured." Regarding compactness of style Mr. Higginson gives the advice,—“Be noble both in the affluence and the economy of your diction; spare no wealth that you can put in, and tolerate no superfluity that can be struck out. Remember the Lacedemonian who was fined for saying that in three words which might as well have been expressed in two.” We quote this in order to show that a skillful writer may offend by carelessness against his own rules. For the author has this sentence,—“Wendell Phillips rarely made special preparation; his accumulated store of points and illustrations was so inexhaustible that he did not need to do anything more than simply draw upon it when the time came.” The italics are ours. We think they mark careless English. Here are twelve words which could be reduced to five, thus: he needed only to draw; or, if the author would think this not quite inclusive of all his meaning, he could reduce his phrase to eight words, thus: he needed no more than simply to draw. Mr. Higginson's style is very easy and bright, but he is far from taking the care needful to be an example of his own rule to “tolerate no superfluity.” Nevertheless it is a good rule, and should be heeded more than it is; for whatever heeds it not is loose writing.

Foes of Her Household. By Amanda M. Douglas. Boston: Lee & Shepard. $1.50.

Forced Acquaintances: A Book for Girls. By Edith Robinson. Boston: Ticknor & Co. $1.50.

"Foes of Her Household" is a rather tame account of the vicissitudes of "sweet simplicity" among the unfriendly relatives of her dead husband. Supposed to be a mercenary adventuress and a supplanter, she nevertheless succeeds in conquering all hearts by the "might of gentleness", and finally marries her young husband's favorite brother, thus restoring the property to the rightful heirs. There are many girls who have found in the cheery, wholesome atmosphere of this writer's former books an inspiration toward nobility of purpose in the homely routine of ordinary life, sufficiently helpful to outweigh the artistic shortcomings and inaccuracies. These will be likely to read the new book for the sake of the old favorites.

Of the same class, from perhaps a more original, though a less practiced pen, is "Forced Acquaintances", by Edith Robinson, which is a bright and interesting little story, with sufficient charm to make palatable the very wholesome moral of mutual forbearance between the members of one family. There are, moreover, some clever passages and quaint turns of phrase; and some others which are startlingly bad, as in the first page, where Doctor Ware is introduced "wringing out the last dish-towel with his handsome, physician hands".

S.

Sonnets in Shadow. By Arlo Bates. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

There are thirty-nine sonnets in this little volume, exclusive of the introductory and closing pieces, of which there are four, and all express phases of a personal grief. Naturally, little of literary value would be expected in such a collection; but Mr. Bates has given some lines, if not one sonnets, here, which are equal to the best of current productions of minor verse-makers. There is, often, in these pieces a freshness and aptness of figure quite striking, while the variety of illustration and of sentiment which marks the forty-three productions is very pleasing. One is occasionally reminded of Job in reading the speculative passages, though the reflections are all natural, and not in any sense quoted. Some parts of the sonnets are strained in expression, and there are some false rhymes; nevertheless, as already intimated, the collection is respectable for a group of verses expressive of personal sorrow. The sonnets are dedicated to "H. L. V. B."—the wife of Mr. Bates, who died a year ago last winter.

E. R. C.

The Will Power: Its Range in Action. By J. Milner Fothergill, M.D. New York: James Pott & Co., 14-16 Astor Place.

This is a thoroughly edifying book. We use the word advisedly,—edifying, building up. No one can read these chapters on "The Will in Relation to the Inherited Character", "The Will in Relation to Self-culture", "Will and Circumstance", "The Will Fight", "The Will in Disease", without being instructed, warned, incited and inspired. The style is easy and clear. There is abundance of illustration by fact and fancy. The tendency of the book is to show the supremacy of character not only over all persons, but over everything that is called circumstance—a salutary lesson. 184 pages.

English Synonyms Discriminated. By Richard Whately, D.D. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co.

No one need be urged to think a book of this kind useful, who thinks that clearness of thought and clearness of expression are useful, and that the latter helps the former. Whately's little work has been revised by the present editor. Pages 179, with classified table of contents and with verbal index of 7 pages in double columns. The index shows that over 600 words are delicately compared and distinguished as to signification. Nicety of words is no mean delicacy, and a critical study of them a good drill in exactness.

Two little leaflets for the Easter season have been issued by D. Lothrop Company. One, "Easter Lilies", price 35 cents, is a collection of Bible texts, prepared by Mrs. E. R. Fairchild, who, both in her preface and in her selections, seems to us to lay undue stress upon the resurrection of the body. The other, "Sunshine", price 50 cents, by Katherine Lee Bates, is a charmingly written poem, with a number of illustrations, in which the wild flowers and sunshine play their part in driving away the bad temper of a little lass who had hidden away in the grass in a fit of sulks.

UNITY CHURCH DOOR PULPIT.

The True Voice.

A SERMON PREACHED BEFORE UNITY CHURCH, ST. PAUL, BY THE PASTOR, REV. S. M. CROTHERS.

Published by the Congregation.

"His sheep follow him, for they know his voice; but a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him; for they know not the voice of strangers."—JOHN x, 4, 5.

Every message which comes to us involves three elements—the thought, the words by which it is expressed, and the tone in which it is uttered. We often take for granted that the thought is the only essential thing, and that it makes little difference how it is uttered, or by whom. But practically, we find that even the division lines between sects and parties do not always follow the line of cleavage indicated by logic. Fully as often the difference is in the method of expressing a common thought. There are words, hallowed by long association, to which we cling even after the original meaning has been forgotten. And people using the same form of words are attracted to each other, just as are people who speak one native language.

But when there is a similarity in thought and language, there still remains another element of attraction or repulsion: it is the tone in which the thought is uttered. Children learn the meaning of tones before they learn that of words. What is said they may not understand; how it is said they feel quickly. One tone means joy, another grief, another anger. Even animals understand this. The sheep, says Jesus, recognize the voice of their own shepherd, and obey it. The voice of a stranger they will not obey, though he speak never so wisely, simply because it is a strange voice. The tones do not express metaphysical distinctions and abstractions, but they do express the emotions of the heart. The intellect speaks in a language which must be with difficulty learned, but the heart utters itself in the primal language which has outlived all confusion of tongues. Indeed, speech is the least flexible medium for the expression of emotion. The inarticulate cry sufficiently expresses surprise, grief and passion; and pure aspiration breathes not in words, but the tones of music.

Now if religion be not simply an apprehension of the intellect, but is supremely a matter of the heart, it follows that it will be recognized more quickly and infallibly by its tone than by its words. We shall know it as we know the voice of a friend. And it is thus that we do continually recognize it. We hear men talking together. We hear one voice, harsh, irreverent, arrogant, and we say, There speaks an irreligious man. His voice sounds discordantly among the many voices that are in the world. Here is a soul that has not been attuned to the harmonies of the universe. We hear the voice of another and may not know what he is saying. But what-ever he is saying, he is saying it modestly, and reverently, as if in the presence of something greater than himself; he is saying it manfully, with that earnestness which comes from personal conviction; he is saying it with all kindness, believing it to be for the good of those who hear him. It needs no analysis of his thought to tell us that that man is speaking religiously, for he speaks as becomes a true man and a servant of the Most High. We recognize the difference just as we recognize the difference between discord and harmony. The one is a stranger's voice, the other is the voice of a friend. He speaks our mother tongue, and our hearts burn within us as we listen.

That is the way great religions have grown up around teachers sent from God. Religious sects have divided and sub-divided over points of doctrine, and over verbal quibbles; but the religious spirit has only been awakened by the living voice. At the Master's voice it arises, and follows, that it may hear again.

"I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness", said John the Baptist. And Jesus, coming after, was also recognized by his voice. He spoke, men said, with authority.

We often talk of the "essential truth" of religion as if we could find it and preserve it in some form of words; as if it were the residuum left when all personal qualities are abstracted. But the most essential truth can not thus be found: it is an element of personality. We ask what is religious truth, but we cannot understand it apart from a religious soul. There have been men so sincere that it was impossible for them to produce an absolutely false impression. Their mental limitations colored the light of truth, but could not shut it out. Through myth and fable, and outgrown theory the eternal verities shine, as in cathedral windows the blessed sunshine streams through the pictured faces of saints. And on the other hand there are those who can not repeat any form of sound words, without robbing it of its vitality, and "turning the truth of God into a lie".

"Now, consider the bearing of all this on the question of truth-telling. We often talk about speaking the truth as if it were a very common-place achievement; and people whose habitual talk is flippant and thoughtless pride themselves upon being truth-tellers.

How often we hear an arrogant voice passing judgment on questions which have perplexed sages: "I cherish no illusions", the man says, "I waste no time in meditation. I indulge in no poetry. I simply speak the plain, unvarnished truth." Ah, good friend, are you sure of that? If you can do that which you claim, you are worthy of all reverence; for it is not often in this world of chaotic thought and still more chaotic speech that one attains to that. Only now and then in ages is there a voice of such full compass that it can speak more than the smallest fragment of the truth. Seldom is there one so free from prejudice as to be able with perfect plainness to describe a fact as it is. But if you think that in that tone of arrogance you are speaking truth, you deceive yourself. We read of sacred oracles issuing from the mouths of beasts, from whispering trees or hollow rocks; but never did the word of the Eternal find fit utterance through the lips of shallow self-conceit.

Consider what it is to speak the truth. It is through our words to give some veritable representation of a reality. Not every fact can be represented by speech. As no picture can represent all the qualities of an object, so no words can give a complete reproduction of any fact. But what the artist attempts to do upon the canvas, the truth-teller tries to do by the use of words.

Do you not see what a wonderful thing this is, and how far short the best endeavors must fall? But what shall we say of one who, not realizing the difficulty of it, attempts in a few hasty words to declare the final truth in regard to anything? Shall we not think of him as we would of one who, with no knowledge of color or perspective, should attempt to paint a picture of a sunset. We would say, "Friend, if those splashes of paint represent to you a sunset, rest in peace and admire your work to your heart's content. Only because I do not enjoy your work do not say that I do not enjoy the beauties of nature."

So when any one tells me what he thinks about God and man and the world he is simply showing me the picture which he has made of these realities. And how inadequate all those word pictures are, to which we are often called to give the reverence which is only due to the things they are intended to represent. How grotesque often are the outlines; how crude the coloring; how absurdly wanting in perspective.

When the arrogant dogmatist brings out his elaborate articles of faith, or the arrogant skeptic parades his latest denials, the effect is the same. That which they call "The Truth" falls short of the reality which we have felt. After we have listened to their definitions we have to answer, "Is that all? That mechanical creature which you have described you say is man? Was it a man then who wrote the Iliad, or built cathedrals, or prayed to God, or died for his fellows? You give us your definition of God and what He can and what He can not do. Ah well, the word-builders may be forgiven for their poor imagery when we know how long He has borne with the clumsy similitudes of the stone-cutters! But if the God who made heaven and earth is no greater than your thought of Him, it is passing strange that men should have ever dreamed of worshipping Him."

But no! when from the inspiration which comes from a direct outlook upon nature, or a direct contact with the Divine Spirit, we come back to our books, our sermons or our speculations, and are conscious of a sudden chill and disappointment, let us not be deceived.

Last summer the forest was wonderful in its dark beauty and you were strangely touched by it. To-day your friend shows you a picture of that scene which he painted on the spot. But the picture does not impress you as being cool or restful or in any degree lovely. Do you say, How mistaken I was in that forest scene? Do you not rather say to yourself—I remember the spot which this picture is supposed to represent, and it misrepresents it. It is not a true picture.

So when in our deepest experiences we become conscious of realities which transcend our definitions and elude the analysis of our science, let us not deny the felt reality, but rather say, We have felt the influence of facts for which we have yet found no fit utterance.

All speech must be inadequate to express the full realities; but we can at least make it suggestive and symbolic of the reality. The test is that our words shall, at least in some faint degree, produce the same impression as the facts for which they stand. To do this is to speak truly. Need I say that to attain to this in any way is the work of a life-time. The voice of the truth-teller must have in it no trace of self-sufficiency, or it will misrepresent the truth it would declare. Tennyson describes the growth which is in grace as well as in knowledge:

"One indeed I knew
In many a subtle question versed
Who struck a jarring chord at first
But ever sought to make it true.
Perplexed in faith but pure in deeds
At length he beat his music out."

The first expression of an independent opinion is apt to strike a jarring chord. The individual word does not harmonize with the universal consciousness. Hence come all manner of schisms and misunderstandings. It is not enough that the new word stands for a fact which can be demonstrated. It must be spoken truly.

We sometimes wonder at a certain conservative instinct among those most naturally religious. They are repelled by novelties and say, "Tell us the old, old story".

In part this may be a weakness, but in part the instinct is one which has its justification. In the old, old, story there is likely to be a quality which is not to be found in the latest statement of opinion. No doctrine can pass through believing souls, and be uttered, generation after generation, by believing lips without coming to have in its expression a certain truth—truth not necessarily to the external fact, but to the nature and needs of those who utter it. Even the harshest doctrines thus come to have a certain tenderness and sacredness; even "as the trees that whisper round a temple soon become dear as that temple's self".

And so to the fervent apostle of some new idea which he is sure is the gospel the world needs, we can only say, "If you believe it proclaim it, with all the earnestness that is in you; but if the world is slow to accept it do not blame the world too much. For the world is old, and has heard many voices as confident as yours, which have come to nothing. Your voice is that of a stranger, your first work is to make it the voice of a friend. Go preach your gospel to every creature; if it can not be thus preached and is fitted only for some circle of the initiated, you may be sure that it is not so important as you had thought. Tell it to the young and hot-blooded and see how strong it is for guidance or restraint; tell it to little children and see if it harmonizes with their pure instincts; tell it to the sick and dying and see how much of comfort there is in it; tell it to the poor and the struggling and see if it is indeed tidings of great joy to them. When all this has been done, and the false glitter of novelty has worn off, and your word has become in its turn an old, old story, you will be able to estimate in some measure its spiritual worth.

There are in the world many kinds of voices: there are sacred voices, reverent, earnest, hopeful; and there are profane voices, harsh, scoffing, cynical. It is for the sacred voices that we listen. It is not enough to say that truth is mighty and will prevail. Much depends on how it is spoken and by whom.

All about us are young minds opening to the facts of the world. In some shape these facts will present themselves—but who will be the interpreters? Shall it be a revelation of life, of joy, of God, or only a fatal knowledge of good and evil? Shall the truth be learned from the sacred voices of parents and friends and trusted teachers, or shall they be left to hear it from the profane and strange voices? How much of impiety and impurity arises because those who could speak most wisely are silent upon so many of the most vital questions. The boy learns some things from those whom he reverences; and these things always seem holy and beautiful. Other facts he is allowed to learn from the unclean lips of those whom he meets upon the street, and these seem to belong to a lower world, casting discredit on all with which they are connected. The positive side of religion he learns at home and in the church. The elements which might inspire doubts are concealed. Do you wonder that when these doubtful elements are forced upon his attention he is apt to cast the credible things aside also? Happy is he who hears all that concerns him through the same friendly medium, who hears the same voice speaking of the care of the soul and the body; who hears the same voice which proclaims the realities of faith, pointing out also the necessary limits to our knowledge: then does Truth not appear divided against itself, but stands all pure and radiant in seamless robe.

There are those who shrink from the responsibility of religious instruction because of their consciousness of their own liability to error. They fear to teach what must afterwards perhaps be painfully unlearned.

But there is a truth of tone and of temper which may belong to one who makes no pretensions to infallibility. What you teach may be discredited, but how you teach can never be a thing of little import. Your words may be forgotten, your thought may be outgrown, but rest assured that the sincerity and earnestness which you may have manifested will remain a harmonizing, inspiring influence through the future years. A modern scholar, who has passed from Romanism to the extreme of rationalism, tells us how still he is influenced by his early teaching, and compares it to the legendary city which was swallowed up by the waves, but whose church bells were still heard, after many years, ringing in sweet melody beneath the waters.

It is no narrow duty, then; this of the right utterance of our heart's belief. To express our belief arrogantly, is to clothe it in the tawdry garments of our own self-conceit; to express it controversially is to arm it with sword and dagger, and so send it against our neighbor. No wonder that he repulses it. The hidden truth we saw and loved is not what arouses his antagonism, for he only sees our vulgar caricature of it.

Our work is not simply to find truth, but also to speak it in love and simplicity. To rid ourselves of our prejudices and our personal affectations, to cultivate our sense of spiritual harmony, to learn the meekness of wisdom—this is our first essential. Only when our faith has worked by love and purified our souls, will it harmonize with what is best in our neighbor's soul, and be recognized for what it is. ●

LAST month's issue of Shakespeariana, the one periodical devoted exclusively to topics connected with Shakespeare, has for the leading article "Portia and the Office of Woman in the Serious Comedies." Other articles continue the series on the editors of Shakespeare, and the department called the "School of Shakespeare". This number contains a course of historical reading in Richard II. The usual departments of Shakespeare societies, the drama, reviews and miscellanies are presented. Philadelphia: the Leonard Scott Publication Co.

THE HOME.

Easter Bells.

Easter bells are gaily ringing,
Life pervades the air;
Children's voices, sweetly singing,
Banish thoughts of care.

The bird on the bough is chanting away,
The sun bids the flowers arise to the day;
Tho' dark my winter may be,
The sunshine will come to me.
Bright Easter bells joyously ring,
A precious hope ye bring!

All that's true and all that's noble,
All that is divine,
Shall above decay forever
Rise, and live, and shine,
The flowers lift their heads from long winter sleep,
Their graves have no terrors, tho' gloomy and deep.
Ah, why should mortal then fear?
Our maker, our God is near.
We'll burst the bonds of our night,
And dwell in the blessed light.

AUBERTINE WOODWARD.
(AUBER FORESTIER.)

Madison, Wis.

Three Seeds.

One furious gust of wind on that boisterous and unrelenting day in October, wrested three remaining seeds from the tip of the last head of Scarlet Caccalia in the garden, and sent them frisking off into the open lot adjoining. That was a blithe moment for them. Ripened and fully fledged for flight, they had only waited the sufficient force to tear them from their parent stem, and start them on a mission of their own. They were like three hearty young people going out into life for the first time, conscious of capacities developed ready for use, and longing for the unfolding of new ones. The children, who loved to visit the garden, had been fond of "poor pussying" the feathery tops of "Flora's paint brushes," while they were still firm and well closed in by the parental calyx. Perhaps it was something in the touch of little fingers which caused the plummy wings of these three to cling so closely together that they sailed through the air without separating. Down they came at last, caught by a whirling leaf, and settled rather suddenly into a convenient jog not far from the cart path running through the open space. Then the dust whirled in on them, while another leaf fluttered down, making them a nice warm blanket, and so they fell asleep.

Near the last of the next April they began to waken, and sleepily whispered to each other as an occasional impulse seized them to stretch and make ready to bestir themselves. They could not, so easily as we can, jump out of bed and slip from their night-dress into the clothing for the day. Their sleep had been longer and the waking must be more gradual. It would take a regular tug to get out of that bit of a brown night-dress. Not a vestige remained of the flimsy wings that had helped them to fly so far away from their old home. Neither the wings nor the wind could help them now. If they went into the world again away from their cozy nook, it must be by other helps; by the stirring of new instincts within them. If they were to grow they must strike both ways; they must reach downward and cling fast, if they would aspire upward and live outward.

Said No. 1, "I'm longing to be off. How can we do it?" No. 2, "Let's stay here. I'm comfortable." No. 3, "My jacket is so tight I believe I shall have to tear it to get out of it. But get out of it I must or I shall suffocate!" and with a push and a squeeze, open came the jacket. The little seed had just drawn a long breath of relief, when, crash! What had happened? This open lot was a sort of thoroughfare for carts, cows, small boys and girls, etc., and a cart load of stone in passing through had got a little way out of its track. The thing which had happened was that a stone had rolled from the cart and landed directly on the spot where the three seeds lay awakening. "Something has killed me," moaned No. 1. "I'm so shocked and frightened I never can get over it. Yes, let's stay here." "I told you so," sighed No. 2 faintly, "We'd better stay where we're comfortable," and she went to sleep again, but somehow,—never woke up.

No. 3, having just burst her jacket, felt the crash more than either of the others. But she had also just known the joy of a full, long breath of freedom; she had inhaled the fragrance and felt the warm loving touch of the good All-Mother Earth, so she sooner recovered herself than they, and answered, "But I wasn't comfortable staying here; I think I must go and find out what it was that frightened us so." Only No. 1 remonstrated, for No. 2 was asleep. "I haven't the least idea how I can go, nor how I can find out," she continued, "but now that my jacket is open I can reach out and feel around here. Perhaps I shall find something by-and-by. It smells nice and fresh out here, although it is all dark,—why don't you get out of your jacket, too?" "Oh, dear, don't speak of it!" quivered No. 1, as she shrunk up closer into herself, folding her little brown wrap so snugly that it was all wrinkled; and then she too went to sleep and didn't wake again.

Later in the summer a brother and sister were walking through the lot and sat down to rest near by. "See what a strong, hardy bunch of paint-brushes," said Florence. "The seeds must have blown over from that garden, and then this big branch has got lodged over the place and kept the cows from nipping the leaves. It is ever so much more thrifty and firmly rooted than those in our garden. They most always have such little roots for their big leaves that the plant gets all loose and torn up by the wind." "Let's pull away the brush," said Dan, "and get at it. Just look here! They are growing up all around this stone, and such big, full blossoms! I wonder if the stone made them root better. We can try it next spring. I'd like to know how many seeds there were in all." "We'll pick your little scarlet brushes, my dear, and show them to their cousins in our garden, so they will want to grow as fine as you another summer." "Clear the track!" sang Dan. "Here comes a new installment of underbrush to save them till we come again."

E. T. L.

It is from out of our direst consternations bravely met and well lived through, that the fairest blooms of our heart's Easter come.

Evening Calm in Early Spring.

There is a calm which steals upon the heart
As fade the beams of daylight in the west.
The cares of day with its last rays depart,
And peaceful twilight settles in the breast.

There is a voice then speaking of the past
In tones like far-off music to our ears;
To bring the sigh, the shade of sadness cast,
While yet he feels a happiness who hears.

The stars peer forth and look with chilling gaze
From underneath the eyebrows of a cloud.
Beneath, a darker cloud, which hides all rays,
Hangs from the mountain's shoulders like a shroud.

And, gleaming through the softened evening shade,
A raft of moonlight lies along the stream.
Which feels the kiss of gust, then, half afraid,
The dimpling waters light with merry gleam.

While checkered shadows limn our lonely way,
Glow at the setting sun each treetop's crest.
And skies that lowered at the close of day
Light with glad thought, and gleam along the west.

J. N. Eno.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD

Pacific Coast.—Rev. Charles W. Wendte is visiting Southern California in the interests of our cause, and arranging for increased missionary effort in that quarter. He reports that Rev. B. F. McDaniel is preaching to overflowing congregations at San Diego, and a new or an enlarged church edifice is imminent. A fine deposit of coal has been found near the city, and Lower California is being opened up for settlement, assuring the further increase and prosperity of the town.

—At Santa Barbara Rev. A. W. Jackson has a largely increased congregation. The church lot is in a valuable business location, and has already quintupled in value, assuring a new and better church edifice in the near future.

—In Los Angeles Dr. Eli Fay continues to draw large congregations to the Opera House, and is the most popular pulpit orator in Southern California. The fair held by their Ladies' Association for the church building fund netted $3,000. Dr. Fay has recently withdrawn the application of the Los Angeles society for aid, and they will hereafter pay their own way. This saves the A. U. A. treasury $1,500.

—In Oakland the new society continues to prosper, and is enjoying at present Rev. A. M. Knapp's lectures on art, and able discourses. This society has assumed half of Rev. Mr. Wendte's salary—a further saving of $1,500 to the Boston treasury. A Unity Club, of which the poet, John Vance Cleary, is president, and which is studying Concord Authors, and a promising Woman's Auxiliary Conference, have recently been organized.

—The San Francisco society has sold its church, endeared by many historic associations, but now surrounded by business structures, for $120,000. A new edifice will be erected at once in the heart of the residence quarter. Mr. Wendte recently organized in this church a promising Woman's Auxiliary Conference. Dr. Stebbins is thought to be preaching better than ever this winter.

—The Sacramento society is prospering under Mr. Massey, a scholarly and devout man, and deeply in earnest.

—Spokane Falls, W. T.—The new society organized at this point is awaiting the coming of its pastor-elect, Rev. E. M. Wheelock, under whose experienced and able guidance we may look for a strong Unitarian church in this young Minneapolis of the northwest. Eleven men recently subscribed $1,100 toward this new movement.

—Tacoma.—Mr. Greer's society have planned an attractive and useful church structure. The location is an admirable one. The Unitarian Building & Loan Fund has lent $1,500. The entire cost will be $5,000. Mr. Wendte hopes to lay the corner-stone in June next.

—The Seattle society holds its own, and plans are maturing for its permanent and prosperous establishment.

—At Salem, Oregon, we have a foothold, and will ere long have a society.

—The Portland society is weakened and saddened by the removal of prominent members of the church. But this is a strong congregation, and Mr. Eliot a host in himself.

—The Pacific Coast Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches will hold a session in Portland on June 12, 13, 14 and 15. Doctors Horatio Stebbins and Eli Fay, and Messrs. Wheelock, Greer, Eliot, Jackson, Massey, Spriggs, Wendte and others will take part. Revs. T. J. Van Ness and Robert Collyer are also expected.

Toronto.—In the view of the present demand for a more national Unitarianism, it was a pleasure to the senior editor of UNITY last week to do something towards developing the international Unitarianism, that is sure to lead the way into the inter-racial and universal Unitarianism which is his hope and faith. Twenty hours from Chicago, and he was in Toronto, to take part in the installation of Rev. A. T. Bowser, as pastor of the Unitarian church of that place. The weather was bright, clear and crisp, and the church was filled on Wednesday evening at the installation exercises. The sermon was preached by Grindall Reynolds of Boston, secretary of the A. U. A. The installation prayer was offered by Mr. Jones of Chicago, the charge to the pastor by Mr. Cutter of Buffalo; the welcome on behalf of the parish by G. M. Rose, of the board of trustees, and the talk to the people by Mr. Jones. The present writer may be indulged in saying, that all the parts were good, but to one listener, at least, the freshest and most inspiring was the breezy talk of the layman, who graphically told the story of thirty-five years of life, the humble beginnings, the loyal standing by the flag, through long stretches of vacant pulpits by the laymen, sometimes reaching into years, and the labors of Dall, Mellen, Bygrave, and other faithful pastors. The next day the three visiting ministers with a cordial local convoy "did the town", and found it a bright Western-American city of a growing hundred and thirty thousand people. If Brooklyn is the city of churches for America, Toronto must be the city of colleges on this continent. Here have been gathered most of the higher schools of all the religious denominations in the province of Ontario. Above them all is the University of Toronto, that looks suspiciously down upon the standards of Harvard and Yale. Here American applicants for university honors at Oxford and Cambridge in England, go for their examination. It has a building that is the richest specimen of Norman architecture that is probably to be seen on the American continent, a building worth a trip to Toronto to see, with its rich entrance, and its rarely carved ceilings.

Thursday evening we gathered at the church again, and although we had Patti's voice to compete with, the church was well filled. We were to talk about Unitarian principles, according to the programme, but the spirit moved the good secretary to speak on the Unitarian opportunity, the good doctor from Buffalo to tell of the new theology movement, and the editor of UNITY to speak of character as the word in this coming religious life and organizations, and the new pastor's word and joy welded the three speeches into one. Next day the visitors went their respective ways, carrying with them pleasant memories, and hopeful expectations of the Unitarian church at Toronto.

Philadelphia.—At the last meeting of the Unity Ethical Association, Camden, Miss Alice Ames related some of her college experiences to an interested circle of listeners.

—Weston closed his series of addresses on Buddha on the morning of the 27th. As giving apt finish to his studies, he had present on this occasion Tatin Baba, a Japanese traveler, who gave some account of the state of the Buddhistic faith as it impresses a rationalistic native. Baba has been lecturing at the Franklin Institute and the University here, and evidently possesses a ripe and generous mind. His English is quite good, and has that indefinite charm which always distinguishes the early handling of a language by a talented stranger.

—Ames has delivered his California lecture in Unity Church, Camden. Walt Whitman comes next in the course.

—Mangasarian wrote a letter to certain orthodox ministers of this city inviting them to accept the hospitality of his platform and explain to his people the reasons they hold against his movement. Of the four messages sent, two were unanswered and two received refusals. This gave rise to certain obvious criticisms from Mr. Mangasarian.

H. L. T.

Boston Notes.—Our winter courses of Sunday lectures and week-day classes are closing as Easter approaches. Much good work will however still be done before warm weather comes on.

—At the late notable tribute to the poet Longfellow, the popular authors taking part in the select readings were remarkable men of whom any religious denomination might be proud. Hale, Holmes, Howe, Higginson, Curtis and others. The financial result was about five thousand dollars.

—Our spring local conferences will emphasize missionary work at home and in the west. They will also turn their faces toward the uses of the coming anniversary meetings.

—Rev. J. H. Heywood will soon visit his early home and parish in Louisville Ky.

Janesville, Wis.—The tender privilege of speaking the word of love and appreciation over a faithful mother in our Israel, and a devoted parishioner of former years, Mrs. S. L. James, enabled the editor to realize once more with joy the good and faithful work that is being done there by Rev. Joseph Waite. The two parishes in Janesville and Baraboo, under his charge, were never so flourishing, either in point of interest or attendance, as now.

A Great Offer.

No matter in what part you live, you had better write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, without delay; they will send you free information about work that you can do and live at home, at a profit of from $5 to $25 and upwards daily. A number have earned over $50 in a day. Both sexes. All ages. You are started in business free. Capital not needed. Every worker who takes hold at once is absolutely sure of a snug little fortune. Now is the time.

If the Sufferers from Consumption,

Scrofula and General Debility, will try Scott's Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, they will find immediate relief and a permanent benefit. Dr. H. V. Mott, Brentwood, Cal., writes: "I have used Scott's Emulsion with great advantage in cases of Phthisis, Scrofula and Wasting Diseases generally. It is very palatable."

For Over Thirty Years.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" have been used with unflinching success for the relief and cure of Coughs, Hoarseness and other throat troubles. REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER says of them: "I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, except I think yet better of that which I began by thinking well of. I have also commended them to friends, and they have proved extremely serviceable. I do not hesitate to say that your Troches are pre-eminently the best."

Channing Complete for 25 Cents.

Channing's complete works, including "The Perfect Life", are published in one large paper-bound volume of over 400 pages, and we are able to offer a few copies at only 25 cents each. If sent by mail, 10 cents must be added for postage. Address

WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, APRIL 16, 1887.

[NUMBER 7.]

EDITORIAL.

THERE is nothing which so strengthens a rising cause as persistent attack, because it compels people to seek truth for its own sake alone.

ONE pleasing feature of the Kansas Conference report in our columns this week, was the post-office mission report by Father Brown, the young octogenarian of Kansas, whose enthusiasm for work is unabated, and who appreciates the rare opportunities opening out before us in the post-office mission field. The whole paper is so full of inspiration and vitality that we print it entire.

THE whole edition of the Louisville Woman's Congress reports (held last fall) was totally destroyed by the burning of the Richmond hotel, Buffalo, on the 13th of last month. The papers are safe and will be issued directly. The reports of secretary, treasurer and list of members can be furnished, with a few of the others; but the bulk of vice-president's and committee's reports cannot be rewritten.

AN interesting and touching bit of fellowship was realized last Sunday in All Souls church, Chicago. On the desk was a pretty vase of pulsatilla, the "Pasque flower" of the east, which the little children of the baby All Souls church of Sioux Falls, Dak., had gathered, the first-fruits of the prairie, and sent as a love offering through the mail to the four-year-old mother church in Chicago. Thus it is that subtle bonds of kinship reach out; the undogmatic fellowship of the west is becoming vascular; "cut it anywhere and it bleeds." This "veined humanity" is sure to clasp hands and hearts around the growing things of the spirit.

Rev. N. M. Mann has recently been preaching "On the folly of preaching", and has given the stay-at-home Christian many points which this Sunday sleeper might not think of. Mr. Mann has been behind the scenes and knows; but still we are glad to find that he concludes with the confidence that the preacher must go on with his preaching and not be discouraged, for it is the appointed means of saving the world. It is slow, like many another divine operation,—like the building of the hills or the scooping of the valleys. God makes not haste. He is patient, as one has said, because He is eternal. Progress, we have learned, is nowhere by sudden leaps. Nature abhors the miracle, and guards by infinite precaution against cataclysms. The preacher is often anxious to make a stir, but Nature holds him to her bosom, and will not admit of much commotion.

A STORY told of Dr. Charles Stearns, a Unitarian minister at the beginning of this century, is a good illustration of being as wise as a serpent and as harmless as a dove, and shows how well tact will serve when springing from real kindness: "An invitation had been given in the papers to meet at Concord and form a Bible society for Middlesex county. It appeared that the invitation had been published in only two papers; and consequently it had been seen by few, and our gathering was very small. Doctor Stearns was chosen Moderator. The question came up, 'What shall we do? Shall we now organize, or adjourn till we have a fuller meeting?' Doctor M—— pleaded earnestly for organizing then. Doctor R—— pleaded as earnestly for adjournment. Thus we were in quite a quandary. The Moderator, looking blandly around, said, 'Doctor M——, I admire your zeal, for it is good to be always zealous in a good cause; and I also, Doctor R——, admire your conservatism, because we should let our moderation be known to all men, inasmuch as the Lord is at hand.' Then addressing the little company, he said, 'Gentlemen, is it your pleasure that we adjourn?'—and the general response was an emphatic yea."

THERE is a Greek story of a sophist, who desiring to sell his house carried a specimen brick around in his pocket, hoping thereby to satisfy the purchaser of the merits of his building. We have also read of an artist who submitted the cast of a nose and the big toe to the committee that was to pass upon the merits of his statue in competitive contest. These men remind us of certain Unitarian ministers and writers, who are still busy in trying to give "perfectly fair" representations of certain parties, by printing and commenting upon certain fragmentary sentences and half sentences, carved out of rounded discourses, and certain lines which, compared to the whole life and conviction, purpose and intention of the parties concerned, are far more fractional and unjust to the whole than the brick and the art fragment indicated above. We have read somewhere of a doctrinaire who justified suicide on Biblical grounds, offering the following easily authenticated Bible text in point: "And Judas went out and hung himself. Go thou and do likewise."

The "Mothers' and Daughters' Meeting" at All Souls church, in this city, which began a week ago, promises to be a decided success. The first lecture, by Dr. Elizabeth Chapin, on "From Girlhood to Womanhood", was largely attended. We quote the following appeal to the young grandmother:

"Oh, mothers! do not fold the hands across your empty lap, and say at fifty, 'The story is told'. If home has been so all-absorbing that outside interests have fallen away from you, find the broken thread, or take up a new one, and you will soon find yourselves among the world's creators. The summer sunshine went with the children, but your autumn may be long and bright, with real 'halcyon days' here and there. Your daughters, now young mothers, will feel that your example has given them a larger life-lease, and the world must needs acknowledge its errors. The promise for the 'golden age' for women is fair, but its realization will never be reached until home training undergoes the needed reformation, and its girls and women secure a physical poise which shall give judgment and stability to all their undertakings. Upon the women of to-day devolves a mighty task, but when filled with glory and honor, it teems with rich possibilities."

The Arbor Days that have been started in many states are good signs, and should be fostered. Eleven states have already established these Arbor Days by acts of legislature. Public schools are to take part in the celebration. A circular of the Bureau of Education says: "The celebration of Arbor Day, as instituted by Governor Morton, in Nebraska, is one of the most powerful means thus far employed in this country for educating the people in the important facts relating to trees and to forests. In the prairie states it has stimulated the planting of many thousand acres of forest trees for economic purposes, and it has given an impetus to practical forestry that is moving on in geometric ratio across the treeless plains toward the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains, carrying innumerable blessings in its course. But the celebration of Arbor Day as instituted at Cincinnati in the spring of 1882, by the planting and dedicating of memorial trees, I would have observed by the public schools everywhere. No better method, and none half so attractive, has been discovered for arousing enthusiasm and imparting correct ideas to both young and old of the beauty and utility of trees and forests."

MRS. G. E. GORDON, secretary of the Wisconsin Humane Society, in the seventh annual report of that society, recounting the amount of work accomplished, says: "Something has been done to prevent the wanton destruction of our song-birds, though with less well-marked results than in other directions; and for the reason, I suppose, that all boys have, or seem to have, to pass through a 'barbarian era' in their growth, when the instinct for killing is very marked." But Mrs. Gordon does not touch the primal danger to our song-bird: it is not "the barbaric era in the boy", but it is the passion for decoration in the woman reverting to barbaric conditions, that still persists in enjoying the plumage of butchered birds, in her hat. The barbarian also remains, in the man who under the guise of "sportsmanship", still delights in taking life. The son of such a father and such a mother must needs be expected to delight in throwing stones at birds, impaling flies, and robbing birds' nests. Example is the most potent teachers: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

WE share in the surprise, though we try not to share in the impatience, of the diligent brother who writes us as follows:

Permit me to say that I am made ashamed, almost every week,—made ashamed, and all but disheartened,—by the persistent falsity to truth of many who call themselves Unitarians and print Unitarian literature. For one instance, in the Every Other Sunday for April 8, circulated among the children of my school yesterday before I had seen it, occurs a "Scriptural Geographical" exercise—prepared for that paper, and impliedly recommended as an example for Unitarian Sunday-schools,—in which the places in Palestine where "Christ" performed all his "miracles" are pointed out with labored and scrupulous time-serving: "Cana, where he turned water into wine;" the lake-side, where a sifted sediment of a residuum of fish and loaf was increased to more than enough to feed thousands; the roads and hedges where blind and dumb men were made to see and hear; the towns where the dead, even, were "raised";—and all the remainder of the wicked and foolish fabrications and exaggerations. All this is cruel and disastrous! * * * Not long ago a friend, visiting in Massachusetts, wrote me of a Unitarian "service" which she attended. The opening hymn was "Rock of Ages cleft for me, let me hide myself in thee"—with the "river side", the "blood", and all! And the remainder of the "service" was of a similar nature. I wrote back somewhat like this: "I am surprised that many who call themselves Unitarian call themselves also liberal, rational, progressive. Perhaps, however, the surprise should really lie in the fact that many who call themselves liberal, rational, progressive, call themselves also Unitarian."

THE attention of the country needs awaking to the subject of Forestry; but no doubt it will take many and long trumpet blasts yet to arouse our wasteful people to a wise economy in this matter. It seems to be one of the last things that human beings learn, that the balances of nature are to be touched with reverent hands. Our Department of Education at Washington publishes the statement: "In the early part of the eighteenth century the governments of Prussia and France had their attention seriously called to the rapidity with which the forests were disappearing within their borders, and the disastrous effects which were sure to follow. The great Frederick cast the horoscope of the future for his beloved Prussia, and saw that his little kingdom could grow and prosper only through the observance of a policy that would preserve and increase the forest area—assist, rather than war against, nature's method of preserving the fruitfulness of the soil. He made it a law to divide the forests into equal sections, and to fell the timber in successive annual portions—in fact, to institute a systematic treatment of the forest domain with a view to its improvement and perpetuation." This is simply wisdom, nay, even common morality. We ought to do likewise. Let us learn from whosoever is wiser than we. As a result of this care in Prussia, we are told that for the year ending with March, 1881, the income from the 10,000,000 of acres of public forests in Prussia was something over $12,000,000, and all the expenses for care of the woodlands, and for the cutting and transportation of products, was somewhat over $7,000,000, leaving thus a net income for the year of nearly $5,000,000; this, too, although the expenses included the payment of an army of foresters numbering more than 4,500 men. How different it is here in this country where the crime (for it is little less) and the impiety (for what else shall we call a disregard of God's good gifts?) have wasted our forests so much that an officer of our American Forestry Congress says: "It has been estimated by good authority that if we go on at the present rate the supply of timber in the United States will, in less than twenty years, fall considerably short of our home necessities." Our Bureau of Education publishes that in the year 1884, over five and one-half millions of acres were stripped for timber, "an area as large as the state of Massachusetts", and nine and one-half millions of acres more for fuel, and ten and one-half acres more stripped of their forests by fires. We repeat that this flagrant, heedless waste is an impiety. We know not all that may come of it. Sacrilege comes home at last, always. What calamities to agriculture, what destruction by floods, and what inscrutable plagues falling on human life and health, may come of this abuse, no one can say. It is time to stop this headlong, selfish destruction in the name of patriotism and common humanity.

WHAT are the dangers of the "ethical" fellowship established at Cincinnati? Those which Unitarians have always been exposed to. If a little greater than before in virtue of the frank invitation, also less than before, should we make a frank declaration of our general beliefs,—with the balance probably on the side of the lessening. What has ever prevented "the agnostic, materialist or atheist" from coming among us, claiming our name, entering our ministry, if they would, but the fact that we are still less attractive to them than they to us? To the churches based on creeds we have always seemed unprotected and all-out-of-doors. And yet the spiritual affinities which draw kin together, and keep those not akin apart, have proved ample for protection. Non-worshippers don't care to go with worshippers, unless some deep thing in their being holds them spite of their own logic; and in that case they are our kindred, and we want them with us, and our name like our hearts should hold them,—whatever be the consequences in the world's eyes: which consequences in the long run would be, of course, to help and not to hurt us. Yes, "a new meaning for the Unitarian name" is this,—new in the sense in which Jesus said, "I come not to destroy the law and prophets, but to fulfill them;" new by the right divine which live things have, to grow. When was the meaning of the word "Unitarian" closed,—and who, or what closed it? Practically, "fellowship" can be left in the future, as in the past, to common sense, to common sympathies, and to the congregations who alone have all the right and power there is in the case. The "agnostic" cannot find a Unitarian pulpit unless a Unitarian congregation wants him; and if it do, has any Unitarian Conference the right to forbid the bans, or even to hint its disapproval by public resolution? Individually, the churches and the ministers can do what their hearts bid them as to fellowship. As for ordination, the "Unitarian" minister needs none whatever; and if the "atheist", who yearns to be this minister, asks neighbor preachers to help ordain him, neighbor preachers ought to have the courage to act according to their own conviction of the best, whether that prompt the yes or the no. That "atheist preacher" is our Unitarian sea-serpent! There has been much talk about him recently, but it is quite uncertain yet if he exists; and if he does, is he going to impede navigation? He is almost pure bogey,—good to frighten those who are easily frightened. To actually limit our Unitarian freedom, in order to exclude him, would be to sell our great birthright for about the smallest mess of the thinnest pottage that ever a religious body hungered for! It would be to build a high fence around the house and shut the sunlight out, in order to get a place to nail the horse-shoe up! No, we are denying the power of the great God in us to talk about organizing one of his young churches on such policies of exclusion. Our "protection" is to be worshippers free but so deep, theists free but so intense, Christians free but so true and brave, that the worship, the theism, the Christianity, shall become, not our protection, but our invitation and our charm and our converting power to whatever is outside of us.

We have received and read with warm interest the Reporter of Organized Charity, for April. It is enlarged to eight pages with this its second number, which means, we believe, thrift in the good work, and an increasing understanding of that work by the community. The leading article is a sketch of the late Judge Rogers, adorned with a pleasing portrait of that benevolent man, the first president of the Charity Organization Society; and, the article says, its "faithful friend in adversity and prosperity". But we hope and believe that the day of adversity for this really scientific charity enterprise has passed in Chicago. There is an excellent article on Individual Benevolence, which benevolence the editor thinks of the utmost importance,—to guide and to aid which must, for a long time, be one of the best things the society can do. There is a wise two-column treatment of the overgrowth of institutions; in which Wisconsin is praised for the wise decision of its Board of Charities, that Insane Asylums should be limited to 50 or, at the utmost, 100 inmates. Mr. Johnson, secretary of the Charity Organization Society, says: "Personal human influence is the only influence that avails to help mankind, and without it all rules and systems, how good soever they may be, are of little avail;" and to the same effect quotes the following: "The work which charity has bidden us undertake, while it is practically unlimited in its scope and in its demands, is a work which can only be done at its best by the individual and for the individual. Our methods must differ, our fields lie far apart, but always the truth holds; that what one can do for one includes the most and the best that can be done for the human family by its members"—wise and true words, which touch the foundation of the aim and methods of the Charity Organization Society. The paper contains also interesting instances both of frauds and of wise assistance, which show the nature of the society's work. We say again, as we said last month, that this little paper should go into every household, as it easily can by its price, which is only 50 cents per annum.

In closing his sermon on Mr. Beecher, Rev. A. J. Rich, of Fall River, Mass., said: "I was once crossing the Alps over the Simplon Pass, and was very desirous of getting a glimpse of Monte Rosa. The diligence had slowly climbed to the highest point on the road, and the driver halted by my request. The company consisted of half a dozen people evidently of as many nationalities, as I could hear, without understanding a word of their confused jargon. I knew where Monte Rosa ought to be in the distance; but on account of the billowy clouds of August that loomed up in the lambent skies in the direction of the object of my search, it was hard to distinguish between the clouds and the snow-capped mountain dome. I wanted to be sure that I had seen it, and without success I made signs to the men about me to get their word of assent or denial. It was all Greek to both parties. Finally I said, I will prolong the halt as long as possible with a few francs, and stand and gaze toward the snow-mounted height, and perhaps the clouds will shift and I can distinguish between cloudy billow and snow-crowned dome; and my patience and perseverance were rewarded. In no great length of time I could see the clouds move and scatter, and I caught the sight of lovely Rosa, and there I gazed till every film of cloud had swept past the imperial sentinel, which stood out before the clear blue sky, a thing of beauty, and imaged in my memory a joy forever. Now, my friends, let this picture fasten a truth in your minds, and make it, I care not how vivid and impressive to your thought,—the truth, which I believe is a truth, that, if we are only patient enough, and, failing to get from the differing views of others a vision of the man of whom we speak, as he really was,—watch and wait till the clouds that somewhat obscure the beautiful outline of his character shall have passed, we shall be rewarded; all who have ever been made happier or better by his heaven-inspired utterances will be, in beholding that unique man of finest fiber and rarest soul and tenderest womanly heart, in the grandeur becoming his real worth and his towering splendor, making the common man, detractor or admirer, a pigmy at his feet. And still further, as at the foot of this same mountain, streams of water find their way down its sides to quicken and refresh the valley and give bloom and beauty and fruit to multitudes for their enjoyment and help, so I believe streams of influence and soul-refreshing life will continue to flow to millions of souls this now silent tongue has courageously and continuously addressed for nearly fifty years. Set your eyes upon the mountain beyond and not the passing cloud; at least, gaze toward the reality and believe in the divinity that abides in him and in all essential nobility, in spite of weaknesses and imperfections that so often cling to great natures. It would be a different world and a better world if, in our judgments, we were all as beautifully and as magnanimously charitable as was Henry Ward Beecher!"

The Western Unitarian Conference.

In this number the preliminary announcement for the approaching annual meeting of the above organization appears. This meeting will be looked forward to with especial interest, because at its last session this conference was forced, by parties who tried to check or change the direction of its slow, long, and earnest development, to formally declare the open spirit and, doctrinally speaking, unconditioned fellowship which, from its inception thirty-five years ago to the present time, has become more and more a part of its spiritual endowment, its religious earnestness, and its inspiration. We look forward to a meeting that will be marked with peculiar earnestness of conviction, warmth of fellowship, and religious unanimity and enthusiasm. Probably those who distrust its present position and are afraid of the untrammelled fellowship, will renew their pamphletarian agitations of a year ago, and do all they can to provoke schism. But we think our western churches have grown tired of such tactics, and that the delegates will have little interest in such disputes. Those who think the conference occupies a prophetic position—that the Cincinnati resolution is religious and noble, but for pecuniary and other reasons that it was inexpedient and impolitic, will stand aside awaiting the catastrophe which we believe will never come. Those in whose hearts there is a love for our western cause, a pride in the traditions of the Western Conference, a faith in its prophetic mission, will gather in goodly numbers, anxious to deepen their own religious life, to dispel all discord by love, to find the wisest co-operation with fellow-workers of all localities and every shade of belief.

The first great concern of the conference will be for high, devout, loving BEING. It will seek to be true, Christ like and God fronting, though its dollars be reduced and its words be misinterpreted and misunderstood.

Its next concern will be for worthy DOING: the great unfarmed spiritual fields of the west, the lonely churches, the still more lonely men and women without churches, the feeble state conferences needing fellowship and neighbor sympathy, the great tides of love and good-will in the east, needing western outlet and western trustees; the readiness of the A. U. A. to help and co-operate, and its need of western agents and co-partners,—all point to the fact that the Western Conference has a measureless work before it. There is no danger of too many workers or of rival administrations among generous and noble laborers. It is not difficult to adjust co-operative relationship between the A. U. A. and the W. U. C. Such relations have existed in the past to the strength, satisfaction and inspiration of both parties. Better ways and larger ways doubtless await us.

Brothers and sisters from Denver to Cincinnati, come! Let us take sweet counsel together. Come! Let us see how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. Come! In the spirit of Jesus and in the love of God. Let us be and do the things that will hasten the coming of the Universal church, the Kingdom of Truth, Righteousness and Love in this world!

Character and Citizenship.

In a recent circular of information of our bureau of education at Washington, we find the following statement: "The last census shows about one and one-half millions of adult males who could not read. The popular vote for president in 1884 was some ten millions. This shows that more than one in every ten who voted may not have been able to read the vote he cast." Surely this is enough to arrest the attention of thoughtful people. It is a bad treatment of republican power and citizen dignity to make it worth so little that a man may wield it who will not take so much pains for it, nevertheless, as to enable himself to verify the meaning of the vote which he casts. This is an anomaly, a disgrace and a danger. It is an anomaly because it sets a man to do an important thing for which, confessedly, he is so unqualified that he cannot know of himself whether he does it or not. It is a disgrace because it sets a mean value on liberty and citizenship, and tosses sacred responsibilities about like so much dust. It is a danger, because where ignorance is, passion and impulse rule; and what is more dangerous than power in the hands of untrained impulse? It is simply monstrous that a man should cast a vote who cannot read it; for if he cannot learn he is too imbecile to exercise the power of the ballot; and if he will not learn he holds the privilege too cheaply to be worthy of it. Whoever sees not this and will not preach it, bedizens Liberty with bold flatteries, but clothes her with no virtue.

In another part of the same circular we find it stated that "The total expenditure for public schools in the United States was in round numbers in 1886, $83,000,000." But it is estimated that the trade in liquors in this country amounts to $800,000,000 a year; and this statement, probably, is under rather than over the truth. Whence it appears that $10 are spent for drink for every $1 that is invested in education. This $800,000,000 worth of business employs an army of 400,000 men in the liquor traffic; which is to say that, of the 10,000,000 of voters for president in 1884, one in 25 was in the liquor traffic in some way.

Truly, what with ignorance on the one hand easily to be seduced, and with selfish vice on the other eager to lead astray, civilization and liberty war with fearful odds. The more need that the good, the instructed and the honest should rouse up to the strife. The more need of wise reflection, too, till we understand the immense miseries and loss inflicted by such open sluices of waste as the liquor traffic, and shut them as the first steps in reform.

Finally, we shall do well both for education, temperance, citizenship, and every other good thing, to keep in mind the German proverb that, "Whatsoever we would have appear in the nation's life we must introduce into the public-schools."

J. V. B.

A Declaration Concerning Unitarian Fellowship and Doctrine.

In the last two numbers of UNITY the right, the safety and the advantages of Conference declarations concerning the Unitarian fellowship and doctrine have been set forth in long articles. With obligatory beliefs Unitarians have nothing to do. The kind of declaration meant is one which, instead of prescribing "essentials", pre-affirms itself as "binding on none, always open to re-statement, and representing only the thought of the majority". The first article maintained, against the "congregational" objection, the right of a Conference to make such statements, and proposed a change in the Cincinnati "fellowship" resolution to make it more exactly just to any congregation not yet ready for its freedom. The second urged the safety of an open "doctrinal" statement as against the "credal" dangers, and its advantages: (1) As a missionary voice it would answer loudly the chronic question of outsiders, "What do Unitarians stand for?" (2) While the open fellowship affirmed at Cincinnati will tend to spiritualize Unitarianism, the open doctrinal statement proposed would tend to organize us more effectively for work and influence. As a minor good—should the Western Conference at its May meeting heartily adopt such a declaration—it might help to allay our present "issue" troubles, or, at all events, would do much to correct the misrepresentations that have been so widely spread this year about the western Unitarians.

If the Conference is willing to consider the proposal at all, of course more than one "declaration" had better be, and doubtless will be, submitted to it at the meeting. We ask leave to lay one before our readers now. Some such resolution with "declaration" as that affixed immediately below, the writer hopes to offer at the May meeting, if he be allowed to. It is printed now on purpose to invite examination, and to stir others to make a still nobler statement of our faith. To the same end, it will be put in pamphlet form, in connection with the substance of the two previous articles referred to, and will be mailed from this office for one cent a copy. If our proposed "statement" look long, let its missionary purpose be remembered,—that it is meant to answer with compact fullness that chronic question, "What are Unitarians, and what do they believe?" If it deal little with negations or contrasts with the faiths of other churches, that, too, is intended: these are our Affirmations,—the things which, as we think, will abide when there is no longer need of the contrasts and negations of the day. It is a considerably revised form of what has already appeared in UNITY three times and is circulating as No. 10 in the list of "UNITY Short Tracts"; and several brains and hearts, eastern and western, ancient and modern, may claim joint authorship in its clauses.

This "issue" year has brought much light. We all ought to know what Unitarianism really means and stands for better than we did a year ago. If the plan here proposed would secure us against credal influences, would make us trust more bravely and simply to the force of the Spirit working in and through us, and would more widely sow the blessings of our faith, then the plan is worthy of examination from earnest men and women. And we put it to the minds and consciences of those who have tried so hard to break up the Western Conference on account of the Cincinnati action,—we put it to the gray heads and to the dark heads of the band,—whether, on careful second thought, this plan is not really what they mean and all they want,—whether it is not a safer, a holier, a more effective way than their own of doing the work given "Unitarians" to do.

W. C. G.

Resolved, THAT WHILE THE WESTERN CONFERENCE HAS NEITHER THE WISH NOR THE RIGHT TO BIND A SINGLE MEMBER BY DECLARATIONS CONCERNING FELLOWSHIP OR DOCTRINE, IT YET THINKS SOME PRACTICAL GOOD MAY BE DONE BY SETTING FORTH IN SIMPLE WORDS THE THINGS MOST COMMONLY BELIEVED TO-DAY AMONG US—THE STATEMENT BEING ALWAYS OPEN TO RE-STATEMENT, AND TO BE REGARDED ONLY AS THE THOUGHT OF THE MAJORITY.

Therefore, SPEAKING IN THE SPIRIT AND UNDERSTANDING ABOVE SET FORTH, WE, DELEGATES OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CHURCHES IN CONFERENCE ASSEMBLED AT CHICAGO, MAY—, 1887, DECLARE OUR FELLOWSHIP TO BE CONDITIONED ON NO DOCTRINAL TESTS, AND WELCOME ALL WHO WISH TO JOIN US TO HELP ESTABLISH TRUTH AND RIGHTEOUSNESS AND LOVE IN THE WORLD.

AND, INASMUCH AS MANY PEOPLE WISH TO KNOW WHAT UNITARIANISM COMMONLY STANDS FOR, SPEAKING IN THE SPIRIT ABOVE SET FORTH WE MAKE THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT OF ITS PAST HISTORY AND OUR PRESENT FAITHS.

OUR HISTORY.

In this country Unitarians came out from the Congregational churches of New England some eighty years ago,—came out as New Protestants, asserting,—

- (1) The Supremacy of Character above Belief, in Religion;
- (2) The Rights of Reason in the use of the Bible Revelation;
- (3) The Dignity, as against the Depravity, of Human Nature;
- (4) The Unity, not Trinity, of God; the Divinity, not Deity, of Christ; and that Christ was sent as teacher to save us from our sins, not as substitute to save us from the penalties of sin.

Channing was their leader then. Since Channing's day belief in the Bible as a miraculous revelation, and in Christ as having any authority save as his word coincides with natural reason and natural right, has largely faded away among them. This second movement of their thought began some forty years ago; and Emerson and Theodore Parker have been their real, though at first their unaccepted, leaders in it.

To-day few Unitarians but trust free thought, and trust it everywhere; we only fear thought bound. Therefore our beliefs are still deepening and widening, as science, history and life reveal new truth; while our increasing emphasis is still on the right life and the great faith to which the right life leads—faith in the Moral Order of the Universe, faith in All-Ruling Righteousness.

OUR FELLOWSHIP.

In all matters of church government we are strict Congregationalists. We have no "creed" in the usual sense; that is, no articles of doctrinal belief which bind our churches and fix the conditions of our fellowship. Character has always been to us the supreme matter. We have doctrinal beliefs, and for the most part hold such beliefs in common; but above all "doctrines" we emphasize the principles of Freedom, Fellowship and Character in religion. These principles make our all-sufficient test of fellowship. All names that divide "religion" are to us of little consequence compared with religion itself. Whoever loves Truth and lives the Good is, in a broad sense, of our religious fellowship: whoever loves the one or lives the other better than ourselves is our teacher, whatever church or age he may belong to. So our church is wide, our teachers many, and our holy writings large.

OUR DOCTRINES.

With a few exceptions we may be called Christian theists; theists, as worshipping the One-in-All, and naming that One, "God, our Father"; Christian, because revering Jesus as the greatest of the historic prophets of religion; these names, as names, receiving more stress in our older than in our younger churches. The general faith is hinted well in words which several of our churches have adopted for their covenant: "In the freedom of the Truth, and in the spirit of Jesus Christ, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man." One struck our key-notes who said, "Unitarianism is belief in the humanity of God and the divinity of man." And another who defined it as "that free and progressive development of historic Christianity, which aspires to be synonymous with universal ethics and universal religion." But because we have no "creed" which we impose as test of fellowship, specific statements of belief abound among us. One such we offer here.

We believe that to love the good and live the good is the supreme thing in religion:

We hold reason and conscience to be final authorities in matters of religious belief:

We honor the Bible and all inspiring scripture, old or new:

We revere Jesus and all holy souls that have taught men truth and righteousness and love, as prophets of religion.

We believe in the growing nobility of Man:

We trust the unfolding Universe as beautiful, beneficent, unchanging Order; to know this Order is truth; to obey it is right, and liberty, and stronger life:

We believe that good and evil inevitably carry their own recompense, no good thing being failure and no evil thing success; that no evil can befall the good man in either life or death; that heaven and hell are states of being; that all things work together for the victory of Good:

We believe that we ought to join hands and work to make the good things better and the worst good, counting nothing good for self that is not good for all:

We believe that this self-forgetting, loyal life awakes in man the sense of union, here and now, with things eternal,— the sense of deathlessness; and this sense is to us an earnest of a life to come:

We worship One-in-All—that Life whence suns and stars derive their orbits and the soul of man its Ought,—that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, giving us power to become the sons of God,—that Love with whom our souls commune. This One we name,—the Eternal God, our Father.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

On Easter Morning.

F. L. K., OBIT APRIL, 1887.

On Easter morning in the place
Where late shone her uplifted face
Turned pulpit-ward, some loving thought
A miracle of bloom had wrought.

Pure as these flowers, her spirit rare
Was touched to love of all things fair.
How fit to mark her vacant place
With the pure calla's stately grace!

Sermon and lesson were unheard;
More eloquent than spoken word
The shining lilies spoke of her
New-risen from the sepulcher:—

"Even as the seed in blossom bright
Sends up its soul to greet the light;
In fairer realms a soul new born
To bliss, is risen this Easter morn!"

A. W. B.

CINCINNATI, April 10.

The Kansas Post-office Mission.

A REPORT READ AT THE LAWRENCE CONFERENCE.

In the Open Court, Moncure D. Conway says: "In the statistics, Unitarianism appears one of the smaller sects. In reality it is the largest. The fallacy arises from the fact that Unitarianism is not viviparous, does not bring forth its young alive; it is oviparous, and most of its eggs, like those of the cuckoo, are hatched in other nests than its own. The bad name of the cuckoo comes from the European species, which shove other eggs out of the nests they invade before depositing their own. The American cuckoo respects the broods of other birds, and leaves its child to be brought up with them, and for a time to be confused with them. When the broader wing develops in the Congregational nest, or the Episcopal or the Quaker nest, there is a good deal of fluttering and scolding among the parent birds; but the new creature is strong, not easily pitched out, and is gradually adopted as one of the family."

If Unitarianism recognized all its children in other churches, and outside of all churches, it would feel patriarchal as Abraham, the father of generations. The late Dean Stanley said that while he was in America every sermon he preached had some of Channing in it, and every sermon he heard was largely from Emerson. Yet Dean Stanley did not go into any Unitarian church.

This parable is a good exordium or prelude to what I may have to say about my post-office mission the past year. An orthodox brother in the Congregational church writes me: "I get from the papers and pamphlets you have frequently sent me some very suggestive thoughts, and above all I get that impression and lesson which is so hard to learn, that there are many ways of the spirit, and that Truth is so manifold that no one can expect or hope to see more than one phase of it." And again, "I have read with great interest a sketch of Doctor Eliot in the Unitarian Review, and I could not but think that while I had always heard of Doctor Post, b contemporary, who had maintained the cause of New England Congregationalism in St. Louis for the past fifty years, I had had but a very dim and imperfect notion of the great work which Doctor Eliot had done in the same place."

Another good egg has been laid in the nest of a "Christian" preacher, who writes me: "I receive the Christian Register, Unitarian Review and Mr. Savage's sermons regularly. Am now reading Clarke's "Vexed Questions in Theology", Channing's works, Emerson's Essays, Herford's "Unity of God and Man", Savage's "Social Problems", and Clarke's "Problem of the Fourth Gospel." So far I find myself in sympathy with these works. I find myself more and more in sympathy with your people, and no doubt will take my stand with them sometime.

A very thoughtful and sincere man living in Western New York, who was brought up a Baptist, and who has listened to Baptist preaching for fifty years, writes me: "I have never been able to mark out a line of theological thought that I could feel justified in proclaiming as a guide to others. I find no difficulty in marking out a line of moral conduct which I should follow. These considerations have deterred me from joining any religious organization. The views of your organization, as I gather them from the literature you have sent me, come nearer to my own conclusions. I am prone to skepticism; by this I mean that my organism seems to be such that no sooner I receive an idea, than I begin to weigh the pros and cons of its truth. I can not take another man's idea till I have fully digested it and made it my own. You will readily see that I could not feel at ease in a religious body where I would feel obliged to accept unquestioned what was dropped to me. But I now think if I lived near an organization like yours, I could readily join it, feeling that my honest convictions would not be stifled." From a lady who believes herself orthodox, I have lately received a letter from which I make an extract or two: "Maturer years have liberated me from the bondage of opinions which never seemed rational to me. I can hardly conceive how I made myself believe that the Bible taught what is called the Trinity. I would not teach my class of boys doctrines their parents fear,—nor will I teach the opposite. I leave creeds to try and train good, true and Christian men. I admire Mr. Hale. Thank you for his sermons. Wish more of you liberal Christians had his views of the Son of God and of the Bible. The Christian Register is always welcome."

One whom some of our creed-bound friends would regard as an infidel, or perhaps an atheist, speaks thus in a letter: "I thank you for the tracts sent me. 'Are they such as you approve?' you ask. The majority of them are read with pleasure. Some, however, I should question as to their merit, in these times of advancing thought. Yes, anything from the brain of Minot J. Savage is always acceptable, or from any other individual thinker who has courage to give utterance to a grand thought, however antagonistic it may be to musty theology. I am pleased to say that there is a liberal club organization here, and I have read all the best tracts sent me in our meetings. Again I thank you for continued favors."

From a gentleman well-known in public life, and a member of a Congregational church, I receive this message: "I read every tract you send with pleasure."

From a friend, unknown to me personally, comes this note: "Accept thanks for documents and papers sent bearing upon the subject of advanced religious doctrine. Be assured I have read them with no little interest, and have started a loan office, and will pass them on to my inquiring neighbors."

From a lady in California, once a resident of Lawrence, I received a letter from which I make one or two extracts: "You remember that I used to call myself a spiritualist? Well, I still keep the faith, thank God; but I realize, as once I did not, that spiritualism is not a religion, but simply a philosophy; while Unitarianism is a religion so comprehensive in its nature that it only asks, Are you living your highest and truest life; that calls for no argument, and enables me to reach right down into the hearts and lives of those around with the blessed teachings of the divine master.

"Your papers, after being read at home, are sent on their mission of enlightenment and love to other souls struggling in the darkness after the divine light. For them I want to thank you more than pen can write or tongue can tell."

All such thanks and acknowledgments of our papers and tracts received are, to be sure, very encouraging. But there is far greater encouragement to persevere in my work from the fact that the times are ripe for such a mission. There is a spirit of inquiry now thoroughly aroused throughout Christendom. The old theological foundations are crumbling away. The idols which former generations have worshiped are being cast to the moles and the bats. There is no longer any fear that harm will come to the wheat by separating it from the chaff. The age in which we are living is diligently and earnestly searching for the truth. It wants to build on the truth, and not on the shifting sands of error. The timidity of the past is giving place to greater boldness. The narrow partisanship of sect is gradually, though surely, widening into broader channels. Denominational lines are daily transgressed. My Chicago paper tells me that one Sunday lately the members of Case Presbyterian church at Cleveland were astounded when their well-paid pastor, Mr. Ogden, one of the ornaments of that sect, read the following:

"I hereby present my resignation as your pastor, to take effect April 1st. My only reason for this step is a change, or rather growth and maturing of theological opinions, which make it impossible for me in good conscience to longer assent to the doctrinal standards of the Presbyterian church."

The same paper tells me that three Presbyterian ministers changed their base from this Presbytery last week. This very probably is the result of the ova of Unitarianism deposited in Presbyterian nests.

And so I remain firm of heart. Every tract which I send away I regard as good seed, and a prayer follows it that it may fall upon good ground. I sow in faith. I have no doubt of the fruitfulness of the post-office mission. In the nature of things it can not help doing good. It is good for the intellect as well as for the heart. It goes where the living voice is not heard. It is a still small voice which whispers in secret. It is clear and affirmative.

I am sometimes asked how I am paid for my work—my work is my pay. The consciousness that I am doing good is my reward. Where do I get stamps to send off my 4,000 papers a year and to place on my letters of correspondence? They are sent by the friends of the mission. If they do not come as they are needed, I pray for them, and they come in answer to my prayers. Thus far in my year's work I have received something less than forty dollars. To carry me well through the year (ending with me the first of June) I shall need ten dollars more.

I need not here particularize the sources from which funds have come. Suffice it to say that about 30 dollars have come from friends in the east and ten dollars from friends in the west.

My sincere thanks are due to the American Unitarian Association, and to the Western Unitarian Conference, for papers and tracts which they have gratuitously furnished for my work. Papers, pamphlets and sermons from various individual sources I am happy to acknowledge, publicly, as I have by private letter acknowledged when I have known the source from whence they came.

Upon the strength of those resolutions I am emboldened to urge upon the members of this Conference the importance of strengthening and enlarging the influence of your state post-office mission.

I desire to say still further, that I was encouraged and strengthened in my mission by the resolutions passed by the Kansas Unitarian Conference at its last session held at Topeka, in reference to the usefulness and efficiency of my work.

You can do this by your individual contributions in money or in stamps, in large or small amounts, in proportion to the generosity of your hearts and the fullness of your purses.

You can do this by looking up people scattered here and there over the state who would be willing to receive and read and who would be benefited and enriched by receiving and reading, the papers and pamphlets and sermons which are sent through the post-office mission.

There is not one present who by the exercise of a little thought and care could not send me in the course of the ensuing year the name and address of ten persons in this state, who seldom or never attend any church; who have little sympathy with the irrational dogmas warmly contended for and vigorously urged by the sects around them, but whose hearts, hungering after something higher and nobler, would be cheered and comforted and fed by the gospel of sympathy, tenderness and love which Jesus proclaimed—and which we are glad to preach. We must go out and search for these sheep that are not shepherded and bring them into our fold. I am not afraid to use the self-same words which Jesus used. Other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them I must also bring in, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd. If we have the truth let us speak it boldly, and bring all we can under its influence. Men do not light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it giveth light to all within the house. Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven.

JOHN S. BROWN.

The Chicago Gamin.

WHENCE HE COMETH AND WHITHER HE GOETH.

There are in the city of Chicago about one thousand boys who earn their living on the street. Only about fifty of these can be accommodated at the Newsboys' Home. Some four hundred have no abiding-place. The remainder have homes, and in a few cases both parents.

The first class, who live permanently at the Home, pay five cents for meals and lodgings, and style themselves boarders. They are the better class of boys, who mostly are sellers of the morning papers. They are nearly all capitalists, and some have in their employ even as many as ten small boys, of whom they exact the strictest business settlements. When poverty makes a hard task-master, it makes him very hard; when it makes a kind one, it makes him very kind. Of this class the boys more easily yield to whatever authority or discipline is necessary. They are more ambitious and anxious to better themselves and improve their surroundings. They are loyal and true to each other, and remarkably generous to their companions when unfortunate; keen, sharp, and ready readers of human nature. 'Tis said a stranger in town accidentally jostling him, he is able at a glance to tell in what language to swear at him. They are, as a general thing, quite philosophical in their misery, and bear it with far less complaint than many older ones in the most trivial affairs of life. Many of them have secured good places in the city, and on the whole turn out, perhaps, as good a percentage of honest, capable men as the more favored ones.

The next class includes the entirely homeless. Alleys, doorways, lodging-houses, under sidewalks, or any place that offers a friendly shelter for a temporary abiding-place. The boys of this grade are largely received from runaways and children of criminals; they are lawless and liberty-loving, always sleeping in the open air when the weather is fine. One of this class would answer to the description of Victor Hugo's "Gamin", that lives like the cat or sparrow. Freedom is the one prevailing idea with him, and the fear of losing that liberty does more towards keeping him in order than all the laws that can reach him. He fights, sings, swears, steals, and yet is angry if called a thief, as he never steals except for necessities. He loves the theater, with its lights, warmth and music; it transforms his poor life to a shining paradise. The theater and the mission rooms are about the only friendly roofs that cover his poor head. The little fellow gambles, like his brother, the Italian lazzaroni; he may be found morning, noon and night, whenever he can secure a penny, in sly places trying his luck with the dice, in a game called craps.

Dirty, soiled, ragged, cold and miserable, he forgets it all, and his delight knows no bounds if the lucky number, four or eleven, turns in his favor. Though he knows this passion keeps him colder, hungrier, wetter and more ragged, yet he cannot resist its fascinations.

The last class, the most unhappy, have what are called homes, but which are far more cruel than the friendly sidewalk or warm cellar, and these are the ones that most appeal to our sympathies. Their homes are occupied by lawless, drunken parents from whose treatment the children suffer more than they do from the biting blasts of winter or the scorching heat of summer. These besotted parents, controlled by their degraded appetites, drive these poor children at the tenderest age upon the street, not only to earn bread for themselves, but to furnish money for the vices of the parents. Many a little one has gone to bed hungry and supperless, marked with blows, crushed in heart and spirit, because the money earned has not been sufficient to supply the miserable appetites of these parents. They are not like the little Gavroche, who thought all mothers were like his, and so did not complain; but more like the man who dies a lingering death of thirst in sight of water. We see him denied of every right, denied the right of decent birth, of precious childhood, of honest love. What wonder if he in his turn should repeat the cruelty? Many a pathetic story of their loves and sacrifices, their shame and sorrow, which would seem new in this world of old things. There is one boy twelve years of age in the news-alley, whose parents are both irredeemable drunkards. He will not live at home, but prefers any other place. Every three days in the week his besotted mother comes to the street nearest the alley where the boys stay, and collects what her poor boy has struggled so hard and suffered so much to obtain, only to stop at the first saloon she reaches to spend for that which has ruined her body and soul. Yet this boy has steadily given this woman four dollars per week without urging, sending it to her by a policeman because he is ashamed to let the boys know it is his mother. On being asked why he did not keep it for his own comfort he replied, "I do it for my little brother who has such pretty blue eyes and long white curls." But the pleasant and hopeful feature of it is the good work the missions all over the city are doing. There has been a great change in the condition of the boys during the last four years. If it be true that God intrusts the happiness of many in the hands of a few, then surely there has been good work done by the few. Still there are enough left who need help,—enough homeless, houseless waifs who never knew a mother's love, or a father's care; who never heard the name of God except as a curse, who know nothing of love except to hate and fear, to whom hunger and cold have become a second nature, whose highest aspiration is food and warmth; enough of them in spite of the work of Newsboys' Homes, and Mission Schools, in spite of the self-sacrificing labors of strong men and tender women to cause us, who at evening see our own loved ones well fed, well clothed, to wonder whether some neglect of head or heart is not making each one of us more or less responsible for the condition. Perhaps we are all too much like the man in the late theological discussion who said if God could stand it to destroy the heathen he thought he could. Still, we are hoping and believing that God in his own good time will send them a Moses, who will lead them into the light, broad lands of Canaan.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—Easter at All Souls church was marked many striking features. Offerings in the shape of contributions from the Sunday-school and other members of the parish to the furnishing of the parlors and the general decoration of the church came pouring in Saturday afternoon, the Sunday-school making its offering by classes. In this way five or six easy chairs, rugs, hassocks, vases, a clock, an elegant pulpit Bible, a pair of brass andirons for the parlor fire-place, etc., came in. The teachers of the Sunday-school presented a handsomely framed copy of Waltner's etching of Muncaksy's Christ before Pilate. One lady presented Da Vinci's Last Supper. Another, a copy of a recent painting of Ruth, by Laves, a Spanish artist. These in connection with the flowers and the birds rendered the Church-House beautiful and musical. Every seat was occupied; the Easter festival service was used, as found in Mr. Blake's "Unity Festivals", for the fifth time. Eight children were christened. Nine boys and girls were welcomed as children of the church, after having studied in the Pastor's confirmation class for the last eight months; and, most interesting of all, the Church Book was opened for the first time, and those who had already given their hearts gave their hands by signing their names, having first pledged their interest by standing and joining hands in the interest of the following

BOND OF UNION:

We, whose names are hereunto affixed, join ourselves together in the interests of morality and religion, as interpreted by the growing thought and purest lives of humanity, hoping thereby to bear one another's burdens, and to promote truth, righteousness and love in the world.

—The Chicago Woman's Unitarian Association held its March meeting on Thursday, the 31st, at the Third church. There were present one hundred and twenty-five ladies and one gentleman, J. V. Blake. Mrs. Wooley gave the paper, subject: "What shall we do with our doubts?" The usual discussion followed. Mr. Blake, who was called on, and responded with some remarks bearing on the subject, Mrs. West, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Remick, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Boyeson, Mrs. Effinger and Miss Graves were among those who helped make the discussion an interesting one. The April meeting will be held at All Souls church, Thursday, April 28.

Mrs. E. A. DELANO,
Sec'y C. W. U. A.

Philadelphia.—Weston is shortly to speak again in Unity church, Camden. Gilbert, the seceding Methodist, is likewise expected there before long.

—The April section meetings of the Society for Ethical Culture were made notable by an essay and speeches upon matters of import. Mr. Sallinger read a paper on "The Needs of Cities", and Miss Frances Emily White, Miss Mary Thorn Lewis and others followed it with pertinent comment.

—Plans have several times been broached for holding one of the meetings of the Free Religious Association here, but something or other has always come between the thought and its fulfillment.

—Professor Westbrook is mapping out an elaborate examination of the Girard Trust proceedings, through which the founder's wishes, in regard to religious teaching, have been violated.

—Unity church, Camden, is about to establish a kindergarten in furtherance of the theory of practical religious work.

—Walt Whitman lectured on Lincoln in the Camden church to an audience upon which his unaffected eloquence was supremely effective. As he sat there by the light and read, and the flowing beard and massive frame and utter composure attracted one's thought, an aroma of greatness seemed strangely diffused. Whitman uses two words: "love" and "death", with an exquisite music which goes straight to the heart. Feeble in body, strong as of old in brain-bone, his cheer is like the fresh air of a spring morning. April 14 he reads this vivid story from the stage of the Madison Square theater, in New York.

—The next meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary Conference occurs in Germantown.

H. L. T.

Charleston, S. C.—The restoration of the Unitarian church, so generously provided for by the conference at Saratoga, nears completion. The church is much simplified, stripped entirely of its terra cotta pinnacles and all its castellated battlements. Happily the old beauty is all preserved within,—indeed, heightened by slight changes in the coloring of ceiling and walls. The congregation, now worshipping in Masonic Temple, expect to return to the church on April 24, at which time Secretary Reynolds, returning from the Southern Conference in New Orleans, will tarry in Charleston to share and assist in the rejoicing. The cost of this restoration, using the utmost economy consistent with strength, will run near to $12,000. A new organ was hoped for, but the old one—of which the front was demolished—has had its interior doctored, and is to do service a while longer, with some artistic drapery to hide its external bruises and nakedness.

—A few weeks ago Mr. Browne gave a public reading of "Locksley Hall" in the two parts, with comments, and some defense of the later part from the easy charge of pessimism. The ladies of the congregation served refreshments in the intermission. The reading was in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association.

—The Southern Conference, organized in Atlanta in April '83, holding its first meeting in Charleston in Jan. '85, now holds its second in New Orleans, April 20. Robert Collyer preaches the opening sermon.

Hinsdale, Ill.—Unity church, named April 6, 1887. Our youngest born! Can its record be beaten? The initial word was spoken March 27 by the Western Secretary. W. C. Gannett preached April 8. On Wednesday evening, April 6, a business meeting was held and a constitution and by-laws adopted. On the following Sunday, April 10, a new organ was on hand, a new choir, a new book bearing on its back in gilt letters the name of the bantling, and three dozen copies of "Unity Hymns and Chorals".

The church was made beautiful with floral decorations. Mr. Effinger led the service, and after the sermon presented the parish register, reading the constitution and by-laws and names of newly elected officers. Thirty-four names of new members were entered, with gladness of heart. How hearty the greeting! how inspiring the day! those only can know who were present. Too much, do you say, to be accomplished in fourteen days time? Probably not. The conditions were favorable. The preparation began years ago in other parishes and localities, and the auspicious hour had come for the flowering out of these earnest souls in the new hopes and affections which consecrated that Easter day.

Boston Notes.—Our Easter services have been unusually interesting. The day was fine. The churches had a large attendance. Floral displays and appropriate exercises for adult congregations and for children were held by ministers of all denominations; by some even who had not before observed the festival.

—Rev. James J. Clarke gratified his parishioners by attendance on their communion service on Easter Sunday. He gains strength slowly.

—An effort will be made the coming summer to sustain liberal preaching at several seashore resorts near our city.

—Hon. George T. Hale is trying to realize his ideal philanthropy by canvassing our rich men for subscriptions to the building fund of a workmen's exchange.

—Arrangements are nearly perfected to assure the projected social reunion in May of Universalist and Unitarian ministers, with ladies.

—The Easter Register contains communications from several eminent scientists—generally giving opinions that early and late scientific researches do not tend to oppose or to affirm a belief in the immortality of man's soul—and that spiritual researches are quite distinct from scientific studies. The writers generally believe in immortality on other than scientific grounds.

Duluth.—We are not much given to gossiping about churches,—we do not wish to anticipate news; but we have known for some time that things are moving steadily toward a Unitarian parish at this place. Messrs. Clute and Crothers have already been on the ground, and this week Secretary Effinger is spying out the land.

A Ghost

is a myth, but solid reality will be known by those who write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, thereby learning, free, about work that they can do, and live at home, wherever they reside, at a profit of from $5 to $25 and upwards daily. Some have earned over $50 in a day. Capital not needed. Hallett & Co. will start you. All is new. Delay not. Pay absolutely sure from start. Wealth awaits every worker. Both sexes. All ages.

If the Sufferers from Consumption,

Scrofula and General Debility, will try Scott's Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, they will find immediate relief and a permanent benefit. Dr. H. V. Morr, Brentwood, Cal., writes: "I have used Scott's Emulsion with great advantage in cases of Phthisis, Scrofula and Wasting Diseases generally. It is very palatable."

In 1850

"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" were introduced, and from that time their success as a cure for Colds, Coughs, Hoarseness, Asthma and Bronchitis has been unparalleled. Sold only in Boxes. 25 cents.

"Green Pastures."

This well-known poem by W. C. Gannett has been set to music by George Russell Lewis, and is published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago. $1.00 per hundred copies, or 2 cents per copy, post-paid.

Channing Complete for 25 Cents.

Channing's complete works, including "The Perfect Life", are published in one large paper-bound volume of over 800 pages, and we are able to offer a few copies at only 25 cents each. If sent by mail, 10 cents must be added for postage. Address

WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY,
175 Dearborn street Chicago.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, APRIL 23, 1887.

[NUMBER 8.]

EDITORIAL.

A CORRESPONDENT from Los Angeles, Cal., says: "I greatly approve of the position of UNITY, in its demand for the individualism of the several local organizations, as well as that of individual men and women. On that line is co-operation most certain."

In response to frequent inquiries, made at this office, for further copies of our "Special Bird Number" of UNITY, the issue of April 17, 1886, we would say that the entire issue has been exhausted for some time, although an extra issue of 5,000 was printed. A correspondent in Providence begs for a reprint, and starts the suggestion with a subscription for 200 copies for her own use. The "slaughter of the innocents" still continues. If a sufficient number join in the call to warrant the expenditure, we shall be glad to reprint the entire number in the interest of our Fellowship of Mercy.

"How We Got the Temperance Society in the Church; A Story of What Might Be." The substance of the editorial which recently appeared in UNITY under the above title, has been reprinted as "UNITY Short Tract No. 16", and can be obtained at this office at the rate of 60 cents per hundred. It is something to set folks to thinking upon a topic of continual importance. We hope it will be widely circulated,—not only among the Unitarian fraternity, but also among the sister churches of other denominations. There is no heresy to-day in the temperance agitation. Even the most suspicious can stand so much of ethics in their religion.

WHILE looking over an old file of UNITY, we accidentally stumbled upon the following letter, written by Mr Herford, and published in 1881. It is so apt to the needs of this occasion, and voices so well the thought that was groping in our mind towards an editorial utterance, that we venture to reprint it, in lieu of any word of our own. Perhaps Mr. Herford's estimate of the value of the Western Conference has somewhat changed since the writing; but we believe that these meetings are capable of as much inspiration and spiritual potency now as ever; and we know that the isolated workers in our western parishes are as lonesome and as much in need of fellowship as ever; and so we appeal to these churches in the words of Mr Herford, changing only the date, from St. Louis, May 3-5, to Chicago, May 17-20:

SEND YOUR MINISTER!

I want, through UNITY, to be allowed to say a word to our parishes throughout the west. It is: "Send your minister to the Conference!" Every year since I have been in Chicago, I have myself felt the helpful encouragement of these yearly meetings, and wished that more were present to feel it. But each year I have been saddened by missing the faces of many of my brethren who are working in the furthest and most isolated posts of service, and yet it is these who, most of all, need the cheer and inspiration of such a gathering. Moreover, in the course of my year as treasurer, I have had forced upon me how little practical interest many, both of our ministers and people, have in the good work which the conference is doing, and I am convinced that this is simply because they know so little of it.

In our band of churches we have no general church government to unite us. Our ministers are, for the most part, working in extreme isolation. Some of them hardly see the face of a brother in six months. No wonder that they sometimes become disheartened, and that the "blues" get into their sermons. Of all churches, ours most need to foster the spirit of sympathy and brotherly co-operation. So, friends, all over the west, send your minister to the approaching conference at Chicago, May 17-20. It will freshen him up, and make him preach all the better for six months to come.

If there is only one friend in a congregation who happens to see this appeal, let him (or her) straightway speak to other of the friends, and have the matter arranged. It will be easy enough. What would be a considerable tax for a minister to pay in traveling expenses, will be very little divided among six or eight. Besides, the minister goes as the officer of the congregation, and to adapt an ancient scripture to modern institutions: the laborer is worthy of his car-hire!

So, send your minister! Go yourselves, if possible; but, at any rate, SEND YOUR MINISTER!

CHICAGO, April 20, 1881.

BROOKE HERFORD.

LET what is said in another note about the "Old South Historical work" in Boston,—after making its own impression as a good suggestion,—serve as a whereas to the word that our friend, Mr. Mead, will himself be in Chicago soon to give another course of lectures. His subjects this time are:

- (1) Dante—His Religious Significance.
- (2) Dante—His Place in History and Politics.
- (3) Lessing's "Nathan the Wise."
- (4) Immanuel Kant.
- (5) Carlyle and Emerson.

On Tuesdays and Fridays, beginning Friday, April 29. The time, 3 P.M. The place, Apollo Hall. The Unity Clubs and Study Classes and Browning Circles and Fortnightlies and Athene-s of the city will find the lectures something to enjoy.

THE Register for April 14 contains an additional editorial on the Western Conference, and its relation to the missionary work of the west, in which it generously corrects the mistake committed in a previous article. It now rests its chief argument for the dismantling of the W. U. C. of its missionary purposes and activities on the ground that from 1868 to 1874 the Western Conference abandoned all missionary work, and that during that time the A. U. A. invested a large amount of capital, and did direct a good deal of its attention to the western field,—a fact which we gladly recognize. But, upon the experience of those years, we rest our assertion that that cannot be efficient missionary method that reduces the self-reliance, self-denial and enthusiasm of the local churches. During that time the tendency of all our western churches was to become pensioners. They were the least fertile years of Unitarianism in the west, so far as home-energy and self-sacrificing zeal was concerned. When that plan was abandoned, and the Western Conference assumed its legitimate responsibility, then state conferences sprang into being; and since that time about one-third of the existing societies in the west were organized. Headquarters in Chicago became a vital force, Sunday-school society, woman's conference, publishing committee and post-office mission work became possible. We know that the Register does not contemplate the reduction of these activities; but without an earnest, confident and aggressive financial policy on the part of the W. U. C.—the brooding mother of all these—it will be impossible to find the money to carry on these various activities, unless they are to be subsidized directly by the A. U. A., in which case it becomes a co-partner in whatever of heresy or theological dynamite may be dealt in by these activities, and its complications become more embarrassing than now. In any discussion that may arise in this matter, let us keep to the text. The trouble is a theological one, and not an administrative one. The various state conferences of the west and the W. U. C. did enjoy practical, rational and mutually helpful co-operative relationships with the A. U. A.

until the foolish alarm and the odium theologicum had been aroused by the passage of the Cincinnati resolution and the agitations that led to it. No shying of the question, by bringing up merely administrative questions, will settle this matter. If, in order to allay fears, the churches of the west were to give over their direct interest in and control of the missionary work of the west, they will soon lose their interest, or be compelled for the sake of peace to silence pen and tongue. To us the matter is plain. Mutual co-operation and mutual helpfulness are possible whenever there is mutual confidence. Perhaps time alone will demonstrate that nothing revolutionary or demoralizing happened at Cincinnati; that the Western Conference is still holding itself steadily to the lines of historic development, and that it is true to its law of spiritual evolution; that it still is to continue to be a vital, loving and loyal part of the Unitarian movement of America. Meanwhile our duty is plain. To do more and not less than ever before; to work harder, to be more patient, loving and self-sacrificing; to have a better, warmer, more generous and more spiritual fellowship than ever before. Hence, we greet with cordiality the brotherhood, the good wishes, and sincere and kindly intentions of our eastern contemporary. Let the faithful workers of the east gather in increasing numbers at our coming meeting. Let us be more determined to be loyal to the diviner prophecies in the soul, and to be more obedient to the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

AFTER the women of Boston by noble efforts had succeeded in saving the Old South Meeting House from destruction, they turned it into a sort of school to teach national history and the national spirit to Boston children. The floors and galleries are full of relics and reminders of colonial time. On Washington's Birthday the public schools pour their flocks into it for a patriotic festival. In the summer vacation weeks large audiences of the young folks gather to lectures from some of the best of their elder fellow-citizens,—one year they were on the Boston story, one year on the Massachusetts story, one year on the War for Independence, one year on the War for the Union. Since 1879 John Fiske has delivered almost all his lectures first in the Old South Meeting House. As its annex this embryo college has started a winter evening school of history for children at the "North End"—the court end of the Boston of one hundred years ago. It also publishes a series of valuable historical leaflets, and offers four annual prizes for historical essays on named subjects to new graduates from the Boston High and Latin Schools. Altogether a unique and worthy undertaking,—or not quite unique, as the idea has begun to catch a little in other cities. If Indianapolis can have her annual course of "Historical Lectures for Young People" given by men and women of that city, with hundreds of her boys and girls listening, why not Chicago? We have history enough right here to go round for a summer vacation or two, and when the stock runs out we can borrow the romance of the whole Mississippi Valley—its discovery and exploration and settlement. In Boston one rich and patriotic lady has mothered the work, so far as money has been needed for it; and one man, Mr. Edwin D. Mead, has had practical charge of its development. Where is our Mrs. Hemmeway, and where is our Mr. Mead?

"If we cannot lay the foundation, it is something to clear away the rubbish; if we cannot set up truth, it is something to pull down error."—Macaulay.

SPEECH may be compared to the art of painting, the color being the emphasis, tones and gestures by which the feeling of the speaker is shown. Writing is sculpture, where there is nothing but form to show feeling, and yet the sculptor shows it not less powerfully than the painter, and the writer succeeds not less than the speaker in communicating it. w. w.

A Unitarian and an Ethical Society.

"He that is not against us is for us."—Jesus.

When the proposition was first made public that Doctor Adler was coming to St. Louis to assist in the organization of a Society for Ethical Culture, there were those who said: "What do they want of ethical societies here? Our Unitarian churches are ethical societies." The idea seemed to be that we stood on their ground and for their objects, and that any one who was in sympathy with Doctor Adler and his co-workers might feel at home with us. Hearing such statements, it is natural that the inquiry should arise as to what are the distinctions between us.

First, let us give suitable emphasis to the resemblances; for we can do justice to this movement only by understanding the similarity in origin and the identity of object discernible in both organizations. In their origin both were revolts against ecclesiastical tradition and authority,—both were tired of the dogmatism of the churches. And in their object both were moved by the philanthropic spirit,—the services to be rendered men in this world; to make them better, and consequently happier here, were substituted for the practice of priestly magic fixing their fortunes hereafter. The conduct of life, in short, was made of more importance than form of faith. They believed in the deed rather than in the creed, in character rather than in confessions.

It is necessary to remember that the Unitarian movement began a hundred years ago, in order that we may appreciate the radicalism of its declarations, and the bitterness of the reproaches it had to endure; in order, also, that we may realize some of its hindrances. The ethical culture movement is an institution of to-day; starting in an age that has been freed from a multitude of strong delusions which clouded men's judgment and sharpened their prejudices. To-day the field of thought is well cleared and greatly enlarged by a thoroughness of religious criticism and an extent of scientific exploration then undreamed of. The new movement has the advantage in all this. It stands forth in the freshness and freedom of youth. Its loins are well girded. It trails no cumbering traditions behind it. It has no inherited sentimentalisms to treat with and pacify. It has no conventionalisms of old respectability to keep up. It can give all to truth and duty.

Surely there is good ground for high hopes for such a movement. It was wanted, and it came. It sprang up in obedience to a growing demand in the changed conditions of religious thought. And those who flatter themselves that it is wanting in vitality, or that it will prove an insignificant or short-lived movement, are, we believe, mistaken.

Nevertheless, we remain a church. Nor have I any expectation that in the coming time the church will be wanted less than now. I think it will be wanted more. Not any and every church, but the right church; the church of reason, fraternity and hope; the church of truth, of righteousness and of love. If we are able to grow into or become that church, then we shall be wanted. Not less and less, but more and more. If we have not this power of development, this sense of consecration to the great needs of the world, then we shall decline and be displaced; and some other church will rise to shame our unfaithfulness.

Now, let us look at some of the differences between a church like our own and a Society for Ethical Culture. We have seen wherein their objects are the same, viz., to develop human character, to enable men to live upon a higher plane of helpfulness and duty. But the method is different.

They say ethics is first, conduct is supreme; so say we. They say theology is to be ignored, is out of court—virtually has no rights which any man is called on to respect. Not so, say we. We believe in rational theology. And while we will not allow it to be the standard by which men are judged; while we will not permit the acceptance or non-acceptance of its phrases to be the condition upon which we form our religious fellowship, yet, we refuse to lock our lips on that subject, and thus discourage freedom of thinking or conference on its lofty themes. The moral sense is first and last, is constant and fundamental, throughout the entire experience of man in his struggle after perfection. But that power which assembles, in its majestic unity, all the conditions of our little life; that Universal Being on whose lap we lie to work out this problem of our character and our life; the Supreme Ideal rising high over all human realizations, upon which our highest thought; center, and toward which our deepest aspirations turns moreover, that question of immortal life which in all ages has made us ask of the infinite, if this atom which we call man, possessed of certain spiritual qualities, is dead when it changes its form, perishes just where it passes out of sight,—these thoughts of God and of Immortality we are not ready to rule out of our assemblies. Nor are we by any means certain that ethics is entirely “independent” of them. It can not be if these ideas have any influence upon sentiment or life.

The very fact that we entertain these conceptions, that we find them interesting and even commanding, making it impossible to ignore them, doubtless leads to and creates the most conspicuous difference in our administrative methods. In an Ethical Society, not only would a theological theme seem to be out of place; but that language which is the product of a theistic spirit would be unsuitable to its purposes. If their work is to be carried on and their instruction is to be given “independent of theology”, as some of their declarations imply, they would seem to be limited to the use of secular language and literature. Think, however, what this exclusion, if admitted, must signify! What men have said and sung out of their deepest experience and holiest emotions, if couched in theological phrases, if uttered under the impulse of worship, if clothed in the utterances of prayer, could hardly take a place in their services. Not only the great body of psalms and hymns of all the ages, but the Bibles of all religions; and what a large part of all the literature of devout genius—and scarcely a great work of art or of letters exists which was not conceived and executed in the theistic spirit—all must be in some sense inappropriate for habitual use, if not for reading at all, in a society that is organized on a professed purpose of excluding theology from its discussions and from its thought.

For ourselves we should not like to limit ourselves on any side of human learning or human culture. Some have tried to confine the church to certain narrow bounds of sacred literature. Only prescribed portions of the canonical scriptures and the authorized liturgy were fit to be read there; the only language to sing was that of the Jewish Psalms. Now the psalm book broadened into “Watts’ and Select,” then into a choice from all the ancients and moderns who had embodied beauty and praise in lyric verse. Beyond the canonical Bible men reached out into the apocryphal writings,—then into other sacred works of the past; until now from many a liberal pulpit, Unitarian or otherwise, you may hear a scripture lesson from a modern as well as from an ancient saint.

But the use of the language of worship, if employed in an earnest spirit, is a part of the service of worship. Now, worship is not recognized as a factor in the methods of an Ethical Society. With us it is otherwise—we have not given up worship, nor dreamed of making it a necessity for any to do so. We approve of worship, which in our services means a tribute rendered to the highest worth we know. And while I think there ought to be greater flexibility in our devotional forms, permitting even that Quaker liberty of silence rather than repeating any language of prayer into which the heart does not enter—this in the interest of absolute sincerity—yet to be of a religious institution which prohibits worship or prayer altogether, this seems to me a limitation of liberty which we do not need. License in the direction of devout utterance does not seem to be our special danger.

Again, and closely related to the office of worship, we have certain services which we have dared to call by the old name of sacraments, which means simply the symbols of sacred emotions, the emphasis with which we celebrate sacred events. Some of us are accustomed to these, and like them. We find them natural and helpful so far as they really and sincerely express and hallow the feeling of our hearts. When the child is born into the household we are glad to rejoice together in the circle of the larger family we call the church, over the babe that is henceforth to be of our company. When youth and maid, or those older grown, are drawn into that relationship of union which means a life for each other, the founding of a home, then it seems right that, in the face of these marriage obligations, religion should be called in to deepen the impression and bless the purpose. And when death darkens not only the windows of our souls, but all the outlook of our hearts, again it does us good to lift a thought upward to the infinite light and calm, and to look forward, if we may, with a bright hope, if not with complete assurance, that the future keeps for us all and more than all that we have loved and lost. Now, these rites and sacraments, if not expressly prohibited by the terms of organization of an ethical society, are unprovided for,—apparently because their work is independent of theology.

And yet I was glad to know that the brave men who represent this new phase of religious development were coming to plant their organization here. I believed there was need of it, and room in St. Louis for men who were willing to make the sacrifices which they have shown themselves capable of making; willing to bear the odium which they have had to bear; believed they saw in this new form of organization a means of helping men join together for needed work, of leading them up to a higher plane of conviction and of life. I saw around us, as you see in this great city, many good men and women who, for one cause or another, feel themselves out of place in any church. Some have reacted against the despotism and unreason of an inherited theology until the very name of church, or preacher, or worship, or Bible, is a sort of red-rag to rouse in them all the antagonisms of their natures. And yet, as I said, these may be good men of conscientious conduct, whom we respect for their honor. They may be men, also, who crave a religious fellowship in the place of that which has been lost. Deep down in their natures they are not less religious than others, than ourselves. They are moved by the same affections, they are struck dumb by the same sorrows, they are confronted by the same problems, and they wish their children instructed in all these high moral duties which will make them upright, generous and self-respecting members of the community. Shall we not rejoice, then, that the Ethical Society offers in its fellowship and aims a grateful opportunity and an admirable instrumentality for their use? And when I consider the careful and laborious preparation which the leaders of the Ethical movement have undergone to fit them for their work, the courageous and true spirit with which they have entered upon it, and the already apparent fruits of these organizations in the citier where they are already established, I feel that we owe them our heartiest respect, and that we cannot withhold from them our unfeigned sympathy as co-workers with us in our efforts to lead men to surer and higher standards of well-doing.

I should do injustice to these men if I left the impression upon your minds that either the societies or the lecturers themselves were by any conditions of the movement necessarily either atheistic or agnostic. I believe the contrary could be more safely affirmed. And yet if worship, which seems the blossom of our church life, is made to seem rather a blemish in their administration, we must keep in mind the reactionary class, whose wants the ethical society is meant to serve. It must be left out of the polity of their organization. Nevertheless I believe that in the coming time,—though they will never depart, as they should not, from the ethical basis and constitution of their fellowship,—we shall find them gradually developing a ritual and sacraments for their use. The spirit of religion, the spirit of reverence and trust and a sense of the infinite, is strong in all the leaders of this cause. No men are more sensitive to all the poetic and emotional influences of life. Behind them, from Felix Adler down to the latest member of the fraternity of lecturers, lies an ancestry of religious feeling and religious faith. We may safely assume that it has been with pain, with struggle, with deep sense of loss, though with the resolves of unfaltering conviction, making the path of duty clear, that they have severed themselves from the churches and from the faiths of their childhood, to do in our day their much-needed work.

If only we, as Unitarians, as believers in a liberal church, might be found as ready to act upon our convictions, as ready to make sacrifices and bear reproaches, as ready to serve our fellow-men as these, a new day would dawn upon us. When we can send forth young men into new and untried fields, so admirably trained, so thoroughly filled with patient purpose and high resolves, there will be no lack of liberal churches and no lack of men and women seeking admission to their fellowship.

J. C. L.

Do We Want a Fellowship Resolution?

Two years ago the Western Conference was asked by its secretary to put into some simple form of resolution its faith, to express "the deep central things for which Unitarianism stands". The matter was much discussed for a year, and last spring at Cincinnati,—whatever else the Conference did or failed to do,—it refused to say, "The Western Conference stands for" anything. UNITY, with one voice, has opposed all such expressions of faith by the Conference; not because its editors, or the Unitarian churches composing the Conference, have no faith, not because they are not willing to stand for that faith in all ways that seem to them right, but because they are unalterably opposed to defining the Unitarian movement or Unitarian name, in abstract or theological terms, in any way that may ever be authoritative. In this unalterable disposition we feel that we have the whole history of the Unitarian movement behind us. The best men, the great majority of all the best among us to-day, nearly all of the original leaders of the Unitarian movement in New England, have been united in the opinion that Unitarians should never write their creed, and make their definition authoritative. Nevertheless, it has been against written creeds, and creeds used as tests of fellowship, that is, as defining what Unitarianism is, or what a Unitarian must or must not be, that their arguments have been directed; and at the same time and all the time, the truth has been reiterated, we have a creed, in sense of real beliefs which we hold in common, and which are very dear to us. Had it not been true that Unitarians have always had a real creed in this sense, nobody would ever have supposed that there was ever such a thing as a Unitarian denomination or sect. It is a fact, that in most cyclopedias and books of reference concerning the Christians of this country, Unitarians are set down as one body of Christians, or religious people. And by all their work and their history they have deserved the good name that has been given them. The good works and the noble history correspond to the great and noble creed which Unitarians have always held, and as a general thing have not denied holding. When some one has said that we are creedless, the meaning has been simply that we have not defined our creed by vote, and made its acceptance incumbent upon those entering one of our churches or even our ministry. No doubt this refusal to limit or define our creed has cost us much, in the way of numbers and power, as a religious denomination. And Unitarians, it is probable, have generally understood how much they were losing in this refusal; but they were acting on principle. They would not abandon the principle of a free and open fellowship on account of any gains in numbers or organic strength. Upon this principle, the Conference last May refused to even state the purpose for which it existed. This seemed to many people carrying our love of liberty to an almost absurd extreme. Mr. Sunderland had, for the most part, ceased to urge that we should name the great central things for which Unitarianism stands, but was only urging that we should declare the purpose for which the Conference exists to be something religious and Christian. It did seem following an idea to a great length to refuse to say in a simple resolution, so straightforward and true a thing, as, that "this Conference exists to promote the religion of love to God and love to man". But to the sincere, religious and Christian people composing that majority, all of them religious and most of them Christians, it seemed necessary to refuse for consistency's sake.

But did not the Conference then proceed immediately to do an inconsistent thing, in passing a resolution defining our fellowship? The resolution has been recently interpreted as merely declaratory of the conditions of fellowship already existing among Unitarian churches; but is there any difference here between declarative and legislative? Practically, there is not, however it may seem verbally. If a Conference by majority vote declares its fellowship to be conditioned so and so, that settles the matter for all honorable men. All those, if there are any, who have been accustomed to act upon different principles in regard to fellowship, will feel excluded by such resolution. The Cincinnati resolution for all practical purposes might as well have said, "No one ought to come among us and call himself a Unitarian, unless he is willing that all people shall be called Unitarians who wish to join us and help establish truth, and righteousness, and love in the world." Now, there happen to be a good many people in the west who have always thought themselves Unitarians, who have always passed as such, who have believed that a Unitarian must, of necessity, be a Christian. The Cincinnati resolution disfellowships these, obliges them to withdraw because the majority of the Conference has said in effect, "We do not wish anybody with us who is not broad enough to welcome as Unitarian everything that wishes to come under the flag to work for truth, righteousness and love." Truth, righteousness and love are great and noble words, but should we set up any words as a shibboleth? Is it worth while to pass any resolution on the subject of fellowship that results in disfellowship and division? We lived many years peacefully and harmoniously without a fellowship resolution; why can we not rescind this unfortunate one passed at Cincinnati and go on without any? Because it is a true word and a great and noble utterance? But, from the discussion that has arisen, does it not seem doubtful whether it is true? Is it not evident that there are Unitarians who do condition their fellowship on dogmatic tests, though unwritten, and who are not willing to welcome to their fellowship all who profess to work for truth, righteousness and love? Of course minorities cannot always be considered; minorities must submit or secede sometimes. To be sure it is doubted, and there is reason for the doubt, whether the majority of Western Unitarians believe that the Unitarian name does not necessarily signify Christian or religious. But we will pass this for the present. But at any rate, is this a case where it is so necessary to pass a resolution, that it must be done, even though division be the known result? It may be said that there should be no division, that all ought to submit to so easy a yoke, to be willing to bear so light a burden as this. But, put the burden on the other shoulder. Mr. Sunderland and his friends think in all reason that all Unitarians ought to be willing to bear the light yoke of the name Christian.

A resolution concerning fellowship may contain just as arbitrary a shibboleth as a resolution concerning belief. One who is excluded because he finds himself too narrow in his conceptions of what Unitarianism is to welcome as fellow Unitarians all that his brethren wish to welcome as such, is just as really excluded as he would be if "made to feel that he ought to go" because he believed too little of a certain sort of theology. Now, if it is a matter of conscience with us to say this word in regard to fellowship, why then it must be said, whatever the consequences. But is it a duty? Is it not purely a question of expediency, whether we now or ever pass a resolution in regard to fellowship? Nay, it has even been urged that it is unecumenical for the Conference to pass any resolution on the subject, and with this opinion I agree; but if congregational, it is yet impolitic because its effect is to exclude so many of our brethren.

Of course it will be said that it is not this resolution that excludes these brethren, but the refusal to pass that, declaring a Christian purpose. But had we stopped with that refusal we would have been on defensible Congregational ground. Every one could have been brought to see that we were consistent, and had a reason for our action. The condemnation that would have fallen upon us for refusing to say anything upon either belief or fellowship, would have carried little weight among Unitarians in general; but to refuse Christian and theistic resolutions for fear they might be made tests of fellowship, and then to turn right about and set up a test of fellowship, albeit the test is purely a matter of fraternizing ability, this is what makes it appear that we wished to legislate upon fellowship, and put a new meaning into the name Unitarian. The truth is, fellowship belongs to the churches, and not to the Conference as such, at all. It has no right on this subject, nor on that of belief, to say a word as a Conference until it says it with no voice of dissent. No Conference should say "we fellowship", nor "we believe", so long as one church cannot join in the we. To say the word sooner, even as the "voice of the majority only", and as binding on them only, is saying to the dissenters, "There is the door, and you see we are unanimous if only you were outside." To do this in the name of breadth and liberty and prophecy, does not better it. Why need we do it? Why not simply refuse all resolutions on these subjects, until we can make them unanimous?

U.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Barriers Overthrown.

I look upon my work, and sadly cry,
 "Undone, undone—how can I e'er tear down
 The barrier raised between my toil and crown?"
 I saw afar those brighter regions lie,
 Which courage sought to conquer, aiming high
 To build the fabric of my fair renown.
 Ambition foiled, all hope in tears I drown,
 And curse the fate my deeds could not defy.

"Oh scale the battlement", again I hear,
 "Unfurl the ensign of a prouder soul;
 Let all thy spirit's strength at once appear
 In thine own uplifting. Undwarfed and whole,
 Thy nature yet can stand in the white flame
 Of that divinity, from whence it came."

VIRGINIA G. ELLARD.

Browning in Chicago.

A story is told that Browning, dining with some Americans, when the conversation turned on the recent interest in his poems, asked one of the guests, a resident of New York, if he knew in what city on this side of the Atlantic the largest number of his books were sold. The gentleman replied that he should like to think it was his own, but that he supposed he must say Boston, upon which Browning quietly corrected him by saying "Oh, no; it is Chicago."

At first sight it might have appeared that there was little in the second annual meeting of the Chicago Browning Society, held April 11, to bear out this assertion, for the attendance was unexpectedly small even to the least sanguine member in attendance. But the president reminded us that numbers is only one means of estimating the worth or interest in a good cause, quoting the poet's words, "The size of things in this world, the sort of things in the next." But though small in numbers the meeting proved to be quite a representative one in the reports which were given of the work going on at different centers in the study of the most inspiring poet of the age. The rapid growth in the west of the interest in Browning during the past four years is almost phenomenal. Probably no writer, much less poet, has received such loving and diligent study, study at once so helpful and enlightening to both the head and heart of the student, as this one. I cannot help thinking that one of the most inspiring features of this study lies in the fact that it is the study of a living author, though I once heard the singular postulate laid down by an intelligent critic and scholar, that no writer could be made the proper subject of class and club work, such as has recently begun to be given to Browning by his contemporaries, the reason being that no interpretative study of an author should be necessary during the age in which he lives. We may concern ourselves to advantage with the difficulties of Dante and Homer, since each wrote in an age widely remote from ours, and must be judged by the life and standards of his own time; but the difficulties and obscurities of Browning are malice prepense in their nature, wilful and deliberate, and the poet who will not write so that at least his own age can understand him deserves neglect and oblivion. The growing number of Browning circles and clubs offers a better reply to this kind of criticism than any other. The fact that Browning is read and studied, to the growing profit of all who are engaged in such study, outweighs all the labored arguments to prove that he is not worth study.

The work of nine or ten Browning societies springing directly from the work in our own city was reported with more or less fullness at the annual meeting of the Chicago society. The more distant sister-cities of St. Paul, Minneapolis, Quincy and St. Louis received a word of mention from the president, who had visited all of them and was instrumental in many cases in starting the work. The outlying towns of Oak Park and Evanston were also represented. In the former place the work is just begun, a small class of women meeting every other week, beginning with the love poems, and the biography of the poet and his wife which these poems naturally lead to. The class, I believe, is under the leadership of Rev. Augusta Chapin. No more interesting report was given than that by Professor Bradley, of Evanston. The class there is in its third season, and the professor spoke with much animation of the good results of this work. Two or three facts had particularly impressed him. One was the social variety represented in the membership of the class, its members being drawn from quite different social classes and grades. Another was the contrast presented between the work of a Browning class and that of one engaged in the study of almost any other poet, in the moral earnestness which the former continually evoked. It is not the merely cultured but the really earnest and thoughtful mind which cares to take hold of Browning. Still another thing that had struck him was the continued elevation of the themes and sentiments which came up for discussion in such a class. Here is no chance for triviality or shallowness, where every poem that is read and every question that it raises turns upon the deepest problems of life and conduct. This is not to say, however, that a grave-faced seriousness must pervade the true Browning assembly. That would be impossible in the study of any writer with so marked a love of the humorous, running often into the ludicrous and even grotesque, as the author of "Pacchiarotto" and "Up at a Villa". Reports were given of the work going on in different parts of the city, there being at present four classes engaged in the study of Browning; but space is lacking for fuller mention of their labors. The literary part of the programme was supplied in a paper on Paraelsus, by Mr. F. I. Carpenter, which included a careful analysis of the poem, followed by a critical comparison of its merits with other poems of its class, the "Manfred" of Byron, Shelley's "Alastor" and Goethe's "Faust". The election of officers for the ensuing year substituted the names of Rev. David Utter and Mrs. McCormick for those of the retiring President and Secretary, Rev. J. L. Jones and Mrs. Mitchell, both of whom felt obliged, from pressure of other duties, to decline re-election. The report of the secretary showed that but one of the seven meetings planned for at the beginning of the year had failed. The publication work of the society consists in a small hand-book, "Outline Studies" of Browning; and, as the treasurer's report shows a gratifying balance on the right side of the ledger, other helps of this kind may be expected. I should also speak of the musical accompaniment arranged by Mr. Reginald DeKoven for the song in "A Blot in the Scutcheon", "There's a Woman Like a Dewdrop", which Mr. DeKoven has generously offered to publish and dedicate to the society.

Thus our many-sided poet, poet of art as well as of thought, makes his way, finds and is welcomed by his own. And this is the sweetest compensation either life or art affords. Of him, too, it will be said and may now be said,

"As he willed, he worked:
And, as he worked, he wanted not, be sure,
Triumph his whole life through, submitting work
To work's right judges, never to the wrong,
To competency, not ineptitude."

C. P. W.

Divinity.

Not what the wise men say,
Nor what the good may do,
Not where the wrong may slay
Or justice makes us true.

Something: confined, it flees;
Nothing: if scorned, 'tis here—
Found in the eye that sees:
Sung in the equal ear.

Less and yet more than all—
We love, and it is love:
Seen in this whirling ball
It lights the stars above.

Dreaded, it comes to thee—
Allured, it hies away—
Yet o'er the outmost sea
It gives to man the day.

H. L. T.

Christianity in the Western World.

It seems that the Anglo-Saxon, the Celtic, the Teutonic and Indo-European races were well adapted, geographically and constitutionally, to receive the doctrine of Christianity. It aimed a blow at caste, class and aristocracy, being purely catholic and democratic in its principles. It taught international and mutual co-operation, emphasizing human brotherhood. It is a slow-working leaven among a people given to deep-seated prejudices and characteristic educational systems. It flourishes not where faith is strongest, but where reason is imperial, and it grows rapidly as a principle, not where it is taught as a foe to the world, but a friend to the lover of nature. It takes on a peculiar type as man, under all variety of conditions, views it, and it becomes dogmatic or theoretic as it blossoms into Calvinism or Wesleyism. As practical morals, its aim can never be gainsaid. As a religion, it is an abiding source of inspiration. Victor Hugo did not catch the Christ spirit when he had himself painted standing on a craggy mountain, commanding the witness of God to his genius. But that little girl caught a glimpse of the divine nature who, the other day, approached the coffin of her dead, yet unworthy mother, and placed an immortelle on her bosom. We all caught it when, unmindful of reward or praise, we helped an abandoned child of God back to honor, spoke a precious word to a sorrowing woman, or bore the slander of a worthy friend.

Christianity as a dogma or mere belief has deluged the continents with blood, has given us the horrible scenes of Smithfield and Oxford, and furnished material for the erection of the scaffold. It has been stated by good authority that in the year 1881 there were over fifty clergymen of the orthodox persuasion in the New York state prison, at Auburn. Half, if not three-fourths of the inmates of state penitentiaries and county jails have been and are believers in some form of Calvinism. The darkest ages in the history of man were those when reason was dethroned, when mere faith paralyzed the world with a fanaticism which drove men and women mad, causing them to brutally murder with the hope that a crown awaited them in the hereafter. Contemplate this picture and then ask yourself by what can orthodoxy be vindicated if it makes men violent—not lovers of humanity? Yet, men would rather believe error, they would rather bend the knee to a superstition, than take truth fresh from the hand of God. When Christianity becomes, as we feel it is, duty to the poor, the abandoned, the helpless, the erring,—when it returns to the willing service of Jesus, when it ceases to be mere belief or theology, when it becomes one with all moral reform,—then will we see a more rapid growth in the intellectual and moral condition of mankind.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

It Cannot be Done.

EDITOR OF UNITY: It is not perhaps quite true to history, to say: Revolutions never go backward. It would certainly be absurd to say that progress proceeds in that direction.

That Unitarianism is both a revolution and a progress, must be clear to all well informed minds. If therefore it takes a step toward the rear, it must in that act, and so far, cease to be what it now is. It cannot even stand still and continue to exist, except as reminiscence. It must go steadily forward in order to live. On more occasions than one the attempt has been made to either crystallize or reverse the work of this great religious denomination. So far, the wisdom of its friends has kept it moving in the line of its true destiny. It is doing to-day, even more nobly and successfully than ever before, the work for which it was called into being. All its chief functions have been well tried and pronounced good.

We may, therefore, question the wisdom of any proposed radical change in the policy of the Unitarian church. Only the most strenuous causes, only the most insurmountable obstacles, should alter the present line of policy. Indeed, we may go so far as to say: if any obstacle lying in the road is of mountainous proportions, that obstacle may perhaps better be tunneled, and keep the church in rectilinear motion, rather than allow the church to make a curve in its path. It is well known that going around an obstacle does not remove it. No statesman ever conceived the American nation as an absolute unit. Besides the separate states, which must ever have their separate interests, there is, and always will be, a North, a South, an East and a West. To ignore these, is to be false to truth. The unity of the nation is best conserved by recognizing the mutual but respective interests of these various sections.

Now, the Western Unitarian Conference came into being, naturally, under the law of evolution. It was a necessity, and so it came to us. The same forces that created it still exist, and demand its perpetuation. It has not, by word or deed, forfeited its life; neither has it destroyed its power for good. Its worth to the world is not less, but more, than it was a decade of years ago. Per se, it is none the worse for being an institution of the west. Relatively, its value is greatly enhanced by this fact. It may be that only those who live and work in the west may feel the full force of this truth. But the Western Conference is bone of our bone, linked to our memories, our sympathies, and our warmest love. It is not, even in our estimation, the masterpiece of perfection, nor always endowed with the highest wisdom; but such as it is it is a necessity to our religious life.

This fact needs no argument to prove it, and no argument can disprove it. The Western Conference is a manifold cord, vital to the highest degree, that

1. Holds our Western Unitarians together.
2. That keeps us in co-operation with the parent A. U. A. of the east. If its functions be lessened or limited, it must live a feeble life. If it dies, there are thousands of hearts and homes that will die with it. It has had a noble history, and it has before it a noble future. Its powers should be increased, not diminished. With a rapidly increasing population, the demand for a Western Unitarian Conference is proportionately increased. Nothing but the baldest sophistry can make any important modification of our western work appear reasonable.

Let us grant there are difficulties in the way. Not one nor all of them can be commensurate with the life of the Western Conference to western people. Let me speak as a western man for western Unitarians, and say, that we are conscious of no antagonism toward the east; and, that we believe we are pleading for the highest interests of our national Unitarianism, when we ask that the west shall be allowed to do its work as heretofore, somewhat in its own way. The west will not go backward.

T. P. WILSON, M. D.

ANN ARBOR, MICH., March 29, 1887.

EDITORS OF UNITY:—Would UNITY like a brief letter from the capital of the Old Dominion and the ex-capital of the ex-confederate states? If so, you may print this scratchy writing, with a public pen at a hotel writing-desk, by one who is away temporarily from his northern post, seeking new physical energy in an escape from New England spring blasts.

We hear much in these days of the new south. Richmond is a good specimen of it. I find here to-day an entirely different city from what I saw on a visit within a year or two of the close of the war. Then the business part of the place was still largely a mass of ruins, the result of the conflagration which was one of the last desperate acts of the collapsing rebellion. And everywhere were marks of the first struggle and of the sacrifices to which the southern people had subjected themselves to continue the conflict. Now, Richmond is a growing, enterprising, prosperous city. It gives evidence of having abundant business. On its streets of residences, some of these residences palatial, there are marks of ample wealth and luxury. The population is 80,000 or upwards,—30,000 colored. In proportion to such a population, one seldom sees, I think, in any city, so many comfortable and even fine dwellings. And a very large part of these houses are new. They have been built since the war and within the last ten years. New streets have been opened and the city has been largely extended. Important railroads now center here, which twenty years ago were not thought of; and real estate is booming.

It is evident, too, that the colored people are sharing, to a considerable extent, in this prosperity. One may see evidences of poverty among them, and it is very likely that they still suffer hardships which do not appear on the surface of things. But, as one sees them on the streets, they appear about as well off as the laboring population of most cities. On Sunday they are well dressed. They ride in the horse-cars without molestation. An edifice, called "a college", has just been erected in the city for colored girls. One of the first militia regiments of the city has two colored companies belonging to it. The question has arisen whether these colored companies shall be allowed to go with the regiment to the National Drill in Washington in May. A protest has been made by certain other regiments farther south, but their regimental commander says that these companies shall go. Governor Fitzhugh Lee says that they shall go, and that he shall be there with them; and the authorities that control the encampment at Washington say also that they are to come. A few days ago I saw in the hotel corridor a group of five or six members of the Legislature,—one of them was colored. He seemed to receive special attentions from his white fellow-members, one of them putting his arm affectionately across his back. This colored man may have been a democrat, for some of the colored voters have joined the democratic party, and when they take that step they are cordially welcomed and petted. This marks the revolution which the war produced politically. The south went to war to save and protect slavery. Now, even the democratic party, which plunged the south into the war for this purpose, welcomes the votes of these ex-slaves, and will even help to elect them to office, if thereby it can gain a present party end. In other parts of the south, doubtless, that party still thinks it can best gain its ends by intimidating the negroes from voting; but, in general, the negro in the south possesses at least a share of the power that goes with the ballot, and the white man knows and recognizes it.

Yet, notwithstanding this immense revolution with regard to the negro race, and the institution which was once the peculiar feature of the south, the southern papers, generally, still speak of the lost cause as a just and holy one. The confederate soldiers' monument, at Hollywood, says that it stands "for God and country"; and so, for the most part, I suppose the people still talk. That they made sacrifices and manifested heroism worthy of a just and holy cause, is most true; but history will ever bear record that the heaven-wide difference between the southern and northern cause in that struggle was that the north fought for country and universal liberty in it; the south for a divided country and negro slavery. It is, however, too much to ask, perhaps, that the southern people should publicly confess in words that their cause was wrong. Let it suffice that they make the confession in their action. They now honor loyally the stars and stripes, which yesterday I saw waving over the maimed soldiers in the confederate veterans' home in this city, and they would not move a hand to re-establish slavery if they could.

Richmond abounds in churches. The south was always pious; even in the old days of cock-fights, and duels, and slave-auctions, it never forgot its piety, and it is still pious. Judging from the throngs of people on the streets at service time, the churches are well filled; but there is not a liberal one among them,—except a Universalist church, which only has meetings occasionally. An attempt was made soon after the war to start a Unitarian society here, but it failed. Perhaps the result might be different now. Has not UNITY a missionary to send here to preach "Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion"? The new south should have a new gospel.

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

RICHMOND, VA., April 10, 1887.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—The Montana Industrial School for Indians, recently established by the American Unitarian Association on the Crow Reservation, has now more than half its present quota of pupils, and will probably be filled to its full capacity as soon as the roads become passable. Our earnest and faithful missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Bond and Miss Crosby, have their hands more than full, while the school equipment is very much less than full. There is a special need of boys' clothing. Most of the pupils are boys, while most of the clothing and material contributed is for girls. Gifts of new or worn clothing and material are solicited.

They need a kitchen, which must be built at once. Above all, they need a trained and intelligent woman to take charge of the cooking department and the cooking school. Is there not in our denomination some one who can meet this want, and who is ready for a moderate compensation to spend a year or two in this good work, gaining an interesting and valuable experience that will always be pleasant to look back upon? And are there not enough friends of the cause in our churches to thoroughly equip this, the "one lone, lorn, Indian mission school of our denomination", with all the facilities it requires for doing its needed and promising work? Mr. Bond, the Superintendent of this school, has the following assistants:

Mrs. Bond, Matron.

Miss May Crosby, Kindergarten teacher.

Miss Sarah Walker, Sewing Department, an Indian of Crow descent, educated at Hampton.

Mr. Geo. W. Hill, a Crow Indian, educated at Carlisle, in charge of boys, and general assistant and interpreter.

Miss Flora Wellknown, a Crow Indian from Carlisle, whose work as seamstress and laundress attracted attention at the New Orleans exposition, is engaged to take charge of the laundry work.

George Arbogast, farm hand, etc., now acting cook.

The government pays us $108 annually for each Indian pupil clothed, supported and instructed at this school. The limit is fifty. This will meet about one-half the expenses. The boys are to be taught farming and the mechanical trades, and the girls sewing, cooking, laundry work, etc.

The Dawes bill, which is now a law, gives the Indian his land in severalty, and the rights of an American citizen. As Professor Painter well says, "After long and arduous effort the friends of the Indian have secured the conditions under which it is possible to develop the manhood they believed lay dormant in these people. They must not fail to" the responsibility which they have incurred. Having at last got him into a school where it is possible to teach him, they will be guilty if they do not give themselves heartily and laboriously to the work of teaching."

We have not been able to pay off the whole of the debt on this Indian school building. Will not our friends promptly and generously respond to our appeal for contributions in aid of this Indian work?

J. F. B. MARSHALL.

DEAR UNITY:—A belated response, but not less cordial. Turning over a quantity of "cyclone" papers and documents, not touched for more than a year, and since buried still deeper by earthquake, I fell, with surprise, upon an invitation from UNITY to lend a hand to its thought and work. By some strange miss, I never saw this invitation before.

Of course, such hand as I have is yours in so good a work, and such thought as I have is yours, to aid in so broad and prophetic truths. I have read UNITY in all its history. Sometimes its positions have seemed a little too pronounced, and its thoughts a bit rarefied; but I have so often in an hour of spiritual fainting found my soul exhilarated by its thought, and in an hour of contention delivered and adjusted by its high position and broad outlook, I come to look to it with great sympathy and gratitude. Its work has told for good in the past. It holds a position now that commands my deep respect for its noble breadth—too large for those who do not think generously, or who have a dogmatic point to carry. Its main positions, justly understood, are so in line with the principles of our church, to say nothing of the principles of Jesus, I rejoice at every good presentation of them, and grieve when I see them misrepresented or ungenerously condemned.

E. C. L. BROWNE.

CHARLESTOWN, S. C., April, 1887.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in Their Day. By Robert Browning. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., pp. 187. $1.25.

This book opens with a prologue, antique in form, but modern in thought, in which Apollo pleads the cause of Admetus, the representative man, with the Fates. It closes with an epilogue describing a scene in the workshop of John Fust, the inventor of printing. In the book the poet interviews seven almost forgotten worthies, all of whom have been in their graves for over a hundred years. The poet talks to and with them from the superior vantage ground of a later age. These seven ghosts belong to an old Holland writer, a learned Italian Jesuit, a poet whose masterpiece was written in a mad-house cell, a wicked politician who rose to position by means of his wickedness, a Florentine painter-priest, a Flemish painter who lost his eye-sight at fifty, and then continued to serve art by writing and teaching, and an old organist and band-leader of New Castle. The book is in the poet's most vigorous, characteristic method. It is vital and inspiring to him who is willing to study close thought, and to seek for subtle meanings; meaningless and provoking to the careless and hasty reader. The former student will find in this book a poet, scholar, patriot and man of society, standing at the close of nearly seventy-five years of life and study, with a cheerful confidence in progress. Browning believes we are going on and up. He has faith in the possibilities of soul, in the value of life's discipline. He believes in the sanctity of things near, in untrammelled fellowship, and in undogmatic piety. Unlike his illustrious contemporary, Tennyson, he is not afraid of democracy, has no distrust of science, and rejoices in the spirit of the age.

Channing was the best friend of thousands of laboring-men, who did not understand his words when living, and who do not read his words now that he is dead. Emerson is a helper of the Spirit to thousands who scarcely know his name,—he reaches them through his interpreters; and so Robert Browning is now speaking what seems a strange language, but which is to be interpreted into the glad life of better governments, more earnest and rational churches, simpler homes, clearer thinking, and truer living. In this latest contribution to English literature, the student finds a poet who believes that the kingdom of beauty, love and righteousness is the Kingdom of God. The last word in English poetry is "Courage" and the command is "Forward".

"Let age advance and teach that knowledge helps—
Not ignorance—the healing of the nations.

* * *

The past indeed

Is past, gives way before life's best and last,
The all-including Future!—What were life
Did soul stand still therein, forego her strife
Through the ambiguous Present to the goal
Of some all-reconciling Future soul?
Nothing has been which shall not bettered be Hereafter."

The Golden Legend. By H. W. Longfellow. With notes by S. A. Bent. Nos. 25 and 26 of the Riverside Literature Series. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1887. Price, 40 cents.

Longfellow's beautiful poem is well known; it is the "Notes" by Mr. Bent which gives this "school edition" special value. Every legendary, historical, local allusion—and the poem is full of such allusions—has its careful, well-compacted explanation. Where longer explanation is desirable, reference is given to books and pages. It seems like humble work, this baring of the prose foundations on which a poem has been built; but it is work which few can do very well, and which, well done, should win praise and thanks, especially from teachers. We hardly see how such work could be better done than Mr. Bent's. The dictionaries and book shelves have been searched, and just the wanted facts are brought out and laid below each question-making word. To be sure, there is danger in such, and the reader must beware. A poem read only in this way becomes a very mechanic thing; but read once in this way, it becomes forever afterward a more living thing. Give to a class this book and a good teacher, and cathedral, castle, convent, the prince and peasant, the minnesinger, the monk, both jovial and angelic monk, the nun, the scholastic, the physician, the pilgrim, and then the miracle-play, the street-preaching, the confessional, the relic-worship, the madonna-worship—all these scenes and figures of the Middle Age should start out to vision real; real—and Longfellow may be trusted for the romance. w. c. g.

The Story of the Nations: The Story of Persia. By S. G. W. Benjamin. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The Story of the Nations: The Story of Ancient Egypt. By George Rawlinson, M.A., with the collaboration of Arthur Gilman, M.A. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Two more of this useful series of books which are fast building a story-epitome of the world's history. The preface to the volume on Persia says: "This work differs from other histories of Persia, in giving more proportionate attention to the legendary period of her history than is usual with those who have dealt with this subject, as well as to the great career of the house of Sassan, which, in the opinion of the author, has never received full justice from those Christian historians who have undertaken a connected history of Persia." * * * A long residence in various parts of the East, including several years in Persia, has led the author to form a higher and, he thinks, a more just estimate of the character of the orientals than many European writers are willing to concede to them. The first six chapters are occupied with legendary history. Then come the more verifiable annals, beginning with the reign of Cyrus, about 558 B. C., and the story is conducted through Darius, Xerxes, Alexander, the Parthians, and so on to the Mohammedan conquest, and down to the present day.

The volume on Egypt brings down the history, not merely to the conquest by Cambyes,—as in the author's large work on Egypt,—but goes on further in three chapters entitled, "Three Desperate Revolts", "Nectanebo I.—A Last Gleam of Sunshine", and "The Light Goes Out in Darkness". The opening chapters treat of the "Land of Egypt", "The People of Egypt", "The Dawn of History", "The Pyramid Builders". Both books are excellently illustrated with cuts and maps, as is the case with all this series; both also have indexes, and both also are lamentably lacking in chronological helps, especially the volume on Egypt. As to Egypt, this may be accounted for by Mr. Rawlinson's remarks in his larger work concerning the almost hopeless obscurity of the chronological element in early Egyptian history, which is so great that the extreme estimates differ by more than 3,000 years. Rawlinson also asserts, in his larger work, the possibility of an instructive treatise without an exact chronology—which, of course, is true enough. Nevertheless it would help the readers of both books to have a chronological table such as some volumes of this series present; likewise to have a chronology incorporated in the text with the uncertainties and different estimates mentioned. In the case of the Persian volume, we know of no excuse for the omission.

Magazine of American History. Illustrated. Edited by Mrs. Martha J. Lamb, 80 Lafayette Place, New York.

This magazine opens for April with a very fine portrait of Henry Ward Beecher as frontispiece. The interesting article on the "Beginning of Journalism" is continued in this number under the title of the "Transition Period of the American Press", and is amply illustrated with fac-similes of newspapers issued between the years 1796 and 1803. Several fine portraits of the editors are also given. Other articles are on "Governor Spotswood's Horseshoe Campaign, 1716", "The Heartherly War", "John Van Buren", "The Fall of Fort Duquesne", "The Making of History in Alaska". The usual departments of Queries, Replies and Societies are given. Terms, $5.00 a year; 50 cents a number.

THE HOME.

Balder.

The story of Balder is one of the loveliest in the world. Balder was so good that he was very beautiful; wherefore he was called Balder the Beautiful, and also Balder the Good. Gentle and kind and patient—indeed, there was no way in which Balder was not good. Now, this good being had a mother who loved her beautiful son, and was very anxious about him lest he should be hurt; the more, because she heard there was a bad being who hated the good Balder, and meant to kill him. So the mother sought how she might shield her son, and at last she found a way which she thought was sure. She went all over the earth and made everything promise not to hurt the beautiful Balder; every kind of plant and every sort of stone, and waters, and winds, and clouds, lightnings, and everything, she made promise. Then she felt safe. But, alas! she had missed one little plant, called the mistletoe. She had overlooked that, because it had not a place of its own with roots in the ground, like other plants, but grew on branches of other trees. Now, the bad being, whose name was Loki, saw that Balder's mother had overlooked this one thing; so, then, he laid a plan to kill Balder with it, and yet not seem to do it himself. Now, Balder had a brother who was blind; nevertheless, they used to play together, and the blind boy, whose name was Höder, used to throw things at Balder in sport, hurling them thither whence he heard Balder's voice. And, then, Balder would run and touch his blind brother, and run away somewhere else, calling, "Throw again"; and so they had much sport. But Höder never could hit Balder with anything, although he threw very strongly and straight toward Balder's voice, because all things had promised Balder's mother never to hurt the beautiful boy. But one day the bad Loki came with a piece of mistletoe and put it into Höder's hand, saying, "Throw this." And when Höder hurled the mistletoe, it smote Balder and killed him. Then the poor mother wept bitterly, and was so wild and despairing in her grief, that Death said he would give up Balder from the death-home if all nature would bewail him with his mother. This was not difficult, for, indeed, all nature was crying for Balder; not a tree, not a rock, not a man, nor animal, anywhere, but was shedding tears. But at last, one old woman, very evil in face, was found, who had no grief. Now, this was the bad Loki, who had changed himself into this shape, so that some one earthly creature might seem not to be sorrowful for Balder. Then Death would not let Balder go. On this all the powers of heaven, very angry with the evil Loki, joined together and made war on him. He hid from them and changed his shape many times to conceal himself; but at last they caught him and shut him up in a dark cave amid jagged rocks. Then, when no longer the bad Loki had power, everything was found grieving for Balder, and most of all, the mistletoe that had hurt him. So then he returned from death-home, and all the world was glad, and the sun, which had been darkened, shone brighter than ever.

This is the story. It is a part of the religion of the Northmen, who lived in Iceland, Norway, and along the northern seas. Balder was one of their gods; so was Loki. Now, what shall we say of this story? That it is true, or untrue? In a small way, it is not true; but in a much greater way, it is true. No doubt, the simple Northmen believed it just as they sang it in their songs, as I have told it. Now, we know very well it could not have happened in that way. There are no gods like Balder, and Loki, and Balder's mother; and rocks, trees, waters, animals, neither make promises nor weep. Yet the story is true; for like all the others which I have told you, it was the language of this people by which they told all they knew and thought about evil. They were just like children, full of imagery without reasoning; full of feeling and life without knowledge. Therefore they spoke as children do, in stories, figures,—drawing pictures by words. Even in primitive times, when men are just like children, still they see that some things are good and some bad; then soon they see that the good is always struggling with the bad, and the bad with the good; then they see that it must be so; then, at last, that the good always prevails. But they know not what good means except good beings, or the bad except bad beings. So they speak their thoughts in stories of the struggles of the good and bad beings. Thus the story of Balder is a childlike language which says, "Where evil and good are, there is always a war, and the good conquers at last." Now this is true. Is it not true? This war has been called the "irrepressible conflict," between slavery and freedom, tyranny and justice, temperance and drunkenness, uprightness and fraud; wherever these are, they struggle together till the bad one is overcome; and no man can prevent the struggle or the end of it; and even when the good seems beaten and killed, soon it comes to life again, because all nature grieves. This is the meaning of the story. Now, the same meaning is found in stories in our Bible. There you will read about the Devil, called Satan. He is the Jewish and Christian Loki, just like Loki. About him are told the stories of the temptation of Jesus and of the misleading of many persons, and of the heaping of sickness and other evils on men. Jesus is made to say that he "saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven." All this means the struggle between good and evil, the "irrepressible conflict". Indeed, in the book of Revelation, 12th chapter, you may read about a war in heaven, angels doing battle with Satan and his minions. Thus in the cold North, where our forefathers lived, and in the warm Palestine, where the Jews dwelt and Jesus was born, the simple people told the same thought by like stories. These stories were their language. We know that neither the Northmen's tales nor the Bible stories could happen just so; but they both mean the same holy truth, and so are true stories.

J. V. B.

"EACH age must write its own books . . . Meek young men grow up in libraries, believing it their duty to accept the views which Cicero, which Locke, which Bacon, have given; forgetful that Cicero, Locke, and Bacon were only young men in libraries when they wrote these books."—Emerson.

NOTHING can exceed the stupidity of him who has been seared by the practice of vice. w. w.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Union Teachers' meeting considered Monday noon the third and fourth chapters of the Book of Daniel, Mr. Blake being leader. He began by calling attention to the style of Daniel, which was characterized as prolix and puerile, and tedious in comparison with the older prophets. Its wearisome prolixity was compared to that of legal documents, that repeat all particulars over and over. The story of the children in the fiery furnace was commended as a story, though we were advised to tell the children that it is not to be received as a statement of facts. The morality of the story is wholly in the 18th verse—the youths believe that Jehovah will deliver them; but they say, "But if not, we will not serve thy gods." The language of verse 25 should be "one like a son of the gods", and not "the Son of God" as in the common version. The meaning is that it was a divine messenger or angel, and has no reference to the Messiah or Jesus. Stress should be laid upon the date of this book, as the weight of authority fixes it at the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, 175 to 164 B. C., when the Jews met really for the first time Greek culture. We may well suppose that their faith and the destinies of many nations trembled in the balance at that time. Would the Jews' religion vanish, would these people be Grecized as others of their times were? The Maccabees and their party and followers said no, and the writer of the Book of Daniel reinforced the sentiment against Grecian influences so far as they affected religion. The "Watchers" spoken of in chapter iv are the angels that from this time among the Jews were believed in, guardian angels we would say. The story in chapter iv was compared to Longfellow's poem, "King Robert of Sicily," a valuable suggestion for teachers.

Lawrence, Kans.—The Conference of the Unitarian churches of the Missouri Valley was held in Lawrence, Tuesday evening and Wednesday, April 5 and 6, opening with a vigorous and inspiring sermon from our ever welcome secretary, Rev. John R. Effinger, upon the opportunities and privileges of our liberal churches. The audience was smaller than usual, owing to there being many other attractions at the same time, principal among which were a lecture by Rev. Anna G. Shaw, whose first appearance here has been eagerly looked forward to for some time, and who, coming on the evening of the day when women for the first time had exercised the right of suffrage, and who, consequently, were especially interested in that event, drew a crowded house; and a concert at the University which most of the students and young people attended.

We have learned, however, fully to believe in the blessing which comes to the two or three; and I think Mr. Jones used rather to inspire us with the feeling on such occasions that the goodness obtained was inversely as the square of the numbers present. But though our own people were not very well represented there was an unusually large number of friends from abroad, among whom were Rev. E. Powell, from Topeka, who read a paper upon Parasites, which was a plea for individuality and independence of thought,—politically, morally and religiously. Miss Leggett, who came with Mr. Powell from Topeka, and who has been helping him in his work there, read an essay upon "Why I am a Unitarian", which as an introduction to her thought and aspirations was very interesting. Rev. Mr. Griffin, from Marlborough, Mass., who is at present supplying the pulpit at Kansas City, and who led the morning devotional meeting, giving Prayer as the topic of thought; and Rev. W. Roberts, who is about to be installed as minister of the church in St. Joseph, who, laying aside his notes, spoke earnestly of the work of the liberal churches. Mr. Tucker, a former student of our University, now fitting for the ministry, was present. In addition to the above Arthur J. Marsh, formerly from Cambridge, Mass., but now professor of belles lettres in our University, read a paper upon Moral and Religious Education in our Universities and Colleges, which elicited a good deal of discussion. The Lawrence people had a dinner in the church basement, which was an opportunity for social meeting and visiting, and the whole session may be regarded as a most pleasant and profitable event.

S. A. BROWN, Sec'y K. S. U. C.

Minneapolis, Minn.—It is not often that a society under-estimates its growing capacity; but according to a local paper, Brother Simmons has been too modest. Our readers will be interested in this clipping:

"When the Unitarians commenced to plan for their church in Minneapolis, their reasoning was somewhat as follows: 'Unitarianism does not seem to take root and flourish in all sorts of soils, as do some of the isms. We recognize this fact and make allowance for it; at the same time we remain loyal to our church. It is not at all likely that there will be a congregation of more than three or four hundred. If our church is planned to seat 600, it will be plenty large enough.' Acting on that reasoning, the church was built. The leaders of the movement are now puzzled to find a place for stowing away 2,000 people in an auditorium planned for only 700 at the most. Any other church would 'colonize' and easily settle the problem in that way; but Unitarians have not much of the missionary spirit. More than one of them will say, 'If we can't hear Mr. Simmons we will not go to church at all.'"

Davenport, Iowa.—DEAR UNITY: Two years ago a church door lending library was established in Davenport, under the direction of the literature committee, and as the expense has been very light and the results encouraging, perhaps a little sketch of our ways and means may be useful to some UNITY readers. Two members of the literature committee furnished enough money to buy a good second-hand bookcase, with glass doors, and in this were placed the most advanced books from the Sunday-school library—which were of no use there—Channing, Clarke's Ten Great Religions, Martineau, etc., to which Mr. Judy and others added later books. These last were simply lent to the library. No books were bought for it. At the close of the year, in June, we found that twenty-four persons had taken books, and sixty-four books had been read. All the books were returned, usually within three weeks, in excellent condition. Encouraged by this indication of interest, the literature committee this year decided to place in the case a list of books desirable for the shelves, and to suggest that our people should buy such as they cared to possess, and lend to the church door library. The suggestion has already been acted upon. A number of new books have been put on the shelves lately, and we feel confident that interest in the reading increases. Of course many of our people read at home or in the public library many of the books we have at the church door; otherwise you might well say of us that we are not a reading society; and many of the books lent to the library have been well circulated before.—"No. 2."

Moline Ill.—The ladies of the Unitarian church of Moline carry on a Kitchen-garden for the children of the poor. On Thursday evening, April 8, they gave a Mother Goose entertainment, which netted them a hundred and thirteen dollars. The Moline Dispatch says: "The display of the work of the Kitchen-garden girls was a source of surprise to many people—a surprise that girls of such tender years should have become so proficient in the use of the needle, the rolling-pin and the cook-stove. The singing by these girls was also a pleasing feature; but the 'card' of the evening was the Mother Goose melodies in operatic and other familiar airs, and rendered by nineteen young ladies, including Mother Goose herself—all attired in appropriate costumes." The Unitarian women of Moline are in dead earnest in this work, and furnish an example which other churches would do well to follow. A most artistic hand-wrought menu was furnished with the supper, in which cold meats, Saratoga potatoes, salads, cake and coffee were interlarded with choice bits of poetry, and closing with "Twere good you do so much for charity."

Quincy, Ill.—We are glad to announce that Rev. C. F. Bradley, of Sandwich, Mass., has accepted a call to the Unitarian society at this place, and is to enter upon his duties about the first of May. We welcome the brother to an important field, and congratulate the society that they have found so earnest a preacher. We hope that Brother Bradley will arrive in time to receive the fellowship of the Western Conference.

Hinsdale, Ill.—F. K. Gillette, who now lends a helpful hand at the UNITY office, preached last Sunday to this hopeful society.

Berlin, Mass.—Rev. I. F. Porter begins his labors in this society about the first of May. Mr. Chandler Carter, recently deceased, left $20,000 to his town, $20,000 to the Unitarian church, and $10,000 to the Children's Mission at Boston.

Notice.—The programme of the Western Unitarian Anniversaries, in All Souls church, Chicago, May 17-20, is ready for distribution. It is proposed to circulate it through post-office mission committees. If those who desire extra copies for such use will notify the secretary, at 175 Dearborn street, Chicago, they shall be supplied. J. R. EFFINGER, Secretary.

The Western Secretary, J. R. Effinger, left Chicago on the 15th inst. for Duluth, Minn., to be absent until the 26th.

War Ahead.

There is great danger of war with Mexico in the near future, but at present we can pursue the arts of nappiness, prosperity and wealth. Wherever you live, you should write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, and receive free, full information about work that you can do, and live at home, earning thereby from $5 to $25 and upwards daily. Some have earned over $60 in $ day. Capital not required; you are started free. All as new; both sexes. All ages. Pay, as above guaranteed, from first start.

"Green Pastures."

This well-known poem by W. C. Gannett has been set to music by George Russell Lewis, and is published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago. 1.00 per hundred copies, or 2 cents per copy, post-paid

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

CHICAGO CALENDAR.

THIRD UNITARIAN CHURCH, corner Monroe and Laflin streets. J. V. Blake, minister. Service at 10:45 A. M.; discourse by W. M. Salter. The Literary Club Tuesday, April 26, 8 P. M. The Charity Section, Wednesday, April 27, 4 P. M. The Young People's Club, Friday, April 29.

CHURCH OF THE MESSIAH, corner of Michigan avenue and Twenty-third street. Pastor, Rev. David Utter. Services at 10:45 A. M. Sunday-school at 12:15.

UNITY CHURCH, corner of Dearborn avenue and Walton place. Minister, Rev. T. G. Milsted. Services at 10:45 A. M.

ALL SOULS CHURCH, corner of Oakwood boulevard and Langley avenue. Pastor, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Sunday, April 24, services at 11 A. M. Sunday-school at 9:30 A. M. The course of lectures on the great religious teachers of the world will be continued in the evening at 7:30. Subject: "Mohammed, The Arabian Prophet." There will be a course of lectures on Womanhood; or, Talks to Mothers and Daughters, on the following dates. Lectures begin at 3:30 P. M. April 22. "Narcotics and Stimulants."

By Dr. Julia R. Low. April 29. "Social Purity." By Miss Frances Willard. May 6. "Embryonic Wedlock."

By Dr. Leila G. Bedell. Season tickets, $1.00; single admission, 50 cents.

UNITED TEACHERS' MEETING at the Channing Club Room, 175 Dearborn street, room 93, Monday noon, April 25. Rev. Mr. Jones will lead.

The annual meeting of the Western Unitarian Conference will be held in All Souls Church, Chicago, May 17-19.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

- Masters of the Situation; or, Some Secrets of Success and Power. By William James Tilley, D.D. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. Cloth, pp. 338.
- The Latest Studies on Indian Reservations. By L. B. Harrison. Philadelphia: Indian Rights Association. Paper, pp. 233.
- The Volcano Under the City. By a Special Volunteer. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert. Cloth, pp. 350. $1.00
- Job and Solomon. By the Rev. T. K. Cheryne, M.A., D.D. New York: Thomas Whitaker. Cloth, pp. 309.
- Recitations and Readings. Compiled by Mrs. Anna Randall Diehl. New York and Chicago: J. S. Ogilvie & Co. Paper, pp. 122. .12
- Talks About Law: A Popular Statement of What Our Law is, and How it is Administered. By Edmund P. Dole. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 567. 2.00
- A Century of Electricity. By T. C. Mendenhall. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 229. 1.25
- A Half Century in Salem. By M. C. D. Silsbee. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 120.
- The Golden Legend. By H. W. Longfellow. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Boards, pp. 194. .40
- Christianity and Humanity. Sermons by Thomas Starr King. Edited, with Memoir, by E. P. Whipple. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 380. 1.50
- Pauline: Paracelsus; Sordells, etc. By Robert Browning. Riverside Edition. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 412. 1.75
- Dramatic Lyrics, etc. By Robert Browning. Riverside Edition. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 404. 1.75
- Theophilus Trent; Or, Old Times in the Oak Openings. By Benjamin F. Taylor. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. Cloth, pp. 250. 1.00

Free Traders

Who are disposed to examine the tariff question from the standpoint of their opponents, can find no more adequate and concise presentation of the protectionist theory than is afforded by the American Protectionists' Manual, by GILES B. STEBBINS, who is characterized by the Philadelphia Bulletin as "a prominent tariff advocate; industrious and conscientious, and with literary attainments of high degree." 192 pages; cloth, 75 cents; paper, 40 cents, postpaid. CHARLES H. KERR & CO., Publishers. 175 Dearborn Street Chicago.

10 GREAT NOVELS, a guide to the best fiction. 24 pp., 10c., mailed. Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago.

A Specific for Throat Diseases.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" have been long and favorably known as an admirable remedy for Coughs, Hoarseness and all Throat troubles.

My communication with the world is very much enlarged by the Lozenge, which I now carry always in my pocket; that trouble in my throat for which the 'Troches' are a specific have made me often a mere whisperer."—N. P. WILLIS.

Obtain only "Brown's Bronchial Troches." Sold only in boxes. Price, 25 cents.

If the Sufferers from Consumption,

Scrofula and General Debility, will try Scott's Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, they will find immediate relief and a permanent benefit. Dr. H. V. MOTT, Brentwood, Cal., writes: "I have used Scott's Emulsion with great advantage in cases of Phthisis, Scrofula and Wasting Diseases generally. It is very palatable."

Channing Complete for 25 Cents.

Channing's complete works, including "The Perfect Life", are published in one large paper-bound volume of over 800 pages, and we are able to offer a few copies at only 25 cents each. If sent by mail, 10 cents must be added for postage. Address

WESTERN UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY, 175 Dearborn street Chicago.

MANUAL TRAINING IN EDUCATION

BY JAMES VILA BLAKE.

Introduction by Prof. C. M. Woodward, Director of the St. Louis Manual Training School. This little book of 64 pages discusses the training of the hand as properly an integral part of Education. The relation of general and special Education, the need of hand-training for all classes, the dignity of hand-work, its influence on personal character, the relation of manual training to immigration and to the apprenticeship problem, and the present condition of the subject, are among the points treated—all in a very condensed way. Price in paper, 25c.; cloth, 50c., post paid. Address CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

POZZONI'S MEDICATED COMPLEXION POWDER.

Imparts brilliant transparency to the skin. Removes all pimples, freckles and discolorations. For sale by all first-class druggists, or mailed for 50 cts. in stamps by J. A. POZZONI, St. Louis, Mo.

"Unity Mission Tracts."

Designed to answer the question, What is Unitarianism? and to illustrate the Liberal Faith, Worship and Life.

UNITY Office, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

Each 5 Cents. Ten Copies, or Ten Selected, for 25 Cents

1. Natural Religion. By J. V. Blake. The Faiths of Reason.
2. The Religion of Jesus. By H. M. Simmons. A quaint appeal from Christianity to Christ.
3. Unitarianism as Shown in Western Church Covenants, etc. Short answers to "What is Unitarianism?"
4. About Prayer. By several writers. (1) "Shall we pray?" (2) "What does Prayer do for us?" (3) "How Pray?" (4) Poems.
5. Unitarianism: its Story and its Principles. By J. C. Learned. (1) Its Story from Bible times through the Trinity-growing centuries and the Reformation, up to to-day. (2) The Principles involved in this long struggle for Reason in Religion.
6. The Growth of Faith. By H. M. Simmons. Of Faith (1) as the feeling of Trust; (2) as a system of Beliefs.
7. Emerson's "Divinity School Address." No better entrance into Emerson than through this ever-fresh Address.
8. Jesus. By J. L. Jones. (1) The secret of his power. (2) How he "saves." (3) His relation to Christianity and to other teachers.
9. Missionary Work in Unitarian Churches. By T. Sunderland. A tiny hand-book of practical suggestions.
10. Songs of Faith, Hope, Charity. Set to Old Tunes. Fifty-one of our best-loved hymns and eleven familiar tunes. A five-cent hymn-book for young churches, etc. (No discount on this.)
11. The One Religion. By C. C. Everett. (1) One Religion, many Theologies. (2) What this one Faith is. At the end, Poems.
12. Responsive Services for Reading and Singing. In preparation. A five-cent service-book for young churches, etc.
13. The Quiet Moment. In preparation. A "Daily Strength" book.
14. God. 16. Miracles. 17. The Bible. Each by several writers.
18. Channing. 19. Parker. 20. Emerson (in preparation). 21. Martineau. Our Four Great Masters. Sketch of the life, and "Gospel passages" from works of each.
22. Is a Scientific Basis for Religion Possible? By M. J. Savage. Yes. (1) What is Science? (2) What is Religion? (3) Where are we now? Reviews eleven of man's permanent beliefs.
23. The Sympathy of Religions. By T. W. Higginson. No belief, no ritual, no ethics the monopoly of any one religion.
24. The Bible Regained. By J. C. Learned. Lost, first, through Catholic concealment, and then by Protestant idolatry; now being regained, no longer as the Book of God, but of man.
25. The Co-Education of Husband and Wife. By Mrs. S. C. L. Jones. (1) The Woeing. (2) The Wedding. (3) Home-Making and Child-Rearing.
26. The Religious Education of Children. By Mrs. S. C. L. Jones. In preparation.
27. What is it to be a Christian. By Jenkin Lloyd Jones.
28. Love to God and Love to Man. Forty-seven songs, most of which are adapted to "Revival" tunes. No discount on this.

AFTER DOGMATIC THEOLOGY, WHAT?

MATERIALISM OR A SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY AND NATURAL RELIGION, BY

GILES B. STEBBINS,

Editor and compiler of "Chapters from the Bible of the Ages," and "Poems of the Life Beyond and Within."

"God is the original life and force of all things."—Plato.

"Physiology reduces man to a jelly; Psychology lifts him to immortality."

"Sweet souls around us watch us still;
Press nearer to our side;
Into our thoughts, into our prayers,
With gentle helpings glide."
—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

One hundred and fifty pages: five chapters; Decay of Dogmatic Theology; What next?—Materialism—Negation—Inductive Science, external and dogmatic—A Supreme Indwelling Mind, the central idea of a Spiritual Philosophy—The Inner Life, Facts of Spirit-presence—Intuition—The soul discovering truth.

A FEW NOTICES.

"It aims to state materialism fairly, and to hold it as fragmentary and inconsequent; to give a wide range of ancient and modern proof of the higher aspects of the God-idea in history. The closing chapter, on intuition, gives some remarkable facts."—Delroit Post and Tribune.

"This compact and handsome book bears marks of careful study and wide research. Its chapter of facts of spirit-presence is especially interesting to those who would look fairly at important questions."—Saginaw Herald.

"We look for the best there is on this subject in his writings."—Unity, Chicago, Ill.

"The author finds the full disproof of 'materialism' in psycho-physiological science and in the facts of spirit-presence. Many inquirers will thank him."—Christian Register, Boston, Mass.

"He presents the loftiest inducements to a religion at once rational and inspiring, scientific and emotional, and shows that no true man need fear the obvious decay of dogmatic theology. I commend the book to all truth-seekers."—Epes Sargent, Boston, Mass.

Price, post-paid, 60 cts.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO.,

175 Dearborn Street, CHICAGO.

"We are struck with the general good judgment evinced in the preparation of the volume. . . . He has done a real service to the times in bringing together, within four hundred pages, so many noble and pure thoughts. . . . All minor objects, in plan and proportions, are gladly overlooked in consideration of its many and great excellences. Whoever buys it will receive many times the worth of his money."—FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

CHAPTERS

FROM

The Bible of the Ages.

FOURTEEN CHAPTERS.

Selected from Hindu Vedas, Buddha, Confucius, Egyptian Divine Pymander, Zoroaster, Talmuds, Bible, Plato, Pythagoras, Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, Al Koran, St. Augustine, Luther, Scandinavian Eddas, Tallestin, Milton, Penn, Adam Clarke, Mary Fletcher, Wesley, F. W. Newman, Frances P. Cobbe, Tyndall, Max Muller, Elias Hicks, Channing, Garrison, H. C. Wright, Lucretia Mott, Higginson, T. Starr King, Bushnell, Parker, Emerson, Denton, Tuttle, Frothingham, F. E. Abbot, and others.

Gospels and inspirations from many centuries and people.

"Slowly the Bible of the race is writ,
Each age, each kindred, adds a verse to it."

Edited and compiled by G. B. STEBBINS, Detroit, Mich.

A valuable book for all thinking readers. A great help to clergymen, and others, who would make fair comparison of religious ideas. Its extracts are without note or comment, save a brief appendix of dates and authorities. Thousands have been sold, the plates are worn out, and we are fortunately able to offer what are left of the sixth edition (no more to be printed) at a reduced price. It has been sold at $1.50. We mail it, and pay postage, at half that sum.

A solid cloth bound four hundred page volume.

PRICE, SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS.

. Any of our publications may be ordered through the trade, or will be mailed postpaid on receipt of price.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO.,
175 Dearborn Street, - - Chicago.

THE LEGEND OF HAMLET.

The Legend of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, as found in the works of Saxo Grammaticus and other writers of the twelfth century. By George P. Hansen, late U. S. Consul at Elsinore, Denmark. Edited by Charlie B. Simons. Square 18mo., 57 pages. Paper, 25 cents; Cloth, 50 cents.

"Invaluable to the Shakespearean student."—University Magazine.

"A very interesting tale of the mythical origin of the melancholy Dane."—Saturday Evening Herald.

"A careful reading of this work would make the play even more fascinating."—The Delphic.

"Mr Hansen was in a position to write a valuable treatise, and he did not lose his opportunity."—Cambridge Tribune.

"This small volume must not be judged by its size. In a vivid and charming way it gives us the legend of Hamlet—a legend which suggested Shakespeare's immortal tragedy. * * * It is a weird, strange story, one that must interest every reader."—Interior.

"It gives many facts not within the reach of ordinary readers in any cheap form."—Prof. William F. Rolfe, in The Literary World.

For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

BROWNING'S WOMEN.

BY MARY E. BURT.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY EDWARD E. HALE, D. D., LL. D.

There can be no doubt that Miss Burt has discussed Browning's women with intelligent fairness.—Chicago Herald.

Admirers of the poet will read her analysis of character with special pleasure.—Cleveland Leader.

There is a brightness and piquancy about the narratives that makes the book very readable.—Chautauquan.

The wonder grows upon us that Miss Burt has been able to weave so much of Browning's phrase with her own woof with little sacrifice of effect. The author is clearly a critical, careful, admiring student of Browning, from the standpoint of the literary club. The book can but meet with favor because of what it does, the way it does it, the spirit behind it, the power within it.—New England Journal of Education.

We can cordially recommend her little volume to not only individual readers, but to members of the Browning clubs who are endeavoring to make a special study of the poet.—Boston Transcript.

In her concise and graceful sentences she simplifies, analyzes and makes clear the deep ethical lessons of the author.—Inter Ocean.

Miss Burt will win many admirers by her style, which is very graceful and clear. She is ever dignified and at ease.—Chicago Tribune.

Every line of her study seems to have been weighed.—Chicago Daily News.

"Browning's Women" is certainly a most refined and scholarly tribute to the poet, with its lucid style and its polished accuracy of phrase.—Edgar Fawcett.

Cloth, 16mo, gilt top, 236 pages, price $1.00. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers,

CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY,
176 Dearborn Street, CHICAGO.

THE SOCIAL STATUS OF EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN WOMEN.

BY KATE BYAM MARTIN AND ELLEN M. HENROTTIN.

"A brochure bearing the title 'The Social Status of European and American Women' is attracting much attention * * * and will no doubt attain a wide popularity among thoughtful people of all classes throughout the country. It proceeds from the allied pens of Miss Kate Byam Martin and Mrs. Ellen M. Henrotin. The first portion of the little book is devoted to European women, French, German and English women being indicated by the phrase, and is written by Miss Martin. The second part relates to American women, and is written by Mrs. Henrotin. The descriptions of women named in both parts of the work are characterized by close observation, a keen sense of the peculiarities of the various classes, high ideas of female manners and morals, and practical, intelligent thought on the relations of women to the different forms of social order in which they are placed.

"Miss Martin's sketches of French, German and English women are taken from life and have a verisimilitude that is indisputable. * * * Mrs. Henrotin's sketch of American women is an effective picture of the women of the United States. * * * Many of its suggestions afford topics for profound thought, some for a slight degree of apprehension for the social future, and all are an incentive to labor and study for the advancement of the civilized agencies and for the success of all the means that may be adopted to render American girlhood, womanhood and motherhood the ripest and most consummate products of human culture and enlightenment.

"Each of these writers has a graceful style, clear as crystal, bright with the polish it has received, possessing extraordinary vigor, but the vigor of a cultivated female mind, not of a virile mind, and charming in its grace and simplicity. Women of cultivation and refinement who possess the taste, the understanding, the literary capacity and the leisure to place the results of their studies in social and domestic life before thoughtful readers of their own and the other sex, render an essential service to society and to women when they exercise their power in this respect."—Chicago Evening Journal.

Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

UNITY CLUBS.

The "Unity Club" is a Western institution, still in its infancy but rapidly growing. Historically, its origin has been connected with the Liberal Christian churches in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois and other neighboring states, but logically the name implies merely the purpose of uniting effort in reading, study, and interchange of thought, and this united effort may be made equally well by those of different churches or no church, though practically it will be found that such clubs can be most readily formed by a group of personal acquaintances such as would naturally be found in a common church.

Members of this growing circle of clubs have prepared for each other's use a series of pamphlets as guides in the study of favorite subjects. Introductory to the rest is one entitled UNITY CLUBS: or Mutual Improvement Societies in Town and Church, by Emma Endicott Marean. This leaflet contains in small compass many practical hints for the guidance of those desiring to form new clubs. A succinct list of "Ten Commandments" for literary circles is a valuable feature.

It contains also a descriptive list of our other leaflets for clubs, the titles of which may be summarized: Outline Studies in LOWELL, 10c.; in HOLMES, BRYANT and WHITTIER, 10c.; in GEORGE ELIOT, 10c.; in ROBERT BROWNING'S Poetry, 25c.; in POLITICS, 10c.; TEN GREAT NOVELS, a guide to English fiction, 10c.; THE MASQUE OF THE YEAR, 10c.; THE LEGEND OF HAMLET, giving side-light for Shakespeare students, 25c. New leaflets will be issued from time to time as demand arises.

PRICE OF "UNITY CLUBS," POST-PAID, 10 cents.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., Publishers,

175 Dearborn st., Chicago.

"The Social Status," in cloth, will be mailed free to any UNITY subscriber sending us 75 cents with a new name for six months.

All the pamphlets named in this advertisement will be mailed free to any UNITY subscriber sending us $1.50 with a new name for one year.

"The Legend of Hamlet," in cloth, will be mailed free to any UNITY subscriber sending us 75 cents with a new name for six months.

"Browning's Women" will be mailed free to any UNITY subscriber sending us $1.50 with a new name for one year.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, APRIL 30, 1887.

[NUMBER 9.]

EDITORIAL.

IN the spring, boys play marbles, birds build their nests, the flowers bloom, and—is it to be hereafter—"issue" pamphlets appear. They fall over Western Unitarian parishes,

"Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brook
In Vallombrosa."

ONE of the pleasant features of the recent Iowa conference at Humboldt was the use of the popular song leaflets, "Love to God and Love to Man", introduced here and championed by Mrs. Wilkes, of Sioux Falls, Dak. They were sung with a will and inspiration which demonstrated to those present the common sense of utilizing in general public meetings these already popular "Gospel Hymn" melodies as the vehicles for the new and better words of our liberal faith.

AN enthusiastic woman, speaking of Mrs. Van Cott's 4,300 converts, wonders what St. Paul will say "when these figures appear on the heavenly bulletin boards, in direct defiance to his express order, that women shall not speak in meeting". We do not know, but think he would ask, "How many of them stayed converted?" A temporary excitement is of no more value when produced by a woman than is a temporary scare caused by a man.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: Isn't it a testimony to the value of the Humboldt and Sioux City plan of encouraging the laity to preach and lecture in the pulpit, that among the very best things of the Iowa conference were the papers of "Music in the Sunday-school", by Mrs. M. Vaupel Clarke, of Humboldt, and on "Church Finances", by E. H. Bucknam, of Sioux City, both of which are to be printed. The latter was at once intensely funny and intensely practical. The address of welcome by Mrs. Mary Garfield, of Humboldt, was also a model of excellence.

WE clip the following comforting and inspiring truth from a recently published sermon of James Freeman Clarke: "The real and vital truth which any man may teach, though for a time it may be excluded as heresy from the great belief of Christendom, will one day be accepted and believed by the universal church. Let no one, then, be discouraged by a temporary exclusion. Let us follow after the vital truth, born of actual faithful insight, of personal experience, not a hearsay thing which flesh and blood has revealed, but that which God himself has taught to our soul, and thereby commissioned us to teach 'to every creature'."

CITY parishes find it a growing convenience to print parish annuals, in which, among other matter of value to the society, is printed the names and addresses of the various families constituting the members of the parish. It may be that this practice will have to be discontinued, as has been the case with most of the literary clubs and social organizations of large cities; because of the annoying use which is made of these lists by all sorts of advertisers and agitators. When such parish lists are used for the distributing through the mail, of controversial, schismatic matter, containing sometimes personal attacks upon the ministers of these very parishes, without consent of any of the parties for whose private use the list was published, it becomes, like flies or mosquitoes, an annoyance too petty for public notice,—too irritating to be passively enjoyed. We will not challenge the right of such use of the post-office or of any addresses that may be legitimately obtained, any more than would we challenge the right of the representatives of the Y. M. C. A., or other orthodox colporteurs, to distribute their tracts in front of an Unitarian church or halls as the audience disperses, as they have at times tried to do; but it does raise the question of grace, brotherly comradeship, and spiritual courtesy.

"THE conservative party in the universe conceives that 'the radical would talk sufficiently to the purpose, if we were still in the garden of Eden; he legislates for man as he ought to be; his theory is right, but he makes no allowance for friction, and this omission makes his whole doctrine false.' To which the Idealist retorts, 'The conservative assumes sickness as a necessity, his social frame is a hospital. He takes a low view of every human action and passion; he sings a dolorous tune to beguile the distemper.'" So says Emerson. We leave our readers to decide to which party they owe allegiance, and what ranks they will join.

WE print this week the programme of the Western Conference, entire, and urge our churches to take prompt and effective measures to secure a full delegation. The Conference, we believe, will be one characterized with a desire for work,—and a determination to look forward and not back; and as such, it will be a meeting that will send an inspiration throughout the churches in the west. Let it be remembered that only such societies as have paid a sum not less than $10.00 into the treasury of the conference during the year, are entitled to delegates, and only delegates and officers of the conference and associate organizations are entitled to vote. Send on your money and come yourself.

THE world waits for the thinker who will make scientific the transcendentalists' thought, and who will carry science into transcendental verities, identify the accumulated aptitudes of the physiologist with the innate ideas of the psychologist. Emerson is great, because he kept his feet upon the ground, though he lifted his eyes to heaven. John Fiske is great, because he, emphasizing the humility of mind, recognizes that the limitations of the human fade not into vacancy, but into still greater fullness. This is why their thoughts so often rhyme. Says Emerson, "The axis of vision is not coincident with the axis of things." Says Fiske, "The possibilities of thought are not identical nor co-extensive with the possibilities of things."

WHEN the work of the year is summarized at our coming anniversaries, it will be found that instead of "paralysis" and "torpor" in any quarter of the western field, there has been hearty work and hopeful growth. New work has sprung up all around, new societies have been organized, new laborers have asked for a place,—Mr. Effinger and Mr. Clute, the only men whose entire time is given to the missionary work, have had more than they could do,—and the other fractional missionaries have been pressed with opportunities they could not utilize. The times are auspicious for more work. And good work is being done, the Jeremiahs of theologians to the contrary notwithstanding. The story is told of the brave Sojourner Truth, who, after listening as long as she could stand it, to doleful lucubrations, over the "degenerate days" at an anti-slavery meeting, the final pot of indigo being upset over the audience by Frederick Douglass, the wierd sibyl sprang to her full height, and exclaimed, "Fred, stop that! I say, stop that Fred! Am God Almighty dead!" And so we would say to the Western Conference, Be of good cheer; let those who believe in freedom, fellowship and character in religion, and who have an open hand of religious fellowship to all workers for truth, righteousness and love, take heart and go forward. God Almighty is not dead! Reinforcements and inspirations press us everywhere.

EDWIN D. MEAD, in his lecture on Gladstone, says: "It does not matter so much to-day who wear crowns. The real king is the man of brains, and we need to confess, with considerable humiliation, that he seems quite as apt to find his way to kingship in the monarchy as in the republic. In England it is Gladstone; in Ireland it is Parnell—a real king and a great man. What, after all, do the sundry paraphernalia amount to beside these men? Gladstone is a king of Englishmen because he represents and directs the rational, progressive, just and common-sense sentiment of England, which is rapidly becoming omnipotent as against all pretentious privilege or sanctified stupidity. Home rule for Ireland is manifest destiny. The evidence for it is much the same which Emerson found for immortality."

THE following note from one of the most careful, persistent workers in the Unitarian ministry, who labors far beyond the limits of the western conference, and who enjoys the confidence of the entire denomination, deserves publication for the encouragement it will bring to those who are now much challenged, and sometimes sorely pained:

"I have in the past year found my sympathies going out greatly towards the western conference. I have long followed its course with that indifferent interest we are apt to feel in distant fellow-workers. It has ever seemed to me like an honest man 'journeying towards Jerusalem'. But since lately it has fallen among those not in sympathy with its broad and joyous work, who seem to have wounded and stripped it, and in some instances done it the wrong of misrepresentation, my sympathies warm with real fellowship. My attention is called more closely, and I see as not before the heaven-breadth of its helpfulness, the Jesus-like immediateness of its religion, and the prophecy of its altitude. I see in it the historical position of Unitarianism not only consistently exemplified, but legitimately furthered and fulfilled. So I can but hope it will 'hold the beginning of its confidence steadfast unto the end',—proudly, generously, lovingly, affirmatively, as now. Five or ten years will prove again that 'wisdom is justified of her children'.

'All our creeds are hinting only
Of a faith of nobler strain';

When a clear voice utters that nobler strain, some persons are startled, and prefer the 'hinting creed'." B.

REV. A. S. GARVER, of Worcester, Mass., in a recent sermon on "What is Unitarianism," discovers its spirit in two things, viz.,

1. "The best things that can be said about it are not to be compared with it. They are but poor and prosaic statements, while it is the life and glory of the soul. It is a living experience, ranging through all the sympathies and affections that bless, ennoble and beautify life. It is made up of trust and hope, of tears and of laughter, of the loveliness of earth and of dreams of the sky, of knowledge and of faith, of human relation and of divine communion. It is essentially free, and every definition of it is but the symbol of the reality. It is not the conception of God, but the love of him. It is not the abstract idea of right, but the practical doing of right. It is not the absolute formula of truth, but the being true. This conception is noticeable not for its singularity, but for the strong insistence that the substance is more than the shadow."

2. "The frank acceptance of reason as a divine guide to truth. This was the inevitable conclusion to the idea, which gains so firm a footing, of the dignity of human nature. So long as the mental faculties were held to be corrupt and disabled, of course their testimony was worthless. But as soon as this dogma weakened, the mind was trusted, and all questions which it could deal with were brought to the bar of reason. The credibility of an affirmation depended on its credentials, and these must be tested by the ordinary laws of evidence. The problem is simply this: Here is the world outspread about us and the record of its past behind us. How are we to determine its meaning and our relation to it? Once the answer was plain—listen to the church. The modern spirit is no less clear—listen to its own witness; piece together, bit by bit, what it tells of itself, till you can form the syllables of its mighty tale."

W. ALEX. JOHNSON, in an article in the International Record of Charities and Corrections, entitled "An Insidious Disease", calls attention to the dangerous tendencies of pauperizing associations, as well as individuals, by too much outside aid. He says:

"Whenever private persons or associations seek, or willingly receive, from outside sources, that which ought to be derived from their own exertions, the insidious disease of pauperism has begun its work in them; and, if not checked, the end will be disaster, if not ruin. The greater their success in procuring adventitious aid, the more rapid is their destruction and the more irretrievable their failure."

"In the case of associations, the progress of decay is often not apparent until long after the process has begun. A society originally healthy, useful and energetic, supporting itself by hardly earned subscriptions, depending for public support on good work, and always more of it, receives from some source an endowment, or other public fund, which makes its managers feel that they are at last independent of the public. Its officers quickly become content with what they are already doing, and satisfy themselves with letting well enough alone, instead of ever striving for fresh growth and improvement. Once having arrived at the stage where the necessity for growth as a reason for support has ceased, officialism takes her place at the head of the directory; the institution begins to exist for its own sake, instead of the sake of those for whose benefit it was created, and decay and dry-rot have begun."

We earnestly commend the above to those who are at the present time discussing ways and means of increasing the missionary efficiency of Unitarian organizations, east and west. Historical illustrations of the truth here stated are not far to seek.

The New Moral Philosophy.*

"It is not fitness that makes an act moral, but it is morality that makes it fit."—James Martineau.

There is so much that is good and practical in these lectures, and the style is so plain and familiar, that they may well serve the wants of many teachers. They are free from Trinitarian and Calvinistic metaphysics. They are equally free from all the influences of modern speculation, i. e. tendencies which have become pronounced in the last fifty years.

If sometimes we are tempted to ask whether it is a treatise on morals or a treatise on theology that we are reading, we need only be reminded of the standpoint of the author to account for his free mingling of ethical and dogmatic phraseology. Christian language and ethical language with him, if not identical, have no adequate significance apart from each other. In fact Doctor Peabody fully endorses the theory of Matthew Tindal—the British Voltaire—that "Christianity [is] as Old as Creation." Christianity, then, not having its "birth midway in human history," but, like Truth and Right, coeval with God, and having for its eternal purpose the development of human virtue, naturally furnishes the only dialect for a moral argument.

That definition of Christianity which identifies it with the good and true in all ages, or which compares it with the law of gravitation, which, always operating, only waited for some great mind to announce it, is very seductive. But so is Pantheism, so is the doctrine of Evolution. It may seem to solve some difficulties; it will certainly lead us into others. In the end we shall find ourselves choosing the definition or the theory which meets the difficulties that press most heavily upon us. The personal equation inevitably enters into the solution which we accept as the true one.

For ourselves we have not been helped by any effort to define Christianity as a code of divine precepts or a system of infallible doctrines, devised before the world was, to be doled out to the human race from time to time, through specially appointed men or messengers of the Almighty; until at length God made an open breast of it, and in a blaze of supernatural transactions told the whole story in the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. More reasonable to us has seemed the conception of Christianity that it was a movement, as really and naturally having its birth in time, as any other religious or political or intellectual movement of which we have any account in history. And moreover, that instead of its being either the absolute goodness or the infallible truth, Christianity,—whether judged by the institutions which bear the name, or by what we know of the founder of the church,—will not wisely, and cannot safely, lay claim to either. Christianity, as a great world-movement, and as the designation of the most regenerative and moral of world-religions, carries within it good and evil,—is partly true and partly false.

*Moral Philosophy. A Series of Lectures. By A. P. Peabody, D.D., LL.D. Boston: Lee and Shepard.

Hence to call a man a Christian, or to deny him that name, is neither to describe the degree of his goodness or the amount of his knowledge of the truth. It means that he belongs or does not belong to the movement. So, claiming or disclaiming the name means no more.

Yet while Dr. Peabody, by his definition, seems to make all ethics, worthy the name, to be Christian ethics, he has a philosophical theory somewhat independent of revelation. It is the a priori method of Samuel Clarke—a sort of mathematical morality suggestive of the system of Spinoza. Not that there is much elaboration of any metaphysical method in Dr. Peabody's work—whoever looks for any metaphysical solution of ethical problems here will look in vain—but he takes Clarke's ground of obligation as the supreme and satisfactory one. "Fitness", "intrinsic fitness", is the ultimate and sole ground of right. Right and wrong are only other terms for fitting and unfitting. Everything in nature has its proper place and use. Man's duty is simply to do the intrinsically fit. On this ground he lives temperately and obeys God. "Things are not holy and good (as Clarke would say) because commended by God, but are commended by God because holy and good." The moral law is thus older than any command or revelation. Nor do men do right from hope of reward or fear of consequences here or hereafter—this is the utilitarian theory,—but looking at the act itself they decide if it be right or improper. They are to do right because it is right (fitting)—this is the sufficient law. This, of course, gives us a system of intuitive morals.

This statement of the basis of ethics, which, like his definition of Christianity, belongs to that period of English thought which marks the transition from orthodoxy to deism, is also interesting and attractive. The phrase "intrinsic fitness", as a measure of conduct, has been a helpful one, and may still continue to be to those whom it finds on a certain plane of moral inquiry. Moreover, in a limited sense it is indisputably true. But like all, even the most happy phrases, when we think more about it we shall probably find that it is wholly incompetent to solve the problems that pertain to the moral life.

How "intrinsic fitness" inheres in an act or even in the thought of an act to enable us to see it before any of its consequences are known; indeed how "fitness" can pertain to anything except as we understand its various and manifold relations and especially the relation of means to end; and how "fitness" makes itself morally obligatory upon us—these questions we do not find any better answered than they were a hundred years ago.

At the same time there is a plain moral growth and gain in society; perhaps no page of Dr. Peabody's book better indicates such progress than his own view of the subject of intemperance. His attitude is heroic. While not exculpating the dramseller, he is in favor of moving upon the drunkard. Heretofore, he says, the latter has been looked upon "as an object of pity, to be cosseted rather than condemned, and if he suspends drinking for a while, to be wreathed with the aureola of sainthood and welcomed as a public teacher on the platform or in the pulpit. * * * What is needed is to attach to drunkenness itself the most disgraceful stigma with which the law can brand it. Let the law treat the drunkard with as little mercy as it shows to the pickpocket, and society will follow the lead of the law, and put the drunkard under its ban; and the aim of parents and householders thenceforward will be to exclude from their tables, their houses, and their use, save in stress of need, that which might bring 'shades of the prison-house' on their homes, and place their children in the same category with thieves and vagabonds." pp. 98, 99.

J. C. L.

"No man is an atheist who believes in a single attribute of God."

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Coming.

The summer is coming, my love so fair!
I hear its step in the fragrant woods;
I know by spring's strange, fitful moods,
And a hushed expectancy that broods
Like a wondrous presence everywhere.

The summer is coming, O love of mine!
When the earth will go whirling nearer the sun,
And the currents of life more deeply run,
And the symphonies by spring begun
Swell into harmonies more divine.

A day is coming! (Ah, how you start,
And blush rose-red, and droop the eye!)
And many will carelessly pass it by,
Unheeding its beauty as, sweetly shy,
It nestles in summer's great warm heart.

That day we shall wed, O my love, my dear!
And my Queen will come to her rightful throne;
And my heart's domain shall be all her own,
As, into a world untried, unknown,
We haste with no thought of regret or fear.

Weary the hours from my love apart!
Then up, O Time! and with hurrying feet
Bring us the guerdon so fair and sweet,
That day of days with rich joys replete
Plucked from the summer's throbbing heart!

GEORGE R. LEWIS.

Prayer.

"The self-same moment I could pray,
And from my neck so free
The Albatross fell off, and sank
Like lead into the sea."

* * * * *

"He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all."

It would seem strange to any truly thoughtful person, that the question of the use and beauty of prayer should be a debatable subject, did we not remember the origin and low conception of prayer which obtained in the earlier ages, and which even to-day are not entirely eradicated from our religious life. The begging for some favor of the All-Wise Creator, some petty desire to be granted, some selfish wish to be fulfilled, seems to us a shocking conception of prayer. But there is a conception of prayer which makes it at once helpful, real and permanent.

The necessity for prayer in the human soul in moments of its highest aspiration, deepest sorrow, or keenest ecstasy, is its own justification, and one proof that prayer will be satisfactorily answered, though by no means answered always as we, with our finite vision, would wish.

The materialistic school would banish prayer entirely, or relegate it to a purely scientific field. They cannot deny the reflex action, but would not assign to it any higher possibilities. Reflex action is certainly one of the elements of true prayer, because any effort of the soul reaching forth in unselfish desire lifts it into a higher atmosphere, and this reflex action of the mind upon itself elevates and ennobles. But this is not all. We have learned that the inferno is a state of mind; that Heaven is within us, and not without; and that prayer is an attitude of the soul, not a begging for some material blessing. Prayer, then, is an attitude of the soul. Let us remember this, and see if we may learn how it is possible to attain this attitude. One may also say that prayer is an altitude of the mind, for no soul groveling in low or sordid desires can be said to be prayerful, and because, in its reaching upwards to the source of all things, it touches the infinite. It gives breadth to character, because it embraces in its beautiful spirit all sweet human relations and experiences, and remains with the soul, as one of its eternal possessions. And it gives depth, because the awakened mind reaches into the very heart of the universe, seeking there the laws of its being.

Prayer follows the law of growth and development, as other attributes of the mind. If we use our reasoning faculties over a mathematical problem seriously, persistently, knowledge will shine in upon our understanding, and reveal to us the truth we seek, and this seeming miracle is repeated again and again in our experience. It is ever the same wonderful revelation, and the joy we feel when the light leaps up in our minds, like a flash of lightning, revealing the truth that was before hidden,—this is of itself enough to teach us to have faith that every effort in the right direction will, sooner or later, be rewarded, as the solution of a mathematical problem is.

If a muscle of our arm be weak and feeble, and we use it gently, quietly, continuously, obeying at the same time the laws of physical well-being, growth, strength and use will come to the enfeebled member.

We have also a spiritual faculty of the mind. This spiritual faculty, if developed and rightly used, and in that mood which we call prayerful, meaning simply a reaching forth and upward to the source of all light, in an attitude of childlike receptivity and earnest effort, such prayer will be rewarded; by what laws we do not now know, but an answer will come, in the form of clearer insight, greater moral strength, heavenly comfort, and possible joy.

Prayer is the activity of the spiritual part of our nature, and is doubtless governed by fixed and immutable laws, just as the physical and mental nature of man are governed by such laws.

It matters little that we cannot define or prove the existence of the spiritual organs, which are co-related to this spiritual function. But we know, through the necessity in our own being and by faith, corroborated by the history of man's spiritual growth throughout the world, and in all ages, verified by observation and experience, that such organs and such functions must exist.

The need for prayer in the human soul is its own justification for being, and is common to the whole race of mankind, partaking, in the lower phases of the nature, of fear, begging and pleading, and in the higher of worship, praise and rejoicing.

The first requisite for a true attitude of prayer is to gird one's self with the "rush of humility," and an honest belief that we deserve the sufferings brought or inflicted upon us, and a determination not to shrink or run away from conflict, nor to be crushed by opposing forces; but a rational acceptance of consequences, and an earnest desire that through this lacerating strife wisdom and holiness shall become ours.

To receive true blessedness through prayer one must drink of the waters of Lethe, that Lethe "Whither to lave themselves the spirits go, whose blame hath been by penitence removed." And this is not the Lethe of the Hindoo Nirvana, but a continued and never-ending series of transmigrations from our lower selves to our higher selves, pressing on from height to height, until, having passed through the inferno and purgatorio, we reach the divine heights of paradiso, where shine the white lights of serenity and peace. Here "the word becomes flesh", and the incarnation a reality.

To make this attitude of mind habitual, we should begin with the child at the tenderest age. Teach him to let the mind, in some quiet hour each day, return in upon itself, to become self-searching, to bring the mind to feel thankfulness for blessings received, sorrow for wrong-doing, and there rekindle the fires of aspiration. Let him be taught to carry all its conflicts, all its passions, all its hopes, to this internal subjective tribunal, this sacred altar, with fires ever burning ready for the sacrifice, the pleading and the praise. The sacrifice of all selfishness, the pleading for all good, the praise and thankfulness for all joy. We may, if we choose, teach the child to discard the material altar, built of wood and stone, or covered with cloth of gold, to which the ancients brought peace offerings of slaughtered goats and rams, of sweet herbs, and of those things most precious to them. Nor is it altars of polished wood, nor fine vestments, nor soothing music, nor æsthetic coloring, nor polished rhetoric, that are alone sufficient for them; but an altar erected within the heart, and that the true oil to keep the fires burning is the sacrifice of selfish desires and gross passions. Through this action will be developed a clearer consciousness of right, and the ability to seize quickly the best and the true, which will in time become habitual, and finally there will grow up, in the expanding soul, that keener insight into what are the real and eternal verities, and a nearness to all that is most desirable and beautiful in life. And later will come that consciousness and knowledge of the divine purposes, and close fellowship with God which, in its final synthesis, is unity with God, and the recognition of the divinity and brotherhood of mankind. This preparation would afford an impregnable fortress against sin and temptation, because this habitual attitude of the mind would at once repel all sudden attacks of evil, which we have most cause to dread.

The good effect of a rational understanding of the meaning and purpose of prayer is illustrated by a fact from life. Two little boys had a quarrel. Neither would acknowledge that he was in the wrong, nor would they speak to each other for many weeks. One little fellow told his mother, "I have not repeated the whole of the Lord's prayer since my quarrel with G——. I did not and could not say 'Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us.'" But finally, when he had brought himself to say those lines feelingly and truly, he was the first to speak, and the breach was healed. Here was the prayer and here the answer to prayer; whether by reflex action, the interposition of Providence, or the action of the will alone, it matters little; the result was all that could be desired, and the activity of the child's spiritual nature strengthened his moral courage, and was a general uplifting of his whole nature towards the higher and better.

It is not enough that we cultivate the intellect alone, for we have abundant evidence that there may be the finest culture and a cold, hard, barren spiritual nature. The brilliant men and women of the Italian Renaissance furnish some of the most striking illustrations of this, and our 19th century renaissance resembles the spirit of that remarkable period. There is the same spirit of egoism, of worship of the antique, love of luxury, love of learning, and also love of display. These are all characteristic of both the past and present times. The cultivation of the intellect alone is often a mere delightful pastime, a mental and emotional excitement, which is purely æsthetic, and may be a most selfish act. We have learned that statuesque beauty, nor cultivated intellect can take the place of that interior attitude of the mind which includes both the "good of the intellect" and that supreme beatitude of spirit which "rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in truth, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." But in our day there is an element which acts as a restraining power, even though unconsciously. We are direct heirs of those principles of Puritanism, which made and molded our grandsires, and we can not lightly throw off our birth-right. There is with us a moral hurt for wrong doing, an underlying protest from this puritanic spirit, like the still, small voice to those grand men who made the love and worship of God the first duty and pleasure of life.

Therefore let us not discourage prayer, but rather cultivate this highest language of the soul, and strive to make the prayerful attitude habitual, an ever-present factor in our lives, as the rational man makes his reason the arbiter of all vexed questions. This will be an equipment with which to do glorious battle-work in the world. For, take life on whatever basis you may, there are stern, warlike elements in it which never will and never can be eliminated, and the success or failure of life will largely depend upon the choice of weapons he shall select with which to fight life's battles. And if we would keep in the tide that bears upon its bosom the grand movement of the world-spirit, we must seek to obtain and retain the prayerful attitude.

MARY E. COLB.

Is it Nothing to You?

DEDICATED TO COL. GEORGE W. BAIN.

[John W., who a short time since was hung at Norristown, Pa., said: "When my strangled body hangs between heaven and earth may all who look upon it imagine they hear me say: 'It is the work of Rum. Is it nothing to you all, ye that pass by?'"]

Is it nothing to you, that the murderer's knife
Is lifted all dripping in gore?
That the blood of the child and the blood of the wife
Stains the white wall and the floor?

Is it nothing to you, that the suicide there
Is somebody's brother and son,
Who was driven to his death by his maddening despair,
Ere his young life was scarcely begun?

Is it nothing to you, that the mother in rags,
Sits there by her gray ashes cold,
While she wearily watches the hour that drags,
And the babe that her loving arms fold?

Is it nothing to you, that up yonder there hangs,
And swings from the scaffold's huge arm,
A poor hapless youth, who was caught in the fangs
Of the drink-custom's oft fatal charm?

Is it nothing to you, that grim Want, Pain and Woe
Going forth with their pestilent breath,
Corruption and crime over all the land sow,
And will reap a rich harvest of death?

And will it be nothing to you or to yours,
Or to those who may yet bear your name,
To have left as a legacy, while time endures,
A heritage only of shame?

Yes; something it will be, to them and to all;
For brothers alike we are born;
And together we sink, into darkness we fall,
Or together we rise with the morn.

T. P. WILSON.

A Reverie.

Winter has at last unlocked the portals of his icy castle and ushered into our presence the very queen of all the seasons. Let us fling open the doorways of our hearts and give a generous welcome. How silently she moves among us, and yet our finer ear may hear her in the springing grass and opening blossoms. We feel her magic touch in everything about us. She whispers, and the slumbering earth awakes to new life and beauty. Would we might sing her praises with hearts as full as the happy, joyous birds.

I wonder whether if we would we could not make our daily lives fuller of praises and thanksgiving-songs; clothe homely and unlovely care with beauty. And I wonder, too, if we are not ourselves to blame, if in the pleasant walks of life, we gather not enough of sunshine up to last through cloudy weather; and yet, we must dream our own dreams and live our own lives.

The hearts of little children drink in the spring sunshine as freely, even, as the birds and flowers. And are not their voices sweeter than the song of birds and their lives dearer than all the blossoms?

A maiden sits and dreams, and in her fancy she weaves the golden meshes of a nest that will one day be her own, and if her morning and evening carol shall be sweeter than the bird's it is not strange, for is not her nest dearer and her love deeper?

In the spring sunshine a mother muses, and her thoughts have flown backward. She sits amid blasted buds and voiceless birds, in a springtime of the past; and though her whole pathway is strewn with flowers, it is not so much to her as to know that on those little graves the violets are come again. She tends them with a loving care, for they speak precious promises to her soul.

The aged couple number over and over again the many springtimes their lives have known in light and shadow. They drink not in the full sunshine of these delicious days, for their nest and their nestlings are all gone, and they are waiting for a more glorious springtime yet to come—waiting for eternal sunshine and perpetual blossoms.

Upon the faces of men of great crime, through all the scars of sin may be found indistinct traces of happy days of innocence and pleasure. Doubtless as the springtime sun streams faintly into the cell of many a criminal, memory is quickened to life by its soft rays, and flowers of tenderness which have long slumbered bloom again, in the garden of his heart. Perhaps he may remember days all sunshine, days of loving, when a dear face and the light of glad eyes transfigured everything into a world of glory. But temptation, like sorrow, overtakes us when we are least prepared, and on the stream of life we either drift with its current, or, with great strength of will and determined purpose, pull our fragile bark against it.

None need, so much, human sympathy and divine love and favor as the poor in spirit. The poor in purse may often vie in happiness with the rich; but to a life from which the light of hope has all gone out, the journey to the end is drear and desolate. Thus it is we dream our own dreams and live our own lives, however much we may live for others.

For myself—

To feel that the springtime is coming,
That the wildwood is all full of song;
That the leaves, and the grasses and blossoms,
In beauty are creeping along,

Thrills my soul with a deep song of gladness;
And the depths of my being are stirred,
Till I feel that the Master is timing
My voice to the voice of a bird.

And what harmony thrills all creation,
From the brooklet's musical flow
To the wonderful tide of the ocean,
With its ceaseless murmur of woe.

Yet, He who made earth, sky and all things
Reckons man of himself a part—
And what to nature is budding and bloom,
Symbols love in the human heart.

And I look at the world as I see it,
With its mingled sorrow and strife,
And my lips cry out the thought of my heart,
What a wonderful thing is life!

With eyes to behold the glory of God
In the stars or the blossoms of spring,
Our hearts feel a love that lips may not tell
Of a glorified Presence, within.

But since not all is sunshine, beauty and bloom,
And bright hopes fall to ashes and dust,
The richest lesson for us to learn
Is the wonderful lesson of trust.

ELLA F. STEVENS.

IN all ages, souls out of time, extraordinary, prophetic, are born, who are rather related to the system of the world, than to their particular age and locality. These announce absolute truths, which, with whatever reverence received, are speedily dragged down into a savage interpretation.—Emerson.

"'Tis not the dying for a faith that's so hard, Master Harry,—every man of every nation has done that,—'tis the living up to it that is difficult, as I know to my cost."—Henry Esmond.

If we still love those we lose, can we altogether lose those we love?—Thackeray.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Agnes Surriage. By Edwin Lassetter Bynner. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

"Agnes Surriage" is a historical romance, and has already been told in verse by Doctor Holmes, in his poem "Agnes". It is not a matter of surprise that the story has been retold by a novelist, but rather, that such excellent material should have remained so long unused. Mr. Bynner is not more to be congratulated, however, for discovering such a pleasing story to tell, than is the story for reserving itself to be told in the form of a novel by so charming and gifted a writer. Briefly told the story is as follows: A handsome young Englishman, Sir Harry Frankland, fresh from the society and clubs of London, arrives in the quaint provincial town of Boston, as his majesty's collector for New England. Official business calls him to Marblehead, where he meets Agnes Surriage, a rustic beauty whose untrained voice astonishes him and gives promise of one day astonishing the world, if properly cultivated. His generous heart prompts him to become her patron, and with the co-operation of the governor's wife, he has her brought to Boston to receive instruction. While there, he falls in love with her, as might be expected in a novel if not in real life, and treats her as a handsome, titled young Englishman with eighteenth-century morals and manners would be likely to treat one of her class. The indignant Bostonians make it so unpleasant for them that they are obliged to set up a country establishment. They finally go to England, and by accident the girl is brought into contact with the baronet's family. Leaving England for Portugal, they are in Lisbon at the time of the great earthquake. Sir Harry is buried beneath the ruins, and after being rescued by means of Agnes, makes atonement by publicly marrying her.

A novelist would find it hard to invent a better romance, and we doubt if there is another novelist living who could tell the story so well. The reproduction of the life and manners of eighteenth-century Boston, London and Lisbon is the work of a conscientious and painstaking artist. The literature, historical characters and topics of the day are introduced in a delightful manner. The chapter called "The Portrait", in which the youthful "Jock" Copley is brought into notice, is one of the cleverest in the book, and it is doubtful if any reader will recall the artist's name, after reading it, without calling up Mr. Bynner's picture.

But the author's greatest success is achieved in the higher and more essential qualities of the novel,—the discrimination of motives and the development of character. The reader's respect for the heroine is preserved, and that, too, without making her relations with Frankland appear other than they were. This has been accomplished after the manner of George Eliot, by making Agnes her own sternest critic, and by sympathetic and skillful analysis of character. Altogether, "Agnes Surriage" is a book that deserves to be read.

W. S. L.

New York; The Planting and the Growth of the Empire State. By Ellis H. Roberts. In two volumes. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

This is one of the series of volumes called American Commonwealths, of which have been published Virginia, Oregon, Maryland, Kentucky, Michigan, Kansas, California, New York and Connecticut. And there are in preparation Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Ohio and New Jersey, and others to be announced hereafter. It is an excellent plan to furnish monographs of small divisions of history treated separately. Hence, however large and satisfactory may be any general history of the United States, special monographs on individual states are to be welcomed warmly. This volume on New York is divided into four parts: 1. Before the advent of the English. 2. New York as a British colony. 3. The revolution. 4. New York as a state in the Union. The method is simple; the story is carried straight on year by year. It begins in 1524 with the discovery by the French, early voyages, early maps, etc. Then the discovery and occupation by the Dutch. After this, there are chapters on the Swedish attempts, topography, French missionaries, etc. The English rule is treated in ten chapters, beginning with the year 1674. The second volume begins with the revolution, the history of New York during which is narrated in four chapters covering 90 pages. The balance of the work, comprising 16 chapters, covering nearly 300 pages, is devoted to the history of New York as a member of the Union of States. These chapters treat of the First Tasks of Peace; Parties, their Leaders and their Divisions; Waterways and their Development; Education; Jurisprudence; General Political Affairs; Literary Activity; Land and Rent; Manufactures, and other subjects. A chapter is devoted to the part of the State in the War for the Union. These volumes are paged consecutively, the second volume beginning at page 359. There are several conveniences in this manner of paging volumes. There is an index of 18 pages in double columns. The style is lively and the books are well made.

The Family: an Historical and Social Study. By Charles Franklin Thwing and Carrie F. Butler Thwing. Boston: Lee & Shepard. New York: Charles T. Dillingham.

It is pleasant, in this estimable book on the Family, to see the names of husband and wife on the title page as joint authors, without distinction of part. It cannot be told what one or the other has contributed; simply they stand as joint authors of the work. The book has a goodly quantity of knowledge massed together, gathered from a long list of authorities covering six pages. There are 12 chapters and 200 pages. Each chapter is preceded by a heading which states the subjects treated in the chapter. The chief topics are: The Family in Pre-Historic Times; Among the Greeks, Romans and Jews; In the Early Christian Centuries and in the Middle Ages; The Family and the Church. From this point the work is more philosophical than historical, treating of the family as an institution, divine and human, as a basis of social order, as related to its individual members, and to property, etc. Two chapters are devoted to the present condition, the causes, dangers and remedies of divorce, in parts of which much information is set forth of facts both in this country and in many states in Europe. Regarding the family as a basis of social order, the authors think that the value of the family should be taught every way, and that, as much as possible, a drift should be set toward the country, and not from the country toward the city. In one remark under this head, however, they fall into a common error. They say on page 108, "Socialism is the product of political individualism." This is the exact contrary of the truth. Socialism tends to sink the individual in the state. It is Anarchism that sinks the state in the individual. Touching the family and property, the authors think that dower should be done away, in favor of separate ownership of property, and that property rights should be equal. The wife should have the same interest in her husband's estate that the husband has in the wife's estate. The book has a good index, and is well printed with large type on heavy paper.

Young People's History of Ireland. By George Makepeace Towle. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co.

This work has a preface by John Boyle O'Reilly, in which it is remarked that "Nothing could better illustrate the deplorable relations of England and Ireland, than the complete absence of Irish history from both English and Irish schools and public libraries. So far as English power could reach, Irish history has been obliterated, misrepresented or left unwritten. The English story of Ireland would not bear telling, and it must not be told." The history fills 300 pages, and has besides a chronological table of Irish history of 8 pages in double columns, and an index of 4 pages in double columns. It is an excellent thing in a history to supply chronological tables. The text is provided with marginal tables also, which facilitate reference. The book is illustrated, all the pictures being full-page. The opening chapters are concerned with Irish Legends. The Ancient Irish, St. Patrick, The Early Irish Kings, etc., and the history is carried down in the 39th chapter to Gladstone's struggle over the Home Rule bill, with which great legislative conflict the history ends. The last illustration in the book is an effective, full-length picture of Gladstone explaining his Home Rule scheme in the British Parliament,—a tribute which well may be rendered to the great statesman by a writer on Irish history. The completing sentence of the volume is, "Whether the task of according full justice to Ireland shall be finally intrusted to Mr. Gladstone or not, his name must always be held in the highest reverence, honor, and affection by the Irish people, as one who has spent, in their behalf, the later period of a life fruitful and illustrious beyond that of any English statesman of the present century."

The Inter-State Commerce Act. An Analysis of its Provisions. By John R. Dos Passos, of the New York Bar. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

This neat little hand book forms number thirty-eight of Questions of the Day, a most interesting and useful series of books, the title of which sufficiently describes the intent. This volume contains the much talked of Inter-State Commerce Act in an appendix, which is preceded by a hundred pages of analysis and commentary, apparently impartial in spirit, clearly and intelligently presented

THE HOME.

From a Bird's Righter.

We sow with pleasant songs rich fancies in men's minds;
Such as was given is our appointed lot;
We reap a poor return; by most ungrateful man,
Are hunted, persecuted, stoned, and shot.

Our song high-vaunting man doth vainly emulate;
He pays his gold to hear some shrieking dame;
Our notes are stol'n from angels' harps in heav'n
By nature's gifts we put his art to shame.

Our garbs the rainbow hath not brighter hues, nor sheen
Of moonlight-silvered waves can with them vie;
So beautiful indeed 'twould seem we should be spared,—
But man prefers us, rather, in a pie.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—The enclosed rhymes were read at a recent Birds' convention, and received with chirps of approval. Adding a few lines of plain prose, I send them to you, hoping you will publish them in behalf of my suffering fellow-songsters in your great city.

I am, sir, a brown thrush. We thrushes, you must know, are a sedate, sensible set,—no nonsense about us. We never go larking about like the robins, or spying into the affairs of others, like the wrens; but we sing to the best of our abilities, and look with awe upon the achievements of mankind.

Now, my dear sir, in consideration of our freedom from qualities obnoxious to man, do you not think we are entitled to his love and protection?

Yet, not a day passes that I do not mourn the loss of some friend or relative at the hands of his ruthless offspring.

Only yesterday my pretty cousin was slaughtered by a band of little wretches armed with slings, who eyed her fluttering agonies with keen delight. From a sheltering lilac-bush I saw her fall to the ground, and with a chirp of anguish thrust my head beneath my wing; but from the steps of a neighboring dwelling, a—something you call a woman, I believe—gazed with indifference upon the cruel scene. Her form was beautiful; upon her head she wore a covering which reminded me vaguely of my own brown wings, and her voice was soft and sweet as the coo of the wood-dove; but it was never raised in defense of my poor darling who perished almost at her feet.

Permit me to ask, dear sir, do you cherish these beings for their superiority of voice and plumage? Ah! if you could only hear the sad little plaints twittered in my ear daily, your voice would also cry out in indignation at the wrongs inflicted upon the most inoffensive of Chicago's inhabitants.

The sweet-throated of our species daily grow more tuned in the presence of man, and their songs are hushed as they listen to the dirges breathed by the wind over the remains of their murdered kindred.

Even the clover-tops fold within their arms the tiny feathers scattered here and there, and send forth a tender whisper of regret to the mute singers among the tree-tops. Man only is unsympathizing. Is there not a law in your city for the protection of my race, and an army of blue-birds—blue-coats I mean—to enforce it?

In future, if our rights are disregarded, we shall build our nests alone in the green deeps of the forest and the meadows far away.

Why do not the authorities punish these wicked children who still our songs and drive us into neglected graves? I have long wished to tell you of our sufferings, but constitutional timidity prevented. At last I summon courage to entreat you, not only for the lovely and harmless of my own family, but in the name of the whole feathered tribe, to aid in suppressing the barbarities offered us by the sons of the citizens of Chicago.

Tweet! Tweet! I feel very sad; my little heart flutters with apprehension of coming evil. I know not but to-morrow will witness my own destruction.

FUZZ AND FEATHERS.

"Bunny" Replies.

"Me vont be bathed! Me vill be bad—
Bad for twenty hundred days"!
Thus said a frowning little lad
With very naughty willful ways,
While two wild tears a race to win
Rush for the dimple in his chin.

Patient Nursey dropped the sponge, "I know",
She sighed, and gravely said
"You're like the naughty Pansy blows
Out there in the garden bed;
See how they jerk and bounce about
And turn their jackets inside out."

"They don't love the rain that flies
To make them fresh and sweet
For the sun's kiss on their pretty eyes
Purple gowns and dainty feet;
Each angry little blossom tries
To dodge the raindrop from the skies."

Then "Bunny" ran in great surprise
To watch each dusty bud and flower
Shrink and close their shining eyes
Against the swiftly pelting shower;
Winking, blinking, twisting 'round
They even fell flat on the ground.

But he laughed as he saw the shower
And cried with childish wit,
"No, I ain't like the naughty f'owers
For they can't s'ceam one bit;
But oo is like the rain, Nurse,
For oo don't care where oo hit!"

WE have a careful thought for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometimes guest;
But oft for our own the bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best.
Ah! lip with the curve impatient,
Ah! brow with the shade of scorn;
'Twere a cruel fate were the night too late
To undo the work of the morn.

—Anon.

THE Youth's Companion tells us that at the ostrich farm in California, it is one egg for ten guests,—boiled one hour, and that aside from its size there is nothing peculiar in either taste or color, both resembling a duck's egg; but it takes twenty-eight hen's eggs to equal in weight this one ostrich egg.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,
J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Boston Notes.—At the last meeting of the Sunday-school union of superintendents and teachers, a stereopticon exhibition of scenes in Judea was given. At the Monday Club Rev. H. G. Spaulding advocated fatherly care from the minister over his larger or smaller family of Sunday-school pupils. The Grove meeting at Weirs, N. H., to be held the coming summer, promises to make itself unusually attractive. This is more like a western camp meeting than any anniversary exercises of our denomination which occur east of Chicago. Brother Beane, the A. U. A. missionary for New Hampshire, induces persons of other sects, who live in several neighboring counties, to attend the meetings. Last Monday evening the parish of Rev. M. J. Savage, with some other of his friends, tendered him and his wife an elegant reception at the Vendome. The addresses were in testimony of the impetus and valuable aid given by Mr. Savage to liberal religious thought in all parts of our country.

—The fact that Rev. J. W. Chadwick, the apostle of radical religious thought, will, by invitation, address the English Unitarians in their summer convention, seems to indicate that our English brethren are willing to hear all sides and ready to choose the most reasonable theology, and to take, if need be, a new departure from old denominational ground.

E. R. B.

Cleveland.—Mr. Edwin D. Mead has been warmly greeted by his many Cleveland friends after an absence of three years. On the evenings of April 15, 18 and 20, he gave a course of three lectures under the auspices of Unity Club in the Unity church parlors, as follows: "Nathan the Wise, or, The Gospel of Toleration"; "Immanuel Kant"; "Carlyle and Emerson". To those who have heard Mr. Mead, it is unnecessary to speak in commendation of the lectures. Clear thinking and a fine moral glow mark all his utterances.

—On Sunday last A. J. Jennings, missionary agent of the American Unitarian Association for Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky, occupied the pulpit with Mr. Hosmer, and preached an earnest and excellent sermon on "The Church of the Future". In the afternoon he went to Youngstown to hold an evening service in that growing town of 25,000 people. Mr. Thomas P. Byrnes, a student at Meadville, has been preaching here on Sunday evenings recently, and has gathered quite a promising congregation. No attempt is yet made to organize a church, but there is a growing interest in the meetings. Mr. Hosmer has preached for Mr. Byrnes two Sunday evenings. Mr. Jennings will visit Marietta and several of the larger towns where there is no liberal church.

—Mr. Hosmer is to preach three successive Sunday afternoons, beginning April 24, in Doan's Armory, East Cleveland. Neat circulars are out, announcing the sermon subjects as follows: (1) The Need of a Restatement of Religious Doctrines; (2) The Fatherhood of God; (3) Confessing the Christ: what it meant in Jesus' time; what it means to-day. He will be assisted by a good quartette choir. The East End is the most rapidly growing residence portion of the city.

Iowa Conference.—EDITORS UNITY:—I want the readers of our western organ to know something of the good time we have just had at our Annual State Conference, held at Humboldt, opening April 11 and closing April 14. There were over forty visitors present. The following Iowa towns were represented: Sioux City, Des Moines, Iowa City, Fort Dodge, Webster City, Algona, Eagle Grove, Hawarden, Rock Rapids and Renwick, also Sioux Falls, D. T. and Minneapolis and Luverne, Minn.

The evening sermons, which were listened to by full houses, were given by Rev. Ida C. Hultin, of Des Moines, Rev. Mr. Simmons, of Minneapolis, and Rev. O. Clute, minister at large. The day sessions were very well attended. The reports of the different departments of the state work made us feel that this great liberal cause is becoming a power in Iowa. Many of our ministers and friends seem to feel that the outlook was never more encouraging than now. The Great Spirit which seems to fill all creation more abundantly these glorious spring days seemed very near during our devotional meetings. There were earnest appeals made for more fellowship, more sympathy, more love for our fellow beings.

This matter of missionary work done by isolated persons was of great interest to the Conference. One case we must mention: Rev. Mrs. Wilkes, of Sioux Falls, D. T., has for six or eight years worked almost single-handed in southeast Dakota, and the results that true missionary labor are coming to light. Many others might be mentioned who, almost alone, are spreading our rational religion. The Conference has been very helpful to the Humboldt church, and indeed to all who attended. These Conferences made up of earnest men and women can not be other than powers of good.

The following officers were elected for the coming year. President, Rev. M. A. Safford, Sioux City; Vice-President, T. C. Puckett, Rock Rapids; Secretary, Rev. Arthur M. Judy, Davenport; Treasurer, W. H. Fleming, Des Moines; Directors (for three years), J. H. Anderson, Keokuk; Wm. R. Cole, Mount Pleasant; Secretary Unity Club work, G. S. Garfield, Humboldt; Secretary Sunday-school work, Miss Carrie J. Bartlett, Sioux Falls, D. T.; Secretary Post-office Mission work, Rev. Eliza T. Wilkes, Sioux Falls, D. T. Secretary lay leader society, Miss E. E. Gordon, Sioux City. Lay leader directors—Iowa City, Rev. Arthur Beavis; Des Moines, M. Neilson; Keokuk, Miss Cora Pittman; Sioux City, Miss Alice Morley; Humboldt, Mrs. M. Væupel Clark; Davenport, Rev. A. M. Judy; Rock Rapids, Edwin Bradley; Luverne, Minn., Mrs. F. C. Mahoney; Sioux Falls, D. T., Rev. E. T. Wilkes.

M. W. G.

St. Joseph, Mo.—Two long days and two nights on the railroad for the sake of two hours' fellowship, congratulation and prophesying with the loyal little band that represent the Unity church at St. Joseph, was our experience last week. C. B. Roberts was to be welcomed at once into the Unitarian fellowship, and into the pulpit of the Unity church, and the church home was to be dedicated. Messrs. Snyder of St. Louis, Powell of Topeka, and Jones of Chicago came together for this double occasion. Mr. Jones said the installing word, Mr. Powell charged the people, and Mr. Snyder preached the sermon; and then the new pastor and the people united in the interesting service of dedication, using the same words in hymns and responses as were used in the dedication of the Helena chapel in Wisconsin, All Souls church in Chicago, and the Unity church at Topeka. The chapel belongs to the new order of church architecture; domestic, quiet, cozy—not too large and not debt-burdened. It is a beautiful flowering of the slow-maturing hopes of a patient, loyal faith, held largely by a few men for many years. Over fifteen years ago we first made the acquaintance of this field, and we are glad to testify that we know of no Unitarian movement in the west that has been fostered with more care, wisdom and diligence than this Unity church of St. Joseph, which now receives the merited congratulations of UNITY.

Bloomington, Ill.—Edwin D. Mead lectured last week at the Unitarian church, on Gladstone, and Sunday morning occupied the pulpit and spoke on Emerson and Theodore Parker. He reports the society thoroughly alive and Mr. Westall earnest, interested and industrious.

—The Universalist Pastors' institute, which was held in this city from April 12th to April 19th, was largely attended, and the crowded programme was carried through with much fidelity. It took a wide and searching range, and much good must have come from it. Perhaps the most significant meeting was that at which Dr. Thomas talked upon "The Universalist Church as seen by a Friendly Critic", in which he predicted great things, when they dwell more upon the universals of religion and less upon the isms of the sect.

—The catalogue of the Meadville theological school for 1886-'7 is before us, showing thirty-one students, and giving particulars of course of study, conditions of entry, etc., etc. Parties desiring copies can procure them by addressing A. A. Livermore, at Meadville, Penn.

Easter Extravagance.—A Congregational church, it is said, used 7,000 callas in decorating their temple; also 1,700 marigolds in one floral anchor, and 1,200 roses, shading from white to deepest crimson, in a huge cross. Our correspondent adds "that there was also a colossal lyre before the pulpit, which is better than one behind it". Yes; but, alas! for the religion that has so much money to bestow on floral crosses. It but poorly typifies the virility of the Nazarene, and the robustness of the faith that was his.

The True Socialism.—W. H. Zinn, a Boston merchant, has informed all his employes that the profits of the year, over and above a reasonable amount, are to be distributed among the employes according to a given scale of wages and time of service. This is brought about not by legislation, but by education. It is the result not of law but of gospel. Legal attempts do but stand in the way of the true development of the sense of justice that, alarmists notwithstanding, is brightening the prospects of labor every day.

Humboldt, Iowa.—April 17 Miss C. J. Bartlett, Unitarian minister at Sioux Falls, D. T., preached morning and evening in the Unitarian church at Humboldt. Her sermons were thoughtful, earnest and helpful, and were heard by full houses. We want to hear Miss Bartlett again.

G.

"Green Pastures."

This well-known poem by W. C. Gannett has been set to music by George Russell Lewis, and is published by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago, $1.00 per hundred copies, or 2 cents per copy, post-paid

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MAY 7, 1887.

[NUMBER 10.]

EDITORIAL.

A CORRESPONDENT writes us: "UNITY will not outlive its usefulness until there is recognized a great deal more character in religion than at present."

No one wants to make a shibboleth of an untruth. No one needs to make a shibboleth of a truth; of that which is inevitable. So when is it time for a shibboleth?

EXPEDIENCY has much, instead of nothing, to do with the right; for to do the right now is always the most expedient thing to do,—as the longer run proves in cases where it is not done now. Garrison put it, "To do right is always to regard consequences."

"A WORKING lad was observed walking regularly, every Sunday, to school, a distance of two miles. He passed several other schools on his way, and one day a friend asked him why he traveled so far when there were other schools so near. He replied, 'They love a fellow there!'"

IN last week's Christian Register the secretary of the Unitarian Church Temperance society complains that the Unitarian temperance pamphlet is a rare document. He only knows of three available for circulation. Will he please add one more, the "How We Got the Temperance Society in the Church;" just published among the "Unity Short Tracts,"—if sixty cents per hundred copies makes it "available."

THE substance of recent articles in UNITY, by "W. C. G.," concerning Conference declarations of Unitarian fellowship and faith—a plea for their right, their safety and their advantage, if pre-declared to be "the voice of only a majority, binding on none and always open to re-statement,"—has been printed in a pamphlet, with a short introduction concerning the true nature of "the issue in the west." See the advertisement in another column.

WHEN one grows old enough and wise enough he is not so sure what he believes about the how of things, and is perhaps more than ever sure of what some call the goodness of the universe, and others the loving-kindness of God, to which the how can be left. With the young it is apt to be the other way; they know about the hows, and practically are not so sure of the eternal goodness. And this is well. That they are so sure of the how, etc., helps them to do and dare and upset things, and change them for the better; and, when they get through with some of their knowledge, they will have their turn at wisdom.

FROM one of our fellow workers comes the following word of cheer for the Western Conference. "Within five minutes after my benediction I had the $20 all subscribed! and I will send it in before the Conference meets." . . . "For we are not dead here, nor even sleeping, but are one with UNITY and all its board, and will swim with them (there will never be any 'sinking') until we all come gloriously to harbor." . . . "I am discovering, with a great bound of heart, that when once we have urged men and women to the consciousness that Human Helpfulness (with big, big H-s) is a large and sublime part of true practical religion, then we may urge and urge on to almost any bounds within reason, and not find ourselves disappointed. Oh, is it not good, and does it not bring happy tears—it does for me! to feel that one has been instrumental, to however slight a degree, in rousing men and women up out of the selfishness and niggardliness of an unreasonable religion, and bringing them into somewhat of a diviner faith? Our society was never, I think, more hopeful than now, or doing more for religion and man."

WHEN a man was vaunting his bicycle to a lady, as much better and more useful and more economical than a horse, we heard the lady answer, "Ah! yes; but then when you go with a bicycle there is only one of you, but when you go with a horse there are two of you." We confess we liked that lady hugely on the spot. That is the right kind of heart! That is a true and deep tie! Your horse and you are two of you—a tie hidden deep in God.

LET self-reliance be self-surrender to the highest in one and it becomes reliance on God. Let self-respect be reverence for the highest in one and it becomes akin to worship. Begin at self-will in the child or in the man, and by the successive steps of self-control, self-denial, self-surrender, self-devotion, one ends on the happy heights of self-forgetting,—that is, ends in the will of God:—

"Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line
Severing rightly his from thine,
Which is human, which divine."

THE signs of increasing "organization" in the Unitarian church are many. This year, at the anniversary meeting in Boston, the various Unity Clubs connected with our churches hope to effect a central organization. The Unitarian Temperance Society holds its first mass-meeting in Tremont Temple, ex-Governor Long presiding. Probably the committee on a Liturgy will make its first report. Here in the west the question of a Declaration of Faith is at least to be offered for discussion. Good! and amen! to each and all such tendencies, we say,—tendencies toward more efficient service in the world for Unitarianism—provided, only and always, that equal tendencies to the "spiritualizing" of Unitarianism exist. Who is looking out for that? Organization which outstrips spiritualizing leads to a funeral for a religious body.

ON a suburban train lately, two men were energetically discussing the photograph business. The following fraction of their talk will carry a suggestion of the whole. "There ought to be something done to keep you amateurs from working at these things. You'll ruin the trade!" "No, I'll tell you how it is. We raise the standard of work so much that you professionals don't want to work hard enough to compete with us." This was a striking reminder of the situation of the Unitarian difficulties to-day, and we give it here as a helpful hint in the right direction. Allusions have been frequent of late to the need of "churches" that are built in the name of God and Christianity. The emphasis carries its own implication as disfavoring societies formed upon any such unauthorized religiousness as a mere "Truth, Righteousness and Love" basis, and calling it "church" work. It does seem, from one point of view, as if it might "ruin the trade;" but, from another point of view, it certainly does "raise the standard of work." To meet opposition in any line of work does inevitably, in the long run, bring advancement to its cause. Amateur photography cultivates a wider and keener artistic appreciation in the people, and works thoroughness and advancement in the professionals. The result of every wide-spread religious controversy is to throw open to the thought of the masses a deeper stratum of religious truth than that which was before grasped. The result of church work done upon a basis of principle, rather than personality, will be to put religiousness into the hearts and lives of the people more closely and firmly than ever before.

WE have heard this remark made by a woman who was earning her living by service in the home of another. "I have lived in houses where they were very pious and very hard on me; now I live where there is no pretension to piety, and they are very easy on me." What then? Is piety bad? Not so; but piosity is. If texts be needed, there are enough against it, such as, "He who loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" and, "Go ye and learn what that meaneth,—I will have mercy and not sacrifice." The other kind of religion, that is, pious observances (if we may defile a good word by calling it pious), but without humanity, Jesus, who had a way of calling things plainly by their names that was very uncomfortable to some people, called "defiling widows' houses after long prayers."

"It means and costs something to be a temperance man in this great wine-growing and brandy-making state of California. All our ministers on this Pacific coast, save one, are total abstainers." So writes a friend from California. Would we could pass the word along to the Middle-State men, "All our western ministers save one are total abstainers;" and they on to the New England men, "All our ministers save one," and they across to the Old England men, "All ours save one." And that would still leave four ministers who need conversion here. Of all men it seems as if the minister, who knows the secrets of so many a hushed tragedy of drink, the dawns of fear in that mother's heart, the first still rains of that young wife's fate, the meaning of the growing swagger-look in that young man's eyes,—as if the minister, of all men, could neither care or dare or bear to be other than "total abstainer."

The A. U. A. Delegation in Chicago.

It was pleasant to greet the five delegates whom the American Unitarian Association sent out to Chicago last week to consult with the directors of the Western Conference and those of the new Western Association, concerning closer co-operation in the missionary work of the west. Secretary Reynolds—or Father Reynolds, if he will let us call him by a heart-name—is always welcome for his own sake, in the west, apart from his official powers and functions. With him came Rev. Howard Brown of Brookline, Rev. James De Normandie of Roxbury, Rev. Mr. Thayer of Cincinnati, and Mr. Albert L. Calder of Providence. Some twenty of the western men were present to receive them, and we had a four hours' friendly and earnest talk together. At its end, ceasing to be officials, we had a fifteen minutes of good fellowship as men and friends.

Not so much the plans as the possibilities of a co-operation which all wished for, became the leading theme of the discussion. During this year of western woe, the American Unitarian Association has tried to hold itself impartially aloof from either party in our differences,—its own income suffering not a little, meanwhile, from the extension of the disturbance eastwards. Apparently it still wishes to preserve this attitude, but now feels it necessary to adopt some more decided line of action in regard to its missionary service here. To co-operate actively with the Western Conference of churches while the Western Association stands apart and hostile, seems wrong to the American Unitarian Association, and therefore that co-operation depends on reconciliation of the Western Unitarian Conference and the Western Association. As the Western Association has frequently offered us, as terms of reconciliation, the alternative of virtually declaring certain doctrinal beliefs obligatory in Unitarianism, or else of abandoning executive functions as a Conference,—the alternative, as it seems to us, of shibboleth or suicide,—the resulting situation with reference to the American Unitarian Association seems tolerably clear. And this becoming tolerably clear at last week's meeting, the delegation from the east wished to learn, next, what effect it was likely to have on our western hearts, should the American Unitarian Association give up co-operation with us in the western work and begin now to operate here alone through an agent, or agents, of its own. As the result of the talk upon this point, they probably saw that relations were likely to become delicate and strained in that case, as the real point of the refusal to co-work with us became better and better understood, and that their utmost care must be used in choosing a wise course of action. We are sure they recognize the difficulty of our problem here, and will try to give that utmost care. Meanwhile, we thank them for the visit, which, in itself, attests their true good-will.

We, at the west, on the other hand, should remember the difficulty of their problem; and, whatever they do, and however it may embarrass and weaken us, should still remember it. From the side of religiousness and the Holy Spirit, the meeting last week was pathetic. The American Unitarian Association directors feel themselves bound, and are bound, by their constitution to administer their funds to promote the interests of "pure Christianity." A real "Andoverschool" question is upon them. Sooner or later they will have to face it in the simple form,—What, in all honesty, is the Unitarian test of "pure Christianity?" Is it the taking of the name, or is it the life, the character, the spirit, and the "fruits," of a man and a society? If it be the former, then the American Unitarian Association ought not to co-operate with the Western Conference as long as the latter abides by the Cincinnati action. If it be the latter, then that Cincinnati action, as the brave refusal to surrender the spirit-test to the name-test, makes new cause and title for all possible co-operation and for honor. Sooner or later, we say, this question will have to be faced; and the American Unitarian Association directors can not settle it alone. The people in the eastern churches will have to help them. It has been faced already at the east in the form of the "Year Book" trouble; faced again in the form of the National Conference trouble of 1868 to 1882. Each time the first answer given at the east was in favor of the name-test; and each time, in a few years, the new heart grew, the higher vision came, the name-test gave way, and the spirit-test was adopted. So will it be again, if at the east the first decision now is for the name against the spirit. This is the good thing about Unitarians,—and it is the consequence of our liberty,—not that we escape all storms, collisions, "issues," in our church-life, but that we soon correct our errors, and are meanwhile friends. Sooner or later, then, this question will be answered rightly: we have no fear. If Jesus Christ were within reach to appeal to, and we did appeal to him, we think he would answer, "I spoke of that matter in my sermon on the mount. Do you not remember? You will find it near the end." w. c. G.

An Ethical Basis.

The basis of anything ought to be in accordance with the thing to be built. A church cannot be built upon an ethical basis, because the word church implies something more than ethics. A real church would be top-heavy if reared on so narrow a basis as ethics. It follows from this, that if a conference of churches has a purely ethical basis it cannot "do the work" which these churches would naturally wish to do.

The Western Conference at Cincinnati last year was not really put on an ethical basis. It is doubtful if a resolution can, in any proper sense, be called the basis of a conference. Then, as to the resolution, it welcomes all who wish to join the Conference to assist in establishing truth, righteousness and love in the world. Of these three words only one is ethical. The word truth is rather a philosophical than an ethical word, and if in this connection it means anything, it means theology rather than ethics. To establish truth in the world has been the aim of philosophers and theologians, while the aim of moralists has been simply to establish righteousness, or good conduct. What it might mean to try to establish love in the world, it is difficult to say. Love is an emotion that needs no establishing; what it needs, if anything, is guidance or control. Not to be too critical, however, the meaning in this sentence would seem in all probability to be religious. Love, when we exclude the lower forms, is quite entirely a religious word, and we speak in strained or figurative meanings, when we count it ethical. In a formal resolution like this, however, it was not right to leave the word without limitation. D. M. Bennett, of unpleasant notoriety, labored, some people think conscientiously, for the establishing of love in the world, but by it he meant something very different from anything meant in this resolution. This resolution ought to have limited this word by others, as, for example, Love to all mankind and love to God. "But then, it would have been religious, and religion means dogmatism, and this must be a purely ethical basis." But the religion has not been excluded, it is in the word love, or nothing is there. Neither has theology been excluded, it is in the word truth, or establishing truth means nothing whatever.

Brethren and friends, this discussion over words is a bad business, besides being useless. It has brought disfellowship and heart-burnings through all our churches; pray let us abandon it. The basis of our Conference is its article of incorporation, and its purpose is stated there with sufficient definiteness, and as fully as Congregational principles, broadly interpreted, allow. The Conference exists to do the work which these Unitarian churches have in hand to do. That work has always been to establish similar churches, and that has always meant Christian churches. Let us return to this and rest content.

u.

Parker's South Boston Sermon.

We will give an abstract of this famous sermon, partly because of its fame and its historical importance, and partly to point a moral. Parker named the sermon, "A Discourse of the Transient and the Permanent in Christianity." It was an ordination sermon; that is, the discourse at the ordination of a minister in South Boston, delivered May 19, 1841. It fills thirty-six pages of the recent volume of selections from the sermons and writings of Theodore Parker, called "Views of Religion," published by the American Unitarian Association. The book has nineteen chapters, with an index filling twenty-eight pages, in double columns. It is a well-made book, with good paper and large type. Without doubt, it will carry the peculiar strength that inspires all Parker's thoughts and words very widely.

The South Boston sermon produced a great stir. The newspapers and ministers discussed it, the Unitarians being challenged thereto by sharp-sighted orthodox theologians, who saw what "lay latent in the discourse," and asked troublesome questions, not caring for a reply, as Weiss says, but "intending only to embarrass the Unitarians and force them to accept or repel Mr. Parker." Ah! the Unitarians could not rise to the high occasion. The more is the pity! The pity may go without the least tincture of blame. We mean not to reproach those elder men of our dear household. It is not easy to be wholly wise. Yet it is always a pity when a large opportunity for large conduct is lost. Weiss says, well, "The Unitarians forgot a great many indignant words which their leaders had uttered when the orthodox refused to continue the fellowship of exchange and ministerial intercourse, and their plea was that the old controversy arose from a difference within the limits of Christianity, but that the new one was between Christianity and something else. Was not this assuming the very point at issue? And the orthodox never allowed their distinction; but had previously declared that men who denied the Trinity, the Atonement, and Original Depravity, were outside of Christianity. If a man is permitted to decide that he [the italics are ours] is inside anything, he can put his head through his own assumption, and others will appear to him outside." This sermon, together with the publication of Parker's book, called "A Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion," which speedily followed, caused Parker to be disowned as much as it is in the power of Unitarians to disown anybody; but this means no more than that ministers, with a few honorable exceptions, set up little inquisitions, each on his own private account (Spanish inquisitions we might call them, that is to say, inquisitions in Spain; for, in truth, they were very fanciful; and finding America but stony soil for such seed, and having no root, they withered away), and refused to exchange with the heretic. We were about to exclaim, satirically, "Horrible punishment!" but we forbear, remembering that Parker wept over it. We will give here an abstract of the sermon which bore this sad fruit, but also, in another way, great, good fruit:

The present state of religious thought.

Fears about religion and Christianity.

Some bad men say Christianity is worn out.

Some good men say it is past, and that something better is coming.

So let us consider what is transient and what is permanent in Christianity.

Christ says his words shall never pass away.

What more fleeting than a word?

Yet Jesus simply gave his thoughts to words, taking no other pains with them.

And those words have lived and vibrated while empires have risen and fallen.

But while Christ's words have remained, men's notions of his words, that is, current Christianity, have changed continually.

Christian forms have changed.

Christian doctrines have changed, and this is inevitable; for men can not think truly all at once, nor learn all the facts of nature at once, but both by degrees and with many errors and corrections.

Two illustrations or examples of the transient elements:

First, the views of the origin and authority of the Bible; these have changed from age to age, especially under modern criticism.

Secondly, the views of the nature and authority of Christ; these have changed continually and vastly from age to age.

But these subjects and the different views about them belong to theology, not to religion. Christianity is not theology but religion, and rests on its own natural and immutable truths. And these two, the Bible and Christ, shall be lifted up into a pure light.

The Bible—how grand it is! how much it has done for mankind! Men shall learn to know it truly, as it is. Christ! how high! how glorious! Men shall learn to know him as he was; and thus lifted up he shall draw all nations unto him.

Now, we cannot be sure that other like changes in doctrines and forms will not come; nay, it is sure they will come.

But Christianity will stay, because it is simply the voice of God in the heart. It requires not that men shall think alike, but that they shall think uprightly. Jesus exemplified this truth. He worshiped with nothing between him and the Father; and so he would have us do. That alone is to be a Christian as he was Christ.

Compare the simplicity of this Christianity of Jesus with the systems taught under that name.

Alas! for clashings and ill-feelings!

This, then, is the transient and the permanent in Christianity.

Let the current and the transient change and go, and regret it not. Cling to the inner and spiritual, which are the permanent, and you shall be set above all fear.

Here are a few sayings from the sermon, a very few, and short ones, from the many and longer which we have marked. "The difference at this day between opposing classes of Christians, the difference between the Christianity of some sects and that of Christ himself, is deeper and more vital than that between Jesus and Plato, pagan as we call him." "Strictly speaking, there is but one kind of religion, as there is but one kind of love, though the manifestations of this religion, in forms, doctrines and life, be never so diverse. It is through these men approximate to the true expression of this religion." "The stream of Christianity, as men receive it, has caught a stain from every soil it has filtered through, so that now it is not the pure water from the well of life which is offered to our lips, but streams troubled and polluted by man with mire and dirt." "Exalt him as much as we may, we shall yet perhaps come short of the mark. But still was he not our brother; the son of man, as we are; the son of God, like ourselves? His excellence—was it not human excellence? His wisdom, love, piety,—sweet and celestial as they were,—are they not what we also may attain?" "The quarrels which then [in the middle ages] drove wise men mad now only excite a smile or a tear, as we are disposed to laugh or weep at the frailty of man. We have other straws of our own to quarrel for. . . . Who shall tell us that another age will not smile at our doctrines, disputes and unchristian quarrels about Christianity, and make wide the mouth at men who walked brave in orthodox raiment, delighting to blacken the names of heretics, and repeat again the old charge, 'He hath blasphemed?' . . . Men of other times may look down equally on the heresy-hunters and men hunted for heresy, and wonder at both. . . . The contest about transubstantiation, and the immaculate purity of the Hebrew and Greek texts of the Scriptures, was waged with a bitterness unequaled in these days. The Protestant smiles at one, the Catholic at the other, and men of sense wonder at both. It might teach us all a lesson, at least of forbearance." "There are always some, even religious men, who do not see the permanent element; so they rely on the fleeting, and, what is also for evil, condemn others for not doing the same. They may take a defense of the truth for an attack upon the holy isholies; the removal of a theological error for the destruction of all religion."

What is the plain lesson for us from this sermon and the controversy it raised? Two-fold; first, how innocent this sermon seems to us now! Why, it would hardly cause a ripple in the quietest of conservative churches. This shows that the Unitarian mind has broadened and grown reasonable. Strange that so little is made of such lessons! Strange that we do not reflect, if frightened, that even our little babies soon will take for granted with a quiet mind what we quake over. Secondly, what has come of all the offence, the exclusion? Why, now behold the Unitarian Association issue Parker's works and place his picture in their new building. O excellent event! But then, looking back on it all, from the vantage ground of this outcome, how poor and sad it looks in the distance! How mean, too, and pitiful!—But they meant well, they thought they had a cause. Let us beware.

J. V. B.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Unfinished Song.

One time an angel in the room
Made radiant the twilight gloom;
"Lo, I am sent to show to you
A vision. Choose what you would view."

"The one thing which, when I am gone,
Our Lord shall joy to look upon!"
"And do you think what that may be?"
My angel questioned, smilingly.

"Ay! The one gift he gave most fair,
I cherished with exceeding care;
And wrought, in love and tender awe,
One little song without a flaw."

"Behold the vision!" And straightway
My life rolled backward to a day
When all my soul was thrilled with song,
And words flowed fast, a glowing throng,

Then to my side my little boy,
Heart-broken o'er some shattered toy,
Pressed sobbing; with a pang, to me
I clasped him, kissed him on my knee.

"The simple duty close at hand
Which here was wrought at love's command,
Is your best deed.—The song half done
Is fairer than the perfect one.

"The song—some other soul shall voice
Better by far. But O, rejoice!
The duty, if neglected, you
Had yearned across the grave to do."

ALICE WILLIAMS BROTHERTON.

Our Present Opportunities and Our Present Needs.

AN ADDRESS BY REV. OSCAR CLUTE BEFORE THE IOWA CONFERENCE, AT HUMBOLDT, APRIL 6, 1887.

Our opportunities depend on the condition of religious thought in the world to-day. The churches have large numbers of followers. Among these followers there are some who are real believers in the creeds that the churches represent, and who are trying through those creeds to serve God and man. But very large numbers in the churches have no vital faith in the creeds, and no vital religious convictions of any kind. They go to church because it is popular, it helps them in business, it introduces them to society, it gets votes for them in politics. And then there are in the churches many people who do not believe the creeds, but who go to the churches because they are the best religious influence near them. A very large part of the American people are outside of all churches. Of these outsiders some are genuinely religious; they stay from the churches because the churches do not supply their religious needs. Some are indifferent to religion; they know nothing of the creeds, they care nothing for them. Some are antagonistic to all religion, for religion has been so presented to them as to drive them into opposition and bitterness. Some of those outside the churches are the great criminal and degraded classes who are especially in need of help. All the classes of people I have mentioned are the ones whom we ought to reach and help.

In reaching these people we have certain indirect and yet powerful aids. Our great system of free public schools is a most wonderful help to our work. The daily and weekly press in all parts of the country, if not our direct friend is neither our enemy. It will print our word, it will give to our ablest men a wide public. The many cheap and good publications can be used with good results. The progress of Biblical scholarship is one of our good friends. The revised version of the Bible, in sweeping from the Bible a very large part of those texts which are supposed to teach some of the doctrines of orthodoxy, has done us great service. The progress of modern science, too, is fast undermining the dogmas on which the popular creeds depend.

Then as our direct aids we have that great system of thought which has come to us from the past, and to which to-day our religious geniuses make additions,—a system which is known as Unitarianism. I need not to-day make any statement of it. As to its essentials the most of us are agreed. Then the great purpose which animates us is the greatest of all aids. That purpose is to help all mankind to a purer moral and religious life, and in this work the noble religious spirit which has been so conspicuous in our great leaders, and which I hope is found in some measure in us all, will give to us invincible strength and courage.

Such are the people whom we are to help; such are our aids, direct and indirect.

In considering what we need to make our work helpful and successful in the future it is wise for us to look somewhat at our work in the past. If I criticise that work somewhat, remember that I do it as a friend. I express the feeling of a very large number of our thoughtful men when I say that our success in reaching and helping the great body of the people of America has not been so great as our fathers hoped eighty years ago. We have not accomplished the large work of which those noble leaders hoped and for which they prayed. Why have we failed? It seems to me that the largest cause of our failure lies in a defect in our method. We have worked as if the human mind were intellect only, when of course it includes the emotions and the will as well. We have appealed excellently to the intellect. We have had clear thought and we have enforced that thought with clear reasoning. Generally we have stopped here, we have thought that this was enough. We have seemed to forget that emotions and will are an essential part of the human mind: that they are given by God as well as the intellect, and that doubtless He knew what He was about when He gave them to us. If in our endeavor to help men we fail because we do not rouse the emotions and move the will, we are failing to use methods which God has given us for doing good. The carpenter who has a kit of good tools would hardly be thought wise if he confined himself to the use of one tool, say the ax. His ax might be a perfect tool of its kind; but if he used no other tool his progress in building his house would be slow, and the building, if ever completed, would be rough. Using such tools as are necessary he easily erects the commodious and beautiful building. If, in our endeavor to help men, we approach them not only through the intellect, but also through the emotions and the will, we can accomplish an immeasurably greater work than we have yet done.

Let nobody say that I am underrating the importance of the intellect. In not a few friendly contests in the past I have been found contending for the importance of an intellectual basis,—a basis of thought in our work, if we would reach the best results. Upon that I still insist as strongly as ever. To-day I do but ask attention to the other departments of mind,—the emotions and the will. I do but ask that, for the help of man, we shall wisely appeal to all those faculties by which man can be reached and helped.

If we will thus add an appeal to the emotions and the will to our already convincing appeal to the intellect, we can almost immediately enlarge our sphere of helpfulness to an almost unlimited degree. Instead of reaching the little handful of people only whom we now reach, we could reach the learned and unlearned, the religious and the non-religious, the indifferent and the antagonistic, the degraded and the sinful. We could so enlighten and convince the intellect, so warm and rouse the emotions, so move the will to an immediate decision to give up all forms of disobedience that we, as individuals and as a denomination, could become a most important factor in leading all classes and conditions into the kingdom of God.

Confirmation.

They stood before us fair with youth
Their faces full of light;
They came to give themselves to truth
To happiness and right.

And standing there with purpose pure,
With hearts resolved, sincere,
We gave to them our friendship sure,
Our blessing and our cheer.

"Go forth! the world now waits for you;
It wants your word and deed,—
The willing hand, the spirit true,
To sow the swift-winged seed.

"Sow light where darkness seals men's eyes;
Sow good where sin is rife;
Sow love where alienations rise—
These seeds of endless life,"

J. G. L.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR UNITY:—I hope that the coming conference will not devote all of its time to the discussion of a basis of fellowship, increased missionary work, and like problems, of undoubted importance; but will widen its field, and make itself an exception in church conferences by giving a good share of its time and thought to a consideration of the questions which are agitating the masses, viz., What are the proper relations of man to man? What is a just government, and how are we to get it?

The masses, that body of the people which, wisely guided, makes up the state, and unwisely destroys it;—the masses are not concerned about bases of fellowship and missionary work, but about justice between man and man. They are fast reaching a point where the rich man's charity (in its deepest sense of love), his sympathy and kind helpfulness, are not enough. They are asking for justice; are asking: "By what right have you the wherewithal to be kindly helpful? by what right am I in the condition to need your helpfulness?" They say: "There is such a thing as justice; give us that. Then we shall not need your help, and then your charity and sympathy will be acceptable." Such questions, such ideas, are spreading among the masses. Does it need a wise man to foresee the result? Does any one pretend that under existing forms of society the masses do get or can get justice? Do not all but the blindest admit that society must be vastly reformed or wholly reorganized before justice can be done? Aye! and JUSTICE MUST BE DONE, or a French revolution.

Does any one ask, "What has all this to do with our conference?" Brother, much, very much. Do you think he would have been a wise priest who, being told ten years before the French revolution that the church ought to study the social problem and try to reconcile peasant and noble, had answered: "The work of the church is to spread religion, to teach love and righteousness; she must not meddle with politics." Do you think they were wise ministers who, ten years before our rebellion, said: "The business of the minister is with religion; he must not meddle with slavery." And so to-day, ministers and churches have not to deal alone with religion (in the narrow sense of that term): they must recognize the needs of society, its greatest needs, and try to satisfy them.

"And are not the greatest needs the needs of the soul?" Yea, verily, and the greatest need of the soul is that it DO JUSTICE.

We, brothers and sisters, we who stand midway between the very rich and the very poor, we need to think more of doing justice. Justice is not done; the needle-women, the street gamins, the fallen women of our cities; the tramps and the mortgage-ridden farmers of the country; these and more testify with tears, with groans—aye! and with muttered threats—that justice is not done. Society does injustice to these her children. We are a part of society. We are (not with pride, but knowing the heavy responsibility it implies, do I assert it) the salt of society; a salt which is fast losing its savor, if existing social rottenness be any indication. We must do justice. We must become the saviors of society. If the impending Revolution is to be changed to Evolution, we must do the work. We must do justice.

The wrongs from which the masses suffer most and which we too often countenance, are not those committed in the slums. How many, think you, of Chicago's citizens, are not proud of her magnificent Stock Exchange? Yet it were better for your city if that "gilded palace of sin" were what that name usually implies, than the den of thieves it now is; better that it were filled with painted harlots who sell themselves and their own souls than with men who ruin the lives and souls of others. And we, we who should be the salt, countenance these stock gamblers and thieves whose influence upon the masses is far more pernicious than that of all other social parasites put together.

Let the coming conference deal with the highest problems the soul needs, and let it urge, in deep and unmistakable tone, the mighty need of the soul TO DO JUSTICE.

EDWIN G. BROWN.

LAS ANIMAS, COLO.

THE STUDY TABLE.

EDITOR OF UNITY.—Dear Sir:—Enclosed find bank check for $3.00, half of which is for my own subscription to UNITY for the year ending March 1, 1888; the other $1.50 for a new subscriber. Send it to Mrs. ———, Salem, Mass. Send me for new subscription "The Faith that Makes Faithful," the $1.00 edition.

I was somewhat surprised to see in your prospectus of UNITY the quotation from my note to Brother Blake. If any word of mine can be of use in aiding UNITY's circulation it would be to me a rich reward. UNITY! dear little UNITY! "Not the least art thou among the princes" of modern thought. Brave UNITY! "The archers have sorely grieved thee and shot at thee and hated thee, but I have prayed for thee that thy bow may abide in strength." I wonder if the editors of UNITY can tell some of us eastern brethren "what we can do to be saved" from the incessant annoyance and persecution that we have been subjected to for months by certain brethren who seem to have nothing to do but to write and send out tracts and pamphlets to enlighten us stupid people east on "What is Unitarianism?" When is this thing going to stop? Can not you find, in the far west, as far as the setting sun, "some work for their idle hands to do" besides persecuting us quiet brethren in the east? Is it possible that we gray-headed, toothless fathers in Unitarian Israel have not yet learned "What is Unitarianism?" Where do they get their authority for putting up their judgment as the infallible one in deciding "What is Unitarianism? Who cares or wishes to be bound by such verbal definitions?" I spoke a few days ago to a brother minister in one of our eastern cities regarding this petty, unchristian persecution. He smiled and said, "Well, do as I do,—as soon as I see 'Western Issue,' or 'Unitarian Christianity,' or 'What is it to be a Unitarian?' etc., etc., I give them to my little girl to cut out paper dolls*—or drop them into the waste basket for lighting the fire." This "Odium Theologicum" (for such it is—nothing more and nothing less—it surely cannot be Unitarianism) is the worst of all social evils; the most arrogant, selfish and cruel of things. It is a species of barbarism that should never be mentioned among decent, enlightened, truth-loving, righteousness-loving Unitarians. It breeds the foulest abominations, develops the most lamentable dishonesties, fosters controversy,—not for the love of truth but for the love of individual opinion; it perverts the powers of intellect, the zeal of the heart; it creates, among those who should be brethren, the most heartless inhumanities; it is of the spirit that in all ages has stoned the prophets, that crucified the Holy One between two thieves, that kindled the fire of martyrdom, that built the inquisition, that put the brave old Palissy, the potter, in a foul French prison in his 80th year, that made the streets of Paris red with the blood of Huguenots. It is the spirit that inspired the brutal Bonner, that animated Laud, that prompted Calvin to murder Servetus. It has no "bowels of mercy." It is "red in tooth and claw." And are we to be taught that Unitarianism means to-day the same arrogant, overbearing, dishonest and inhuman spirit which, in the torn and tattered rags of theological word-jargon, breathed out threatenings of old? My heart's desire and prayer to God is, that these mistaken brethren will heed the warning of the good book, "Shun profane and vain babblings, for they will increase unto more ungodliness."—Avoid "doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil-surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds and destitute of the truth."

Fraternally,

NEW H. BERGER.

EVERY man takes care his neighbor does not cheat him. But a day will come when he begins to care that he does not cheat his neighbor.—Emerson.

*Thereby giving them at least a semblance of life.—EDITOR.

American Patriotism. An Essay. By Putnam P. Bishop. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

This is a book wholly commendable for its purpose and aim, and with much that is commendable in its execution, although in this it differs much in different parts. It has, however, the merit of increasing in value towards the end. It begins its stronger portions when it begins to disclose the vices antagonistic to patriotism, and thence goes on to treat of partisanship, civil service, and of the spoils system. There is little danger that too great stress will be laid on the importance of this subject by the press, the schools, the pulpit, or the rostrum of this country; but there is great danger that too little stress will be laid on it,—as, indeed, now is the case, lamentably. The tone of the book is entirely calm, persuasive, and reasoning, and its views deserve thought. We quote some sayings,—“The maxim, that ‘The office should seek the man, and not the man the office’, is often repeated with approval; but I am convinced that it ought to be discarded. The co-operation of our desire for personal welfare, with the impulses which move us to work for the public good, is obviously provided for in our spiritual constitution.” “I suppose there is as much meaningless verbiage gathered around what is called ‘the will of the people’, as it is possible to find in any other connection, and that no other subject surpasses this in affording material for demagogic harangues.” “When the spoils-mongers, professional politicians, and servile partisans assume to speak for their respective parties, they exaggerate their own importance preposterously; and when those of them who belong to the party controlling the administration, pretend, on the strength of that ascendancy, to voice the will of the American people, their impudence takes on colossal proportions.” “There is nothing to be deplored in the mere certainty that, under republican institutions, there will always be a class of men exceptionally powerful in shaping the characters of parties, and consequently in determining governmental action. If they are deservedly powerful, their existence is an immense boon to their country.” This last remark ought to be the key to much and extended reflection.

J. V. B.

A History of Education. By F. V. N. Painter, A. M. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1, 3 and 5 Bond street.

This is a volume of the International Education Series, which bids fair to be a valuable and thorough series of treatises. This volume fills 325 pages, with an index of 8 pages. The table of contents is excellently arranged. Much space is given to accounts of special teachers, and of the educational views of different philosophers—which is well. The author says that his order of treating the subject follows the course of human progress, which naturally gives the following divisions: 1. The Oriental Nations. 2. The Ancient Classical Nations. 3. Christian Education Before the Reformation, under which head is discussed the relation of Christianity to Education, and Education in the Early Churches and during the Middle Ages. 4. Education from the Reformation to the Present Time, treating of the Revival of Learning and the Humanists; the Relation of the Reformation to Education; the Reformers, Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli and Calvin; Abstract Theological Education (1550–1700); Reaction Against Abstract Theological Education, under which are treated Bacon, Montaigne, Comenius, Locke and others; Abstract Human Education, treating of Rousseau and others; Education in the Nineteenth Century, under which Pestalozzi, Froebel and the Kindergarten, and Contemporary Education in Germany, France, England and the United States, are treated. The author says in the preface, “As far as was consistent with the limits of this volume, the great teachers of all ages have been allowed to speak for themselves—a method that appeared more satisfactory than to paraphrase or epitomize their views. Avoiding such matters of detail as serve only to confuse and oppress the memory, I have endeavored to present clearly the leading characteristics of each period, and the labors and distinctive principles of prominent educators. Considerable prominence has been given to Comenius, Pestalozzi, Froebel and other educational reformers, who laid the foundations of the scientific methods now coming into use." We like not to see on page 188 such a remark as this, "John Milton, the sublimest poet of all times;" much better and nobler is Hugo's view that poets are not to be compared, for each holds his own place perfectly; but it is of no use to argue such a point.

J. V. B.

Poems: Patriotic, Religious, Miscellaneous. By Abram J. Ryan ("Father Ryan"). Tenth edition. 12mo., pp. 347. Baltimore: The Baltimore Publishing Company.

"He dips his pen in fire!" said a southern poet of John G. Whittier. The same may be said, and with equal emphasis, of him the title of whose memorial volume of verse appears above. Mr. Ryan was unquestionably one of the very first writers of the south in poetic power. His scope was far more limited than that of Lanier, and few of his strains are so high as almost any of that poet's; but he possessed quite as much poetic quality as Lanier, or, indeed, any other southern poet. He always chose, save in the "Song of the Mystic" and kindred pieces, thoughts familiar to the people; yet he felt so deeply, and was so richly gifted with the metrical faculty, that not one of all the poems in this collection but is worth cherishing. Doubtless, his most successful as well as most popular pieces are "The Song of the Mystic" and "The Conquered Banner". These are certainly among the most fervid and poetical pieces of verse ever produced in this country; but in all there are enduring qualities. Some lines are inferior, and a few rhymes are poor; yet the technical features of the poems rank with those of our most distinguished verse-men. The book is accompanied with a memoir of the author, by John Moran, of Washington, and also contains a full-page likeness of Mr. Ryan and cuts of the Irish flag; of St. Mary's church, Mobile, and the author's residence adjoining; and of the Confederate banner. The covers show elegant and tasteful binding.

E. R. C.

Japanese Fairy Tales. New York: For sale by G. P. Putnam's Sons.

These are not only Japanese folk stories, but presented in little Japanese books, each story bound separately, with an ornamented cover tied with silk floss. They are eight in number. Six of them have an excellent moral, and only one or two of them are at all unpleasant, and these not so unpleasant as our common nursery tale of Hop-o-my-thumb. Some of them are very pretty. Like all folk-lore stories, they are very carefully and directly told. The illustrations, which are profuse, are interesting bits of Japanese art. The little books are so prettily bound that they would form an entertaining gift to any one interested in undeveloped but vigorous art.

NEVER too many cyclopedias; always room for a better one. We have been examining with interest the "International Encyclopedia", which is now being urged as a candidate for public favor, by Dodd, Mead & Co., of New York. It is, as all cyclopedias ought to be, a growth, starting from the father of all cyclopedias, "Conversations-Lexicon", published in Leipsic in 1812, passing through the growths of the "Chambers' Cyclopedias"—and the "Library of Universal Knowledge," published a few years ago by the energetic Alden of New York. Revised, re-edited and enlarged, it now presents itself in the shape of fifteen handsome, practical volumes for $45.00. We like all the cyclopedias and covet them all; but certainly the same amount of money cannot be put into any books that will yield larger returns in the home than in this form. It is possible, where the "Britannica" is not; and as a ready reference it is handy, even where the "Britannica" is. It is the natural basis of a parish library, a Sunday-school library, a teacher's library and a minister's library. We are glad for the publication of Dodd & Mead, and hope to see it circulate.

THE HOME.

A Recollection of Last Summer.

"Now run out and call the children, Bertha; here it is eight o'clock." So says mother, and I run out quickly; but where are the children, whose faces I saw not five minutes ago? I hear the sound of talking in the back yard, and sure of myself, I run round the house to find it was only Nora talking over the fence to her best friend. She declares they were here "just now," but to my vision they had vanished. I hasten across the yard, thinking they may have gone to see Aunt Mary, who lives in the next house. No, her children are nearly ready for bed. Ralph had seen Flossy, however, not long before, crossing the road. I hasten away again in the direction indicated. I inquire at two or three houses, and at last hear that Flossy has gone with Effie to see something on the corner. In the mean time, I have found Bob playing ball in a field. Every one knows it is never too warm for boys to play ball. After calling him until I am out of breath, he is made to understand that he is wanted. Trouble is but just begun. "Just one more bat, and I'll come right in." I catch sight of Flossy on the corner, and soon I start triumphantly with her for the house. She lets me lead her in passive, but soon murmurs in a decided tone, "Don't think it's fair to have to go to bed before Bob does." Nevertheless, she throws herself down on the bed, saying, "Oh, dear, it is so hot I can't undress," and my suggestion that she put on her nightgown goes unheeded. Five minutes pass, but Bob does not make his appearance; five more, and still he is waiting for "one more bat." This time mamma goes for him. He soon appears on the scene of action, but when nearly undressed, remembers that his coat is hanging on the fence about two blocks away. He gets it, and comes back much sooner than I dared hope. Meanwhile Flossy is safe in her bed, and Bob starts for his own in the room opposite. Then comes the nightly request from Flossy,—“Won't you come to bed now, Bertha?” I refuse, simply because I am too tired for that. She doesn't exactly understand the reason. Then she wants to go in Bob's room to kiss him good night, which I permit. Their prayers are said, intermingled with some laughing, much to my displeasure. I talk quite severely about the wrong of mingling fun and prayers, but it doesn't seem to have much effect. At last I am on the steps down stairs, cooling off, and think how glad I am to have them safely disposed of, when Bob appears at the head of the stairs calling, "Mamma, can't I have a drink of water?" "Yes, Bertha will get it; run right back to bed." The water is brought, both pillows well shaken up, the sheets smoothed out, and then I go back, hoping for fifteen minutes of rest before bedtime. All is quiet for a few minutes, and then the sound of laughter is wafted down the stairs, following a sudden noise. We rush up to find that a slat has fallen out of Bob's bed, and the two small, night-gowned figures are in a state of excitement until all is put to rights again. The clock strikes the half-hour past nine, and mamma and I are too tired for anything but rest. We say, "Soon they will be big enough to put themselves to bed without noise or trouble. But then, who wants them to grow up fast? They do that any way faster than we really like, so why not be patient for the short time that they are "our troublesome comforts?"

BERTHA BOYD.

"WILL he do the deed and repent it?

He had better never been born.

Will he do the deed and exalt it?

His fame shall be outworn.

He will do the deed and abide it,

And sit on his throne on high,

And look on to-day and to-morrow

As those who never die."

In a republic the passions of the hour must ever prevail over serene judgment.

W. W.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

"The Divine Satisfaction."

A SERMON PREACHED IN THE UNITARIAN CHURCH, GENEVA, ILL.,
APRIL 24, 1887, BY THE MINISTER, JAMES H. WEST.

Selected and Published by the Congregation.

I saw, lately advertised, the title of a new theological work, published in England. It was this: "The Divine Satisfaction: A Review of what should and should not be thought about the Atonement." The author is James Morris Whiton, Ph.D., and the book has lately reached its second edition. I have not seen the volume itself, nor do I think it would contain very much that either you or I would care to spend much time over. But Professor Toy, of Harvard college, says of it and of its author:

Mr. Whiton is already favorably known by various theological writings, in which he shows a notable breadth and depth of religious feeling. The object of the present work is to prove that the Biblical teaching of atonement, properly understood, contains nothing that is opposed to our highest moral sense. The author rejects, from his conception of atonement, everything that he cannot bring into harmony with perfect individual freedom—such as the vicarious suffering of Christ, the arbitrary forgiveness of sins, and imputation of Christ's righteousness. He really draws his principles of religious life from his own moral consciousness. At the same time, his reverence for the Bible is so great that he feels constrained to prove his position to be Biblical. I do not think, however, that his exegesis is exact; he does not succeed in eliminating the idea of vicarious suffering from the Epistles. But the spirit of the book is admirable, and must contribute to the establishment of a more rational idea of religion.

It was not, however, especially with the subject-matter of this book,—the Christian idea of "atonement,"—that I wished, friends, to occupy your thought to-day. Certain ideas, the rather, suggested simply by the title of the volume in question, as that title first met my eye, are what I would endeavor, in the main, to set forth. And I have taken that title, direct, as the title of my discourse: The Divine Satisfaction.

First, however, I must outline briefly, for the sake of the comment I shall wish to make, what the phrase has meant in the Christian church for many hundreds of years, as it has been literally interpreted.

Under the ecclesiastical idea of "sin" and the Christian scheme of "salvation," all men have been held, for nearly two thousand years, to be under the just condemnation of everlasting punishment—in consequence of the "fall" of the mythical "Adam" in the times of the race's infancy. In the disobedience of the supposed "first man" to the commands of the Hebrew God, concerning the eating of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, "Adam" and all his descendants to remotest time came under the divine wrath. "Infinite justice" was offended; and in order that infinite justice might meet infinite satisfaction,— "divine satisfaction,"—all men must partake of the evil consequences.

And thus, for many centuries, the course of things went on, and the tribes of earth went down to death.

But in the lapse of a number of thousands of years, "God," in compassion for the creatures he had made, but who had rebelled against him, was able to devise a plan whereby "infinite justice" might still be "satisfied," and yet man as a whole go free thenceforth, under certain conditions, from the inherited curse. The divine plan, whereby infinite justice should be appeased, was this: A part of "God" himself should come to earth, and, in the person of a young Jew, give his life once for all, as an infinite sacrifice to the remainder of "God" still on the throne of the universe,—who, according to the scheme, though newly wishing well to men, continued to demand some sort of recompense for offended righteousness. And this infinite sacrifice made in the person of Jesus (for that portion of "God" which came to earth and dwelt in the man of Nazareth was as "infinite God" as the remainder that still ruled in the skies, and thus the sacrifice was "infinite sacrifice") was held to counterbalance humanity's infinite guilt: conditionally, however, even now, we have to add, on every man's individual, formal acceptance (in the name of that part of "God" which was sacrificed) of the atonement made to the other part.

In briefest outline, this was, so far as I am able to understand it, the original Christian scheme,—though possibly I have not here expressed it with all the plausible smoothness and contradictory circumlocution of the popular creeds, nor presented it in accepted ecclesiastical language. . . . We see things, oftentimes, with altogether a new face, by thinking them in straightforward language.

Now, I would not have you think, friends, that I am declaring that all this, which I have just been setting forth in its naked wonderfulness, is held by all Christians to-day—even of the evangelical sects. The single volume which gives my sermon its title proves the contrary. There are growing to be in the church, of late years, various more rational ideas of sin and forgiveness, of causes and consequences, than were ever held until quite recent times. Yet the creeds of the church—still subscribed to by all evangelical church-members—continue to set forth such things, and very many who formally accept them as "God's truth" are openly tenacious of them if you or I dare to question them.

All that aside however for our present purpose, we ought not to fail to note, before passing from this old-time thought, that the soul of truth in the whole complicated scheme—for it has a soul of truth—is one which the world will never outgrow. Almost all of the great ideas of mankind, held through long periods,—however false in garb,—are most often true in fact. In the present instance, for example, the man "Adam" may be proved altogether a mythical personage. Jesus himself, even, may be held more and more, as years go on, to have been simply a pure, open-souled, natural, patriotic Jewish youth, around whose brief, earnest life as a nucleus the growing church built up symbol and dogma and high ideal, until, in the maze of speculation and formula, the original human teacher of Galilee was altogether forgotten. And moreover,—greater transforming fact yet,— "sin" and "evil," in human life, may be demonstrated, without possibility of question, to be not at all, in every instance, nor in many instances, pure "wilfulness," and open "antagonism to God,"—much less, ever, inherited "total depravity;" but rather, in by far the majority of cases, simple "imperfection" of blood and brain, and a result of natural weakness of untrained will: both of which features of his defective, as-yet-unsublimated nature, man to-day is rapidly learning how he may outgrow, and shall sometime altogether outgrow.

And yet, notwithstanding all this our new modern thought and better actual comprehension of things, the eternal fact will abide—founded in the nature of things as the universe goes on—that evil, invariably, unless some "atonement" is made, does bring evil, awful consequences; that the laws of life, and of the universe, under which man has his existence, are no whit less exacting or remorseless, in any instance, than the vengeful personalized deity of old-time was deemed to be. The world-forces demand, on the contrary, "to the uttermost," equally with the merciless deific Fabrication of the child-world,—unless by human intelligence thwarted. Man may co-operate with recuperative forces, towards mending. But offended "law," no less than an "offended God," must meet "satisfaction" of some kind. Divine "forces," gone contrary to,—whether with open knowledge, or in utter ignorance,—must meet, equally with "divine justice," divine satisfaction, of some kind.

Thus those who, in theology to-day, have turned as it were square about, and declare now a "God of love,"—that is to say a God who, for any reason, or under any certain conditions, whatsoever they may be, will "forgive" and "save to the uttermost," making consequences as though they had not been,—are falsifiers and mistaken, equally with the phanta-siasts of old time, who declared only a "God of wrath." For the universe does not so work! The forces of the overruling energy are immutable. Evil brings evil for evermore—unless, as I have said, thwarted by intelligent, counteracting good. Absolute "forgiveness" of any sin is impossible: its consequences follow in the nature of things. The God-power does not, and cannot, contradict itself.

It is only thus,—through the absolute invariability of upholding and corrective law,—that sentient, intelligent life, in a universe such as we know ours to be, could exist and grow from more to more, from higher to higher. It is only thus that the physical worlds, even, could abide as worlds. If evil and chaos—broken law—whether in planet or in man, were not invariably "destructive;" moreover, if they were not ground down and made "abnormal,"—indeed, if they were not abnormal in the very nature of things,—soon evil and chaos would predominate over good: which never yet, in the history of nebula or world or human soul they have done!—else nebula would have scattered to the remotest limits of the universe; never would its whirling haze have condensed into suns and planets. Worlds would have sundered themselves into fragments; never would they have circled, "singing," in their orbits, about their parent stars, forever in eternal order. The entirety of potential human soul would never have climbed from worm to man,—from savage to barbarous, from barbarous to a race bringing forth a Socrates, a Spencer, an Emerson;—but, the rather, having attained to that progressive stage, would have continued worm or savage, or sunk again to polyp.

And if indeed, now,—anticipating just here a possible sentimental criticism,—there may seem to be, to some, at first thought, and in one aspect, in all this new and better scientific analysis of modern times, not much to prefer, in tenderness or beauty, over the older theologic phantasies, there really is for us, nevertheless, this two-fold satisfaction in the new: namely, that the new is the True; and furthermore, that the consequences of ignorance, and even of wilfulness, in human existence,—the consequences now or any time, present or future,—are not, and shall never be, the arbitrary "retribution" of a jealous and exacting personal deity, who, if he had wanted to, might surely, from the very first, if all that is said of his power and love be true, have upbuilt and blest men, rather than put them at the very start under a curse, and then, in resentful pettishness, hurled them down to eternal torment.

"'Tis good to have a giant's strength,
But tyrannous to use it as a giant."

Ay! and 'twere glorious to have a God's strength, and devilish not to use it as a God.

"Consequences," the rather, good or bad, we know now to be, in a word, the on-working, upbuilding, beneficent energies of Nature,—of the unknowable God-essence,—invariably enforcing a natural outcome for every good or evil act:—in order that the stability of things may be upheld, final good be brought to pass, and a true "divine satisfaction" reign at last, the predominant nature of things!

And we thus see that it was indeed only in the fanciful, awful, dramatic garb in which the early thought of men was clothed; only in the idea of a jealous personalized vengeance, remorselessly following man's every imperfect deed, and making, moreover, all "sin," great or small, inheritor of the same arbitrary, unlimited woe,—that the early church-creedmakers were at fault. The underlying idea in their scheme was, and is, a true idea, and shall be for ever.

But the overruling power—glad word!—is LAW. The overruling power is the beautiful and helpful and beneficent energy (altogether unknown by mortal in its absolute, inner essence, and possibly more wonderful, more hopeful, more divine on account of man's very ignorance of it) which carries all things up and on from less to more, from bad to good, and from better towards best; the energy that searches through and through all things, and forever through all things, "from Chaos to the dawning morrow";—through planet-haze and condensing system; through lambent globe and solidifying earth; through slowly-evolving leaf and bud; through the beginnings, later, of sentient life, in however humble forms;—and, finally, even through

" . . . all our human plight,
The soul's birth, pilgrimage, and flight";

—the energy which, in a word, in its progressive ongoing,—and eternally permeating all things,—however apparently regardless, at times, of whatever good, or evil, comes in as a temporary incident in its career,—

"In city, or in solitude,
Step by step, lifts bad to good;—
Without halting, without rest,
Lifting Better up to Best!"

And, once more,—to complete this part of my exposition,—the "atonement," the true "atonement," which, I hinted a moment back, must be made, in every instance where law (whether of body or mind or spirit) has been violated, if ever a truer and nobler life is to be gained, is now seen to be not really an "arbitrary" thing either, any more than natural "condemnation," or consequences, is an arbitrary thing. "Atonement" is now seen to be not at all through the "infinite vicarious sacrifice" of any man, or of any God; but, as the deep constructive significance of the word itself implies, is in the assisted, the growing at-one-ment, the entrance into harmony, of every individual human soul, with the universe's powers of good, which alone are eternal and upbuilding;—a harmony into which man "enters" through conscious co-operation with those powers.

Ignorant or neglectful of such harmony, man wanders, suffers, sins. But coming into such harmony,—forsaking, with energized will, all evil, and following, with eager, worshipful soul, all good,—"divine justice" is met and accomplished, "divine satisfaction" is attained!

And, again I say, by every man individually; never by another, for him.

And now,—the literal interpretation which "theology" has always given to the phrase, "The Divine Satisfaction," having been, for the sake of illustration, made apparent, together with the more or less of latter-day explanatory comment which I have by no means felt it right to omit,—I may proceed to read into the expression which is the burden of this paper, more directly than I have yet done, the especial modern significance which I have in mind, which gave call to this discourse, and which I deem the quoted phrase may helpfully and hopefully include for us.

If, now, I could put my whole remaining thought into one or two brief sentences, those sentences would be these:

Man himself is, in essence and possibility, divine. He partakes of the God-nature. In that wonderful generalizing phrase of Herbert Spencer's (and Herbert Spencer's is, without question, the greatest mind of the race to-day)—"The power, or force, which wells up in us as consciousness, as love, as will, is the same power, or force, by which the worlds were and are created and continued."

The life in man, that is to say, is the God-essence of the worlds. We, and the divine on-working energy of the spheres, are "one."

Moreover, the great call of all, therefore, among many high calls which forever vibrate in man's soul, is the same great call, identically—and naturally—as that which, figuratively speaking, seems to be, and indeed must be, the impetus (so to speak) with which the entirety of Nature swings forward towards completer being: the call, "Perfection!" the call, "greater good!"—ay, the greatest good!

Some one has said, in wise and inclusive definition, "Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself." Religion is not that—all that (books, creeds, miracles, prayers, prostrations); but simply and helpfully this: which the veriest child may understand and strive to help on: Man's effort, in whatever nation, and by whatever means, to perfect himself! No nation, moreover, of any least degree of civilization and intelligence, is without such conscious effort for higher good. And furthermore, this universal on-reach towards perfection, as it is the great, the naturally predominant impelling force in man, all over the globe, is also—to reverse now, an instant, what I said a moment ago—the great impelling force throughout the physical worlds also; and not only through the physical worlds, but, we may be hopefully confident, through all moral and spiritual planes or spheres of existence which the all-including and wonderful universe shall ever be discovered to bear in its bosom. The universe is indeed uni-verse: “turned into one,” composed of one; one in origin and essence and power, . . . and the whole permeated --for ever thrilled through and through—by the God!

Thus, man is indeed “divine;”—a part of God. And in his strife for self-improvement; in his struggle to make the most of all his high opportunities in a universe-house full of high opportunities; in his increasing conscious endeavor, in this modern age, to free himself, even further than he has already, in past epochs, done, from the untampered sway of low, merely animal forces: in a word, in his struggle—then and now, and always—for power over Nature’s every crudeness; for completeness, wholeness, in every department of body and mind; and especially for nobler attainment in the things we call “spiritual,” the things of the soul,—here, I would affirm, lies man’s “divine satisfaction!” For this is overcoming the low and evil: this is entering into active, living communion and co-operation with the highest “God above all Gods worshiped of all nations.”

The truth is,—and we must not shut our eyes to the fact, nor fear to grapple with it: the truth is, that if the God-power is indeed “infinite,”—if the “God” is “All,”—then certain expressions of the God-power are not always “good;” are inimical to man; are things man has, with all his soul, to fight against and endeavor to overcome. The low, the bestial, the crude, the cruel, in Nature, are as much the expression of the God-force as the high, the humane, the lovely, the helpful—only, the former are, we dream, the temporal; the higher and better, alone, are eternal.

Many centuries ago, looking forth upon the beauty and wonder of the natural world,—of sunrise and moonrise, of sea and mountain and meadow, and the mighty heavens; looking, too, upon the nobler of the lower animals, and observing their wonderful instincts and careful self-preserving tendencies;—more than all, dreaming of mother-love, and of fatherly care, and of children’s prattle and caresses, the old writer, whoever he may have been, who, far back in Babylonian and Hebrew ages, wrote of the “creation,” and left his thought for us in the Book of Genesis, said, of all that his ear heard, and that his eye saw, and that entered into his heart to conceive concerning the Whole of Things,—“Behold, it was very good.”

In reality, however, underneath all Nature’s order and beauty thus far in the onward evolution of things, there have been many woeful, bitter tragedies, innumerable unavailing cries for help,—cries of anguish from sentient lips, bitterness of human soul and agony of human heart. And Nature has not seemed to care very much for all this,—any more than she seems to care when she topples a rock from a cliff upon a bunch of fragrant, springing violets; any more than she seems to care when she whirls the earth’s inner fires till they surge madly up and engulf a city, with its people, in hot death; any more than, centuries ago, she seemed to care when, surging as hotly in the vengeful brain of an ancient Hebrew poet, she made him put into the mouth of the angry, personified God of the universe, “The Lord of armies mustereth the host of the battle. Every one of them that is found shall be thrust through; their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes. Howl ye; for behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger.”

Underneath all Nature’s beauty and bounty, thus far in her onward strugglings for nearer physical perfection, have been many apparent convulsions and corner-turnings and entanglements; and many moral twistings also. And in man’s upward-growing, expanding life have been the same.

What is it that Longfellow, under his breath, shudders to whisper?—

“This life of ours is a wild æolian harp, of many a joyous strain,
But under them all there runs a loud, perpetual wail as of souls in pain.”

But here I will not longer stay. The time is indeed coming, we may believe, though it never yet has come, when men may look forth, over the world of Nature, even over the world of man, and say truly, “Behold, it is very good;”—when there shall really be “divine satisfaction.”

All lies in man’s own hands. He himself is the “God,”—the transforming power within Nature,—which, so far as man’s little lot and corner of things is concerned, shall help and uplift and subliminate Nature!

You recall the verse of Matthew Arnold?—

“For man hath all that Nature hath, but more;
And in that more lie all his hopes of good.
Nature is cruel, man is sick of blood;
Nature is stubborn, man would fain adore;
Nature is fickle, man hath need of rest;
Nature forgives no debt, and fears no fraud;
Man would be mild, and with safe conscience blest.
Man must begin—know this!—where Nature ends;
Nature and man can never be fast friends.
Fool, if thou canst not pass her, rest her slave.”

What shall we say, however, when we recall one thing which Matthew Arnold, in these forceful lines, seems to forget: the truth, namely, that the universe does not permit the thought man and Nature; it must be, the rather, man in Nature. Shakespeare is the wiser, where he asserts:

“Nature is made better by no means
But Nature makes that means: even that art
Which you say adds to Nature, is an art
That Nature makes.”

• So even here, again,—in the larger synthesis, the wider summing up,—we have still our Hope, that in Nature, and therefore, if he wisely seek it out, to be in man, is yet more and better still than all the past of outward beauty and good, and all the past of high human struggle and aspiration and faith, have wrought. And as the years go on, diviner and diviner “satisfaction” shall come to have home in the souls of men!

The poets have always been prophetic. Shakespeare, once more, has exclaimed, looking ahead down the years,—nay, looking at the best in man as he saw and lived with men some few generations ago:

“What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! how infinite in faculties! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god!”

And the poet Herbert, looking at the best in man as he knew and lived with men in his generation, exclaimed:

“Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one thing to another,
And to all the world besides. . . .
Nothing has got so far
But man hath caught and kept it.
His eyes dismount the highest star,
He is, in little, all the sphere.”

And the singer* in our own little pamphlet of hymns we should not forget:

“Child of passion and of pain,
Sounding all of being’s scale;
Golden link in Nature’s chain
’Twixt the Infinite and frail.

“Lord of laughter and of tears,
Owner of all lands in fee
By a title that inheres
In his greater gift to see.

“Where he goes the heavens bend,
Letting all their secrets through;
And the Graces him attend
In a glorious retinue.

“Working up through cycles wide,
Nature finds in him her goal;
All her forces glorified
Come to flower in his soul!”

* Walter R. Thomas.

Truly, Nature provides us with every opportunity we need! If all men could but be awakened to do their part! . . . Yes, if we ourselves but did our part! . . . And if, henceforth, we should begin to help others, even a few, to see and learn and do!—inspiring them, at the same time, to follow a similar line of good for others, starting, thus, an infinite progression of good! . . . If, in the one simple yet mighty thing of increasing just the will-power of men towards the doing of the known right,—if in this alone we should inspire the veriest accumulating trifle!—then should the sublime forward-reaching of Nature, and of man in nature, fail not. The “future of good” would be made speedier and easier and surer. The true “divine satisfaction” of the years and of the ages should sometime come to pass.

In the old-time scheme of “salvation,” and of the “atone-ment” made by Jesus, of which I spoke when I began, there was one feature which will help us greatly if we look at it aright,—as here and now in conclusion, this morning, we bend at least our own wills once more to the Best.

Some said of old, among the early Christian Fathers, that the death of Jesus, “the infinite son of the infinite God,” was not a sacrifice to God, but rather to the devil. Through Adam’s “fall” the devil had gained, by pre-arrangement with God, a hold on the human race. Gregory of Nyssa was one who held to this thought; and his argument was somewhat like this: Men had become the slaves of the devil. The “son of God,”—God in Jesus,—offered himself to the devil as the ransom which should release all others. The crafty devil assented, caring more for the one Jesus, with the infinite attributes inherent in him, than for all the rest of mankind. But,—and here is the whole value of the story for us now,—notwithstanding his “craft,” the devil, in his bargain, lost all; since, simply because Jesus was infinite in attributes, the devil could not hold him after he had accepted him, and Jesus returned to the skies. This “trick” on the devil, as the Church Fathers piously knew it, of course implied deception on the part of God and Jesus, inasmuch as they knew, while the devil did not know, how the bargain would conclude. But Gregory declared that the bargain was justifiable, nevertheless;—the end sanctified the means!

In the Middle Ages, many wonderful legends and dramas were founded on this story,—they may be seen yet in European libraries,—carrying out with much ingenuity the profound idea for those years—a residuum from Manicheism and the Gnostics—that the devil (the personification of evil), notwithstanding his subtlety, was at last outwitted by the wisdom of God (the personification of good), and thus appeared, in comparison, as a “stupid” devil. That was the denouement of every performance: the devil was hooted from the stage as a “stupid” devil, while “the God” alone, (the high power of good) was declared triumphant.

Carrying out, now, in modern guise, the dominant idea of this phantasy, we may observe that, in all speculative ages,—until modern science came in to show us atomic glories, and the promise and potency of all life in the dust of the balance,—“matter” has been supposed to be “evil.” The bodies of men, often, have been self-lashed for the “sins” (the imperfections, the unsublimated surgings) of the expanding God-force in human souls! For, certainly, the forces of the lower animal appetites, making human bodies and minds their home; the appetites which have “held over” in man, in his progress upward from lower forms,—these are evil,—in their excess,—when unrestrained,—when undiverted to good; whatever we may deem, or wish to deny, concerning “matter” in itself, in opposition to “spirit.” These lower passions in men,—of avarice, of carelessness towards others, of gluttony and intemperance, of selfishness of every name and order: idleness, vengefulness, wantonness, impurity,—all,—are remnants of an inferior grade of being, of a lower order of existence. And moreover, these now are what hold men back,—now that men have come to be beings of a new order, standing with their faces towards heaven, and with mind and soul, and helpfulness to the brother, rather than strife and blood and selfishness, their highest end and goal. The God is climbing!

Yet if, even in this age, all the lower, evil tendencies and passions in man,—which still, in thousands, in millions of individuals existing in the guise of humanity, are the dominant tendencies and passions,—if all these idiosyncrasies and wild surgings could be again personified, would they not make an excellent “devil” still? Heretofore, it has been always on this same basis that men have builded, in constructing their mythical “Satans,” though they might not always have known such to be the material with which they wrought—their own unrestrained, untempered passions. The “devil” has always been the personification of the bad, the harmful, the degrading, just as “God” has always been, and is still, in the highest ideal, the personification of the good, the better, the Best.

And, for ever, good is, in the nature of things, greater, wiser, more powerful, than evil! Evil is, for ever, “stupid,” and, under the right conditions, easily—or at any rate, finally—put to rout by good! If not by greater shrewdness and trickery, then at any rate by sheer high force of nobility of being, and truer right to be, good does and shall, always, overcome the power of the bad. It makes, and shall for ever make, beauty, and truth, and purity, and sympathy, to be the things we call sweet and desirable, and like “light”; while all sin and foulness, and ungenerousness of life, are “bitter” and “undesirable,” and the “blackness of darkness.”

Shall we, in our individual daily lives, help still more to disown the powers of evil in humanity? enter more nearly into the real at-one-ment with good?—that we, and the race, may more truly have part in the actual “divine satisfaction,” slowly accumulating with the years?

We may!

Passages from Doctor Channing’s Note Book.

On Freedom,—“How many have fought for civil liberty without a glimpse of true freedom!” On Fellowship,—“We all lean on one arm.” On Character,—“What grandeur may lodge in a small form if it express purpose—the eagle in the clouds.” On Friendship,—“We should want friends to incite us to be victims to humanity, to be more than their friends.” On Love,—“Nothing is more awful than love; nothing provokes less undue familiarity.” “Love is not giving ourselves away: we are too great to be given away.” “Love absorbing the whole nature would destroy itself. Its office is to expand the whole nature.” “The loving heart looks into the mystery of nature. Life is love. To love is to live.” “In loving all we do not love a mass but a multitude of individuals.” “Love is the parent of thought.” On Pride,—“When we become great in our own eyes, others become small.” On Flattery,—“We are bound to approach men by noblest faculties—no flattery, no soothing, wheedling, etc.” “We should look on people who give and receive flattery as giving and receiving poison,—destroying one another.” On Conversation,—“On every topic we may express love to God and man.” “People converse with carelessness. They wish to say something, and this leads them to say anything.” “Conversation confirms the temper it expresses.” “Making fine sounds is the ruin of eloquence.” On Manner,—“Manner should be a sign of ideas.” “Some people are polite in manner, but they let you see that they know it. They think more of themselves than of you in paying you respect.”

EVERY work of true art is an object of infinite study. The more it is known the more it will be prized and the deeper questions it will suggest. It can never be mastered till all the secret history of the artist is known, and that is never.

W. W.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, - - - J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, - - - H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, - - - DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Union Teachers' Meeting was held, as usual, on Monday, at noon. Mr. Utter was leader. The Book of Daniel is the happy hunting ground for all who are so misled as to search for texts whereby to fix the date of the end of the world. For this reason we should have clear views and knowledge about the last chapters of Daniel, beginning with the seventh. At this point the hortatory part ends,—written to encourage the Jews, under the persecutions and tyrannies of Antiochus,—and the historical begins. The visions of Daniel are not predictions at all, but history, told in emblems and allegorical scenes. Daniel's knowledge of history seems to be quite defective, especially of the period in which he is supposed to have lived in Babylon. For example, he represents Belshazzar as being the son of Nebuchadnezzar; but he was the son of Nabonedus, the fourth in succession from Nebuchadnezzar, and not a relative at all, so far as we know. The following is a list of the kings of Babylonia, from the time it became an independent state, until it was conquered by Cyrus:

- B. C.
625 Nabopolassar.
600 Nebuchadnezzar.
561 Evil-merodach, 2 years.
559 Neriglissar (assassin).
556 Laborosoarchod (boy).
555 { Nabonedus (Usurper).
555 { Belshazzar.
538 Cyrus the Great.

Again, Babylon was taken, not by Darius, the Mede, but by Cyrus the Great. But the writer of the book of Daniel believed that Babylon was taken by a king of the Medes, and that a Median period intervened between Nebuchadnezzar and the Persians. So, in expounding the king's dream, he says, "Thou art the head of gold," and then represents the Median kingdom inferior, the Persian kingdom still inferior, before the iron kingdom of Alexander.

Daniel's vision, in chapter seven, will serve as a fair representation of the remaining portion of the book. The vision opens with a storm at sea, the four winds of heaven striving together. Four great beasts come up out of the sea,—a lion, with eagle's wings; a bear, with three ribs in its mouth; a leopard, with wings and with four heads; then the fourth, a terrible and exceedingly strange creature, with iron teeth, which devoured and brake in pieces all the others, and it had ten horns. While Daniel was considering the horns, there came up among them another little horn, before whom three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots, and in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things. Here again Daniel repeats his one historical lesson, extending from Nebuchadnezzar to Antiochus Epiphanes. The lion with eagle's wings represents the Babylonian empire. The bear is Daniel's imaginary Darius the Mede, and the Median kingdom, which he believed succeeded the Babylonian. The leopard represents the Persian empire, and the fourth beast, with its iron teeth, the Grecian empire of Alexander the Great. The ten horns are the ten Seleucidæ, who ruled over Syria and Mesopotamia. The little horn, with the eyes of a man, and the mouth speaking great things, is this author's persecutor, the tyrant, Antiochus IV.

Chapter VIII. repeats the same history lesson under other figures, only here the vision begins with the Persian empire, represented as a ram, pushing westward, northward and southward. Alexander is represented as a he-goat, that casts down the ram, stamps upon him and breaks his horns. But just as the goat becomes very strong, his great horn is broken, and then there come up four notable horns, Alexander's successors, and out of these comes up a little horn, that waxes great toward the south, and toward the pleasant land, that is, Palestine. He even exalts himself against the priests, that is, the hosts of heaven, and casts some of the ecclesiastical stars to the ground and stamps upon them, and, most sacrilegious of all, he takes away the daily sacrifice.

In Chapter IX. this writer shows his inadequate historical knowledge in yet another way. He undertakes to give a new and figurative interpretation of Jeremiah xxv, 11, 12, wherein it is prophesied that the Israelites shall serve Babylon for seventy years. The author of the book of Daniel wishes to stretch the seventy years to his own time, that is, the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 164. So he conceives the seventy years to be seventy periods of seven years, and makes out a period of four hundred and ninety years in this fashion, "Seventy weeks are appointed for thy people, and for thy holy city to complete the iniquity," etc. "Know, therefore, and understand, from the going forth of the word that Jerusalem should be restored and built until an anointed one, a prince, are seven weeks; and during sixty-two weeks it shall be built with streets and moats, yet in troublous times," etc. He means that there are to be seventy weeks of years between Cyrus and Antiochus, made up of $7+62+1$. The time is really about fifty years short, but this is a small matter compared with the mistake about Darius the Mede.

In Chapter XI. this author goes over the same ground once again, and, as in all former visions, when he comes to his own time, he represents the end of all these earthly kingdoms, as brought about by the setting up of the kingdom of God, which is to crush, subdue, overthrow and absorb all the kingdoms of the earth, and is never to come to an end.

In the final chapter, descriptive of the setting up of this kingdom, there is a declaration that "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars, forever and ever," which is the first clear announcement of a future resurrection of good and evil souls, found in Hebrew literature.

The Southern Conference of Unitarian Churches met in New Orleans on Wednesday and Thursday, April 20 and 21. An essay on the ministry of Theodore Clapp, the first minister of the New Orleans church and the most popular preacher of his time in the southwest, was read on Wednesday morning by Rev. Charles A. Allen, the present minister of the church. An essay on church extension was read by Rev. George L. Chaney of Atlanta, and reports were made of the work in Charleston, Chattanooga and Texas. In the evening Rev. Robert Collyer preached to a crowded church. On Thursday Rev. E. C. L. Browne preached, and Mr. N. Schultz, of the last Meadville class, who has been working in Texas for a year, was ordained. In the evening excellent addresses were made by Rev. Grindall Reynolds, secretary of the A. U. A., Rev. E. C. L. Browne and Rev. Robert Collyer. Rev. W. P. Tilden, who has been assisting Mr. Chaney in starting a new movement in Chattanooga, Tenn., took part in the exercises of the conference, and goes to Nashville, Tenn., immediately, to break ground there. C. A. A.

Boston Notes.—Rev. M. J. Savage preached last Sunday on the duty of Boston churches to provide at the north end of our city a workingmen's exchange.

—Rev. J. W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and Rev. A. L. Garver, of Worcester, Mass., head the list of minister-tourists intending to sail in June for Europe.

—A conference meeting is now appointed for delegates to organize the National Bureau of Unity Clubs. It will occur on the Thursday forenoon of anniversary week at the Unitarian building. Circulars of invitation will be sent to all Unity clubs and kindred societies, and a full attendance of delegates will be solicited.

—Last Sunday the forces of the Salvation army in America celebrated their seventh anniversary service in our city. Those "soldiers of the cross" have rescued some few very unambitious Christians in Boston from a low kind of life; yet the larger opinion here is that a better way of doing the same work already exists in our usual people's churches and our multiplied temperance societies. Their Sunday parades with loud music cause a good deal of truanting from Sunday-schools, and certainly disturb usual church services.

—After our old Boylston market site shall be covered with tall, new buildings, its vicinity will be very strange to a western Massachusetts man returning to the scenes of his boyhood.

Duluth, Minn.—The new Unitarian movement at this place is making encouraging progress. The congregations number from fifty to seventy-five, including some of the best people of the city, socially and morally. The western conference has assisted in no movement during the year that promises larger results than this new and hopeful endeavor to plant a church in this important business center. G. W. Buckley of Battle Creek, Mich., is preaching there for the month of May.

Tremont, Ill.—Mrs. Lucretia Effinger preached morning and afternoon, April 17. Mr. H. D. Stevens, of Indianapolis, is expected May 15. Our faithful workers at this mission station are showing increased interest and energy. They are hoping to secure services twice each month.

Mattoon, Ill.—Mr. H. D. Stevens, of Indianapolis, preached in this place in April. He is expected to supply the pulpit of Unity church again May 8. He will be cordially welcomed by the Mattoon people. How happy for them and the cause if they find in Mr. Stevens the minister for whom they have been waiting!

Warren, Ill.—Mary H. Graves, secretary of the women's conference, preached twice on Sunday, May 1. She brings back an encouraging report. A meeting has been called for next Sunday, May 8, to consider the question of organizing a Sunday-school.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MAY 14, 1887.

[NUMBER 11.]

EDITORIAL.

COME to the Western Conference. Note the arrangements in Announcement column, and report the number of delegates promptly.

MISS FRANCES WILLARD in her tract on "Dress and Vice" in the "Social Purity Series," thus illustrates an important principle: "The style of dress among hired girls is often pitiful to see. But it usually puts to shame the mistress more than the maid by reason of its tawdrier imitation of tawdry fashions, set in the parlor which, in this democratic land, the kitchen will be sure to follow."

AMONG the many admirable sayings on man in the Channing Note Book we find the following: "The misery of mankind is not this or that calamity, but ignorance of the true resources from all calamity." "The man who is always receiving aids instead of conferring them is a poor creature." "Man cannot control outward nature,—he can do more, he can rise above it. In all changes he can hold his steadfast course."

"THE Ethics of Gambling" is the title of the second tract published by the Unitarian Conference of the Pacific Coast. It is significant that the general title for the series is "Modern Religious Thought." Modern religious thought is concerning itself with the questions of ethics, personal, social and political. Mr. Eliot's tract is timely and moving. Send for a copy to C. A. Murdock & Co., 532 Clay street, San Francisco, Cal. Then read it and lend it to boys and business men particularly.

THE Independent contains an article by Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, entitled, "A Poet and his Minister," which has reference to the Rev. Thomas Jones, of Swansea, a Welsh preacher of peculiar oratorical powers, and his distinguished hearer, Robert Browning, the poet. Mr. Browning has written an introduction to a volume of this preacher's sermons, commending both him and them highly. In welcoming Mr. Gunsaulus to our city, we are glad, among other reasons, that he comes as a lover of Robert Browning.

THE following from Channing has the sound of many of Marcus Aurelius' sayings:—"What have you lost? Everything essentially precious is left you, for your own nature is left you. Had a calamity fallen on you which had robbed you of the attributes of reason, or annihilated the principle of duty, or the idea of God, or the capacity of pure love,—then you would have incurred an infinite loss. Over such a calamity no weeping would be excessive. But the misfortunes of the day—what have they taken?" If in the midst of our fretting and troubling over the petty trials that come to us every day, we would stop and think of this saying, how much comfort it would give us!

CHANNING said, "The attempt to eclipse another is an act of hostility." This saying reminds us of what Victor Hugo says about the persistence of poets, in his "William Shakespeare!"—"Progress is the motive-power of science; the ideal is the generator of Art. Thus is explained why perfection is the characteristic of Science and not of Art. A savant may outshine a savant; a poet never throws a poet in the shade. * * * Saint-Simon says (I quote from memory): 'There was through the whole winter but one cry of admiration for M. de Cambray's book; when suddenly appeared M. de Meaux's book, which devoured it.' If Fénelon's book had been Saint-Simon's the book of Bossuet would not have devoured it. Shakespeare is not above Dante, Molière is not above Aristophanes, Calderon is not above Euripides; the Divine Comedy is not above Genesis, the Roman-cero is not above the Odyssey; Sirius is not above Arcturus. Sublimity is equality."

WE are glad to see that the Unity club interest is assuming such proportions in the east as to become one of the anniversary occasions at Boston. Rev. A. J. Rich, of Fall River, is the moving spirit. The Unity club is a western product, and is almost a universal attachment of our western parishes under one form or another, and we are glad to see it take such strong hold in the east. We hope at our western meetings next week the subject will receive some attention, and we will do all we can to keep our place in the national line in this as in other respects.

Two or three years ago our readers were interested in our symposium over the "Ten Great Novels." The Pall Mall Gazette, of London, has been trying something of the same kind, limiting the competition to English novels; and here is the result, showing the current English estimates:

1. The best historical novel, Scott: "Ivanhoe."
2. The best humorous novel, Dickens: "Pickwick."
3. The most imaginative romance, Rider Haggard: "She."
4. The best "novel with a purpose," Charles Reade: "Never too Late to Mend."
5. The best tale of sea-faring life, Marryat: "Midshipman Easy."
6. The best tale of country life, George Eliot: "Adam Bede."
7. The best sensational novel, Wilkie Collins: "Woman in White."
8. The best tale for boys, Defoe: "Robinson Crusoe."
9. The best Irish novel, Lever: "Charles O'Malley."
10. The best Scotch novel, Scott: "The Heart of Midlothian."
11. The best novel of all, Thackeray: "Vanity Fair."

Three weeks ago UNITY told how the old South Meeting House in Boston had been turned into a school to teach national history and a patriotic spirit to Boston children, and how, through the summer vacation weeks, the young folks flocked to a weekly lecture there, and how one rich and patriotic lady had paid all the expenses of the work and one man had engineered it;—and we asked "Where is our Mrs. Hemenway, and where our Mr. Mead, to do the same thing for Chicago?" On the very day the question was asked the second lecture in a children's course, quite similar to that in Boston,—was given in Chicago. Our "Mr. Mead" is the enterprising Principal of the Chicago Manual Training School, Mr. H. H. Belfield. Being in Boston last summer, he attended one of the Old South lectures, saw the boys and girls listening there, "took it," and came back to do that thing here without waiting for a summer vacation. He arranged a course of seven lectures on "the War for the Union," each lecture to be by a Chicago man who was an actor in the scenes that he describes. The lectures are given in the hall of the Manual Training school, corner of Michigan Avenue and Twelfth Street, on Saturdays, at 2:30 P. M. Admission is given by tickets distributed free to pupils and teachers, and already three or four hundred, mostly boys, from the High and Manual Training schools are there with their ears alert. We presume that any one by courtesy would be welcomed without ticket. Here is the programme,—and for next year another is already in preparation. April 16.—Fort Sumter, Maj. Horatio L. Wait. April 23.—Chickamauga, Col. A. N. Waterman. May 7.—Gettysburg, Col. H. W. Jackson.

May 14.—The March to the Sea, Gen. William E. Strong. May 21.—Nashville, Capt. Henry V. Freeman. June 4.—Life in a Military Prison, Gen. Joseph B. Leake. June 11.—Bentonville, Gen. A. C. McClurg. Why cannot such a course of lectures be arranged by the school-superintendents in a dozen cities of a state,—utilizing the home-talent of fellow-citizens to tell the story which, twenty-five years since, they helped to make? The captains and colonels are plenty among us, and many a man who never wore the shoulder straps can tell the story better than he who had them. The fact that 1887 is the centennial year of the Constitution, suggests another timely theme.

"OUR BEST WORDS" made its name good on April 15, by making the whole paper for that date a tribute to the memory of Doctor Eliot, of St. Louis, the father of all the work that bears the name of Unitarianism in the west. What young minister need despond, who reads that "at the end of the first four months, on a bright, clear Sunday morning a congregation of eight" was all that waited to hear young Eliot's word; and that when, eight months later, they dedicated a little wooden church, "four or five householders, a half dozen young men, three or four women and no children, constituted the census of our strength,"—and then thinks of the great church, with its great benefactions and its power in the community, and of the noble university, which lay at the end of the old man's life? Or who in small, frail body need lose heart, remembering what that hundred pounds of human consecration has availed to do out here in the two and fifty years?

"KING'S CHAPEL, Boston: 200th Anniversary: 1686-1886." So-named, comes a stately volume, telling of stately ceremonies, with which many of Boston's "first families" celebrated gratefully and reverently and with no unworthy pride the finished second century of their church. The low and beautiful stone building stands firm and quiet in the corner of Boston's first burying ground,—building, grave-stones, and the small green field with trees, making a cathedral quiet at the corner where two thoroughfares meet and the Boston of to-day bustles and hurries by. In former days it was "King's Chapel," because the royal governors and their little courts attended worship there,—being the first Episcopalian church that pushed its way into the unwelcoming Puritan town. After the Revolution it retained the name in token of allusion to "the King of Kings." And then, Episcopalian as it was in origin, it became virtually the first Unitarian church of America, and revised its English prayer-book "to relieve the consciences of the worshippers by omitting that which seemed to them not scriptural." To it all our Unitarian churches may look back with love as to a nursing mother. The liturgy they altered then, and still retain, now seems a badge of elder days and ways, but seems natural in that low gray building by the ancient stones. At their anniversary they told their story and their gladness over in sermons and addresses, in poems, and hymns and prayers,—the story from the time when the "East End of the Town Hall" was grudgingly granted in 1686, and they had their "12 formes for the servise of the church and the movable pulpit" made, down through the escutcheoned days of royal governors to Freeman and Greenwood and Peabody, their latter-day saints. May the story go on hallowing as it freshens through the years to come!

A CENTRAL Unity club society has been proposed at the east, of which all our Unity clubs and kindred societies should be members; and a circular has gone among the churches inviting them to send a delegate to Boston in the anniversary week to meet with others and perfect organization. Even should nothing more result than a meeting once a year of those hundred people who believe that a church is more than ever a church when it has side chapels of poetry and literature and science and art, that would be a result worth while. But out of such an annual meeting more would spring. Methods would be compared, plans would be discussed, the best of these would crystallize in published programmes and working-tools, new clubs would be tempted into being, and old ones find new and pleasant paths already mapped and surveyed for their winter's walk. Such work would very naturally affiliate itself with the Sunday-school society's province. We have known of Browning classes, as well as Hebrew-prophet classes, turning into prayer-meeting and confessional; on heights of Emerson and Whittier we bow the head and bare the feet as naturally as on the heights of Paul and John; in Romola and Les Misérables, we feel the God moving in history, and in the soul's depths, at least as really as when we study the Hebrew chronicle; the thought of Germany seems as sacred in its growth to a class that studies earnestly, as the growth of the Hebrew religion; and the duties of the American citizen, or the study of the great philanthropies of to-day, can be made to stir the heart and conscience at least as truly as the study of the early Christian church. So why should not the Sunday-school societies deliberately seek to encourage the Unity club side of church-life? Whoever knows our western churches knows to how genuine a mind and heart-hunger the study in the clubs can minister. "Unitarians" are not men and women of "prayer-meetings," so-called; probably we never shall be; we are men and women whose prayer-feeling, without the name, it is not hard to surprise, and whose recognition of the higher thought and the higher life, unchristened by the churchly names, is eager. The "Unity club" is really an extension of the church influence into the week-day life. The good time, the chat, the tea together, the little theater, the game, the dance, are well enough,—the club is better for them all, they each and all are better for the half-conscious connection with the church; but the heart of the Unity club lies in its study-classes, in the intellectual and moral earnestness there called out. If the Central society can by published hints and helps become a guide and a depot-agent in this behalf, we hail it with all welcome!

Our Western Anniversaries.

Before we visit our readers again these meetings will have come and gone. Each annual session has seemed as it approached "the most important one in the history of western Unitarianism." We will not say less of this meeting. We look forward with interest to the fellowship of next week, and have no anxiety for the result. The discussions into which the conference has been precipitated by the indefatigable energy of a few during the last three years we did not covet, and, as it seemed to us, they were largely unnecessary. But we will not on that account consider them unprofitable. And the outcome we have no doubt will be vitalizing. Indeed it already has been. However agitated the surface may have seemed, the undercurrents in our churches have been deepened and intensified. Our spiritual life has been quickened everywhere because it has been challenged. Religion has been on trial in our churches. Verbal pretensions have had to give way to the living convictions, and religion thereby has profited. We are not among who think that the last year has either been a torpid or a calamitous one. It has been a year of intense growth, of splendid mental activity east and west, from the national conference down to the local parish, and the individual mind. The birth-throes of a larger thought, and a truer, because a broader fellowship, have been felt. We do not wish to anticipate the deliberations of next week. We are sure they will indicate three things: (1) a growing religiousness, (2) an abundant courage to stand by the character tests of piety and of fellowship, (3) an earnest, hearty desire to co-operate with the American Unitarian Association, and a readiness to join hands with it in hearty fashion if it is willing to receive the hand in the same free, fraternal spirit with which it is offered. In all these discussions let the true issue not be lost sight of: viz., whether the conditions of fellowship and co-operation and the Unitarian name shall be the life and certain words, or the life with or without words. Will it be the thing that will be insisted upon or the thing and the name?

But the coming meetings are to mean more than the discussion of intellectual problems or of missionary plans. Post-office mission work, Unity club life, Sunday-school activities, the renewal of fellowship, and the refreshing of the spiritual life,—these things are to justify these annual gatherings, and they cause us to bid hearty welcome to our meetings. Come all of you. Come let us demonstrate how good it is “for brethren to dwell together in unity.”

Two “Statements of Faith” Better than One.

The editor of the Christian Register has an able article in his paper of April 28, called “Description and Proscription,” in which he points out clearly the difference between a “creed” which aims to keep people out of a church-field, and a “description of faith” which aims simply to tell what is to be found within the field without any banning intent. At the end of his article he notices kindly the “declaration of faith” in UNITY of April 16, and which,—preambled by the words that “it represents only the thought of the majority to-day, binds none, and is always open to re-statement,”—is probably to be submitted to the approval of the Western Conference. But our friend objects to the adoption of any declaration of faith by the Conference for two reasons, if we understand him: (1). It may commit us after all, to a given form, rather than to the substance, of the statement. To this we can but answer, Read that preamble, which makes part of the confession of faith its absolute to-day-ness, its absolute inability to commit and bind. (2) It is needless, because in missionary work it is not the form of any statement, but the power with which it is put, that tells. True, and yet there is the silent field of literature through which a noble representative statement would go more widely than any one individual’s word. And further, the missionary in the field, the man who comes in constant contact with inquirers, would be re-inforced by the representative word. It would help him in his work, if together with the longer “What we Believe” tract by Doctor Clarke, or Mr. Wendte, or Mr. Savage, he could hand out a short, impressive statement to essentially the same effect, endorsed by a large comradeship. Just because it would “go” and would “tell,” however, that preamble, or its equivalent with the force of no word blurred, should be structurally incorporated in the statement. With that, it is apostle with the halo on; without that, it might become an emissary to preach “creed.”

But the Register spends more space in urging this question: “If a Conference is going to adopt one statement of this kind, why may it not adopt more? Why not adopt one which represents the opinions of the minority?” We think that would be, not only a good, but probably the better way. Is it not suggested in our own words? We said (UNITY, April 9), “If we meet, ready in heart to pass such a declaration, the noblest of the statements offered would probably command a large assent; for we surely do think much alike. If framed in the way proposed, there is no longer need of exacting the precise shape and shade of one’s own thought. Or it might be well to agree upon two quite variant statements, and let the vote for each reveal the Conference mind: that published variance”—and our essential identity in the variance, we might have added—“would again illustrate the spirit and the breadth of Unitarianism.” And again in UNITY of April 16: “This declaration is printed now on purpose to invite examination, and to stir others to make a still nobler statement of our faith. If the Conference is willing to consider the proposal at all, of course more than one declaration had better be, and doubtless will be, submitted at the meeting.”

But we did not call the statement which might receive the smaller number of votes a “minority” statement, because, if the thing is done at all, we think every statement likely to be offered, having that preamble, would be likely to pass by a majority vote. Many of us would probably be able to vote for more than one. If any one series of Affirmations were offered, so intrinsically noble in its truth, so impressive in its words, so like a great psalm or chant in its effect upon the mind, as to secure a unanimous Amen, that might be enough and best-alone. But that is not to be expected. Next to that, two noble statements illustrating the span of faith in Unitarianism would be best,—and, possibly, the best in any case. Two statements, if they covered well the span, would be better than a larger number; better, surely, than a large number. Our differences are too small to require a half dozen variations to word the substance of our faith; they would but perplex a reader trying to find out why we cared to say so nearly the same thing in six ways. And besides, two or three of the six are likely to be more nobly worded than the others; there are poems and poems. For our Affirmations we want the clearness without the cold of a scientific catalogue, the glow without the mist of a poem,—if such an ideal can be made real.

It has been said by another friend that, prior to voting on such questions as those of Faith and Fellowship, delegates should be instructed by their churches how to act, and that ratifications by the churches would be necessary afterwards. That would certainly be the case, if the resolutions passed were to have universal scope and authoritative force; but when they expressly say they speak for only a majority, bind none, and are always open to re-statement,—in other words, when they are simply a frank attempt to gather up in summary forms, and preferably in two different forms, and without the least binding intent or possibility, the great faiths that are practically everywhere preached and taught and worked for among us,—then what need of going about the matter so formally with prior instructions and subsequent ratifications? The open resolutions would be everywhere understood among us for just what they profess to be, and the usual method of submitting them and passing or rejecting them would probably be satisfactory to all the churches; whereas the formal and stately way of doing the thing would be apt to imply a significance and a sort of authoritative force that would be wholly contrary to the general thought and wish.

W. C. G.

Conference in Hindoo Land.

The Brahma Somaj is the name of the Theistic church of India, founded by Rammohun Roy, in 1830. The Sadharan (universal) Brahma Somaj is the name of the most important branch of this church. In the midst of a society that worships idols, treats the Vedas as infallible scripture, and is ruled by the caste system, this “Church of God” has abandoned idols, given up the Vedas, and opposes caste as a monstrous iniquity. Its great mission is to establish spiritual freedom in India, and to teach direct relations between men’s souls and the Over-Soul. They are not “Christians,” but they reverence Christ among the highest prophets. For them the historic back-grounds are Hindoo, not European, so their thoughts naturally turn to native prophets who have taught faith as against ceremonial works, freedom as against the bondage of tradition, and truth and righteousness and love as the way of life eternal.

In their temple at Calcutta “the great holy supreme God shall alone be worshiped, and no divine honors shall be paid to any man or woman as God or an incarnation of God or as specially appointed by God. No book or man shall ever be acknowledged as infallible and the only way to salvation, but due respect shall be paid to all scriptures and the good and great of all ages and all countries. In the sermons and prayers used in this hall no scripture, sect, or founder of a sect shall ever be ridiculed, reviled or spoken of contemptuously. Flowers, spices, burnt-offerings, candles and other material accompaniments of worship shall never be used, and care shall be taken to avoid anything tending to reduce religion to mere parade and lifeless forms.” These Brahmos are our Hindoo cousins, therefore, but cousins in a country where to avow oneself a Unitarian of this sort is to court social persecution, banishment from home, and sometimes poverty and want. They are active in educational and reform movements, and they send out missionaries through the land to start Brahma societies. Once a year, in January, they meet, as we meet in May, to hold their anniversary festival, the Maghotsab. Just now, as we go to Conference, it may be interesting to watch them at theirs.

It is our Conference with a difference. In the first place, theirs lasts a fortnight! If we understand aright the weekly newspapers stop during that fortnight, and the editors turn in to help in other ways. Every morning sees a prayer-meeting, every evening a sermon or a lecture or the anniversary of one of their religious societies. Last January one of the lectures was on Martin Luther, and it was two and a half hours long. One was on Chaitanya, and another on Nanak, two Hindoo Luthers; and one on the "Best Teachings of the Age," which were found mainly in the works of Emerson, Wordsworth and Carlyle. Like us they have a Women's Branch, the Brahmo Somaj, which celebrates its own anniversary, "two hundred ladies present;" and a Banga Mahita Somaj, or Bengal Ladies' Society, which we might translate "the Chicago women's association." But the Bengal sisters meet every week,—two Saturdays in the month for prayer-meetings, one for the reading of their own original papers and discussions, and one for lectures given to them by gentlemen; and once in three months comes "a social gathering open to guests of both sexes;"—in which respect the gentlemen friends of the Banga Mahita Somaj are better off than the corresponding Chicago gentlemen. And there are sights and sounds in the Maghotsab which are never seen or heard in the May meetings of us cool westerners. These for instance:—

"On Saturday afternoon the whole concourse of the people, numbering some hundreds, young and old, learned and illiterate, enthusiastically sang the Sankirtan (choral hymn) which had been composed for the occasion, and passed singing through the streets to the temple, where large numbers of people, men and women, young and old, waited to greet them. Long before the party arrived at the temple the benches and the galleries were filled. The spectacle was truly imposing and edifying. Hundreds of men with flying banners containing the favorite Brahmo mottoes, animated by one idea, and that the grandest and holiest,—maddened by this wine, almost frantically singing His glories, regardless of their rank and position in society—the scene was most touching and drew tears from many an eye. Many a broken heart which had been bruised in the world, many a weak soul which had met sad discomfiture in the very first trial in life, found consolation; and when the choruses were sung, the large crowd—which grew in bulk at every stage, drawing people by dozens and scores—could with difficulty restrain the sobs which were distinctly heard at every step. When this crowd entered the temple there was hardly any vacant seat, and the spacious hall could with difficulty provide standing space."

"On Sunday there was utsav (festival) during the whole of the day. At dawn before it was daylight numbers had gathered in the temple. After the service was over a large part of the congregation did not leave for hours, but in a body remained seated, not a soul stirring, and prayed and chanted His name. Here was one brother sending forth a fervent prayer from the inmost recesses of his heart; there a sister singing a soul-stirring hymn broken at intervals by sobs of the penitent, broken heart; the blessed rejoicing at the bliss they enjoyed."

"In the evening five young men were initiated into Brahmoism by Pandit Sivanath Sastri, who delivered a most impressive discourse on the occasion. 'Why have you,' said he, addressing the young men, 'not caring for riches or distinctions of the world, entered the Brahmo Somaj? Is it merely because the Brahmo Somaj is the place for social reforms, where, with iniquitous and monstrous custom, the caste system will no longer cripple your conscience, where no unjust fiat of society will fetter your thought and action? Or is it even because the Brahmo Somaj preaches a higher morality? No, brethren; if only this feature of the Brahmo Somaj has attracted you to it,—if you seek only to reform your society, to ameliorate the condition of your women, to liberate them, or even only to practice a higher morality than is prevalent in Hindu society, you will be sorely disappointed.

But if hunger and thirst for His presence and His righteousness drives you to seek shelter in the Brahmo Somaj, then are its doors open to you; enter and be seated by the side of poor sinners who will embrace you with open arms. Here you will find no social distinction, no worldly honor; here your companions will not be men at whose words society trembles, but poor, broken-hearted men whom nobody takes any notice of. Let prayer be your constant companion, never in your life forget it. Pray to Him daily, and surely He will bless you."

Such is a Unitarian conference in Hindoo land.

W. C. G.

Reading.

Mr. Morley has been saying some good things about education and the habit of reading, from which we take the following extract:—

"Now I frankly admit that the habit and power of reading with reflection, comprehension and memory all alert and awake does not come at once to the natural man any more than many other sovereign virtues. What I do submit to you and press upon you with great earnestness is, that it requires no preterhuman force of will in man or woman—unless household circumstances are unusually unfavorable—to get at least half an hour out of a solid busy day for good and disinterested reading. Now, in half an hour I fancy you can read fifteen or twenty pages of Burke, or you can read one of Wordsworth's masterpieces—say, the Lines on Tintern; or more than half—if a scholar, in the original, and if not, in a translation, of a book of the Iliad or the Æneid. I am not filling the half hour too full; try for yourselves what you can read in half an hour. Then multiply the half hour by 365, and consider what treasures you might have laid by at the end of the year; and what happiness, fortitude and wisdom they would have given you for a lifetime."

This we repeat, is wise. But possibly there is one difficulty about it, namely, that it may be as discouraging to some as encouraging to others. For many people read very slowly; they seem to themselves to creep at a snail's pace through anything worth reading attentively. Whether such persons read so slowly because with special concentration resulting in greater assimilation of what they read, or whether only because their minds work slowly by constitution, but do not, on that account, work with any more precision or result than others gifted with greater quickness, we know not. But that there are such slow readers we know, because we are one of them. To us it is appalling to think of reading a page of Burke in two minutes, or half a book of the Iliad in half an hour. We must read as we can, that is, as we are made to read, which is at a tortoise's pace, and with many stops to look about, and with much brooding and observation over turns of expression, and with comparison of different passages. We say not that this is the only way to read, nor even the only way to read Burke, and such like, with advantage and appreciation; but it is our way. Shall we then, and others like us, be discouraged because we cannot stride with Morley over 30 pages an hour? By no means. The point is, let his wise words encourage us to read, and let not the amount he can traverse dishearten us so that we traverse nothing. Our resource is steadiness. No matter how little be done, so it be done steadily, much comes at last. Locke said that "The way to grow learned is to attempt but little at a time; short flights will gather much if all be saved." For tortoises like ourselves, we will supplement Morley thus—if we learn one wide fact, or scale one great thought, each day, in a year we have 365 facts or thoughts. Now this is no small learning; nay, if the thoughts be big enough, 300 of them is wisdom.

J. V. B.

We are always looking for single acts by which to judge the whole of a man's character, when we need the whole, in order to understand the single act.

W. W.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Maiden's Reply.

"Come down, Oh Maid, from yonder mountain height,
What pleasure lies in height," the shepherd sang ;

* * * * *

"And come, for love is of the valley, come"

TENNYSON'S "Princess."

Nay, shepherd boy,
The happy vale is not for me;
Dear and welcome is the joy
Of snugly-nested home and warm fireside,
Where true hearts bide
In love and sweetest charity.

But well I know
Love lies along the heights, also:
Though bleak and cold they stand
Within a wintry land.

Love, perhaps, that's long delayed;
By pain or ignorance withstood,
Bereft of much of human good,
Yet waited for and prayed;—
Love by dear losses tried,
And sorrow purified,
'Till all selfish longings cease,
Melted in God's peace.
Such the love that lies the heights along,
Praised in my song.

Farewell, dear shepherd boy.
For thee the valley's cot and fireside joy,
Lowly content and cheer,
That spring from duty known and near;
But I, with those fair, shining peaks before,
How could I choose,
But gladly lose
All meaner bliss and gain?
Though weary my feet at times and sore,
And heavy my heart with a nameless pain,
An inward voice still bids me know
That love, so humble and sweet,
There at the mountain's feet,
Lieth along the heights, also.

CELIA P. WOOLLEY.

Nature and the Bible.

The beauty and usefulness of the Bible is found in the fact that it, more than any other historical work of morals, harmonizes with the laws and facts of human life. It furnishes us with the struggles of the early Jew, the path he developed as he grew from savagery and ignorance into civilization and knowledge, the terrible vicissitudes through which he passed, the art and letters, law and science, which attended every step of his progress, and beyond and above all other things in importance, the apprehension of God and the discovery of the moral law. Take the Bible in its broad application to human thought and life. As the oceans receive different names as they touch different shores, yet are the same in composition, so the Bible adapts itself to the various individualities and constitutions of mankind without a change of nature. It is in part the history of universal human nature. It shows how long it has taken man to know himself. It reveals the many errors, stumblings, disciplines, battles and victories through which the Jewish race passed. And it struck upon such principles as justice and benevolence, principles which underlie the foundation of an absolute civilization. The fertility of thought which the Bible undoubtedly contains made philosophers use the Bible as good soil for the cultivation of their theories. As a tree is almost covered up and hidden by ivy, making it quite difficult to distinguish the form or nature of the object concealed, so the parasitic doctrines and religious vines which theologians have grown about the Bible make it difficult to separate the one from the other. But to say that these doctrines or dogmas make the Bible is as absurd as to say that the crabs or oysters make the ocean. The Bible is a very natural book. It shows that an open disregard for the moral law brought upon society certain degenerations and diseases which cut off life in the blossom, polluted the blood of families, and retarded the progress of man. The life of Job is the history of a man awakening from the folly of ignorance into the realities of nature—of God. The life of Moses is the history of a man, in a low state of culture to be sure, who legislates a people as a priest rules his flock or a pope domineers over the church. The life of David is the history of a man wrestling with his passions and appetites, allowing his genius to run into the "by-ways and hedges" of sin, yet condemning himself as often for his wantonness and brutality, and yielding at last to the impulse of virtue. The history of Solomon is that of a royal king attached to wisdom as Goethe or Heine was to a knowledge of human nature. The life of Joseph is that of a young man, pure in his integrity and beautiful in his wisdom, who scorned to do that which he was taught was wrong. The life of Queen Sheba is the history of a woman, who, like Queen Elizabeth of England, although perhaps sensual and passionate, was yet a patron of wisdom, art and literature. The life of Naomi is that of a true wife, never unmindful of her duty nor forgetful of the vows which she made in marriage. And so we could continue to modernize the characters in the Old and New Testaments.

Aside from all other purposes the great aim of the Bible is to make men realize the potency of natural law. Here is a common basis for the church and the state, for the home and society. Here is a foundation for a true religion and a practical morality. On this plane, nature and the Bible are one. The day is coming—we await it with joy—when Christianity will either be outgrown or be proven to be one with all nature. And planting our feet firmly upon this everlasting rock, may we not see all law, all life, all nature, aye, history itself, point toward this uncompromising conclusion—this unity of all things?

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

Bird-Worship.

The busiest world in all the world is the world of little birds in the April woods. Doing the duty nearest to them, they have no time for song, nor much talk. So their world is as silent as it is intense.

Dear silent birds about your happy care
In all the blossoming woods these April days!
Shall we not count your high absorption prayer,
And see in all your glad contentment praise?

If my content, Father of bird and man!
Forgets some time the Power that grants my will,
And deems the whole world in my little plan,
Wilt Thou not count it praise and worship still?

E. C. L. BROWNE.

ASHLEY WOODS, ST. ANDREWS PARISH, S. C.

Is It Honest?

The name Christian has for more than a thousand years been used with a definite and well understood meaning—to designate the believers in Christ; that is, not the historical Jesus of Nazareth, but a person of divine nature, incarnate in a human body and anointed for a special mission. A supernatural origin is of the very essence of Christianity, as the word has been used until now, and is now used by ninety-nine hundredths of those who bear the name. But a handful of men in these last years have proposed to change the meaning of the Christian name. None of these men believe in Christ in the sense in which the Christian world believes in him; and a large proportion of them reject his supernatural character and mission altogether. This is not a new opinion. There was a considerable body of thinkers in the last century, who rejected the divinity of Jesus, while reverencing him as a man; but they confessed that the old historic meaning of the word Christian was opposed to this view, and they consistently called themselves not Christians, but Deists. With what right now do the Unitarians of the present day call themselves Christians? Is it honest?

I should answer this question in the affirmative, but I do not see how any person can give an affirmative answer to it, who denies the name Unitarian to any person who believes himself to be faithfully following out the fundamental principles of Unitarianism.

z.

In Vain?

Is all the waiting vain?
Is it for naught I have endured
The maddening whirl of pain?

In vain have all my tears
Run piteous course before my God
Through all my troubled years?

Is it in vain I stood
With torn heart crying: "Give me what,
Though hard, Thou deemest good?"

In vain has each hard blow
Taught me that I was higher raised
When I was laid earth-low?

Was all the love I gave
One life, in vain bestowed, as though
I formed that young love's grave?

Have we no recompense
This side the gates of Home for all
Our wasted love intense?

Comes not from some far sphere
The love we deemed as lost below—
Returning to us here?

Lo! after many days
Does not the bread on waters cast
Return in wondrous ways?

EUGENE ASHTON.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The History of Music. In two volumes. By Emil Naumann. Translated by F. Praeger. Edited by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus. Doc. Cassell & Co., Limited: London, Paris, New York and Melbourne.

This is a work of 1300 pages divided nearly equally in two volumes, and paged consecutively from beginning to end. The second volume begins with page 759. The list of illustrations for both volumes has 300 titles, consisting of passages of music, facsimiles of musical manuscripts, musical instruments, ancient and modern; mythological and ethnological pictures, related to music; portraits, historical buildings, monuments, etc. These are included in the 300 titles, and are scattered profusely through the text. Besides this, there are in the first volume nine, and in the second volume thirty-eight full-page pictures, which are prints of old sculptures, of great pictures and of portraits. The excess in number of these full-page illustrations in the second volume results from this being the more biographical volume, since it deals with the later history of music, therefore with the great composers, their lives and works. Besides all this wealth of pictorial illustration, as excellent as it is profuse, there are two illuminated frontispieces, showing musical notes and signs of the ninth, tenth and thirteenth centuries. Besides this, the volumes are decorated with ornamental designs and initials; specimens of the melodies of many nations enrich the volumes. The work is divided into four books, and by a novel arrangement each book, and in the third and fourth books, different divisions, have special introductions, like little general treatises or prefaces of the matter, which then is treated in detail in chapters with special titles. Book First relates to the classical, pre-classical, and oriental history of music, with chapters on the Chinese, Japanese and Hindoos, on the Egyptians and other Africans, on Western Asiatics, on the Israelites, the Islamites, the Greeks and the Romans. Book Second traces the development of music in the middle ages, treating in six chapters of Christian hymnology, folk-music, troubadours and minnesingers, and so on. Book Third carries on the history with Luther and the music of the Protestant church, to which subject are given seventy-four pages. Also, in twelve chapters, are treated the early Italian music, English music, and the decline of music with the Romance nations, and its rise with the Germans. Book Four treats of the history of music from the beginning of the eighteenth century to the present time. It is divided by the prefaces or introductions, before spoken of, into four parts, the first being the epoch of genius in German music, under which different chapters treat of Bach, Handel, Glück, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, about thirty pages being given to each. Then follows the epoch of the great German talent, as the contents phrases it, treated in three chapters on Schubert, Weber, Spohr, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn and Schumann. Then follows the influence of the German genius on Italy and France, treated in two chapters, in which a chapter of fifty-two pages is given to the opera, and another chapter to Cherubini, Spontini and Rossini. The book ends with the New Romantic school, under which a chapter is given Berlioz and Wagner. A chapter of eighty-two pages discusses contemporary composers and the concluding chapter of 42 pages treats of modern English music. There is an index of eighteen pages in double columns. The author says in the preface that it is hoped his work "may aid in fostering an ever-increasing interest in the most emotional and cherished of all arts—music;" which, indeed, it can hardly fail to do; and certain it is that it will delight and instruct those who are already lovers of the art. It is truly an imposing work. It is very uncommon indeed, in the wealth, profusion, excellence and extreme interest of its illustrations. It is a critical history, displaying both affluent learning, and that kind of knowledge also which consists in a mind thoroughly penetrated with the subject. That this ample work does not disdain anecdote will appear from the following, from page 341, relating to the musician Josquin, which we will copy for its naive interest: "It is related that one day the king asked his favorite Josquin whether his powers were equal to the scoring a popular French melody, in which a part should be reserved for his majesty. This task was by no means easy, as the monarch was possessed of a very feeble voice, and of still less musical skill. But these were trifles to the sagacious master. He arranged the selected chanson for two boys' voices, adding a special part for the king, marked 'Vox Regis,' consisting of a single note running throughout the piece, reserving for himself the bass which, it is almost needless to say, was the most important."

J. V. B.

Gordon Browne's Series of Old Fairy Tales. The Drawings by Gordon Browne. The story Retold by Laura E. Richards. Boston: Roberts Bros. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. No. 1, Hop O' My Thumb. No. 2, Beauty and the Beast.

These are old stories pleasingly retold, in quarto form, illuminated covers, and adorned with very vigorous illustrations. The drawings, in fact, are worthy of entertaining the old as well as the young. We must say, however, that the story of "Hop O' My Thumb" is not good matter for the imaginations of children, nor for elder people either, for that matter. The letterpress is large and clear, and the paper good.

The Fousant and the Prince.—A story of the French Revolution By Harriet Martineau. Ginn & Co., Boston and Chicago.

The promise of the publishers to supply choice literature with full notes for children's reading, printed in large type on good paper at low prices, is being abundantly fulfilled in this excellent series of classics. We have in the present volume another old friend in new dress. In the words of the author, the sad story of the young prince, Louis XVII, is "a standing lesson to all who imagine that to be a prince is to be happier than other people."

THE HOME.

In a Storeroom.

In the wing of a large, old house in the suburbs of a city was a storage room where three children were housed on a stormy day of early September.

It was not very often the children were allowed in this holy of holies, for be it understood this was no common catch-all of a lumber-room. It was no part of the economy of this household to stow things away which were of no earthly good. In the first place, they had the strength of mind to immediately destroy and put out of its misery anything which was really used up. In the second place, if a thing was worth further use after they were done with it, they put on their thinking caps long enough to remember some one whose case it fitted, and then sent it to that person, or invited him to come and get it. Third, if no one could be thought of to whom it would be useful, it must be something really worth storage to find a place there. So this is the situation. The room contained things reserved for occasional use; it was orderly, and not overcrowded; there was space enough to get at anything and use it. Some one connected with this family evidently had a scientific and mechanical turn of mind. There was a carpenter's work-bench in the roomiest and lightest corner, with well-kept tools in their respective places. Another corner hinted of chemical experiments, with the accompanying unlikely dishes and suspicious looking mixtures locked in behind glass doors. Across the way stood a tempting chest of drawers—high, old-fashioned, and showing itself the worse for the wear, still having remarkable capacity for storage. On it was a case with some fine geological specimens and a large globe, from which the children had taken turns in studying geography. In the most secluded nook in the room, and solemnly draped in gray cloth, something very tall and slender loomed up high, and had the most mysterious attraction to the children, because they were never allowed to meddle with it in the remotest way. Quiet little Sadie was more absent-minded and dreamy than usual that day, which was altogether unnecessary, as she was chronically so every day. It was Dick and Nelly who kept up an excitement by going into ecstasies over the curious stones and shells, who whirled the globe with desperate rapidity, to assist their memories as to the rate of speed in which the world goes round; who found a few stray squares of board under the carpenter's bench, and drove tacks into them as thickly as pins in a pincushion. Sadie only laughed occasionally from her corner, diagonally opposite and most distant from the tall, gray object. She and her doll were supposed to be keeping house, but it must have been rather dull business, as neither of them were doing anything but watching the others and looking out of the window. She always fell into this mood when in the storeroom now. The first two times she had haunted the corner of the mysterious object, from which mamma had lifted the cover to let them peep, and then told them what they might play with. Sadie had not the gift of teasing for the things she wanted most, and which had been forbidden, as the other two children had; and so the more she wanted to know all about what was under the cover, the further she put herself from it, bodily and mentally, but the effort made her the more dreamy and passive.

That afternoon there was a surprise in the family. Uncle Edward came. He had been abroad several years, and to him belonged most of the things in the store-room. The clouds broke away at sunset, and as evening came on a cloud was lifted from Sadie's horizon, too; for Uncle Ed went up into the storeroom, opened the long window out on the little balcony, took off the gray cloth from the tall mystery, and invited all the folks to come and look through his telescope. It took some time to get the things in readiness, and it was a great event for the children to sit up so late. But they never forgot the wonderful sights they saw that evening as the stars came out, and Uncle Ed helped them to see and understand things new to them by the aid of the telescope. Dick and Nellie were the quiet ones now. Sadie forgot to be dreamy, and was alive with interest, whether it was herself or another who was taking a turn at the stars.

"It is just only to see things through, and nothing else!" was at last her conclusion.

"That is a great deal," said papa, "when it shows us so much more than we can see without it."

"Yes, I thought I could see all there was when I had just only my eyes to look through. Now I know there is ever so much more." "And always more yet undiscovered," added papa. Here mamma suggested, "With the telescope to show such wonderful pictures to your eyes, and Uncle Ed to talk into your ears about them, your mind is getting nearly as full as it will hold for this time," so with the promise of another evening on the balcony before Uncle Ed carried off his treasures, the little ones went to bed glowing with wonders.

"I guessed it was a sort of pump, mamma, when you lifted the cloth once to let me peep under, only I couldn't think where the pumpings came from."

"Well, it isn't so very unlike a pump after all," agreed mamma, who didn't quite like the kind of laugh with which Dick greeted Sadie's reflection. "It looks a little like one; then if we work a pump it brings up water through it from away down in the ground, which refreshes and invigorates our bodies; and in a like manner a telescope can be made to bring down rays of light through it from away up among the heavenly bodies, and shows us objects which fill our minds with knowledge and understanding."

"I liked best to hear Uncle Ed talk," shouted Dick from the next room, preparing to bounce into bed.

"That was because you can take things into your thought through your ears more easily than through your eyes. When we come to think of it, whatever brings distant things nearer to our sight is a sort of telescope, and I am thinking now of our inner sight which we talk about at bed time with your prayer. Looking in people's eyes often reminds me of a telescope, for there is a whole soul-world lying just beyond, from which wonderful rays of light reach us and carry thought from one to the other."

"Don't you know, mamma," put in Nellie, "how the other day when we had been over to the Corners, and knew you wouldn't like it, you said you saw something in our eyes that wasn't right, until we told you? and sometimes when you look at us I know what you mean before you say it."

"Yes, and do you remember what Uncle told you about the lenses to-night,—how they catch and reflect the rays of light? It reminded me of that most powerful lens in a human soul, for reflecting rays of light from the thought of one to another, and that is love. Love is not only the greatest reflector, but the greatest generator of thought. It is so clear that it reflects the rays of light very truthfully, and by this transmitting or sharing, it also generates,—that is, awakens new thought and makes it grow. You can understand your lessons better when Miss S. is your teacher, you say, than when Miss B. is with you."

"I should think we could!" declared Dick, with a gusto. He had bounced out of bed again, dragging the bed-clothes half across the room after him, when he found there was more telescope talk going on.

"You catch a touch of warmth and kindness from the face of Miss S. that makes you glad to give your attention to her. The thought she wishes you to get, reflects more brightly from her mind than from Miss B's, because she has more love for you, and so more confidence in you. To try to see things through another's thoughts always enlarges our own."

"I was a little afraid of the telescope, mamma, when it stood covered up in the corner, but now I love it, for it has shown me such beautiful things;" and Nellie added, "How we shall miss Uncle Ed's things out of that room when he goes!"

"We will fit it up for a play-room then, and you can keep all your treasures in it."

"Won't that be fun!"

"But now it is time for sleeps."

E. T. L.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

Good Friday From An Ethical Standpoint.

LECTURE BEFORE THE SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE OF CHICAGO, APRIL 3, 1887, REPEATED BEFORE THE THIRD UNITARIAN CHURCH APRIL 24, 1887, BY W. M. SALTER.

Good Friday—which falls this year on Friday next—commemorates one of the most pathetic events in history. This event is ordinarily regarded from a theological standpoint—and so the mention of it is apt to have little interest to liberals.

The orthodox idea of the death of Jesus takes us back to the dim beginnings of Hebrew history, when Jahveh, the national God, was conceived as the special source of thunder, and the storm, of plagues and pestilence; and when the fierce wrath with which he smote the Egyptians, destroying the first-born in every house, was only stayed as against the Hebrews by the blood of lambs dashed upon the door-posts or the lintels of the houses wherein they lived. The sight of blood was thought, according to the legend, to have softened the heart of the stern God, and in his mercy he passed the houses of the Israelites by. Thence arose the festival of the passover; thousands of lambs were slaughtered every spring in ancient Israel, to commemorate the God's favor in the past and to secure his favor for the future. Now it happened that it was during one of the passover festivals that Jesus came to his untimely end; the coincidence could not fail to affect the imagination of the early Christians. Jesus was their passover, they declared, their lamb—and they had no need to sacrifice any other; behind him and his blood they could take shelter; and the destroying hand that would soon be stretched out in the dread day of judgment would pass them by. The gospel traditions even represent Jesus as taking this view of his death. As the shadows of his coming fate fell upon him, he spoke mysteriously of giving his life as a ransom, by which the destruction of many should be averted; and the night before the crucifixion, at the last meal with his disciples, he identified the bread and wine upon the table with his body and blood, which were about to be offered up as a propitiation to Israel's God. This is the meaning of the communion which all Christian churches celebrate: here lies the significance of the Catholic mass; to Protestants figuratively, to Catholics really, the bread and the wine are the body and blood of that precious paschal lamb, whose life was taken eighteen centuries ago. Unless God is appeased, unless blood is shed, there is thought to be no favor from the unseen world for man; and to those who do not trust in this sacrifice already made there is only, to use scriptural language, a certain fearful expectation of judgment and of fierce, devouring fire.* Here is one explanation of the power which orthodox Christianity still has over the minds of men; at bottom it is a religion of fear, and before the advent of science and its disclosures of an equable reign of law, fear is more natural to men in contemplating nature than any other feeling; there is nothing men crave so as to have their fears allayed; and so to ignorant, anxious men and women everywhere, whether among the earliest Jewish converts or among the thronging multitudes of Rome, or among the untutored barbarians of the north, or among the uneducated masses in our great cities to-day, Christianity has come and comes as a boon, assuring them that if they will trust in the blood that has been shed for them, the unseen powers of the world will be kind and gracious.

We, to whom this whole circle of belief is illusory, and pitifully erroneous, what occasion have we to speak of Good Friday? I answer, because the death of Jesus may be looked at from a different standpoint. We may look on the death of this devoted son of Israel as it really was, not as it came to be regarded by his pious followers, or as it was transformed into something mysterious and fanciful in his own pious imagination. We may ask ourselves, what led to it; what does it show us as to his character; what is its meaning as an incident in the moral progress of the race; what value has it still for us personally, when we look upon it simply as the death of a great and heroic man? We may treat it as we would the death of Socrates or the death of Savonarola, or the death of John Brown—tragic deaths, all of them; deaths that have moved the hearts of men and influenced the course of history, and have still an inspiring power. The death of Jesus surpasses them all in pathos and in its influence on the fortunes of mankind. I think it not presumptuous to depart from Jesus' own estimate in this matter. We human beings often think we best understand ourselves. We think the estimates we set upon our work are the true estimates. But often we are mistaken. President Garfield said that "the lesson of history is rarely learned by the actors themselves." We who are really living are too earnest about the matter to sit down and form calm judgments. Time and the perspective which time gives are necessary. Jesus may have valued his death for one thing; history may value it for quite another.

How was it that Jesus died so soon? Why did he not live on to a ripe old age, like Socrates? I answer, essentially because he was not a philosopher, but a reformer; an agitator. For this reason his predecessor,—the ascetic Baptist, was cast into one of Herod's dungeons, and only came out to be decapitated. He had spoken too boldly of social iniquity in the court. Jesus had no ascetic ways about him; he did not love the lonesome wilderness; he frequented the towns and cities where men were congregated, and was touched by human sufferings and privations as well as human wickedness. I must not linger over details on which I have dwelt on other occasions. In brief, Jesus threw himself into the social agitations of his day—and the one agitating thought, that with which all secretly sympathized, though few dared to promulgate and hope anything immediately from, was that of an overthrow of the hated Roman power, and the inauguration of a new social and political order, under the name of the Kingdom of Heaven. This was the Messianic dream of his people. During his youth or early manhood there had been actual uprisings and bloody resistance to the Roman authority. Jesus had a horror of war and looked not to the hands of any soldiery to accomplish the great revolution on which he, too, set his heart.

The great God, Jahveh, he who had flashed fire out of heaven in approval of his faithful prophets, who had parted the waters of the Red Sea to let his people pass through and escape from their oppressors—his arm would be stretched out again; and it was only necessary that he be trusted, and the people be gathered out of Israel who should be worthy to form the new and glorious kingdom. By a bold leap, and yet no bolder than other Messiahs made before and after him, he took the leadership of a new movement, gathered followers, spoke with authority to all men, foretold the great coming change, and made others feel and believed himself that when the kingdom of heaven should come, he should be at its head. The old order falls, he said, a new one is coming; in the old is oppression, and cruel suffering, and abject misery, and sensuality and all manner of evil; in the new, there will be a recompense for every wrong and comfort for all who mourn, and the poor and the persecuted and the pure in heart, and those who love others as they do themselves will be the privileged ones—and all who oppress, all who are sensual, all who are hypocritical and for a pretense make long prayers, shall be humbled and cast out. The heart of the people responded to such fervid utterances; those in authority, on the other hand, the props, the pillars, the ornaments of the old order of things looked askance at Jesus. 'Tis the old story—that of conflicting interests; the Sadducean nobility, the zealous punctilious Pharisees, the lawyer scribes were in a place of reverence now and it did not look as if, in the dream of the future which Jesus unfolded, they should have any place at all. On the other hand, those who were oppressed and miserable now, had everything to gain,—and that many of them were inspired by no higher motives, is shown by the fact that when Jesus got into the clutches of the civil power, they made a very rabble against him. The Roman authorities never seem to have troubled themselves at all about Jesus; so peaceful was his attitude and so exclusively did he address himself to his own countrymen, that they scarcely knew of him; and when he was brought to trial before them, they seem to have regarded him as a harmless dreamer, and would never have consented to his death, had they not been driven to by the fierce and determined attitude of the leaders of Jewish orthodoxy. But the conflict into which Jesus precipitated himself could have no other issue. He did not trim his words, he spoke as conscience prompted him to speak; sharper invective than that he poured out, according to the report in Matthew, twenty-third chapter, against the false guides of his people, was perhaps never heard,—they would not enter into the kingdom of heaven, nor would they let others go in. 'Twas but a question of time and opportunity; and when one of his disciples, momentarily chagrined at a rebuke his master had given him for his penuriousness, and with the thought, perhaps, of forcing him to take his position as the nation's king, offered to put the Jewish authorities in possession of him, the offer was readily closed with, Jesus was made a prisoner, and the next day, after being hurried through a judicial trial, which was little better than a farce, was nailed to the cross.

*Heb. x. 37.

Such were the causes which led to the event which Good Friday celebrates—so far as they can be gathered into a few words. Jesus died the victim of a great hope for his people and for the world. He belongs to the company of those who cannot be patient with things as they see them, and who, because they cannot, meet with suspicion, and opposition, and hatred, and perhaps violence and death. His hope was not free from illusion; nay, in one sense it was altogether illusion, for wrong and oppression will never cease in this world by the intervention of divine power to judge and punish it, nor do men come from the dead or from heaven to do the work which they left undone on earth. But we have to distinguish between one's aim and the means by which he hopes to see it accomplished; and there is more hope for the world from one Jesus than from a dozen or a thousand men versed in the methods of science, yet without any transcendent aim and passion for a reign of right. The aim of Jesus was sound; nay, that is a tame word for it; it was perfect, it was unsurpassable. There is no other supreme aim for man than that reign of justice and of love upon which Jesus set his heart. To-day, in the measure that we have it, there is order, and safety and joy in the community,—and that there is so much lawlessness and defiant wickedness abroad, is simply evidence as to how great an extent men have it not. We must seek first, not wealth, not power, and not science, nor art, but the Kingdom of God—there is perpetual inspiration for man in this lofty thought of Jesus. The significance to us of the death of Jesus is simply that he kept this aim, in the only form that was possible to him, to the bitter end. We distinguish the aim from the method by which it was to be realized; we separate the form from the substance of Jesus' thought, but Jesus was not a philosopher, his consciousness was one and indivisible, and to doubt that he was the Messiah, would have been to doubt that there was any Messianic reign to be—and to doubt that would have been to shatter his faith in Israel and in Israel's God; and that he could not shatter,—it was a part of him, in his blood and in every fiber of his being.

For my own part, I can say that there are no events in Jesus' life so touching as those toward the close. At no time does he reveal so much character. To stand by our faith when all things go well with us—there is no great virtue in that; to stand by it when it is persecuted, when we may suffer loss from it—that tests whatever manliness there is in us. Jesus had no stoical feeling about death. It was not a matter of indifference to him whether he lived or died. He who loved the flowers of the field and the birds of the air, the lakes and the hillsides of his native Gallilee and the proud city of Jerusalem, to which he had made yearly pilgrimages from his boyhood up, could not turn from all these without some rendings of the heart and tears. And sharper pang than all, he who had counted on Divine assistance, he who had looked to being elevated to a Divine throne, whence he could execute the justice that was burning in his heart—how could he die like other men and leave his great work undone? In theory he had assented to it; on his way from Gallilee to Jerusalem for the last time, he surmised where the end would be; yes, on the night before his death, as we have seen, he made a mournful comparison of himself to the paschal lamb. But afterwards, when alone, in the darkness of the night, and the dread specter of death actually stood before him, his human shrinkings were too strong,—he fell on his face and prayed to God that he might not die; prayed three times, and sweat fell like blood from his face. 'Twas an almost mortal agony, so that to-day we almost hold our breath as we read of it—we feel the wrestling as 'twere our own, we hear the cry of pain; and then the cry ceases and a more than mortal calm passes through his breast—he has yielded his strong love of life, he goes forth to the sacrifice. Never was man serener than Jesus before his judges; when idle charges were trumped up against him he was silent,—he would not honor them even with a denial; but when asked as to the central core of all his faith, was he the Messiah, he promptly answered, "I am"—he took the oath administered to him by the High Priest, though he had never sworn before and commanded his followers not to; he pointed his persecutors away to the time when he should sit on the right hand of God and come in majesty on the clouds of heaven; and when in return the priestly hirelings spat in his face and cuffed him and jeered at him, he held his peace. Before Pilate he preserved the same dignified attitude, affirming his royal rank, but replying nothing to the frivolous charges urged by the priestly hypocrites. He submitted to the insults of the brutal Roman soldiery; in cruel mockery they put a red gown upon him, and placed a crown woven of thorn branches upon his head, and for a scepter they put into his right hand a reed—and then they filed before him, kneeling in turn and saying, "Hail, King of the Jews;" and not a murmur escaped him. On his way to the place of execution, he had to bear his own cross, until, in his weakness, he could carry it no longer, and a passer-by was impressed into the service. On arriving at the dreary hill-top, he was offered, "according to Jewish usage, a highly spiced wine, an intoxicating drink, which, from a sentiment of pity, was given to the sufferer to stupefy him."* He touched the cup to his lips and put it from him. As Renan says, "This sad solace of common criminals was unsuited to his lofty nature. He would face death with mind unclouded. The physical horrors of that death no one could describe—nor shall I attempt to. Crucifixion was reserved for slaves and the lowest criminals. It was a horrid torture and ordinarily long drawn-out. But if we may trust the gospel traditions, no outcry escaped the lips of Jesus, unless it was once when consumed with burning thirst; so magnanimous was he, that he prayed God to forgive his executioners, since they knew not what they were doing; and, though for a moment his heart failed him and he felt as one forsaken, he reassured himself at the last, and trustfully commended to the hands of God his parting spirit.

Where shall we read of a more tragic, a more noble death than this? Where is one that stirs more all our mingled feelings of indignation, and pity and admiration? Do we wonder that by his death, Jesus has won a closer place in the hearts of men than he could ever have by a most splendid and successful life, that the crucified one has been covered with honor and glory, that men have raised him to a height of praise equal only to the depth of shame in which he was once plunged? Who would not like to be a believing Christian for a moment on Good Friday even more than on Easter Day, since all the instincts of honor and pity in a man incline him to take the side of one who was once placed at such bitter disadvantage, and we would rather err with such an one than keep company with those who are coldly correct and have not hearts large enough for a noble mistake! I for one would cast my tribute of honor at the feet of Jesus. There be liberals who would ignore him, who would bring up their children in ignorance of him, or perchance would ridicule him. I am not of this number. He is no paragon to my mind—no model of spotless virtue or of infallible wisdom; I do not call myself his follower. But this he is to me—inspiration; he touches my heart, he stirs my conscience, he warms me with love of a noble ideal; and this is something which few philosophers, liberal or other, have done or are doing for men, so that while they give correct opinions, Jesus and a few others like him give that indefinable thing we call life. I should rather have the impulses which Jesus communicates and be left to form my own opinions, than to have the opinions of our wisest philosophers without that motion of the heart toward goodness and all unselfishness which is so naturally stirred by the spectacle of the life and death of this son of man. It is not knowledge that moves the world, but character, love; and outside of the holy Buddha, where is there a man that has so impressed himself upon the world and created and deepened so many channels of pity and tenderness as Jesus, whose opinions we may outgrow, but whose heart never!

*Renan, Life of Jesus, p 346.

The death of Jesus sets the last seal to his sincerity, and to the reality of that wonderful love of man, which made him brave so much and count the cost so little. A man of commoner mould would never have risked so much, a man with a heart less pure would never have assumed so high a mission; we are compelled to say that if Israel and the world were to be redeemed and purified and transformed according to the outlines of his dream, he was worthy to be the instrument of the Unseen in doing so; for never was there one who had less self-will, who more completely identified himself with the will of the Highest as he conceived it, never one better qualified to sit at the right hand of his Father, as he thought he one day should, and dispense justice and merciful judgment to the assembled nations of men.

And now let us look at the death of Jesus in a broader way, as an incident in the moral progress of humanity. It has a three-fold significance of which I wish to speak: First, it is the consecration of sorrow, of suffering. Cast over in your mind all the gods of the Grecian and Roman pantheon and where shall you find one with the downcast, sorrowful visage of the son of man,—where among the fair goddesses shall you find one so tenderly beautiful as that which Christian imagination has given to the Mater dolorosa? A suffering god—what an incongruous thing to a Greek or a Roman! But a suffering god, a suffering man whom his followers have made a god, is the central figure in Christian worship. This means an immense difference in the moral sentiments of men. It means a compassion strange to the ancient world,—it means that the more men suffer (other things being equal), the more they shall be cared for; while in pagan civilization it was too apt to be the case that the more men suffered the more they were neglected. No man can turn in reflection to the cross of Jesus, or to any of the affecting incidents of the last two days of his life, and not feel his heart softened toward all the sufferings of his fellowmen and a double aversion to all the jeering spirit with which one man sometimes makes light of another man's distress. Such incidents as those at the trial and crucifixion of Jesus would not be tolerated now, even in the punishment of our worst criminals; the dignity of humanity, even in crime, is felt now, and hardly a lynching mob would subject its victim to such indignities as were heaped on Jesus. 'Tis not by accident, then, that we care for the sick now as never was the case in the old world, that the poor have a love shown to them, that they never knew in Greece or Rome; 'twas not by accident that in old Rome itself the gladiatorial shows were stopped, when Christian influences gained the upper hand in the state. Everywhere a new humanity arose, a new pity for all the outcast members of society; for no one suffered shame and loss without exciting the remembrance of him who was in his day "despised and rejected of men," and who asked no honor for himself, save that of being remembered in the form of the least and feeblest of those who were his brethren. Secondly, the death of Jesus brings home to us in a vivid way that sacrifice is a law of progress. It is not that the unseen Spirit is angry and will not be favorable to man until some offering of blood is made to him; but that the conditions of things are such that progress is only possible through effort and pain and sacrifice. "What good thing have my brothers," exclaims the Buddha, "but it came from search and strife and loving sacrifice?" It is a beautiful ideal that each of us should live a full and complete life, without any marring of it, any cutting of it short for the sake of others; but it is the goal of evolution rather than the law of the process, and in the meantime, we have often to suffer injury to ourselves that good may come to others. What mother, what devoted friend, what leader of reform, what helper in any useful cause does not know that unless they are willing to part with something, time, means, strength, health, perhaps life itself, they are not fitted to the tasks which nature or their own hearts call them to? And this is why the innocent ideal of pleasure, of happiness for ourselves, falls so far short of the real requirements of life; it is summer-weather philosophy, and if we have cherished it, the first storm of adversity, the first disappointment dispels it like a dream from our minds, and is only too apt to leave us bitter, because we were so unprepared. My friends, we are bound to one another, we belong to humanity; 'tis against our nature to seek a good for ourselves, alone and apart, 'tis according to our nature to find our happiness in the common happiness, and to give, to spend and be spent in the service of humanity. None of the lower goods on which we so often set our hearts are absolute; health we should seek, but we may disregard it, and suffer, as George Eliot says, "glorious harm," in some noble disinterested service. "Who would not rather be sick," says Renan, "like Pascal, than in good health like the multitude?" Who would not rather suffer, I would add, and bear his cross like Jesus, and be buffeted and spit upon and made the butt of cruel jests, and at last be crucified, than to live to a good old age as the high priest did who condemned him to death, and left children after him, so that, as Josephus says, he was held to be one of the most fortunate men of his century? Let us not use words lightly, let us not rate ourselves too high. I do not forget the truth of those lines of Newman's:

"Prune thou thy words, the thoughts control
That o'er thee swell and throng;
They will condense within thy soul,
And change to purpose strong.

But he who lets his feelings run
In soft, luxurious flow,
Shrinks when hard service must be done,
And faints at every woe."

Ah, we should shrink from the cross of Jesus, we shrink from being ill-spoken of now, we shrink from all the little crosses that duty brings us from day to day; perhaps, I should not say, we would rather suffer like Jesus,—but oh, that we might be ready to, oh that we might school ourselves now by little acts of self-denial, by patience under suffering, by continuing to love, though there are those who hate us, by constantly surrendering our self-will in face of the Divine necessities that surround us, and saying, "Whatever thou layest upon me, that I will do,—school ourselves thus, so that we shall be ready, should we be called upon, to render the last sacrifice, and withhold not life itself from the service of the world. The death of Jesus is a sorry subject; there is no beauty in death that we should desire it—it is the opposite of all we crave, we do not like to think of it, we turn from it when the mention of it is made. O hard, ungracious visitor! O stern, repulsive visage—yet thou may'st be transfigured, thou may'st even be made welcome. "Let death come straightway," said Achilles, "after I have punished the wrong-doer, so that I remain not here by the beached ships, a laughing-stock and a useless burden of the earth." Jesus said, "Let death come." Death is made sacred, death is glorified since Jesus died,—and there have been impetuous followers of his that have even courted it, that have been ready to throw the world away that they might follow in his footsteps. Do not fear death, O friend, but rather fear that thou may'st not die worthily; selfish, fretful, bitter, rebellious, when thou should'st be full of love, and peaceful and thankful and without reproaches to God or man, ready to yield, and glad even if in any way thy death may be a sacrifice for the world's good.

There is one other aspect of the death of Jesus to which I must refer. It is the element of illusion in the hope to which he fell a martyr. The world's progress is not all in a straight line. Those who would benefit the world we remember more tenderly for their mistakes. The road to humanity's perfect goal is not revealed to us by flashes from heaven. We have to find it out by experience,—and incidental to humanity's experience are mistakes, and failures numberless. The hope of Jesus to come again to the world in power and glory was illusory; the solemn prediction he made to the high priest at his trial was illusory; had he had no illusions, he would not have died as he did, he would not have been spat upon and mocked and tortured and crucified. But when I think of this aspect of the case, I call to mind George Eliot's words:

"Even our failures are a prophecy,
Even our yearnings and our bitter tears
After that fair and true we cannot grasp;
As patriots who seem to die in vain
Make liberty more sacred by their pangs."

Jesus died in vain, as have others before him or since his time; but his cause is the dearer to us because he failed in it. I would we might imprint his thought on our foreheads and in our hearts, I would we might make it the great sovereign aim of our lives, to bring that kingdom of heaven, for which he sighed and prayed and died, to pass in the world. O my friends, my companions for a few brief years upon the earth,—what are we living for, what thought is topmost in our souls? I tell you nothing is fitted to be there, but the thought of Jesus. Let us purify it from all that belonged merely to his time and race, let it be to us a hope for America and the world, instead of, as it was to him, for Israel and the world,—let us, here in our own land, in our own commonwealth, in our own city, strive to build a true kingdom of justice, a city of light; let us hold to such an aim against our fears, against the selfishness of men and our own, against all the odds that count on the other side; let us love and labor and die for it, and then, though we in turn make mistakes, others will remember us the more tenderly for them, and press the harder for the way that is true and sure.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SYRACUSE, N. Y. May 2, 1887.

DEAR EDITOR:—In the printing of Church registers could we not partly check the wholesale piracy or miscellaneous and indifferent aims which they are made to serve by selling them, as may be done, for ten or fifteen cents a copy? This pays the cost of printing and qualifies the risk or scope of circulation. Further—only a limited number could be printed, and for the congregation. Perhaps these "business fleas" would pester us as much as ever—yet they would be paying, in part, for the trouble of troubling us. We have adopted this plan to our joy.

J. C. F. G.

EDITOR OF UNITY.—Twenty years in the ministry of a denomination (Baptist) whose time and means were largely expended in maintaining "integrity of doctrines," naturally begets a desire for "rest." Five years' abiding peace, among the most excellent people of All-Souls' church, of this city, makes us pray to be excused from further "Problems of fellowship in religion," that find their unwelcome way to our quiet home. UNITY brings a glow of joy in its weekly visits that we dislike to have dissipated by appeals to the "Unitarian situation in the light of the vote of the Western Conference at Cincinnati."

Our cause here has much to inspire hope for the future.

S. D. BOWKER.

P. S.—Before I could mail the above I was afflicted with "Unitarian Christianity," and "What is Unitarianism?"
KANSAS CITY, MO., April 21, 1887.

BROWNING'S WOMEN.

BY MARY E. BURT.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY EDWARD E. HALE, D. D., LL. D.

There can be no doubt that Miss Burt has discussed Browning's women with intelligent fairness.—Chicago Herald.

Admirers of the poet will read her analysis of character with special pleasure.—Cleveland Leader.

There is a brightness and piquancy about the narratives that makes the book very readable.—Chautauquan.

The wonder grows upon us that Miss Burt has been able to weave so much of Browning's phrase with her own woof with little sacrifice of effect. The author is clearly a critical, careful, admiring student of Browning, from the standpoint of the literary club. The book can but meet with favor because of what it does, the way it does it, the spirit behind it, the power within it.—New England Journal of Education.

We can cordially recommend her little volume to not only individual readers, but to members of the Browning clubs who are endeavoring to make a special study of the poet.—Boston Transcript.

In her concise and graceful sentences she simplifies, analyzes and makes clear the deep ethical lessons of the author.—Inter Ocean.

Miss Burt will win many admirers by her style, which is very graceful and clear. She is ever dignified and at ease.—Chicago Tribune.

Every line of her study seems to have been weighed.—Chicago Daily News.

"Browning's Women" is certainly a most refined and scholarly tribute to the poet, with its lucid style and its polished accuracy of phrase.—Edgar Fawcett.

Cloth, 16mo, gilt top, 236 pages, price $1.00. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers,

CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY,
175 Dearborn Street, CHICAGO.

THEODORE PARKER'S

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

Selected from Notes of Unpublished Sermons, by Rufus Leighton. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 480: reduced from $2.50 to $1.25.

"It has been a great comfort to me often to think that after I have passed away some of my best things might still be collected from my rough notes and your nice photograph of the winged words. The things I value most are not always such as get printed."—Theodore Parker to Rufus Leighton.

"This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. * * * The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

This volume, edited by Mr. RUFUS LEIGHTON, was first brought before the public in 1865. It ran through several editions, but for a number of years has not been regularly upon the market. We have just concluded an arrangement with Mr. LEIGHTON by which we shall have the exclusive sale of the book. The price, originally $2.50, we have

REDUCED TO $1.25.

The book contains 430 large duodecimo pages, and is substantially bound in cloth. The general divisions of subjects are as follows: The Material World and Man's Relation Thereto, the Nature of Man, Traits and Illustrations of Human Character and Conduct, Phases of Domestic Life, Education, Human Institutions and National Life, the Power and Endurance of What Is Noblest in Man, Human Progress, Jesus of Nazareth, Man in His Religious Aspect. Each of these divisions is subdivided into from seven to forty sections; for example, the chapter on Human Progress is subdivided as follows: Man to Make His Own Paradise, the False Idea of Man a Hindrance to His Progress, Man's Progress not by Miracle but by the Use of Natural Forces, Power of the Human Will Over Circumstances, the Necessity for an Ideal, Death a Blessing to Man, the Founders of New England—the True Way to Honor Them, the Prophecy of the Past to the Future, the Next Half Century.

The book is copyrighted, and no portion of it is accessible in any other form, except a single section which has been used in this recent volume published by the American Unitarian Association.

* * * The book is for sale in Boston at Roberts Brothers' Book Store, and may be obtained through the trade generally, or will be mailed on receipt of price ($1.25) by

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Editorial Wanderings.—Last week the senior editor was away from home, and touched elbows with the faithful workers at St. Paul, Minneapolis and River Falls. At each of these places he told of Browning's method and message, and, judging from the number and interest of the auditors, Browning is not so remote from the thought and life of our communities as many would have us think. At the latter place, he also told the story of Millais, the peasant painter, to an audience of nearly 300 students, and on Sunday morning he preached in the over-crowded Sunday-school room of the new Unitarian church of Minneapolis. The audience is tremulous with expectation of the upstairs glory that is almost ready for them. We will not anticipate, but we will venture to say that after a few weeks one of the things to see in Minneapolis will be the Unitarian church, as already the man to hear in Minneapolis is the Unitarian minister. What bright, great country is focalized in these twin-towns of the north! How earnest and hopeful the Unitarian fellowship!

Philadelphia.—Doctor Furness, who seems somehow to have come into possession of eternal youth, went to Woodstown, N. J., on Sunday, the 27th, and there conducted the religious exercises of its embryo Unitarian organization.

—Rev. John B. Barnhill, of the Unitarian theological school at Meadville, has written a letter to Henry George, in which he states his acceptance of the theory of the nationalization of land.

—The Emerson circle at Germantown has adjourned its meetings till September.

—Robert Collyer lectured on "Clear Grit" in Unity church, Camden, May 2nd.

—Mrs. Pemdita Ramabai, who is in this country, presumably on some mission in behalf of Hindoo women, spoke before the Sunday-school in Clifford's church, on a recent occasion. I heard this woman speak at a Presbyterian missionary meeting upon the same subject, and was struck by the guarded nature of her discourse, in which "Christian" or "non-Christian" could not once have been inferred.

—William Coit came over from New York, and lectured before Mr. Weston's society, Sunday, the 24th.

—Professor Westbrook has delivered two lectures on the Girard estate matter, but his arraignment of the breach of trust seems to have fallen flat, which is lamentable, and yet natural, in the present state of the public temper on that subject.

—Haskell is shortly to exchange with Clifford.

—The Camden church is frequented by an audience averaging one hundred or over.

—The street boys in charge of the Ethical Culture society are likely to have a home of their own in the fall, as the necessities of the day school, now in the same building, are crowding them out.

—The Ethical Culture society has nearly doubled its membership since commencing its meetings in the fall. Though Mr. Weston's re-election as lecturer to his society was a matter of course, the tribute of personal esteem which the occasion and his noble, self-sacrificing nature prompted, were fine and refreshing. Two years of singularly felicitous association have made him seem necessary to those who have been his co-workers.

—Prof. Frances Emily White's fine commencement address has appeared in full in the Popular Science Monthly.

—In the list of Pennsylvania legislators, there does not appear to be one Unitarian. Somebody has been looking into the matter and found the orthodox sects, notably Methodism, dominant. Ten "statesmen" were unclassified.

—Miss Charlotte Porter, who edits Shakespeareana, is a member of the Society for Ethical Culture.

—John Sartain, the veteran artist, is religiously liberal to the very backbone, as will be made evident in his forthcoming autobiography.

H. L. T.

Chicago.—The Monday noon union teacher's meeting was devoted to the first lesson of the book of Job, Mr. Blake being leader. Nothing whatever is known of the author of the book of Job. The word in the margin of some Bibles that the book is believed to have been written by Moses while he sojourned in Midian, is entirely groundless. As to the integrity of the book, various and some extreme views have been held. Some cut off both prologue and epilogue, eliminate the speech of Elihu, and cut out and rearrange other speeches. Mr. Blake regarded these questions as of subordinate interest; the book as we have it is worthy of our study. The bulk and weight of critical opinion dates the book about the time of the Babylonian captivity. An impressive fact in this connection was noted, namely, that the more purely moral and religious the contents of a book are, the more difficult it is to determine its date. Is the book a history? The early Jews and the early Christians thought so. But the better opinion is against this view—the long speeches must be the leisurely work of a man of genius. Is it wholly imaginary? Examples of pure invention are exceedingly rare. Poets are always seeking subjects, legends, stories, facts, which they embellish and exemplify. Most good critics now agree with the opinion of Luther, that this book is an argument or poem founded upon a tradition of a fact or facts.

The purpose of the book. Three theories were mentioned out of the many that have prevailed:

1st. That the book is to set forth three points, (1) that the good are afflicted, but not for punishment, and it is wrong to reproach them with their misfortunes. (2) That it is wrong to call Deity to account, for how can man understand? (3) That at last God will revive and bless the good with prosperity.

2nd. That the book was not to come to any conclusion but simply to state the problem of evil and leave it as insoluble.

3rd. That the purpose of the book is not only to state the problem but to give some sort of solution and that this solution is in the prologue, namely that the good do suffer because God chooses to try, discipline, his children. This seems to Mr. Blake the preferable one.

In general the purpose of the book has been supposed to be probably national, a sort of answer to the question: Why does Israel meet with so many reverses and afflictions?

A few words about Satan. The Satan of Job is not a repulsive or disagreeable character. The meaning of the word is an adversary. In Job, Satan means a person, but he seems not a particularly wicked spirit. A real adversary of Jehovah could not have been accepted by the Jews at that time. There was no evil that Jehovah had not done, as Amos says.

—Mr. Edwin D. Mead occupied the pulpit of All Souls church, morning and evening, to the great edification and interest of the congregation, the subjects being "The Wages of Unrighteousness," and "Lessing's Nathan the Wise." The scholarship, together with the religious vigor and earnestness of the speaker, were strengthening and uplifting to those who were so fortunate as to hear him.

Boston Notes.—Merry May-day did not warrant a large Sunday hegira from our city streets into the suburban fields and groves, or a Monday search by juveniles for cowslips and early violets. Our spring is a fortnight slow this year. Indeed with us no school holiday is ever made of May-day.

—Brother George W. Cooke gave, on Thursday last, to the Moral Education society, his intensely packed lecture on the literary achievements of women, illustrated by the life and work of George Eliot. To the Monday club he gave his just and profound thoughts on the value of literature in sermon illustrations—of wide reading in daily pastoral duties—on the innocent use of imagination in religious instruction, or the advantage of gleaning in other men's reaping grounds to make up a full harvest of sentiment and religious strength and moral courage.

—Last Monday, Rev. H. W. Perris, of Hull, England, and Rev. W. S. Key, of Boston, England, addressed the Monday club. Earnest, truthful preachers they are, redolent of the air of progressive English thought. Both gentlemen will spend anniversary week in Boston. Mr. Perris has conducted courses of popular winter meetings in a theater in Hull, giving good instrumental and vocal music, from suggestive authors, in great variety. —Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, Goldsmith, Eliot, Dickens, Hugo, —even Emerson. Ladies and gentlemen assisted in the reading, and the crowded audiences always gave close attention. The current reading book was largely called for at the second-hand bookstores of the city. Mr. Perris told his audiences of working people that the expenses of meeting would be paid by his friends unless they preferred to defray them. They promptly chose to sustain the services by themselves.

Humboldt, Iowa.—"On Monday evening, May 2, Unity church celebrated its anniversary with a supper and sociable at the church, as usual, and held its annual election of officers. The officers elected were: T. B. Nickson, president; G. S. Garfield, secretary; A. D. Bicknell, treasurer; T. B. Nickson and J. N. Prouty, trustees for three years, and C. D. Mastin and Mrs. Taft trustees for one year. A resolution was passed unanimously and enthusiastically, which warmly commends Miss Murdock's work as pastor, and earnestly requests her to remain in that position for another year." The foregoing clipping from the Kosmos, of this place, indicates something of the annual banquet and business meeting of our society for 1887. It has taken its place as one of the pleasantest of our annual gatherings. The last sentence of the above indicates the high appreciation in which Rev. Marlon Murdock is held by her parishioners. We trust that not only for another year, but for many more we may be permitted to enjoy the relationship which the experience of the past two years has made so near to our hearts.

G.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MAY 21, 1887.

[NUMBER 12.]

EDITORIAL.

CHANNING says, "A high end in the community is an impulse which individuals can hardly withstand." Yes, and a high end in an individual is an impulse which by and by the whole world will not withstand, but will follow and venerate.

"It is a sign of infancy when only a few beings interest us." Strange that some men pride themselves on caring for only two or three persons in the world. But we have known some to take pride in slovenly dressing, and boys sometimes are proud of dirty hands and faces.

SPEAKING of civil liberty, Channing says: "Civil liberty is not enough. There may be tyranny of the multitude, of opinion, over the individual. He is free who is most encouraged to consult his highest nature and to act from it. Popularity enslaves. We want no limits to the range of the human mind." How much truth there is in that. The italics are ours. Channing says again: "Is there no danger of our self-control degenerating into tyranny? A man may lay severe rules on himself as truly as another may."

- UNFORTUNATELY for our readers this week, UNITY editors are also conference goers and conference workers. UNITY goes to press with the buzz of delegates and the rush of business all around it. We are too busy to write about it, but you will hear about it next week. Suffice it now to say that the tides of fellowship are high and warm, and there is no lack of prophetic interest and apostolic zeal in the interest of those things for which we came into being, and which form the subtle ties of sympathy between us and our readers.

A FRIEND writes: "Judaism—in the pure, lofty sense—is probably as dear to me as Christianity or Unitarianism is to you, and yet I fully and with all my heart re-echo the refrain: 'Judaism, or something better,' by which I wish to indicate that the substitution of something higher—higher because involved in Judaism and evolved out of it—does not frighten me. On the contrary, I do not fear to look forward to a period, should it in the natural progress and in the honest course of events come, when something else will be here because something higher. I do not say that the something has come, but what is important to recognize is that it is coming or may come, and in a sense should come." Have the "Christians" so great faith?

"MAKE the good contagious,"—a motto for all kinds of educators; educators in the nursery, the Sunday-school, the Unity Club, the church, the conference, as well as in the public school. It is the editor of the Journal of Education who speaks:—"George Howland, Superintendent of the Chicago schools, says with characteristic modesty in his late report: 'We have striven to make the good contagious.' This accounts for the fact that Chicago has some of the best schools in the country, with modern methods at their best, and all without the faintest ripple of excitement, with no local upheaval, with no agitation, with no noise of pretence. . . . On our recent western trip we visited a large school in which we saw some elegant work in various departments, and many methods we had never seen equaled in their sensibleness. And yet a year ago every teacher was hide-bound in prejudices against all phases of the new education. There has been but one change in the corps of teachers. The superintendent selected schools in which the best work was being done, and asked one and then another to visit and study such schools of their own grade. The results are as we saw them. The good had been contagious. These teachers could never have been scolded or threatened into it. No amount of ridicule would have conquered them; but, when they saw results such as they could not show, when they realized that to attain them they must change their methods, they were not only willing but anxious, and they read, they begged for advice and direction from the superintendent. The hope of the country to-day is in making the good contagious."

"I THINK the most important event that has ever happened to me was the reading of Browning's 'Rabbi Ben Ezra,' in our Browning class last winter. I have never accomplished what I hoped in life, but what he says had not once occurred to me,—that

'All I could never be,
All men ignored in me,—
This I was worth to God!'"

The speaker was a hard-working woman in a little western village. She was an Episcopalian in her church-listenings. She had had some of a woman's deep life-trials. She said it thoughtfully. "The most important event in her life" was the reading of that poem.

WE observed lately the following incident at a table. The master of the house praised the maid (one much loved and trusted in the household) for the dainty excellence of some dish, which he said was as beautiful as it was delicious. The mistress laughed, and said "I believe, E—, he says that every week." The girl answered brightly, "No matter; that's a kind of thing that never grows monotonous." We composed thereupon a short chapter of reflections for our own private edification. The incident recalled another, fishing it up like broken crockery from an old well, namely, that on occasion of a similar bit of praise, a wife, who was present, remarked, no doubt before she thought what she was saying, "My husband never says anything when things go right, only when they go wrong." Now, let a man, or a woman either, cling to the inalienable right of fault-finding on sound occasion, if he wish to; we will not dispute him; but if he have no conscience to join with fault-finding the counterpart duty of commendation, if he blame faults but take no care to praise virtues,—that we call rather mean to say the least of it.

UNITY gives its hearty endorsement to the following suggestion, now circulating for signatures among Chicago citizens. Each of the five reasons is separately strong. The first shows that the woman-half of Chicago begins to wish representation on the School Board. The second and third show that women can well fill the place. The fourth and fifth set forth that the school-work needs the women there. When a wish and a can and a need conjoin, a case is pretty clear. The fourth reason is not the strongest, but is very telling: if, of twenty-six Chicago teachers twenty-five are women, that fact alone suggests that at least two or three wise women should have voice in the over-management. The day will come when our present disproportion between honors and service in matters educational will seem as comical as it is unwise and unjust. We hope our new mayor will let us date this reform also from his administration.

To the Honorable John A. Roche, Mayor of Chicago :

As the terms of office of five members of the Board of Education are about to expire, we, the undersigned citizens of Chicago, respectfully urge upon your Honor that such positions, or some of them, be filled by prominent and capable women,—for the following among other reasons:

(1) The interest of the women of Chicago in all matters pertaining to education, whether as mothers, teachers or citizens, being as great as that of men, entitles them to a voice in all that concerns the public schools of our city.

(2) Women have shown such superior ability, fitness and fidelity whenever entrusted with a share of educational work as teachers, principals of schools, school superintendents or trustees, as to entitle them to still higher positions of trust.

(3) The joint action of women and men on School-Boards has in point of fact justified the acceptance of women for such positions, wherever tried; notably on the School-Boards of London, Boston, New York and other places.

(4) There are twelve hundred and fifty female to fifty male teachers in the public schools of Chicago. The interests of these women teachers should not be confided entirely to men.

(5) The work of a large number of the nineteen standing committees of our Board, notably those relating to rooms and regulations, special studies, text-books, courses of instruction, salaries and appointments of teachers, libraries and sanitary affairs, need, and should have, the counsel and action of women as well as men.

Of the Methodist hymnal, prepared by order of the general conference about ten years ago, and now in use among the churches, a writer in the Northwestern Christian Advocate says: "The book contains 1,136 hymns (including 19 classed as doxologies) 371 of which were incorporated in our hymnody for the first time. Excluding the doxologies, and 27 whose authorship is unknown (we follow Mr. Nutter's assignment), these hymns represent 336 authors of almost every denomination and shade of faith. Among them are 59 female writers, two of whom (Mrs. Adams and Charlotte Elliott) rival Wesley and Toplady in universal favor. Charles Wesley is represented by 308, Isaac Watts comes next with 78, and James Montgomery with 47. The tunes (to hymns proper) number 416, and are assigned to 221 different composers. The favorites seem to be Azmon, Boylston, Burlington, Duke-street, Hamburg, Hebron, Hummel, Lyons, Portuguese hymn, Rockingham and Webb, which all appear three times. The overwhelmingly popular composer is Dr. Lowell Mason."

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Hope.

With a little kneeless stocking in my somewhat weary hands,
All waiting to be woven whole, with forward, backward strands,

And then, with mate beside it, to await the little feet
That now in dimpled whiteness lie, two of an anchored fleet;

With the tick, tack of the clock to match the flitting thoughts of brain,

The hand fills in the trio, with the weaving threads again,
Just as the plaited work is done and little wearer blest
With good-night kiss, so light as not to mar the dreamless rest;

A flood of glorious light, through the uncurtained window
glows,

And over bed and sleeper its magic whiteness throws.
The cloud-imprisoned moon, without a veiling shadow sends
One instant, her full glory, and then with music blends—

The tinkling, dripping, dropping of the unexpected rain;
While in the distant sky is born the child of wedded twain.
For, with a softened beauty, the arching heavens are spanned
By nature's grand highway that rests on neither sea nor land.

And eyes that look will never more forget the wondrous sight
Of nature's stray "somniaulist," the rainbow in the night.

O, blessed bow of promise, my heart exultant cries,
So, born of light and tears our souls to glowing heights shall rise.

To reddest deep of human blood that in swift current flows,
To give through loving sympathies a warmer tinge to those Whose blood runs cold. 'To faintest tint that blends with ether 'round,

So may our spirits rise to meet the eternal without bound.

O, blessed bow of promise, yet with wider thought I cry,
While form and color fade away from out the clearer sky.
O age of aspiration! O age of wild unrest!

Is there no steady hand of calm, to soothe your seething breast?

From white light rainbow colors come, to white light they return;

So, through the ages, first to last, one spirit light does burn.
And prophets, many-voiced, shall rise with banners new, unfurled,

To read in every "chaos" new the "cosmos" of the world,

To write the noble record of the upward-striving past,
With ready pen at latest hour, to note the better "last."
Fair science, keen and tender-eyed, hopeful and never sad,
With firm but kindly voice says "sick," where saints have thundered "bad."

And at her word the Healer comes, and not official, grim,
For love and light do better work than any dungeon dim.

And art, the busiest worker, true art, the friend of all,
Turns downward-looking faces up, by beauty's magic call;
And if a more than Raphael, Correggio, Angelo
Have not been born, our age with no uncertain step, or slow,

Foretells their coming. Science, art, then tripled hand in hand,

With modest truth, which is the one religion pure, shall stand
A rank and file invincible, with love the undefiled
Prediction of the glorious coming of "The Child,"

The Christ that is to be. So reads the future by the past;
And so the present, with Gethsemanes, too sad to last,
But with a faith too clear and strong for any doubt
Waits only for the singer that shall find the music out.

I turn me from the window, and in a gleam of light
A little jewel casket, near, shines out upon my sight.
My quickened fingers turn the key, and folded, marked with care,
Two wrinkled papers, brown with time, are all the jewels
there.

One bears the name of "Gettysburg," and one "The Wilderness,"

And only leaves and rosebuds old these folded papers press.
A severed hand was left to lie upon one battle plain,
With roses' perfume on the air and bloom among the slain.

The other plucked the blossoms, in the name of coming peace,

And sent the precious flow'rets "home" who died that war might cease.

O, rainbow in the night time, your blended colors gone,
You linger in my memory, and thought will still run on,

And picture in your semblance the coming better time
When human life shall bear the sign of promise more sublime;
When strongest shades of difference, that, lying side by side,
The pure white light of truth shall blend that nothing can divide;

When the cross shall break the gibbet down, and love shall cancel hate,

And circling 'round the world shall keep her law inviolate.

O roses from two battle grounds, these twenty years and more
Have robbed you of your fragrance and the lovely garb you wore!

But by the risen spirit of soldier and of flower,
May we not dream the sacrifice to be a living power,
That as the rolling years go by may ever more increase,
To bring about the lasting day of purity and peace!

F. A. B. D.

The True Discipleship.

The fullest appreciation of Jesus is not necessarily with those who take him out of the ranks of our humanity and throne him in the heavens. Some of the deepest and tenderest reverence for this Son of Man I have found among men and women who gave him no titles and perhaps rarely spoke his name. That was a fine distinction of the venerable and saintly Lucretia Mott, who once surprised her friend by saying that she was not a follower of Jesus. "You are not?" said the friend; "No. I am a follower of that which Jesus followed." And yet so much is the popular view of this confession of Jesus linked with particular beliefs about his person and official rank in the universe, that this freer discipleship is often counted for naught. Labels and names blind people to the deeper fact of Christlikeness.

When Jesus first appeared as teacher and prophet, it was without pomp and with no prestige. Later biographers pieced out a confused and discrepant genealogy to connect him with the royal house of David; but his own generation knew him only as the son of Joseph and Mary, living in an obscure village in the province of Galilee. "Is not this the carpenter's son?" the people of the district said of him as he was beginning his ministry. "Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet," said the doctors of the law at Jerusalem. His own brothers, we read, did not believe in him. More than once his friends said, "He is beside himself."

To see the truth and to accept it when it came in so humble a garb as this belonged to few. It belongs to few in every age. Not all who are abroad at mid-day welcomed the rising sun. Even those who owned a secret response to the teachings of this new-risen prophet shrank from the misconception, not to say reproach, which open approval involved. He had no outward rewards to offer. Men could not then better their business chances by "standing up for Jesus." His party had no offices to distribute. A public man could not get votes by subscribing to the "disciple fund." To attend his meetings was not a passport to Jerusalem society. The "best families" didn't have his name on their lists. It was not down in the social directories of the day. On the other hand to speak well of him was to incur reproach. To own his teachings was for those who stood well in society to lose somewhat of respectability. To confess his name was to confront established opinion, to be in the minority, literally to turn one's back upon the world. You see, therefore, what loyalty, what independence of character, what devotion to ideas, what faith in things unseen and not entered in the market reports, went with this acknowledgement of Jesus in his own day. But is it thus to-day? No thoughtful person can fail to see the difference of situations.

That name is no longer a moral sifter of society. To confess it has become easy. It is no longer to stand in a little minority. It involves no loss of respectability with the world at large. It does not necessarily mean readiness to take in unwelcome truths or willingness to break from the bondage of outworn and false traditions. It is no longer to lose this world, but oftentimes it is the door to the enjoyment of more of its successes and emoluments. Nay, more than this. Not a little of that very narrowness and bigotry which Jesus so scathingly rebuked in the scribe and pharisee of his day is now entrenched under cover of his name. That same worship of the letter against which he had to contend makes infallible texts of his own words to-day. The same unprogressive spirit that had no welcome for new and larger adaptations of truth to human life and society will be found often to-day along with the claim of special allegiance to his authority. So that to-day a man must sometimes part company with the Jesus of popular faith in order to follow the things which he followed and live in the spirit of his life. He must be de-christianized in order to read larger meaning into the current Christianity. He must be willing to be called heretic for the sake of a better orthodoxy to come. So it has been in the slow and painful progress of Christendom. We owe our larger interpretations of religious truth to-day to those whose bolder affirmations were counted as denials, and who were steadfast enough to be called unbelievers for the sake of a nobler belief. Every great fold has had its Arnold Winkelrieds who gathered the spears of opposition into their own breasts, to open a way for less daring spirits to follow.

And so we must give some deeper interpretation to discipleship to Jesus than is commonly given if we are to make it of much account and include those who have been most truly of his company in the past, or who are so to-day. Truth comes not at once and in full measure to any given period, and building the tombs of long-recognized prophets is quite another thing from readiness to recognize and follow the new-born, manger-cradled truth of one's own time. Whether you and I, whether those who now are most forward to "stand up for Jesus" would have owned him as he came to his own day, we may not say. We may think that we would have done so. But that particular form of opportunity lies far away in the past. It will never be ours. But Palestine had no advantages over America that we could have availed ourselves of, and eighteen centuries have not essentially changed the elements of human nature. The test for us and for all is to be seen in one's attitude towards the incoming light of his own age, his sympathy with its more humane movements, larger thought, its practical embodiment of ampler justice and right. If he cannot stand with a little minority to-day, he could hardly have done so eighteen hundred years ago.—From a recent sermon on "Confessing the Christ," by F. L. Hosmer, in the Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

House Cleaning.

I sit in my study wondering, while the sunshine falls in upon my meditation, through windows freshly cleaned, whether we think of the "house not made with hands"—the "I am," and the great amount of care needed to keep it clean, pure, righteous. Although we may brush and sweep, dust and polish the houses in which we find so much entertainment, rest from labor, time to read, pleasure with wife and children, social intercourse with friends and repose, we are doing but little in one sense of the word, if we do not take another kind of broom and sweep the cobwebs of superstition and ignorance from our minds and clean the windows of our spirit, so that God's light may shine in upon us. I bless the women for their patience, endurance and sacrifice, which make them bring the kingdom of God among us by their life and give proof of the fact that they deem godliness and cleanliness equal virtues. Their only consolation, they tell me, is to get together and compare notes. I wonder why women are compelled to do so many drudgeries, while we men grow fat bossing and using them as our valets de chambre. Imperial is precedent, and tyrannical seems marriage which anchors woman's life to drudgery or confines it to kitchen or sewing and mending room. But this is an alternative, and her drudgery is no more degrading, if such it can be, than the drudgery of man.

We are surprised to notice the amount of dirt the women get out of a house which is kept clean, so to speak. So there is always room for improvement in the soul. If mankind were always in a paradise, always virtuous, good, true, then we would remain clean. But the world is full of diversified human nature, and we are influenced by the bad and polluted, or at least tainted with sin by the vicious. Hence we must keep on sweeping the rooms of our nature and dusting our intellectual and moral furniture and keeping ourselves unspotted in the world. House cleaning is, philosophically speaking, the employment of our life. We grow tired of such discipline and play truant with ourselves only to receive more dust and dirt in our lives. House cleaning is the best preparation for the enjoyment of this world and for the appreciation of the life to come. "Dear," says one, "if we must keep our 'heavenly mansions' as clean as our earthly ones, if we must worry there about brooms, brushes, rags and dirt, I think I shall board." I guess three-fourths of humanity by their indisposition to culture in this world propose "boarding" in the next.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

Arithmetic.

If our public schools ever recognize the folly of much in the present method of studying arithmetic, it will be due to the efforts of General Francis A. Walker. His address before the school committee of Boston, of which he is a member, has just been published. He argues "that the old-fashioned readiness and correctness of ciphering have been, to a large degree, sacrificed by the methods which it is now proposed to reform; a false arithmetic has grown up and has largely crowded out of place the true arithmetic, which is nothing but the art of numbers." So much has been crowded into the present curriculums of study that something must be dropped, and General Walker believes that the newer subjects give better than arithmetic the power of generalization, afford practice in reasoning and cultivate the habit of continuous attention. Arithmetic should be restricted to that amount which is needed to give facility and accuracy in ordinary numerical operations, with a view to the use to which this power is to be put either in practical life or in subsequent and higher studies. The teaching of the metric system, which has been used as "propaganda for the promotion of legislation," should be pursued in high schools alone. Numerous technical and difficult logical puzzles have been introduced into the instruction in arithmetic, so that our children leave school very ill-prepared, in this respect, for the practical work of life. What are called exercises in arithmetic are really "exercises in logic," unsuitable for the young child. Any problems "where the preliminary statement" is difficult and out of all proportion to the numerical operations required should be abandoned.

General Walker is also a strong advocate of industrial education as strengthening the executive faculty and the creative passion; as removing a snobbish contempt for manual labor; as helping the community at large by the better industrial quality of its citizens, and as maintaining that "sense of social decency" which mends gates and windows; and lastly, as obtaining heartier support of the schools from the citizens.

K. G. W.

We share with orthodoxy our belief in God, in religion, in worship, in righteousness of life; we share with science the belief in the legitimacy of her methods for the discovery of truth; we share with ethical culture societies their supreme regard for character and conduct; we share with agnostics their profound sense of the infinity of the universe, but think it too early yet to settle the limits of knowledge; we share with materialists their respect for hard facts, and their belief that matter is good and not evil; we share with the spiritualists the belief that the life is the maker of form, and that the ordinary common sense of eyes and ears is no measure of the universe; we share with free-religionists their respect for other faiths; we share with the advocates of the religion of humanity in their high human ideals.—M. J. Savage.

WORDS spoken by one who is trying to express his thoughts and feelings, are like good seed corn,—they will grow; but words spoken by one who does not feel their value, are like frozen seed corn,—they will not grow.

w. w.

THE STUDY TABLE.

A Study of Mexico. By David A. Wells, LL.D., D.C.L. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co., 134 and 136 Wabash avenue.

The author describes the conditions of the journey, during which he made his observations in Mexico, as follows: "The journey, it may be further premised, was mainly made upon a special train, over the whole length of the 'Mexican Central Railroad,' over most of the 'Vera Cruz and City of Mexico,' and over a part of the 'Mexican National' railroads; the aggregate distance traversed within the territory of the republic being in excess of three thousand miles, the train running upon its own time, with its own equipment for eating and sleeping, and stopping long enough at every point of interest—city, town, hacienda, mine, or desert—to abundantly satisfy curiosity, and answer every immediate demand for information. It is safe, therefore, to say that such facilities for leisurely visiting and studying so much of Mexico have rarely, if ever before been granted." This journey, the author says, established two points satisfactorily,—“First, that here was a country, bordering on the United States for a distance of more than two thousand miles, which was almost as foreign to the latter, in respect to race, climate, government, manners and laws as though it belonged to another planet; and, secondly, that the people of the United States generally knew about as much of the domestic affairs of this one of their nearest neighbors as they did of those of the empire of China.” The volume treats, in eleven chapters, popular ignorance and fallacies concerning Mexico, Spanish rule and influence in the country, the invasion by Maximilian, and the condition of the people in respect to the division of the population, the power of the churches, schools, occupations, manufactures, taxation, the American railroad system in Mexico, and the prospective political relations of Mexico and the United States. The book is well issued, with large type well leaded, and good paper. An index is added. Reviewers have disagreed somewhat as to the amount of error or eccentricity in the book; but also they have agreed on its substantial value as shedding much wholesome light on the subject. Of the kind of material which a portion of Mexican history consists of, we may judge from the following: "Since the establishment of her independence in 1821, Mexico, down to the year 1884—a period of sixty-three years—has had fifty-five presidents, two emperors, and one regency, and, with some three or four exceptions, there was a violent change of the government with every new administration." Regarding our war with Mexico, called by the Mexicans the North American Invasion, as in fact it was, the author has some good remarks, which we like to read, doing some justice to the bad conduct of the United States, and the good conduct of the Mexicans in all their wretched poverty and meager equipment.

Masters of the Situation; or, Some Secrets of Success and Power. By William James Tilley, B.D. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.

This is an excellent, wholesome, stimulating, strengthening book. It contains sound sense and wise counsel well uttered. Its key-note is the importance of the man as expressed in the following: "That was a significant remark of an ancient general when about to bring on a battle. His officers endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose on account of the superior numbers of the foe; impatiently turning upon them he demanded, 'For how many men do you count me?'" This recalls Plutarch's excellent saying in his life of Coriolanus, regarding the effect on Rome of the desertion of Coriolanus to the Volsci,—“Universal wonder prevailed at the sudden and mighty revolution in the fortunes of two nations which the loss and the accession of a single man had effected.” But what makes the great force of a man? The author answers thus, "After all, have we not found the most effective genius to be the genius of hard work? Have we not seen, moreover, that even those whose great achievements seem spontaneous have been indebted for their seemingly easy triumphs to an intensity of toil and previous preparation of which their admirers little dreamed?" Regarding failure there are these good sentiments,—“Many men who have succeeded have first failed, and some of them more than once, before achieving their success. The real wisdom consists in not making the same blunder a second time. The negroes of Central Africa have a saying that a man is a fool whose sheep run away twice. There is no little philosophy underlying this. What could be finer than that saying of Macaulay's concerning Alexander the Great, ‘Often defeated in battle, yet always successful in war?’” The general topics of the 12 chapters are, Promptness, Individuality, Application, The Single Eye, Habit, Health, Enthusiasm, Manners, “Wait,” Opportunity, Genius. The chapter on Habit has the following from Lord Brougham—the italics are ours—“I trust everything under God to habit, on which in all ages the lawgiver as well as the schoolmaster has mainly placed his reliance,—habit, which makes everything easy, and casts the difficulties upon the deviation from a wonted course.” The book has a full index, is well printed in large type, and well made. We repeat that it is full of health. A feature of it that should not be omitted is its uncommon wealth of anecdotal illustration and enforcement by facts, stories and allusions, sprinkling the pages as thickly as clover in a meadow.

J. V. B.

Apotheosis of an Ideal. An Interior-Life Drama. Privately printed. Sold by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston.

The Foreword says: “The several contents of this little volume are to be looked upon as continuous parts of one ever-expanding whole, an oratorio in rhythmical speech in lieu of tune, whose transcendent theme is the divine possibilities of life.” Concerning this anonymous book we are told that the authorship at least “is a matter of no importance,” and each and all are besought to concede this. We cheerfully make the concession, as the treatment of the theme is such that those capable of catching the author's drift sufficiently to sympathize with him, will all be removed beyond the sphere in which his semi-musical meanderings can be of any interest. He speaks unto the “Silent consecrate Would-Bes,” “Tear-christened Would-Bes,” “Would-Bes up-lift from the pits of despondency, sense-spurning Would-Bes, embracing the azure, spirit dyed azure.” The action of the drama proceeds between Nameless, His Soul, His Ego, Alteria, Etheria, Adonai, Fear and Invisibles. Alteria is further described as “the indwelling divine-womanly of Nameless.”

We make these quotations and statements in no scoffing spirit, but only as explaining the former word, that those capable of understanding what the author means by all this, can write whole volumes of it for themselves, and get more good from writing than anybody can from the reading of them.

Familiar Allusions. A Hand-book of Miscellaneous Information including the names of celebrated Statues, Paintings, Palaces, Country Seats, Ruins, Churches, Ships, Streets, Clubs, Natural Curiosities and the like. Begun by William A. Wheeler. Completed and Edited by Charles G. Wheeler. Boston, Ticknor & Co.

This book, designed as a companion volume to the “Dictionary of the Noted Names of Fiction,” contains 584 pages, printed in double columns, in fine type, of useful information. As to its intent, the author says, “One only needs to glance at the pages of any prominent writer, or at the citations here given, to see how full they are of allusions to buildings, pictures, statues, streets and the like, for which the ordinary reader has no explanation at hand, and which this book aims as far as possible to explain.” That it has been successful is shown by the fact that a third edition has been published. To show its wide range of subjects, we quote the following: “Frog-Pond—A small basin of water in Boston Common, regarded by the inhabitants with an esteem disproportioned to its size.” The title of this leaves us in doubt as to whether the writer means to be jocose or not; but this extract from Holmes immediately under it, relieves us from all doubt.—“After a man begins to attack the State-House, when he gets bitter about the Frog-pond, you may be sure there is not much left of him.” “Mignon—A picture by Ary Scheffer (1795—1858) which is well-known through reproductions.” “Zealous—The. An armor-plated ship of the British navy, launched March 7, 1864.” “Port Coon Cave—A natural curiosity in the county of Antrim, Ireland. It is an extraordinary excavation in the basaltic rocks into which boats may row a long distance.” “Temple of the Sun—A ruined temple in Palmyra, Northern Palestine, and one of the finest ruins in Syria. About 100 columns are still standing.” “Child's Bank—A financial house in Fleet Street, London, celebrated as the oldest banking institution in England. Charles II, among others, kept his account here.” “Gaston de Foix—A portrait with mirrors repeating the figure, by Girolamo Savoldo, a Brescian painter. This picture is in the Louvre, Paris; and there is an original repetition of it in Hampton Court.”

It is a book that will be valuable to all readers.

Daffodils. By A. D. T. W., Boston, Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

In a dress combining tastefully cloth parchment, yellow satteen and gold ornaments comes Mrs. Adeline D. T. Whitney's latest book of verse. The flowers here gathered are simple wayside growths; they were not born on Olympus, nor have they frequent reminders of Olympus in their make-up; sweet-souled and fresh as all of them are, they were evidently born in another than the Parnassian country. Mrs. Whitney has shown slight claim to rank with even the minor poets of America. Supposing that she has no wish to be ranked with them, however, and assuming that her sole desire in her verses is to strengthen and uplift the souls of men, we can entertain for her only the highest respect. The spiritual value of this collection is greater than of almost any other book of miscellaneous poems published anywhere for many a year; while its poetical value is very slight, indeed, the thought being usually commonplace, and a sing-song, crude sort of expression prevailing. The divisions are: “By the Way,” “With the Children,” and “Especial”—sixteen pieces appearing under the first, nine under the second, and twelve under the third. From an unknown writer such a volume would be received coolly, and not even noticed by many critics. If Mrs. Whitney's metrical faculty were equal to some of her thoughts, she might give us some fine poems.

E. R. C.

The Sower. A Poem, by Augustus Currey. Illustrated. Riverside Publishing Company, Detroit, Michigan.

This poem, of fourteen verses and about as many illustrations, is explained in the dedication, which is as follows: “This simple version of the beautiful parable is dedicated to all who work for good.” Without being striking in the way of poetry, these verses evidently come from a good heart, and will no doubt reach and help others of a kindred spirit and mood. The work is very creditably done, both as to letter press and illustration.

THE third and fourth volumes of the new Riverside Edition of Robert Browning's Works have just been issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The fifth and sixth volumes, concluding the work, will appear about June first. The last volume will have a full index to all Browning's poems, together with a table of first lines. The edition has thus far met with a very favorable reception.

TICKNOR & COMPANY, of Boston, have begun the publication of a tastefully printed “Paper Series of Choice Reading,” which will comprise thirteen novels, to be issued in as many weeks through the early summer. The initial number, now before us, is the popular story of Margaret Kent, by Henry Hayes, first published in the regular $1.50 edition two or three years ago, and now offered on good paper, printed from the original plates, at fifty cents.

THE HOME.

Proverb Sermons.—I.

PROVERB:—"He that is warm, thinks all so."

The meaning of this proverb is that men walk near each other without knowing each other; and still more, that the gay and happy forget the sad, and those who have much know nothing of the pinches of those who have little. These thoughts are so common that they are found in many proverbs beside the one which I preach from. Another is, "The fat man knoweth not what the lean thinketh." My sermon shall be in two parts. First, I shall say that it is goodness not to think all warm when we are; or, what is the same thing, not to overlook that others may be cold although we are warm. Secondly, I shall say that this same kind of goodness is greatness.

First, then, think of this, that pure, warm, wide love is the best kind of goodness, and so much the best that I know not whether there can be any other kind without it; and that this best kind of goodness, which is loving goodness, or good love (for it is the same either way), is just this,—To think of the cold while we are warm, and of the sad while we are joyful, and of the poor though we be rich, and of the sick though we be well, without having to wait till we are cold, or sad, or poor, or sick, to bethink us how chills, and woes, and want, and illness feel. The Bible says this plainly; as thus,—“Be eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame;” for if we, having eyes, think all have, or having good feet, forget that some limp, how can we be eyes or feet for them? The Bible says this in another way,—“Remember them that are in bonds as bound with them,” which means, as if we were bound with them. This was the goodness of John Howard, for though he was free himself to go where he would, he could not forget that others were in prison, and his heart was so gripped with pity for them all the time, that he spent his life wandering over the world trying to make the prisons better for the sad, poor, erring people in them. Now the prisons were so bad, as still they are, and so full of cruel things and hard feelings, because the people who were outside the walls bethought them not that others were inside, and still they bethink them as little; but being free they seemed to feel just as glad as if all were free, and still so they feel. The best kind of goodness, also, was the goodness of Jesus. Have you not read how, looking on the people, he was moved with pity because they were like sheep without a shepherd? This means that as he knew what was right, and wise, and true, he was torn with pity for those who knew not, and spent his life going about teaching them, when he could win them to listen, and when they would not listen, then he pitied them the more. Many persons who have had great knowledge and have seen what the truth was, have not felt how sad it was not to know good things, but they have kept their fine thoughts to themselves; that is, as the proverb says, being warm, they thought all so. But not so did Jesus. He yearned toward the untaught. He would not be silent. He gave his life in order to teach them. Once I knew a kind-hearted woman who, whenever there was a storm and “the winds blew and the rains descended and the floods came,” and the blasts roared over the earth, never ceased thinking of sailors, and felt as if she were pitching and tumbling with them on the waters, though her house was standing stock still on the land. And a man I knew who, when he put on his great warm overcoat in bitter cold weather, said “that he buttoned in more shivers than he kept out,” because thoughts of the thin-clad, who had no such garment, pinched him more than the cold. Had not this woman and this man the kind of loving goodness which is such good goodness? I have read a story of Joseph II, of Germany, that he wished to give an office to the son of a certain count, but the count begged the emperor to give the place to another, since his son was already rich; but when the emperor still pressed him, so that at last the good count could do no less than obey, he answered,—“Sire, I consent that my son shall take the place which you honor him with, but I implore your Majesty to let the pay of it be set apart for some person less happy;” and this was done, the emperor being much moved by meeting a man who did not, according to the proverb, think all warm because he was. So the count's son did the duties of the office, but the profits were settled on the aged father of a poor family. Unlike this is a story of a farmer's wife who, looking out from her kitchen on the men in the hay-field, said, “Poor fellows! how hot it must be out there in the sun! I will go carry them a drink of cool beer.” Then going to the cellar to draw the beer, first, she herself drank a mug of the cool beverage, sitting down the while in the cellar. But when she had emptied the mug she said,—“After all, it is not so warm as I thought. The men need no beer.” And so the good housewife returned to her work comforted.

I think that not many persons mean to hurt others. Of all the hard things, painful, bad, cruel things in the world, only a little part is done on purpose; very few persons say, “Go to, now, I will hurt somebody;” yet, how many are hurt! This is because the warm think all warm, or else think nothing; and the glad overlook that any may be sad. There is a French saying, “C'est une chose terrible d'être heureux.” It is a terrible thing to be happy. What, indeed, can be more dreadful than to be happy, or anything else, if it shut us off from all the world, so that we know nothing and feel nothing but our own good fortune. But this is the danger of being happy, and so many fall into this snare that the proverb was made, “He that is warm, thinks all so.”

But now if we change the proverb and say, He that is cold, thinks all so,—will this be true, too? No, far from true. For when anyone is cold he is likely to think very quickly that others are warm, and often he falls to envying them, and being angry toward them, even when it is his own fault that he is cold; and he hates them for being better off than he is, even when it is his own bad deeds or wastes or idleness that have made him wretched. Thus pleasure makes one kind of ignorance, pain another. Happiness makes people heedless of others, and unhappiness unjust to others; and both these are kinds of selfishness. Thus you see how sad this proverb is when it is true of any one. If the cold but thought all cold, as the warm think all warm, it would not be so bad; for then, at least, there would be peace; but now while the warm are placid and thoughtless, the cold are envious and angry, so that a strife is stirred up and bitter feelings rage.

Secondly, I have to say that to think, while warm, of the cold, while happy, of the unhappy—this is not only goodness but greatness. Now this is seen in two ways. First, if we think all warm and happy because we are, is not this as if we saw our own image everywhere, having made everything a kind of looking-glass in which we see only ourselves? And what is this but vanity? And what is vanity but a weak and foolish mistake about ourselves? Now strength and greatness lie in not making mistakes; and still more in not making the worst mistakes, which are errors about ourselves,—thinking of ourselves too highly, and pushing into chief and main places. And how can we fall more into such errors than by thinking of ourselves all the time, or by never thinking of others nor knowing how they feel? Mistakes about ourselves are the worst mistakes, because we use ourselves in everything. If a man mistake about a saw, it hurts him only when he has to use the saw; and so with every other tool. But if he mistake about himself, this hinders him when he uses any tool, or does anything whatever. Thus vanity is a very bad mistake—never firmness and greatness, but weakness and slackness; and what can be greater vanity than always to think that others feel as we do, or never to think that they feel otherwise? I have read of an ancient preacher who, on attending a meeting of ministers, talked all the time until the meeting ended, when he remarked blithely, “Well, brethren, we must part, this has been an uncommonly interesting meeting.” And he had no thought what a silly figure he cut. Surely it was not a greatness but a littleness. I have read of a musician who, being asked to play, played three hours without stopping, while the company dropped away, one by one. At last, when he ceased playing, late in the night, he rose from the stool and, being as short-sighted in his eyes as in his mind, bowed all round to the empty chairs, thinking the silence was caused by the emotion of his hearers. Here was another man after the fashion of the proverb, "He that is warm thinks all so." Now, as vanity was the cause of his blindness, and as vanity is not greatness but littleness, and not knowledge but ignorance, so to be such a man as the proverb describes is as little to be great and strong as good and loving. But, if we look at meekness or lowliness of spirit, what is this but not to be thinking of ourselves, or (the same thing) what but to be thinking of others?—for sure it is that we must be thinking of somewhat, and if not of ourselves, then the more and better of others. This, I say, is the same as meekness or lowliness—a virtue which wise men have thought the spring of all other graces, and also of greatness. One sage man has likened it to a foundation on which the whole house rests, and the deeper it is digged and laid, the higher and grander the house may rise; and another has said meekness is the road to power, because to improvement. Whoever hath an eye for others never will think all warm because he is; and this goodness soon gathers greatness; (for so I may say) the heart and the mind are fellow-doors, and one cannot open but the other must follow, making a wide space for knowledge to come in; thus many facts are ushered, many things received and among them great things, and all mingle in a noble company of thoughts. This is to live in a mansion of greatness.

But this is shown in another way, as I have said. Of all powers of the mind, what is greater than the image-making power, called imagination? This is what makes the greatest poets, painters, musicians. This power takes the things we know and weaves them into great dreams, visions, or scenes, that never we have beheld with the eye, but that lie and shine in the mind. It is a splendid, glorious, grand power. Now, when one that is warm thinks all so, it is because he makes no images in his mind; he has no power to do this; he can take things only as they come, but they cannot lead him to anything. He is like a man surrounded by pots of beautiful paints and colors, but they stay there, each in its little pot. He has no cunning to put them together in a picture. But one who, being warm, bethinks him of the chills and damps which others are in, and feels them, makes images in his mind. He has the greatness and power which imagination is. This links him to all things on the earth, shows him things that never he has seen, and gives him great knowledge. This was the greatness of mind that went with the goodness of soul in the woman to whom a storm brought visions of sailors, though never she had been at sea; and in the man whose warm garments woke shapes of the unclad, though never he had lacked clothing. So if a man like him of the proverb, who, being warm, thinks all so, pass a poor little lad by the wayside, he will see no more than just the boy, and but little of him, small worth, or knowledge, or greatness, in that. But if a man, who is not like him of the proverb, meet the lad, he will follow him in mind to his living-place, and eating-place, and sleeping-place, and have pictures of his life, which gives the man a greatness, a scope, a power. For then his heart opens to an inmate, his mind to a thought, and his hand for giving help if he can.

Beware of him of the proverb that, being warm, thinks all so. I mean not only beware of consorting with such. That would be a sorry end of my discourse; a sermon is but a poor wayfarer if it come not home. O, not only shun him of the proverb, but shun being such; and truly, if thou thyself art not such a one as thinks all warm if he be, thou wilt be sought little by those that are. I know not what such a one is good for; not for himself—he is too blind; not for a friend—he is too selfish; not for his country—he is too cold; not for mankind—he is too paltry.

J. V. B.

He who meets his hardships at the beginning of his career, may conquer them; but he that meets them further on, is likely to be conquered by them.

POEMS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE

PRESS OPINIONS.

Nothing is more characteristic of Mr. Blake's poetry than a singular purity of thought and style. * * * We recommend the volume as a whole to all who wish to see a novel landscape and breathe a fresh invigorating air.—John W Chadwick, in the Index.

Mr. Blake's poetry is the expression of a sincere, sympathetic and beautiful mind; it is gratefully unconventional, and it abounds with noble thoughts.—Edwin D. Mead, in the Christian Register.

A superbly printed and bound collection of the poetical works of a Western author who is deserving of even greater popularity than he has attained.—Wisconsin State Journal.

The verse is for the most part simple and graceful, and some of the poems disclose a deep poetic insight.—Chicago Evening Journal.

A new essayist and a new poet, and strange to say, both in the same man; especially strange when we are compelled to add that when we read the essays, he seems a born essayist, and when we read the poems, he seems a born poet.—New York Evangelist.

One volume, 12mo., 188 pages. Cloth, dark red polished top, uncut edges. Price $1.00. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & Co., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

ESSAYS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE.

SUBJECTS:—Choice, Faculty, Public Education, Happiness and Time, Vainglory, Luck, Seeing Good Things, Side Lights of Intelligence, Individuality, Questions of Heroism, Praising, Censure, Flattery, Government, Handwriting, Knowledge, Meditation, Common Sense, Requital, Anger, Judgment of Others, Patience, Enemies, Immortal Life, Death, Emergency, Conscience Character as a Work, Superiority.

The volume of this [gnomic] wisdom is properly the world's Bible, and every sentence, every fragment of it is precious beyond price. Mr. Blake has given us in this little book the condensed result of the thought of his best hours—hours spent, and a great many of them, in study, reflection, observation, calm, careful meditation upon the great problems of life and of being. The fruit is a rare work of wisdom; a neat volume full to the brim of enrichment, suggestion, stimulus; a very encheiridion, a vademecum to carry amid all passages, the varied experiences and exposures of our earthly life. Every one will find something here to feed upon, pemmican to carry for the waste and solitary places in his journey—song of conquest, notes of the battle cry for successful conflict and victory.—Charles D. B. Mills in Unity.

The essays of Mr. Blake will surprise and delight all lovers of good English prose. He has made a contribution of lasting value to our literature in a form so condensed and so original as to inevitably attract and hold the attention of thoughtful readers. One is reminded not only by the brevity of these essays, but by the cast and mould of the sentences, and the plain, fine, discriminating language, of Bacon's condensed wit and sense. The quaint, clear English, like that which has come down to us from other days, is, however, the only thing in the book that is not modern. This writer reflects the culture of to-day. He respects individuality; he is humane; he is not afraid of the truth; he believes in the future, and that justice and mercy must prevail.—Chicago Tribune.

The quality of these essays which impresses us throughout is one for which we can find no better word than charm. There is something in their manner which is pleasing and delightful to a very high degree. Their quaintness, their archaic simplicity of manner and turn of phrase, have much to do with this. Very likely a critic here and there will say that the style is artificial and affected, but if the impeachment cannot be denied, it is certain that the artificiality is agreeable, and the affectation wonderfully pleasant. We do not imagine that Mr. Blake has chosen any of the great essayists for a model. But it is evident that, like all the essayists, he is a lover of his kind, that he has read them carefully and lovingly, and some of the colors from their palettes have been floated off upon his own. Perhaps it is Bacon more than any other who is subtly echoed here and there. But Mr. Blake is a lover of them all, and quotes from them with generous admiration. Nor has he hesitated, in two or three instances, to revert to subjects which the genius of Bacon has already touched and beautified—praise, anger, death, vainglory. It would be a daring thing to say that Mr. Blake's essays on these subjects are much better than those of "the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind," but "a consensus of the competent" would probably assign to them a greater value relatively to the needs and problems of the present time.—The Index.

1 volume, 216 pages, including full Index. Cloth, dark-red polished top, uncut edges. Price $1.00. For sale by the trade, or mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & Co., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Hinsdale, Ill.—The following bond of union has lately been adopted by the new Unity church:

"The object of this society shall be to provide for public religious worship and instructions, and for such charitable and benevolent activities as belong to a religious society.

"Our Creed—The Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man.

"Our Covenant—To make an earnest effort to live a true, virtuous and upright life.

"Our Religion—To seek the attainment of a complete and perfected social, intellectual and moral status in ourselves and in society.

"Our Aim—To be right in spirit and to do right in deed."

Chicago.—At the union teachers' meeting, Monday noon, Mr. Jones led. The lesson consisted of the first speech of Eliphaz and the reply, in the book of Job. Mr. Jones gave the movement of the drama and a list of the dramatis personae, six in number; Jehovah, Satan, his officer, Job, his three aged friends and advisers and the young Elihu. The question at issue, is how to account for the affliction of Job. The friends insisted that it was penalty for sin. Job was firm in his integrity. His attitude toward the problem was that of an agnostic, and the speech of Jehovah at the close seemed to commend and intensify that attitude of the finite man toward the Infinite. Mr. Utter thought the argument of Job was not always consistent, and Mr. Blake suggested that the whole composition might be arranged into dialogues, instead of the long alternating monologues, and thus be made more readily intelligible.

—The class in All Souls church which, during the past winter, has been studying Victor Hugo's celebrated novel, "Les Misérables," ended the season Thursday evening, May 12th, by a graphic representation in costume of the various characters in the book. All who were present on the occasion witnessed a veritable treat. The reading and analysis of this greatest of the studies of the poor and miserable classes of society has been full of pleasure, interest and thought to all who have been fortunate enough to attend this section of Unity club. Many new lessons of life have been learned thereby. The different characters of the novel were assigned to different members of the class, and each member seemed to vie with the others in the effort to portray well and truly the idea of the part assigned, in manner, dress and figure. Although all of the characters were not taken, some forty or fifty were represented in costume. The costumes were very effective. The Bishop of D—, Madame Magloire, Jean Valjean, Javert, Marius, Thénardier, Madame Thénardier, Gavroche, Cosette, Sister Simplicie, Claquesous, and indeed all of the others, seemed natural as life, and their vivid representations aided very greatly in stamping their characters and peculiarities upon the minds of all those who had the good fortune to be present. The various characters were introduced singly and in groups by Rev. J. L. Jones in a few suitable remarks. It is certainly a very good thing to thus afford the members of the club an opportunity of exhibiting their realization of the characters which have been studied, and the idea should be encouraged.

—The last meeting of the Chicago Women's Unitarian Association was held on Thursday, April 28th, at All Souls church. There were 110 ladies present. Mrs. J. R. Effinger gave a paper on "My Creed," which was composed of the following articles:

1. One Lord there is all Lords above.
2. He is Truth.
3. He is Love.
4. The wages of sin is death.
5. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.
6. I believe in Life Everlasting.

The influence exerted by the paper was to make all its hearers desirous of subscribing to such a beautiful "Creed" as this. Two readings followed the paper. Whittier's poem "Eternal Goodness," was read by Mrs. Utter, and Lowell's "Ambrose," by Mrs. Marean. Brief remarks were made by Mrs. Shears, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Heywood, Mrs. Bartlett, Mrs. Loveday and others. The last meeting for this season will be held Thursday, May 26th, at Unity church. Mrs. S. W. Conger will be the leader with a paper on "Alice and Phoebe Cary," being the third in the course on "Poets of the Liberal Faith."

Boston Notes.—Hon. John D. Long will preside at the A. U. A. anniversary festival.

—At the union meeting of Universalist and Unitarian ministers, Rev. J. F. Moors, Unitarian state missionary, stated that Rev. Mr. Start, the Universalist state missionary, will soon preach to the new Unitarian society in Pittsfield, Mass., and will visit his denominational friends in that city and urge them to join Mr. Moors' movement there.

—Rev. Mr. Moors will soon preach to the new Universalist society in Amherst, Mass., and will visit his friends in that town and urge them to assist in Mr. Start's new church.

—Rev. A. A. Miner said that although it is plain to him that the two liberal denominations cannot join in the same creed, or method, yet they may run on contiguous parallel lines and be personally and as co-reformers fast friends.

—Rev. Edward E. Hale said we need to meet church-going people on their own ground—not be too learned—not be so careful to exhibit the Harvard culture as to preach religion and to open affections and a helping hand. Assume that all denominations are advancing in reasonable religious beliefs and keep on declaring our articles of faith and as well our negations.

—Rev. Dr. Emerson said he always preached to his Universalist congregation in their vernacular; he knew that he was always plainly understood.

—Rev. E. A. Horten said we must keep on the offensive in sectarian warfare,—for victory comes to us slowly. Citizens in a new country like our western states are busy developing land and mines, supplying new cities with water, gas, good sewerage, schools, libraries, and they accept traditional religion until they have leisure to think carefully about church tenets and religious reforms. Then he answered the question, "Why does not liberal Christianity spread like wildfire over our western states?" About his own field of labor he saw signs of advancing churches. On the Back Bay he can count six confessedly liberal churches with liberal minded pastors, one half of whom are not Universalist or Unitarian.

—The traditional annual essay and collation of visiting ministers on anniversary week with the minister of Doctor Channing's church,—in vogue in the times of Doctor Channing, Doctor Gannett and Rev. J. J. W. Ware—are now continued at the house of Rev. Brooke Herford.

Charleston, S. C.—"How can we be otherwise than plucky and hopeful when all the churches of the denomination the whole country over rise up to put a new heart in us! On Aug. 25, 1885, we were shattered and shredded by a whipping and twisting cyclone. But with a great effort at home, and the help of friends abroad, we got back into the restored church on April 16, 1886, and exulted over the storm. In four months only, a year and a week from the cyclone, i. e. Aug. 31, 1886, the earthquake demolished us ten times more. Now, in a year and a week from our former return, April 24, we are "at home" once more. And now we pray the staying of the annual visitation. We trust this thing is not going to be kept up. The first exhausted ourselves, the second has exhausted our right to appeal to the aid of our friends. With that magnificent outpouring at the Saratoga conference, we are once more so far restored as to resume services in the church. The outward beauty of the church is greatly simplified, and iron rods and bars are built into every weak place. More "ribs" are now in that tower than were in the original man before the feminine theft was made. We took advantage of Secretary Reynolds being in New Orleans, in attendance at the meeting of the southern conference, and on his return he tarried and spoke for us the opening and cheering word. And his words, both morning and evening, were precisely such as were good for the occasion—tender, yet strong and positive; considerate, yet stimulating and urgent."

And at the service, they sang the following hymn, written by the pastor, E. C. L. Browne, to utter the experience and feeling of the church:

Thy hand, O Lord, hath touched our holy place,
And heart and altar fell in wreck and pain:
Thy hand hath touched the healing fountains of love,
And heart and fane rise strong and fair again.

Father, its walls are love, its roof is praise,
Its clustering arches type a union strong;
The offerings of a continent here voice
A common faith, and break in grateful song.

Now touch once more, O dread and sacred hand!
The house and hearts that thy anointing wait—
Touch now to strength, touch to abiding peace,
And to a holier service consecrate!

Brookes Fund.—Professor Huidekoper, of Meadville, trustee of the above fund, has published a leaflet giving interesting extracts from the recipients of libraries from this fund during 1886. From this circular we learn that the whole number of ministers supplied from the Brookes fund, during 1886, was one hundred and fifty-five, representing about twenty-seven different denominations, and located in twenty-five states and territories, besides eight "libraries" given from other funds.

POZZONI'S
MEDICATED
COMPLEXION
POWDER.
Imparts brilliant transparency to the skin. Removes all pimples, freckles and discolorations. For sale by all first-class druggists, or mailed for 50 cts. In stamps by J. A. POZZONI, St. Louis, Mo.

BARLOW'S INDICO BLUE.
Its merits as a WASH BLUE have been fully tested and endorsed by thousands of housekeepers. Your grocer ought to have it on sale. Ask him for it. D. S. WILTBERGER, Prop., 233 N. Second St. Phil. Pa.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, MAY 28, 1887.

[NUMBER 13.]

EDITORIAL.

Conference Notes.

THE meetings of last week make the eighteenth anniversary of the Western Unitarian Conference in regular succession, that the senior editor of this paper has attended; and he believes the records will show that, in the number of societies represented and in voting power, it is among the larger known during that time. It is also quite safe to say, that never before was the general attendance of friends, so prompt, regular and attentive. Each of eight long sessions was a meeting of goodly audience measured by the standard of western Unitarians, and of eager listening measured by the standard of any ears. The ninth and closing session, that of the Sunday-school society, falls on Friday when many of the delegates are already on their homeward journey, so that there, with faces fewer, we are used to the freest, gladdest time of all.

AMONG the places and societies represented, we recall the following,—those printed in italics not being represented officially. Possibly there were others, and we shall be glad to revise the list in our next number, through the help of our readers.—Minneapolis and St. Paul, in Minnesota; Cooksville, Helena, Janesville, Kenosha, Madison, and Milwaukee, in Wisconsin; Ann Arbor, Detroit, Grand Rapids, Jackson, in Michigan; Cincinnati and Cleveland, Ohio; Hobart, Indiana; Alton, Buda, Geneseo, Geneva, Hinsdale, Quincy, Sheffield, in Illinois, and First church, Unity, Third, and All Souls' churches, of Chicago; Algona, Davenport, Des Moines, Humboldt, Moline, Rock Rapids, Sioux City, in Iowa; Church of the Messiah, and Church of the Unity, of St. Louis, and St. Joseph, in Missouri; Lawrence and Topeka, in Kansas; Omaha, in Nebraska; Denver, in Colorado. In all, thirty churches officially represented; and one hundred and nine accredited delegates, including officers of associate organizations reporting themselves as entitled to vote. Around these voters gathered many friends and co-workers, chiefly from this city and its neighborhood.

NUMBERS are relative. We suppose that when Jesus had found his twelfth disciple, he took heart and felt strong over his goodly sized band, while all the rest of Galilee laughed at the paltry dozen of fishermen. To the friendly eyes of a brother fresh from the larger Conferences in the east, the meeting of the W. U. C. seemed very small, and its concerns on that account less significant than they seem to some of us. But when he has been in the west a dozen years, and has found the Holy Spirit in the midst of the little bands, that come hundreds of miles to confer together in companies numbered only by a few scores, and sometimes by the apostolic dozens, he will be less affected by numbers and more by the heart-hunger and the spirit of prophecy that may be represented. When you see an earnest sister from Denver comparing notes with a worker in Illinois or Michigan, a brother from Missouri in communication with one from Minnesota, it enlarges the heart and gives one a sense of great possibilities and fullness of opportunity.

AMONG the faces seen at the Conference, for the first time, were those of Revs. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul; C. B. Roberts, of St. Joseph; J. B. Frost, of Alton; Joseph Waite, of Janesville; Reed Stuart, of Detroit; C. F. Elliott, of Jackson, Mich., and C. F. Bradley, of Quincy, Ill. Seven recruits, each ready and eager to join in the untrammelled freedom of a body that was last week re-baptized for the missionary work of spreading the religion of character and the piety found in Truth, Righteousness and Love, and the aspirations that spring therefrom.

THREE women preachers were present, and materials out of which to make a dozen more.

THE Christian Register, the Unitarian Review and the Unitarian were all represented at the Conference by their editors. The whole editorial force of UNITY was on hand. If Brother Douthit, of Best Words, had only been there—and he would have been most welcome—the main editorial forces of the denomination could have shaken hands with one another. Some day we hope to have at the Western Conference an editorial picnic.

THE wide range of the Conference fellowship and of the interest it involves, was shown not only by breadth of territory represented, but by the spiritual latitude and longitude of those in attendance. At different times we saw the faces of Rabbi Hirsch, a Jew; William Salter, of the Ethical Culture society; Mr. Adams; Mr. Gardner, Miss Chapin and Miss Kollock, Universalist ministers of Chicago and the suburbs; Rev. Mr. Williams, of the Congregational church, author of the now famous resolution of sympathy with the bereaved family of Beecher; Rev. Mr. Caldwell, of the Methodist fellowship; Colonel Bundy, editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal; Mrs. Andrews, of the Union Signal, and one of the leaders of the W. C. T. U. in the country; not to forget Doctor Thomas, of the People's Church, Chicago, and Rev. Amos Crum (Universalist) of Dubuque, whose voices were heard from the platform.

NEVER before did the Western Conference adjourn with all possible deficit for the coming year already guaranteed. This, too, although $500 additional expense was involved in the securing of the whole time, instead of the three-fifths time of our Secretary, Mr. Effinger. A guaranty fund of $1800, outside of the usual contributions expected from the churches, was subscribed on the spot. We hope UNITY readers as individuals, and the churches not yet heard from, will promptly raise this fund to $2500; for the larger the fund, the lighter the pro rata amounts at the end of the year falling on each helper. Pledges sent to us will be handed over to the treasurer.

NINE sessions, fourteen papers, four sermons and addresses, twelve or more reports, one long discussion concerning a Declaration of Fellowship and Faith,—and still the delegates went home alive, well, happy, and with the holy spirit of work more than ever upon them.

THE hospitality extended to the meetings was what might be expected from the church which calls itself "All Souls." Body as well as soul, we were taken in and cared for by generous hands. The quaint and pretty building, which is parson's home above, church-home in the middle, and refectory beneath, was properly wondered at and praised. And all the Conference was glad that this year's invitation beckoned whither it did—to the church which Mr. Jones and his people dedicated when the leaves were red last fall. The first green leaves see this use made of it. The youngest and the smallest of our churches in Chicago has a heart of welcome big as that which the Conference has so often tested in the older and the larger congregations.

"I DON'T deny the value of the American Sunday-school, though I presume that its value is greater for the teachers than for the pupils," says Mr. Hugenholtz, in his Conference paper, to be found on another page. If well based,—and possibly it is,—that presumption is a mild thunder-clap of condemnation of our system, and should set us to thinking. It is good to see ourselves as strangers see us, especially when the strangers are friends and fellow-workers; so fail not to read what Mr. H. says of our "Sunday-schools," our "church social," our "pew system," and our "quacks' paradise." And it is good to note how others go to work to reach the same ends as ours, especially when these others are experts of their own way: so note how in his Free Holland church at Grand Rapids they make the two ends meet financially, granting no privilege to the rich man which the poorest does not share; and how solidly the church is founded in the religious instruction of the young; and how real a dignity they make church-membership. Think of the liberal ministers in Holland spending from ten to twenty-four hours a week in teaching the children, and of that school at Amsterdam with its graded five years' course. Our way cannot be their way in all these matters, but our way might be wiser if it were more like their way in each and every point. Mr. Hugenholtz comes from those liberals of Holland, whom Kuenen and Tiele represent in scholarship, and who have sent us, in English translation, "The Bible for Learners." His Grand Rapids church, in Michigan, is in the center of our Holland folk, as Mr. Janson's, at Minneapolis, is at the center of Norwegian America; and the two men are doing much the same work in unwinding the Calvinistic creed from around their countrymen. It is the church to which our National Conference, last September, sent its thousand-dollar greeting.

SEVERAL of the Conference guests added value to the meetings by their papers or addresses. Doctor Thomas of Chicago, always welcome to an audience of western liberals, and Rev. Mr. Crum, of Dubuque, spoke strong words in favor of broad fellowship in things religious. Mr. W. W. Clay, one of the Chicago architects, told us how our tabernacles should be built. Williams Salter, of the Ethical Society, by a few words deepened the feeling with which we had been listening to Mr. Crother's paper about Prayer.

Once we became Pagans. The paper on Celsus, the sturdy old Greek opponent of Christianity, given to the Conference by Rev. S. J. Barrows, editor of the Christian Register, was an admirable piece of work, and though long, none too long, for the dignity of the subject required the length, and the audience was not tired. It gave one a curious feeling, and also roused a sense of the sympathetic bond running through all the world in all ages, to hear from Mr. Barrows the words of Celsus and of his critic Origen, showing that the same problems which now perplex us, the same objections to Christianity and the same answers to them which now meet us, were active so long ago; showing, too, how earnestly the old objector, representing the classic rationalism, was devoted to what he thought the truth and the good of his country and of the world, in his strictures on what was to him the new-fangled folly of Christianity. Mr. Barrows gave us a wonderfully good feeling toward Celsus, and his concluding pages rose into an eloquent glow as he depicted how Origen and Celsus might be conceived to meet and converse, if suddenly they were restored to life at the present time.

Joseph Henry Allen, of Cambridge, Mass., whose presence was a beaming cheerfulness and help to us, gave us a mental and moral lift in an earnest address upon Prayer. Its heartiness, warmth and simple piety was itself an act of worship. It was moving to the heart, but not less inspiring to the mind, to hear our friend speak of the "mystery of prayer." But life, he said, was full of mysteries, of which prayer was only one. No possible exercise of understanding can span the intellectual difficulties which prayer presents; but when the eyes are closed, the world and self forgotten for the moment, and thought and feeling coming forth in words of prayer, then what a mighty reality it is! We shall see the strong man, who can not answer one question about it addressed to his understanding, nevertheless so full of that reality that the tears course down both cheeks, and a great strength and joy also awake in his soul where that which is inexpressible has happened.

The paper on "Bible-class Instruction in Sunday-schools," read before the session of the Sunday-school society by Prof. Alexander Kerr, of the Wisconsin State University at Madison, contained, amid much other wisdom, an excellent practical caution to ministers and others who lead Bible-classes; this, namely, that the teacher must strenuously resist the inroads of the superintendent who descends upon the Bible-class for some teacher to supply a vacant place. Professor Kerr asks how a class in Euripides would prosper, if every week or two the brightest and best scholars in the class were forcibly taken away to serve as tutors. Now it is always on the conversers, those who think of the lesson beforehand and have questions to ask and points to raise—always on these, we say, who are the very life of the Bible-class, that the superintendent alights, to drag them off to supply for the hour the place of absent teachers. What is the consequence? Why, that week after week the Bible-class is stripped of its most living and helpful members—a process which leads at last to the extinction of the class. Let Bible-class teachers take heed to this wisdom and resist the superintendent in his piracies on their domains. This may have the additional good result of inspiring more punctuality on all teachers.

THE following letter has interest as the expression of one of our Unitarian ministers, many years in the ministry, and now occupying a difficult and responsible post without the limits of the Western Conference. It reached Chicago the morning after the Conference, and by the person receiving it was shown to a few friends of the writer. Though not written for publication, it suggests the currents of outside sympathy, and will interest many:

My dear H. and the rest of the brethren:—No doubt you are now in the midst of Conference interests. There are some in attendance with you who do not appear to sight, and are not counted on the list of accredited delegates. The inspiration of your large thought, the pulses of your earnestness, and the strength of your fidelity, reach far and affect those that by distance and different condition are not counted in your fellowship.

It is impossible for me not to feel anxious for the way the Western Conference holds its high position. If with the same generosity and gentleness as in the past year, the same consecrated up-looking, the influence cannot fail to be greatly helpful to the scattered fellow-believers and to the great work we all have at heart.

If the service of "truth, righteousness and love" is not following Jesus, it certainly is following the things he followed. How good to follow him so closely as to find ourselves walking by his side!

Yours for freedom, fellowship and character in religion, and for that faith that makes faithful.

The Story of the Western Conference Meeting of 1887.

The thirty-third annual session of the Western Unitarian Conference was held in All Souls' church, Chicago, May 17-19. The discussion carried on throughout the year has brought us to this session with even more than usual eagerness; and the fact that the youngest of our Chicago churches was host, welcoming us to the new and pleasant church-home and parsonage, in whose construction so many have had share, seemed to give a peculiarly social and friendly character to the meetings. We missed some familiar faces at this Conference that heretofore we have been accustomed to greet, and whose presence we all wanted. But, on the whole, the attendance of delegates was very good,—larger than that of last year. Of friends from the east, we had Prof. J. H. Allen, of Cambridge, and Rev. S. J. Barrows, of Boston, if indeed the editor of the Christian Register does not belong rather to the whole country, into all parts of which his weekly word carries its help and cheer.

We cannot here speak of the many meetings in detail. Full reports will appear in the next, the Conference number of UNITY, and to that number we defer the story of the Women's Conference, and the Sunday-school Society's meetings.

The general report of Secretary Effinger showed that the work at our Chicago headquarters and in the field had been carried on much as usual, in proportion to the three-fifths time for which he had been engaged by the Conference. As a friend from the east said, "That report of work actually done is the best possible vindication of the Conference against the attacks that have been made upon it."

The report of the treasurer, J. B. Galloway, showed diminished contributions from the churches, attributable to the discussion and misunderstanding following upon the Cincinnati votes of a year ago; but the deficiency has been covered by a guaranty fund, subscribed early in the year, and the Conference closes the year without debt.

The various papers and addresses given, quite maintained the standard of any past session, both for practical help, and for mental quickening. Mr. Simmons' opening word, in the sermon of Tuesday evening, was an admirable setting forth of God-likeness in human conduct and character, a high interpretation of "The Divine Unity", and a sort of Imitatio Dei for every-day life. The morning devotional meetings seemed to us very hearty and helpful in their hymns and prayers and talk. The key-note of that of Wednesday, led by Mr. Hunting, was the fellowship born of our deeper human needs and longings and trusts; that of the Thursday meeting, led by Miss Marion Murdock, courage and earnestness in life. The platform meeting of Wednesday evening introduced to us the new minister of our church in Detroit, Rev. Reed Stuart, in whom we recognized a poet and seer of spiritual things, also Rev. Amos Crum, our Universalist brother of Dubuque, whom all were glad to hear, and Rev. Dr. Thomas, whom we remembered at our meeting in 1884, and were all the gladder to hear him again. The general theme was church union, and the addresses by their thought and spirit were a prophecy of the larger fellowship now coming and to come. On Wednesday afternoon, Mr. W. W. Clay, of Chicago, next gave us a historic glimpse of "Church Architecture." Rev. F. W. N. Hugenholz gave the very suggestive paper printed on another page. Then Mr. Crothers, the new minister of our church in St. Paul, read a tender and thoughtful discourse upon "Prayer," and the remarks that followed from Professor Allen and Mr. William M. Salter, leader of the Ethical Culture society, in Chicago, who were called upon by President Shorey, made this hour one to be remembered, binding by its triple utterances, as with a three-fold cord, all who listened in one felt fellowship. Mr. Barrows' "New Study of Celsus," on Thursday afternoon, was an exceedingly clear and instructive review of this critic of the Christianity current in his time, and served as a text for many thoughts applicable to our own day. That evening we gathered again to listen to Rev. Mary A. Safford and Rev. Joseph Waite, our minister in Janesville, who spoke upon "New Grounds and Reasons for Church-Going," among which of course were such old grounds and reasons as outlast change. The evening closed with a pleasant reunion wherein the members of "All Souls" crowned their days of generous hospitality.

The meeting of Thursday forenoon, by vote of the board of directors at their March meeting, had been left open on the programme for "a discussion of such matters relating to Fellowship and Organization as may be introduced." The board itself had no resolution to introduce. Its only official action during the year touching the action at Cincinnati had been its circular letter sent to the churches last July, and by that it stood. But it did not wish to prevent discussion, if any persons desired to introduce it, and the board knew there were some who did. Accordingly the Thursday morning meeting was looked forward to with interest by those within the Conference and friends outside. A request had been offered the day before by Rev. E. I. Galvin that "leave be granted to the executive committee of the Western Unitarian Association to present to the members of this Conference a printed address in the interests of harmony and co-operation." The request was granted, and copies had been placed in the rack at the door for distribution. The address incorporated the recent report of the committee of the board of the A. U. A. about their visit to Chicago to confer with the Western Conference and the Association, and argued against any such plan as Mr. Gannett was expected to propose.

The following resolution offered by Mr. Gannett, and which had also been submitted to the Conference in printed form on Wednesday afternoon, came first before the meeting:

Resolved, THAT, WHILE THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE HAS NEITHER THE WISH NOR THE RIGHT TO BIND A SINGLE MEMBER BY DECLARATIONS CONCERNING FELLOWSHIP OR DOCTRINE, IT YET THINKS SOME PRACTICAL GOOD MAY BE DONE BY SETTING FORTH IN SIMPLE WORDS THE THINGS MOST COMMONLY BELIEVED TO DAY AMONG US,—THE STATEMENT BEING ALWAYS OPEN TO RE-STATEMENT, AND TO BE REGARDED ONLY AS THE THOUGHT OF THE MAJORITY.

Therefore, SPEAKING IN THE SPIRIT AND UNDERSTANDING ABOVE SET FORTH, WE, DELEGATES OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CHURCHES IN CONFERENCE ASSEMBLED AT CHICAGO, MAY 19, 1887, DECLARE OUR FELLOWSHIP TO BE CONDITIONED ON NO DOCTRINAL TESTS, AND WELCOME ALL WHO WISH TO JOIN US TO HELP ESTABLISH TRUTH AND RIGHTEOUSNESS AND LOVE IN THE WORLD.

AND, INASMUCH AS MANY PEOPLE WISH TO KNOW WHAT UNITARIANISM COMMONLY STANDS FOR, SPEAKING ALWAYS IN THE SPIRIT ABOVE SET FORTH WE MAKE THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT OF ITS PAST HISTORY AND OUR PRESENT FAITHS.

To this was appended the "statement," essentially the one printed not long since in UNITY (April 16), summing up "our history," "our fellowship," "our doctrines,"—omitted here, as it will appear again next week in the official report.

The following resolution was then offered as a substitute for Mr. Gannett's resolution and "statement": "Whereas, by virtue of its act of incorporation, the Western Unitarian Conference exists for the purpose of promoting the interests of the churches associated in it; and whereas, according to the principles of Congregationalism, all questions of doctrine and fellowship, so far as the latter may be limited by or hinge upon the former, pertain to the individual churches and can be decided only by them; therefore

"Resolved, that any action on these questions is beyond the province of this Conference, and consequently null and void."

Mr. Gannett spoke to the first resolution, Mr. Utter to the substitute, and a general debate followed, two hours long, in which eighteen or twenty speakers took part. The discussion was direct and earnest, but throughout it all there was a thoroughly good and friendly spirit. Not one hurting word was said. No stranger present could have felt that these men and women were other than of one fellowship in head and at heart. The substitute was lost. Other slight amendments were offered and lost. And then the first resolution and "statement" was adopted by a vote of fifty-nine to thirteen.

Then came a second important matter in two resolutions offered, the first by Mr. Utter, and the second by Mr. Hunting, which, it is hoped, may lead to closer co-operation and greater energy in all our western missionary work. Mr. Utter proposed a general missionary board to consist, if agreeable to the several bodies, of the secretaries of the A. U. A., the W. U. C., and the state conferences within the boundaries of the Western Conference, with the addition, perhaps, of the missionaries at work within this territory; said board to have consultative and advisory power in regard to all missionary work within the limits of the Western Conference, its recommendations to be honored by the executive boards of the several organizations so far as seems possible and right to them. This resolution was unanimously adopted and a committee of three, Messrs. Utter, Effinger, and Judy, was appointed to act for the Conference to this end.

Mr. Hunting's resolution, also unanimously adopted, was as follows:

"Resolved: That the interest of the Western Unitarian Conference is identical with the American Unitarian Association in everything pertaining to the missionary work to be done; that their cause is our cause; that we know no east nor west in the grand work of spiritual emancipation which this time demands of us; and we extend to the American Unitarian Association a fraternal hand and a consecrated heart, and ask their co-operation as in years past in the propagation of Unitarianism in the west."

Three or four other resolutions were passed, among them one in tender remembrance of Dr. William G. Eliot of St. Louis. But the third important action of the Conference was the re-election of Mr. Effinger as secretary, no longer as our three-fifths man of last year, but now as one to give his whole time to our service at a salary increased by $500. And then upon the spot a guaranty fund of over $1800 was subscribed by friends and delegates present, to cover any deficit that may occur through the failure of churches, hitherto contributing, to continue their usual subscriptions. Probably this action was not thought of as the answer of the Conference to the advice so frequently tendered it of late, that it should "abandon executive functions," but simply voiced the Conference feeling that their work called for a whole man to do it, and that the whole man should be secured. None the less it was the answer to that counsel, and the more significant for being almost unconscious in the utterance.

For these three deeds, we think the Conference of 1887 will be remembered,—its declaration concerning faith and fellowship, its suggestion of a missionary board, its bravery in facing all the attempts to diminish its strength with a purpose to do more than ever, and to deserve the confidence and comradeship it craves, whether they be granted it or no.

We have been present at larger meetings of the Western Conference and we have been present at smaller ones during the period of our connection with it; but never in these fifteen years have we attended one marked by a more religious spirit or by more earnestness of purpose than that just held. The Conference stands by its Cincinnati resolution of fellowship altered simply so as to make it more strictly congregational by including it, with the new declaration of faith, under the preamble which says of both, "Binding on none, the word of to-day, always open to re-statement, and only to be regarded as the voice of the majority." The Conference stands by that; but by its new declaration it shows also what inheritance it has received and holds dear, and what elements of thought and feeling make and will continue to make its atmosphere. People will see that so far from the Western Unitarians having given up faiths, they have somehow reached a place where they can and do more daringly affirm them further in choral "we believes" than any other Unitarians; and presently they will begin to see that it is because we first established open fellowship and so abolished credal dangers absolutely that we got this new power and courage of affirmation. We confidently bespeak for the present attitude of the Conference a careful and considerate judgment, especially from those who belong to our own household of the spirit. We believe that the position it has taken will yet be felt for good throughout the Unitarian fellowship, east and west, quickening that fellowship to a bolder reliance upon its freedom and to more positive utterance of its faiths, and so to more helpful service in the world. F. L. H.

If all men and women now in orthodox churches were to take the position to which in their real belief they belong, "there would be an exodus to which the exodus out of Egypt would be a mere holiday."—M. J. Savage.

It is easy to agitate for prohibition and leave our boys on the level of the saloon floor. It is hard to rear them so that they will be above the saloon.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

What Makes a Church, and How to Make One.

BY F. W. N. HUGENHOLTZ, MINISTER OF THE FREE HOLLAND CONGREGATION AT GRAND RAPIDS, MICH. A PAPER READ BEFORE THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE IN CHICAGO, MAY 18, 1887.

How shall we organize a church? And if once organized, how shall we secure its duration by continually accepting new members in place of those who leave or die? Such I take to be the meaning of the question proposed to me when I was asked to give a paper on "Church Organization with Especial Reference to Form of Membership." "Your experience"—thus Brother Effinger wrote to me—"your experience in the organization and work of your own church would be of interest to us all." May be; for my experience is that not I organized our church, but that this church organized itself and then asked me to be its leader. And this is the first point that I would bring before you. An organization is nothing in itself, unless there exists something that needs an organization. What is an organism without a soul? Thus our first question should be, What is this soul? What makes a church?

My answer is, A thorough-bred religious requirement; this and nothing else. No æsthetical requirement, for instance. It may be very pleasant to hear a literary, highly developed eloquent orator, and in many cases such a man will gather together a large audience. But an audience is not a "congregation," unless this preacher represents a spiritual principle; and then he is not the soul of his church, but this principle, of which he is the temporary bearer.

No scientific requirement makes a church. I do not deny that love of science has a right of existence even in religion; but to the greater part of men this love of science will be no more than a kind of curiosity, like that of the men of Athens, when they said, "What would this babblers say?" A curiosity that is soon satisfied, and never can form a lasting church. A small minority only will have this requirement to such an extent that its fulfilment becomes a part of their thirst after God. But in that case, again, not sciences but this religion, will be the soul of their church.

Moreover, a church ought to be an assembly of people varying in intellectual development and social position, but gathered together by the consciousness of the one thing they all have in common, the one thing that is needful. He who tries to start a church has to touch strings which may tremble in every one's heart.

Thus a religious requirement is the first condition, but it is not the only one. The second is a common theological point of view. Our Christian world is no white, unwritten sheet of paper; it has a history, an education, a development, and this past prescribes the direction in which its religious requirement may find its satisfaction. Of course, not all men will in the same degree be conscious of this fact. Our Holland people, for instance, have been always a theological nation. The impression left in their souls by the struggle of eighty years against Spain was so deep, that their children's children never will forget that they are not, and why they are not, Roman Catholics. Their love of free inquiry is only another form of the love of their country. Even the man who founded at Amsterdam the most creed-bound theological school of all, called his school "the free university," because no word makes beat the Holland hearts more warmly than the word, Freedom. The older a man grows, the more the influence of his past grows with him. So it will be with the nations, too. An old nation, like that of the Netherlands, will have a stronger traditional sense than a young one like that of my present country. But it will exist everywhere, and he who will organize a church has always to take account of this theological requirement. Will you call it a dogmatical one? I don't fear that word; it represents an everlasting part of the religious life. To love God with all the understanding is just as much religion as to love him with all the heart. And more than any other common good a common view of life and the world is a motive to form a church.

A denomination, and especially a congregational denomination, needs, so it seems to me, no other formula of concord than its name and the historical meaning of that name. Every more precise description of the common faith will necessarily be a failure. Strictly understood, it will always say too much for the one, too little for the other part; or, if it were possible to find such vague terms that nobody could make any objection, they would proclaim nothing at all. But a single congregation stands for a distinct device,—not so as to be zealous for that device as if it were in itself the one thing needful, but so as to indicate thereby which method of satisfying the religious requirement seems the best one to it. As different nations form humanity and different families the nations, so in the religious sphere there are different groups, each with its peculiar language and manners and traditions; and they have a full right to organize their congregational living according to these peculiarities.

As for me, I desire no supernaturalists, Roman Catholics, Calvinists, or Pietists in my church. If they desire to join it, I'll welcome them heartily, but as those who essentially accept our device,—free development of the religious life. If our voice is to be open and clear, we have to speak in our own language. If I had to use language to hide my thoughts, I should rather keep still. In order to feel at home in our church, we ought to agree about the essence of religion and the best means to promote it.

Thus our Liberal Holland church came forth from a deeply felt consciousness that the Calvinistic theology of our so-called Dutch-Reformed churches was not able to satisfy the religious requirement, because it depressed the intellectual as well as the moral development. Many of these Hollanders, having grown up in another, more liberal, sphere, either suffered from this narrow-mindedness, intolerance, and crudeness; or, as there was no other circle which they could join, they withdrew more and more from all religious, at least from all congregational religious, life. So it came about that many of them, no longer satisfied with this total abstinence, hankered for a more rational, more actual, preaching, for a co-habitation with congenial people. Therefore we inscribed in the very first article of our statutes our standing amongst the different theological parties: "The Free Holland Congregation at Grand Rapids aims at the free development of the religious life in its own circle and beyond its borders. Itself a child of the Christian Protestant spirit as it has developed itself until to-day, the free congregation will follow the same line of growth. Convinced that religion is the natural and most glorious manifestation of the human genius and the richly flowing source of true happiness, the free congregation will promote the growing of the religious life by all means which may enrich the knowledge, clear the intellect, embellish the æsthetic taste, ennoble the mind, in order to sanctify and to inspire by religion every sphere of human life."

But this description of the new-born child succeeded the birth itself. The movement was started by the people themselves. During more than six months they held their weekly lay services, before they called me to be their minister. And every week their number increased, the new-comers being enthusiastically saluted by those who in this congregation felt like the slaves when they had reached, after a painful flight, one of the northern states. Of course, there should be some who take the initiative, who have the gift to awaken in others, by their words and personality, the slumbering requirement; and I do not know why even a minister could not be such a prophet, and looking on the fields and seeing them white unto harvest, begin to speak and to preach before a congregation is formed. But his success will never be complete, unless he finds and gathers together a circle of men who want him to preach not his, but their, gospel, who are impressed by their peculiar vocation in such a degree that, if necessary, they could find their own way without him.

Now we comprehend at the same time what will secure the lasting life of such an organization. It is, first of all, the consciousness that it is their church; not their minister's church, but their own; and that it belongs to all of them to the same amount. A liberal church should not be a monarchy, neither an oligarchy, but a mere democracy. According to this principle, we wrote in our chapter about members and membership, "Every member shall have to pay a yearly pecuniary contribution, unless the board of trustees find reasonable grounds to exempt any one for one year from this obligation." On the other hand, this general obligation carries with it for all members, male or female, the suffrage in the business meetings of the congregation; and the board of trustees elected by all is nothing more than the executive power. No step of any importance can be taken by them, unless the resolution to take it be made by the whole congregation, which accurately controls all their doings. Another right, secured to every member, is that of having his own seat in the auditory. To make impossible forever the miserable custom of renting the pews, by which an unjustified privilege is granted to the rich,—the first step to drive the poor out of the church,—we established this right in a separate article of our statutes. I set a great value upon these financial rules, by which the church has for its current expenses no other income than the contributions of the members. I feel no sympathy at all with the money-making socials, on which so many church ladies in this country spend a great deal of their talents and time. In the first place, the money wasted by those socials will always by far exceed the money made by them. In the second place, this desire to make money will always bring about speculations upon the foolishness, perhaps upon the levity, of the great public; and we should not admit in the churches what we condemn in opera houses and dime museums. But most of all, in the third place, where money-making is the principal aim, there poor people don't feel at home. Thus these socials degrade the churches to clubs, and from that moment they cease to be churches. It has been asked many times, How to reach the masses? My only answer would be: to yield place for them in our own churches; to impose upon all the same obligations and to allow to all the same rights, and never to act as if a member who can contribute a hundred dollars a year contributed more than a poor man who gives only four dollars or one dollar.

I will not wholly disapprove of these church socials. To give an entertainment of art or literature for our people is a good thing, but only if the admission is very cheap, and free for those who cannot pay at all, and if this entertainment has indeed value in itself. But I never can approve of them, when the making of money is their principal aim. The only sound income of a church is the voluntary contribution of the church-members. If a church might fail to make a living in this way, it has lost its right of existence. Perhaps it may save some expenses in order to make the two ends meet. Perhaps a temporary want may be met by temporary help. But as soon as this want gets the character of a chronic disease, it is better to do away with the whole thing.

Meanwhile, this obligation to contribute to the expenses of the church is, of course, not the only condition of membership. Another and higher condition is agreement with the religious aim and the theological principle of the congregation. "Everybody," thus we wrote in the sixth article of our constitution, "everybody who wants to be acknowledged as a member of the congregation shall pronounce in a public service his sympathy with its principle and aim, after which the leader gives him the hand of fellowship and a certificate of membership." I don't ask whether they agree with all the results of our modern theology, but only whether they come to us convinced that in our communion their religious life might become truer, deeper, more self-responsible than in a creed-bound church. I try to make this act a solemn moment. Some days ago a woman, who with her husband was to be confirmed on the next Sunday, said to me, "I look against it as to a mountain." That is all right, I thought,—it is no matter of indifference. Everybody who wants to be a member of our congregation accepts for himself its religious vocation. He knows that from that moment we rely upon his moral support. In order to make and to keep him conscious of this fact we give him the hand of fellowship, and, for a lasting memorial, the certificate of membership, provided with the seal of our church.

But there is still another trouble. He who wants to stand for a religious, a theological principle, first of all has to understand it. Whence will this understanding come if he has not had the opportunity to learn anything of the scientific data which may support his religious convictions and help him to defend it against others? We wrote in our constitution, "Everybody, above the age of twenty years, may be confirmed if he desires it. Beneath that age, but never beneath eighteen, they will be admitted only when they have attended, at least during one year, the course of religious instruction given in the name of the congregation." This is meant only as a transition to better times. The older people in our circle got their religious instruction in their youth in Holland, and, if they had brains for it, their conversation, hearing and reading gave them occasions enough for their own thinking and research. But the younger ones? In this respect there is a great difference between the United States and the Netherlands. There sometimes a Sunday-school is found, but always for children beneath twelve only. At the age of twelve the true religious instruction begins, which is given by the minister, not on Sunday but on one of the other days, and is attended by the children weekly until their eighteenth or twentieth year. And before the end of this course they cannot be admitted to church membership. I know friends of mine in our greater cities who did not give less than twenty-four such lessons every week. As for myself, I had seldom more than twelve to sixteen hours a week, and ten or twelve of these were given in my own small country parish. Different age, different education and intellectual development, ask a different method and different matter. And however many times we felt tired of it, we were always convinced that we never could do enough of this work. It is impossible for me to say how many manuals for religious instruction there are published and used in our small country, and for the greater part from the liberal side. In most cases the result is that we use our own manual, as it is always very hard to follow in all parts the course of another's thoughts. By the free congregation at Amsterdam a religious school or course is opened, which course lasts five years. In the first year the pupils of thirteen years are introduced to interesting narratives from the Old and New Testaments. In the second, after an introduction upon religious phenomenology in general, the main subject was the development of the religion of Israel. In the third year we treated the first centuries of Christianity until the foundation of the Catholic Church. In the fourth, we followed the history of the Church until the eighteenth century. In the fifth, a sketch is given of the great religions of antiquity, and we speak about the principal religious and ethical thoughts and questions of to-day.

It may be that we Hollanders have not yet found the right method; that, for instance, we try too much to make all our pupils young theologians. But still, it is a fact that our church members got by this instruction a development, a cleverness in thinking, a treasure of biblical and historical knowledge, that I did not find in some of the best, the most interesting laymen in this country. Here, as far as I have observed, there is no other religious instruction than that which is given in the Sunday-school, where children of six years are occupied at the same time and upon the same subject with men and women of about forty. I don't deny, while remarking this, the value of the American Sunday-school, though I presume that its value is greater for the teachers than for the pupils. But, however much good such a lay-and-children service may do, the requirement of a thorough religious instruction is not fulfilled in that way. As for me, I get often the impression that the flourishing state of the most absurd sects and churches, the credulity met with by every one who likes to set up for a priest or prophet, the enormous superstition, by which quacks everywhere find here their paradise,—that all this can be explained by the want of thorough religious development, especially by the want of historical knowledge. The course of the world is no circle, but it is a zigzag line; by understanding what has been, and why it has passed by, we better form our judgment of the present things, their value, and the possibility of their future. Knowledge in itself is no religion, but still it will teach us what religion is not; that it is not to overstrain sentiment and imagination; not to commit to memory a revealed doctrine; not the hope of a celestial glory, which is not revealed in this life; not vain ceremonials. Development of the common sense opens our eyes to distinguish between that which often unjustly is called by the name of sin and that which deserves fully that name. And while religion itself always grows but slowly through moral influence from others and one's own experience of life, the way to communicate knowledge is nearer at hand, and this knowledge will never fail to be useful to the moral and religious development.

Meanwhile, it is difficult to change the general rule. I, myself, have not been able to gather together more than fifty pupils from twelve to twenty years of age, distributed over four classes. But I hold my conviction that, if we want to organize liberal churches which have life in themselves, and thus a future, we have to pay attention in the first place to this point.

This is the way to reach the masses, that we enrich society with thorough, earnest people. I think the church does do enough if it can answer this purpose. Then it may leave, without scruples, the growth of social life to the initiation of others. Our liberal church must not be like the Roman Catholic of the Middle Ages, a do-all, who governs all human life. If it only knows how to awaken a sound and rational idealism, the rest will follow by itself. The church should not be anything else than the leaven of the Christian society; and we know leaven does not show itself, but disappears in the flour. A pompous church, which uses humbug to have a splendid success, is in perfect contradiction to the Christian spirit. The church has to say to the religious society what John the Baptist is related to have said of Jesus, "Thou must increase, but I must decrease." Might the church only succeed in changing some people into true men, in awakening the holy spirit of truth, love and righteousness in the hearts of its members, it has fully performed its task. For those members continue the same work and enlarge it, in their families, in their social circles. Every one of them becomes a prophet of the principle that has saved him and has reconciled him with God and with life. So he assures a future to his church by keeping alive its fundamental principle and promoting its highest aim.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Sailing of King Olaf, and Other Poems. By Alice Williams Brotherton. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co., 1887. Cloth, full gilt, pp. 145. Price $1.00.

The name of Alice Williams Brotherton is becoming well-known to both eastern and western readers. Long ago, she won for herself a place in scrap-books by such poems as "Where's the Baby?" which goes the round of the newspapers periodically (though many will now for the first time learn who wrote it), and her poems are welcomed by the leading magazines of the country. It is quite time that she join the ranks of the book-makers and allow us the opportunity to read more leisurely, enjoy more completely, and to judge more fairly. It is safe to say that she loses nothing by this. If we find her less exact in technique than one would expect, she gains by revealing a much wider range of feeling and a deeper insight into varying phases of life than we had hitherto credited to her. Her versification is musical, but often irregular to a trying degree, and the misplaced accents seem to trust much to the reader's own sense of harmony to bring out the sweetness of the verse. Perhaps she is at her best in such warm lyric outbursts as the second "Rosenlied," the tender "Campion" and the blithe caroling of "Wake-Robin;" but we hesitate to say so, as we turn over the pages again to dwell on the long-ing unrest of "The Wife of Pygmalion," praying to know

"All shades of human suffering,
The very height and depth of woe," if thus she might but receive the divine, impossible gift of a human soul. Mrs. Brotherton does not confine herself to subjective poems and lyrics but she has a decided strength in narration, as the first poem in the book, the one from which the volume takes its name, shows. Of these poems one of the best is "The Cardinal's Saraband," which has a swing of movement from the first line to the last. "The Poison Flask" with its ominous ending, and "A Study from the Ring," show the writer in a new field, and it will be a wonder if their possibilities for dramatic effect do not lead professional readers to try their fortune with them. The poems "Plighted" and "Sic Semper" are too much like the verses contributed to college papers to add anything to a book like this. They lower the high average of the book.

The poems of the inner life, which close the volume, are expressions of loving trust and aspiration. The writer believes that it is possible to turn one's mistake, yes, one's great sin, into the angel that brings, not happiness indeed, but the blessedness of loving charity and helpfulness for others. This is the thought, which she has clothed in noble words in "Told in a Parable," and of all the poems we could least spare this one from the volume.

Mrs. Brotherton is thus a poet of daily life. She has the insight that finds in common things and common tasks the uplifting power that prepares for great things and great tasks. She welcomes the ragged regiment of wayside weeds, "the sturdy tramps of nature, mustered out from garden service;" she idealizes poverty, which teaches that "hearts grow strong by striving;" and her religious poems emphasize the worth that lies in doing the nearest duty, whether of working or waiting. Mrs. Brotherton couldn't help singing, if she would, and so we may hope for many more treasures from her storehouse of thought and fancy.

E. E. M.

THE HOME.

Fresh from a Schoolroom.

Ethel was chewing gum in the forenoon, and was politely requested to "give it to the waste-basket to chew, as that poor basket has not had any gum since Friday; and, besides, does not make such a noise, in chewing, as little girls make."

In spite of this, Ethel was chewing gum again in the afternoon. Her teacher said to her, "Why, Ethel, do you know how you look? There is an animal that chews all of the time, and surely you do not want to look like that animal, do you?" No answer from Ethel.

The teacher resumed, "I wonder if any one in the room can tell me what animal it is that chews all of the time?"

Little Maggie's hand waved in the air, and her face fairly beamed with intelligence. "Well, Maggie?"

"A woman!!"

JUNIATA STAFFORD.

Mistakes.

THE man that never makes mistakes never makes any thing. He is of no use in this poor, blundering world. Not that I have any thing against him, O no! I have never even seen him, but I have heard about him. I met a fellow only yesterday who thought he was a twin brother to the man that never makes any mistakes. But he wasn't, and there was mistake number one. Then I began to watch this fellow and to count, and in less than half an hour he had made more real shameful blunders than anybody I met that day.

And this is a fact I have often noticed: The man or boy that is quite sure he don't know how to make a mistake piles them up faster than anybody else. But they are not big mistakes; no, indeed! They are little ones, just about the size of a very little man. The large errors are usually made by the large men. There was the great soldier, Napoleon, he made a monstrous blunder when he went to Russia; and, as nearly as we can find out, General Grant made another at Shiloh. Now you and I wouldn't have got into any such hole—we know better. And yet if we should stand on each other's shoulders it probably wouldn't make as big a man as either of these.

Mistakes, slips, errors, blunders—they will creep in, and it only makes matters worse to pretend that you are different from other people and never get your foot into the wrong boot. But don't be ashamed of it, and don't be afraid of it; go right ahead and do the best you can. A locomotive engine without any fire will never go off the track; but that isn't the kind of an engine you want to be. If you go at all, you are liable sometimes to go wrong, but be always ready to come back again when you know it.

But there is one class of mistakes that it is worth while to be afraid of and ashamed of: the mistakes of selfishness, and meanness, and cowardice. Yes, dread these and despise them, and go slow when you come to them. They are bad mistakes to make.—WOLSTAN DIXEY, in Our Youth.

Intimations of Immortality.

Some weeks since our baby's pet dog died. The baby is a tot of three and a half years. The other day we asked her what she would do if she died. "I'd be buried," she said. "And what would you do then?" She thought a little and then said, "I'd pway with my doggie." M. H. H.

In addition to previous information concerning the education of deaf and mute children, we have received copies of a monthly paper called The New Method, published by Miss Mary McCowen, of Englewood. In that pleasant suburb of Chicago (on Wabash ave. between 62nd and 63rd streets), Miss McCowen has a private school for the training of semi-deaf children not susceptible of education in public schools. What an enthusiast can do is shown by the fact that seven of her former pupils are now attending the public schools. She holds to articulation as the proper method, to the total exclusion of signs; believes that any deaf and dumb person of ordinary mind can be taught to speak, if taken young enough; and that any one who can talk can learn to "read lips," that is, to hear by the eyes. For further information address Miss McCowen, as above.

ANOTHER new tract.—The lecture by W. M. Salter, printed in UNITY of May 14, and called there, "Good Friday from an Ethical Standpoint," is now reprinted as No. 29 in our "Unity Mission" series of tracts, with the title, "The Death of Jesus." It is a noble tribute to the aims and character and influence of Jesus; the more significant as coming from one who "does not call himself his follower." The estimate mounts to words like these: "The aim of Jesus was sound; nay, that is a tame word for it; it was perfect, it was unsurpassable" . . . "He is no paragon to my mind, no model of spotless virtue or of infallible wisdom; I do not call myself his follower. But this he is to me—inspiration; he touches my heart, he stirs my conscience, he warms me with the love of a noble ideal; and this is something which few philosophers, liberal or other, have done or are doing for men, so that while they give correct opinions, Jesus and a few others like him give that indefinable thing we call life." In our two tract-series, numbering all together over forty tracts, this is the sixth referring to the great teacher. The others are in "Unity Mission" series, Nos. 2 and 9 and 27; in "Short Tract" series, Nos. 5 and 12.—Price of the new tract, 5 cents each, or ten for 25 cents.

THE people will not rise to punish vice as they do to punish crime. To cure vice we must look to education (not to schooling), but crimes we must repress.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, - - - J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, - - - H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, - - - DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Boston.—As we go to press, word reaches us that the American Unitarian Association has passed by a rising vote a resolution acknowledging the fraternal greeting from the Western Conference and reciprocating its hope that both bodies may work together in the future, as in the past, for the common interests which they have in hand and at heart.

Chicago.—The Union teachers' meeting was held as usual on Monday noon, the subject being the 12th, 13th and 14th chapters of Job. The comparison of the life of man to a shadow is a simile which is natural to the oriental mind. It seems to mean fundamentally that in the life of man there is a something so real and deep that, compared to it, all we see and know is as a shadow. It is an interesting point of discussion whether there is any hope or belief of immortality in chapter xiv. Mr. Utter viewed it as intimating a belief in a future general judgment after a long time at the end of this order of things.

Oakland, Cal.—DEAR MR. EDITOR:—It is evident that you have not yet had the privilege of a sojourn in California during the flower season, or you could not have so missed the point of the item I sent you concerning our Oakland church decoration on Easter Sunday. You lament the extravagance of a church which will display a floral cross containing 1200 shaded roses, and use over 7000 calla lilies in adorning the pulpit and rostrum. But what if the entire expense of this glorious show was simply the cost of wooden framework, a paper or two of tacks and a ball of twine? The flowers were brought in, with little or no effort, by a few ladies, as the samples of their gardens! Flowers bloom in this favored climate all the year round in field and door-yard, but at this season the prodigality of their growth is truly marvelous. As one walks our streets he is amazed and delighted at the floral spectacle presented by mountain side, garden and grass-plot. The costliest residence and the humblest cottage are alike glorified with profuse displays of callas, heliotropes, geraniums, passion-flowers, marigolds, pinks, and fifty other kinds, but especially roses, which grow on bushes, trellises, trees—in twenty, fifty, a hundred, five hundred different varieties—more plentiful than buttercups and daisies in New England meadows—a brilliant symphony of color, form and fragrance. No description can do justice to the abundance and beauty of the floral year in California. A house near by is covered from roof to foundation with a million yellow roses. A few blocks away, amid a bewildering wealth of tropical foliage, the patient Chinamen are gathering and curing the shining green leaves of the tea-plant. In the pretty Oakland cemetery the roses riot and revel, and break in floral billows over the graves, while high up on the mountain's green flank the fields of golden poppies wave and shine in the evening sun. From a single camelia tree ten feet high, in Santa Barbara, a friend gathered 2500 perfect flowers, and left as many more buds to wither and die. Our extravagance, therefore, is nature's lavish bounty. Come and see for yourself, and share our joy.

C. W. WENDTE.

Boston Notes.—The notes of preparation for anniversary week are already sounding. Speeches, festival and fraternal greetings will be foreshadowed in the Register announcements. We hope to see many of our favorite western ministers.

—By the middle of May our suburban gardens will probably begin to send in supplies to our city flower mission.

—The last meeting of the Sunday-school teachers' and superintendents' union was held on Monday evening, and was so full of good talk and of enthusiasm as to leave no doubt that the union is working vitally in better applied methods of study and in greater spiritual growth in pupils, in city and suburban schools. These results promise strong support and wide extension of our church work from the coming generation.

—For the first time in our city, there will be held May 23, a public meeting (in Tremont Temple) of the Unitarian church temperance societies. Hon. John D. Long will preside.

—Rev. Narcisse Cyr, of Boston, has accepted a very cordial invitation to preach and work as minister-at-large in Paris and its suburbs, and will sail with his wife in the steamer by the middle of June. He carries with him the kindest wishes of his clerical brethren here. One of his aims will be to stand ready as an adviser and friend to Americans residing or traveling in France.

—Mrs. Eliza T. Wilkes, of Sioux Falls, Dakota, interested very much the ministers of the Monday club in her frontier work, and threw light upon the spiritual material offering in small western towns for building liberal societies with. She illustrated the need of forward-looking preachers in the west, and of earnest, liberal supporters in the east of such pioneer apostles. Several of our ministers invited her to speak from their pulpits and solicit help for her mission.

London, Eng.—Mr. Voysey, the well-known preacher of the Theist church in London, sends this word to the secretary of the Free Religious Association in Boston, which this last year or two has been striving to remove from the Massachusetts statute books those strict Sunday laws, which once represented the religion of the people there, and now more nearly represent their superstitions and injustice:

DEAR SIR:—It is with great satisfaction I hear that there is agitation going on in the states in favor of providing increased facilities for popular recreation and amusement on the Sundays. It is well known that I do not undervalue the Sunday as a day of rest, as a day, also, on which public worship is highly beneficial, and therefore I speak on the subject as a religious man and from a religious point of view. I believe incalculable harm arises from the idleness and lack of pleasant occupation during the hours of Sunday which are not spent in religious exercises. I believe many a youth and maiden date their moral downfall from the curse of nothing to do, and nowhere to go on Sunday afternoons and Sunday evenings. I believe that young persons especially, and all in general, would be better and morally more safe, for greater opportunities of innocent pleasure and games at these hours of enforced idleness on the Sunday. Let alone the mere benefit to body and mind of healthy recreation, it conduces largely to morals, to friendliness and good-will among the citizens, and to reduce to a minimum the lower inclinations and passions of mankind.

On every ground, therefore, I wish most heartily to hear of the success of your good cause. Very faithfully yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

LONDON, DULWICH, April 25, 1887.

Philadelphia.—The formal Sunday meetings of the Ethical Culture society have been suspended till October. Mr. Weston closed with a review of work done and some prophetic glimpses into the future. Informal meetings will be continued right along, even during the absence of the speaker in the Adirondacks, by such of the members as care to use the school building through the summer for that purpose. It was Mr. Ames's people who successfully experimented in this way last summer. Though attendance appears to have been limited, the interest was gratifying and continuous. The Camden church will no doubt be open all through the hot season.

—The annual book reception at the Spring Garden church was successful, in so far as contributions, whether of books or cash, were concerned.

Concord, Mass.—The Concord Summer School of Philosophy will open its ninth term on Wednesday, July 13, 1887, and continue above two weeks. Eleven lectures each week, in mornings at 9:30; in evenings at 7:30; place, the Hillside chapel, near the Orchard House. Terms, $10.00 for the full course; $5.00 for each week; 50 cents a single lecture. Course tickets, entitling to reserved seats, can now be engaged by sending address and $5.00 as guaranty to H. L. Whitcomb, Concord, Mass., such tickets to be reserved till July 10, and then secured by paying balance due. Lodgings with or without board can be easily obtained in Concord village.

California.—The Pacific coast conference will not meet in Portland, Oregon, this year, as announced heretofore, but will hold its next session in Southern California in October.

Don't Read This

If you have a sufficiency of this world's goods, but if you have not, write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, and receive, free, full particulars about work that you can do, and live at home, wherever you are located, at a profit of from $5 to $25 per day, and upwards. All succeed; both sexes; all ages. All is new. Capital not required; Hallett & Co. will start you. Don't delay; investigate at once, and grand success will attend you.

For Scrofula, Impoverished Blood and General Debility.

Scott's Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, has no equal in the whole realm of Medicine. Read the following: "I gave one bottle of Scott's Emulsion to my own child for Scrofula, and the effect was marvelous."—O. F. GRAY, M. D., White Hall, Ind.

POZZONI'S
MEDICATED
COMPLEXION
Imparts a brilliant transparency to the skin. Removes all pimples, freckles and discolorations. For sale by all first-class druggists, or mailed for 50 cts. In stamps by J. A. POZZONI, St. Louis, Mo.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE.
Its merits as a WASH BLUE have been fully tested and endorsed by thousands of housekeepers. Your grocer ought to have it on sale. Ask him for it. D. S. WILTBERGER, Prop., 233 N. Second St. Phila. Pa.

TENTH ANNUAL
WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE NUMBER
AND
YEAR BOOK FOR 1887-1888.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JUNE 4 AND 11, 1887.

[NUMBERS 14 AND 15.]

EDITORIAL.

FOR the tenth time UNITY becomes the annual reporter for the Western Unitarian Conference and the sister Societies. We give the columns solidly to this service, hoping three things may befall this "Conference Number."

(1.) That our readers will be heartily content to call this triple number (three times the usual twelve pages) a double one, accepting it for June 4 and June 11.

(2.) That they will read enough of it to feel the earnestness of the workers here telling each other what the year has done for them and what they have done with the year.

Fellow-workers will be interested in the detail of experience and success; and many besides them may be glad to read (on page 200) the "Declaration concerning Fellowship and Faith," with which the Conference has rounded out its Cincinnati resolution of last year,—to read it and the debate which preceded its adoption. The debate is reported in full on pages 202-208.

(3.) That they will keep this number for reference through the year. For in it they will find a Year Book of all the agencies and agents in which and in whom our Western Unitarian churches are most interested;—the objects, terms of membership, lists of officers and life-members of our different working societies, and of our churches and their ministers; and also some description of what may be called our National Organizations—the National Unitarian Conference, the American Unitarian Association, the Church Building Loan Fund, etc. These societies, "National" in scope and hope, though of necessity, at present, mainly eastern and almost New England in locality and officering, are little known to the rank and file of our western churches; they should be better and more warmly known. Further, this same number, in its advertising columns, contains lists of our western tracts and Sunday-school publications, and the book-list of our young publishing firm, Charles H. Kerr & Co. Do you want to find out anything about any of the chief Unitarian agencies, east or west, or anything about the Post-office Mission, for instance,—or the new Bureau of Unity Clubs,—or how to get a loan for your new church,—or how to leave a thousand dollars in your will for the spreading of your ideals of religion,—or where to send your neighbor for information, the free evangelical minister who begins to feel his way to a more open fellowship,—how to get a tract or borrow a book that may help him or yourself,—or even where to send your boy or girl to a home-school in the country where the influences will be those of your own largest faith and most earnest aims,—do you want to learn about any of these things, you will at least find yourself on the track of answer in our Year Book. Therefore, keep this number! Turn back one page and read the index.

For many of the lists, etc., our Year-Book is of course indebted to the Year-Book of the American Unitarian Association, which has been plundered with due sense of gratitude. Plundered and condensed to the items of most interest to the western reader. Few here except the ministers see the A. U. A. book. This shall be its prairie edition. Doubtless there are mistakes and omissions in our lists, and we shall be obliged to any one who sends correction.

THE Declaration concerning Fellowship and Faith, adopted by the recent Conference, has been tracted as "Unity Short Tract, No. 17," and is now ready for delivery. Price, 30 cents a hundred copies. Address this office.

FOR the Cincinnati resolution of open fellowship, and the refusal to pass any resolution whatever looking towards obligatory doctrine as condition of Unitarian fellowship, the western Unitarians have received much blame, both courteous and discourteous, and from those within even more than from those without our household of faith; blame partly because their word was misunderstood, and partly because it was well understood and men were not ready for it. For this new "declaration" we shall receive more blame, if prophecies are to be fulfilled; but we are well content to wait, confident that by and by the sound of blame will turn into an echo of the friend who writes: "It seems to me no statement was ever made that did fuller justice at once to freedom and to faith." What was said in our last number about the matter deserves repeating, that the full force of the because may be felt: "People will see so far from the western Unitarians having given up faiths, they have somehow reached a place where they can and do more daringly affirm them in choral 'we believes' than any other Unitarians; and presently they will begin to see that it is BECAUSE we first established open fellowship and so abolished credal dangers absolutely, that we got this new power and courage of affirmation."

The Story of our Western Meetings Finished.

In the Story of the Meetings told in our last number, little was said about more than the main Conference sessions. But the women of the churches had their session, and the Sunday-school teachers theirs, as will be found duly reported in other pages of this number. A word of introduction or interlineation here.

The Women's Conference opened with a devotional service, a psalm was read and prayer was offered by Rev. Augusta Chapin, then Rev. Mary Safford spoke with earnestness and zeal of the thought of God and the strength to be derived from trust in him and the consciousness that he is all-good and ever near. The President extended a cordial welcome to the friends assembled, and spoke briefly of the origin and nature of Reverence and the religious life which it promoted.

Mrs. Sunderland's oral report of the activities of the churches in Michigan was encouraging, especially of the Religious Study class at Ann Arbor. Mrs. Wilkes' simple word about what the women of Dakota are doing and are going to do shall be given in full before long, that the fresh wind in it may be felt. Rev. Marion Murdock, from that same corner of the field, propounded and solved a Bible riddle:—"What did Phoebe do?" Phoebe was that lady of the Unitarian church at Cenchrea, about 1827 years ago, whom Paul commended so highly for a power of succoring many (See Rom. xvi. 1, 2.).

As for the session of the Sunday-school society, if we were to give that society a distinctive title, we should call it the Heart of the Conference; not that the General Conference lacks in feeling, but that always there is a certain inner warmth in the meeting of the Sunday-school society. Perhaps the explanation may be that people draw nearer together when they talk of the interests and nurture of children. Perhaps, also, this warm atmosphere comes in part from the fact that the Board of Directors have worked together for many years with but few changes, meeting regularly every month, except in July and August. The president in his opening address adverted to that fact, and spoke of the effect of such long co-working to draw persons together in heart. Also, the opening address dwelt on the value of seriousness in the Sunday-school, especially in the sermon, which, it is to be hoped, is given the children by the superintendent or minister every Sunday. Better, it was said, to speak above the children's reach of mind, even considerably above it, than a little below it. Also, it was urged that the church ought to feel, more than it now seems to feel, its duty and responsibility as a school of religious instruction; in dwelling on which point the president referred, with approval, to the picture given by Mr. Hugenholtz of the Holland churches, which have no social parties, tea-drinkings, plays, valentine parties, and the like devices, but give their strength to just two works, religious education and charity. After the president's address, came the reports of the secretary and treasurer. The secretary gave encouraging account of the year's work, both of the society and in our several Sunday-schools of the west, showing by statistics that there appears to have been a growth in orderliness, system and good work. Three or four times the statistics were mere foot-paths to lead us to a high place in the true philosophy and ideal of Sunday-school work. Her report, printed below, should by all means be read, if only to find those spots. The Treasurer's report was very satisfactory. It showed that the schools and churches had contributed to the funds of the Society more largely than ever before. The small deficiency was instantly made up on the spot, so that the Society starts this year with a clean balance-sheet. Mr. Judy's motion that we recommend to our eastern friends the issue of a manual on the growth of early Christianity as illustrated by primitive Christian art, was heartily adopted; and also, that Rev. Arthur M. Knapp, whose studies and lectures in this department are well known, be conferred with, so as to arrange, if possible, a kind of lecture-circuit among our schools, to speak on this subject.

The Boston Anniversaries.

DEAR UNITY READERS.—Here I am at the end of another week of "Anniversaries," with an hour on hand in which to tell you how they do it in Boston. "Ye senior" left the hearty fellowship of the Western Conference Friday afternoon, May 20. Although we had had a week of vigorous hand-shaking it was hard to tear one's self away from so goodly a company; but the limited express would wait for no one; and so I had to rush through a file of delegates, leaving Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, and the rest of the states on either hand. Aboard the train, there was a vacation twenty-five hours long awaiting me, in which I could think it all over,—the earnest spirit, the prophetic devoutness, the conscious sense of a missionary burden, which had consecrated anew the very seats and walls of the dear church-home, the "All Souls," that had been honored with the presence of the western Unitarians for a week. I don't know how it all happened. The rush and swing of that train over gullies, through tunnels, now waltzing around splendid mountain spurs, again tip-toeing through the daintiest of valleys, and anon jumping lightly over mountain brooks; the Allegany ranges, the promising rhododendrons, the demure Quaker faces at prim cottage doors, the white-washed fences, the trim meadows, the splendidly equipped Pennsylvania Central railroad, (is there a more perfect line of transportation in the world?), the iron hand of Col. Tom Scott that brought it to this perfection; nods, naps, long sleeps, dreams of cares and friends left behind, musings on future work, budding every now and then into new plans and splendid schemes of things that could be done if my ships only would arrive from Spain;—some of them, perchance, will be done, even tho' the Spanish armada should never arrive,—all this and more, was crowded into my day's vacation between Chicago and Brooklyn, between our western anniversaries and the eastern "Feast of the Passover." Sunday morning I stood between Brother Chadwick's people and utter pulpit vacancy. The good pastor was fairly over the seas, and doubtless many of the minds in the pews wandered from the "Lessons of the Yeast Pot" to follow the wanderer through the delights of London but still they listened well. Another all night's ride, and I was in Boston, and the anniversary exercises began again when the new building broke upon my sight,—solid, sober, dignified, sincere and noble, on the outside; convenient, inviting, simple, but elegant, on the inside. We know of no public building in this country, concerning which it would be harder to find legitimate fault, with one exception, than these head-quarters in Boston. How long must we wait before we have a similar building in Chicago? It is needed there now, and did we have it, it would forthwith be put to a use, scarcely second in importance to that which the building in Boston renders. The delegates were already gathering, and the hand-shaking had begun, but the brethren did not seem quite so glad to see each other as those who came to Chicago the Monday preceding. It makes a difference whether fellow-workers have been separated a few weeks or twelve long months.

The first meeting was that of the Ministerial Union, Monday, 10 A.M., in Channing Hall. Rev. J. G. Brooks, of Brockton, asked "Some Questions about Unitarianism and its Work." Deep and searching questions they were. "Has it not been too much concerned with the other world; with abstract problems; with denominational anxieties? Are not the lines of culture and wealth too strongly emphasized? Must it not take into prime consideration the agonies of the poor, the needs of the laborers, the week-day wants of society?" The discussion that followed tried to relieve the somewhat somber tones, and to restore complacency, but in many respects the address remains in my mind as the most searching and really inspiring of the week. In the afternoon the women gathered at the Church of the Disciples. The genial auditorium was well filled. Men were permitted to be heard in this women's meeting, an act of generosity which may have somewhat lowered the standard of the speaking; but I like this courtesy, which I think was hardly reciprocated by the men-managed meetings. They have not yet learned to utilize women in the east as we have in the west. Monday afternoon, from 5 to 9, was the New England Women's Suffrage Festival at the Hotel Vendome. The elegance of the affair drew such an immense crowd that very many of the dignities of the occasion were ruthlessly crowded and crushed. The polite and good-natured disorder was equal to that of a grange picnic in the west. But in due time, the commanding voice of Mrs. Livermore, and the persuasive words of Mesdames Howe, Ellen Foster, Gougar and others brought order, serenity and enthusiasm. Later in the evening I was at the public temperance meeting held under the auspices of the Unitarian Temperance society, Ex-Governor Long presiding. Christopher Eliot, the President, modestly but effectively outlined the comprehensive purposes of the society. Hale, Savage, Jones, Mrs. Livermore and others followed. The audience was large, and the meeting was one of the most enthusiastic of the week.

Tuesday was A. U. A. day. Three sessions, all of them well attended, Tremont Temple giving convenient opportunity for the delegates to meet on the main floor and visitors in the galleries. The first surprise, which would make attractive any programme and hearty any meeting, was the exceptional prosperity of the year as shown in Secretary Reynolds's report, notwithstanding the gloomy prognostications to the contrary. About $50,000 contributed to the work, $4000 or $5000, if we remember rightly, more than last year. Twenty-one new societies formed. Following this report Brooke Herford reported for and urged the claims of the Church Loan Building Fund. Mr. Batchelor, whose voice has regained the old ring of health, spoke merited words of praise for the A. U. A. and its opportunities, and Rev. H. Woods Perris was enthusiastically received as a delegate from over the water. In the afternoon Joseph May of Philadelphia, R. A. Griffin of Marlboro, and Stopford Wentworth Brooke gave short papers intended to summon the Unitarian to his duties. The missionary meeting in the evening was addressed by Mr. Perris, Mr. Forbush, of Milwaukee, and Mary A. Livermore.

Wednesday the "Berry Street Conference" address was given by your correspondent. As this is a meeting of ministers only and newspaper reporters are not admitted, it is only allowable to say that there was a manifest reluctance on the part of some to break away from the old-time associations of the Channing-Gannett-Ware church, on Arlington street, in order to meet in the "spick-span" new Channing Hall, where prophecy and not tradition was the cementing spirit. The subject of the essay was "Religion from the Near End." In the afternoon, neglecting suffrage meetings, the Children's mission and the convention of Congregational ministers, I sought instead the classic shades of Harvard, and I met the boys at Divinity Hall in conference, and we talked together of coming courage. I ate with them at the great Memorial Hall. It ought to be a liberal education to eat three times a day within those walls consecrated to heroic memories and decorated with classic names and historic faces. In the evening came the anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Union. Nobody knows how to do such things as Brother Baldwin. The spacious rooms from gymnasium to library were thrown open for inspection and were thronged. At last we went up into the hall, which was packed tight in less than ten minutes. There was some delightful nonsense served up by the Brown University Glee club, three speeches of commendation and encouragement, one of them by Phillips Brooks, all within an hour.

Thursday morning saw the beginning of what I believe will prove a most important adjunct to the liberal churches of America, namely, the organization of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs. Delegates from some forty or more clubs were present, and they cheerfully gave their time to wise deliberation. Our readers, I hope, will hear often from this new organization. In the afternoon the Sunday-school society celebrated its sixtieth anniversary. Secretary Spaulding was happy, as he ought to be, over a year's work full of new life, fresh plans and vigorous vitality. There were three speeches made, one by S. W. Crosby, a layman of Boston, one by Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, of Concord, one by Francis Tiffany, of Newton, if, indeed, the latter deliverance ought not to be called a poem. It was an improvisation which might have been sung with a harp accompaniment like one of the ancient bards of Britain. In the evening came "THE FESTIVAL". Only one to the manor born, the New England Unitarian, fully understands what an event this is in the calendar of Unitarian Boston. All the preachers and their wives come to the great hall and are treated to a great dinner, which is followed by speeches which are always expected to be great master-pieces of wit, wisdom, eloquence and inspiration. This year they all seemed to be there. Ex-Gov. Long presided. After the orthodox amount of wit, he settled down into a splendid bit of preaching with an earnestness and directness that ought to shame many a Unitarian pulpiteer. The clergy were welcomed by Carroll D. Wright, who, the presiding officer said, "could give the ministers statistics enough in fifteen minutes for fifty-two sermons"; and Calthrop the astronomer-preacher of Syracuse responded handsomely. Charles G. Ames, Edward Everett Hale, and others spoke.

Friday was the Free Religious Association day. Three sessions. Twenty years old. It seemed to be a question as to whether there was more work for it to do; if so, what next? There was no doubt in the minds of those most concerned, and there ought to be in the mind of no one, concerning the fact that this association has thus far justified its existence. Through it the theological climate of all denominations has been modified, and the intellectual life of thousands has been enlarged. O. B. Frothingham's words rang out for the second time in the week with their old-time clearness and power. Higginson was genial. Conway had less vinegar and more oil in his castor than has been his custom of late. Salter was high and exacting in his standards, even to the point where rigid standards become unsympathetic, and severity of morals in ignoring the modifying lines of beauty and patience shades into the immorality of intolerance. Mrs. Cheney mellowed all hearts with the motherly piety that exalts communion of thought and the fellowship of heart into the free religion that feeds spirit.

Saturday was meant for a free day, except the morning devotions at King's Chapel, which has been the hour of uplift to each day of the week; but the week overflowed. One of the most interesting gatherings of the week, was that which came together at 11 o'clock this morning to listen to Pundita Ramabai, the young Hindoo widow, whose dark face shone through her white envelope with peculiar power as she pleaded for the cause of her sisters. She told the story of women's needs in India in a way that I hope will help her push her work of education.

Now I am at the end of my story. The Christian Register, (what could Boston do without it?) published in neat pamphlet form the calendar of the week, which announced those meetings which had claims upon the Unitarian, 34 in all, to which I added two others making 36. Upon 20 of these I have looked in and nine times has the voice of "ye editor" been heard. "How does it all seem as compared with our Western anniversaries?" There is the absence of the eager hunger of Western delegates, and we miss the spontaneity, the unexpected bits of enthusiasm and kindling speech which always spring from our Western programme. Spontaneity has its dangers, but they are not so great as the danger of stagnation and apathy that springs from so much careful suppression. But I hope that even this is not incurable. Everywhere there is evidence of new wood forming, new workers growing, fresh enthusiasm being generated. The Temperance and the Unity Club work were new features of this anniversary week. They represent young life. Both, we believe, have sprung out of the Monday Ministers' Club, which in turn represents many of the younger and of the out-of-town ministers. This week has shown abundantly that here, as in the west, Unitarianism is a movement and not a sect. It is going somewhere, and that too, in the forward direction, which is the heavenward direction. This was splendidly emphasized in the best Unitarian speech of the week, made by Mr. Savage on the Free Religious platform. The pity is that it was not given on Tuesday at one of the meetings of the A. U. A., where it would have been most enjoyed and have done the most good. This week has also proven that no geographical or theological lines can be drawn in Boston. The attractions at the Suffrage meetings were the women from Iowa and Indiana. The enthusiastic episode at the Women's Auxiliary meeting was the reception of Mary Graves as bearer of good will from the Women's Conference in the West. When Secretary Reynolds read the resolution of fellowship received from the Western Conference, and Mr. Barrows in well chosen words described the spirit in which it was sent, and moved a response, it was passed by a hearty rising vote. No voice has been heard with more gladness, and no cause has been received with more sympathetic heartiness, than that of Mrs. Wilkes, of Dakota; and if the friends in the west will be as generous as those in the east, the first Unitarian church in Dekota, the "All Souls church of Sioux Falls", will soon be built and paid for.

At the Women's Auxiliary meeting and the Missionary meeting on Tuesday night, the words of Mr. Forbush, of the west, were eagerly listened to and heartily applauded. In the east as in the west, Unitarianism represents a wide range of theological opinions; but here, as there, any attempt to create a schism, or to put "asunder those whom God has joined together," has been rebuked and will be defeated. There may be plenty of disposition to dispute, but none to divide. There may have been anxieties about the opinions of the western brethren, but plenty of the same kind of opinions is found in the east. Never was there so clear a recognition of the fact that the east is bound to the west by ties as strong as those which bind the west to the east, and that the help has been mutual, that our cause is a common one, our fellowship a real one, our mission identical, our faith a growing one, and our religion one that is inrooting and upreaching, and that the thing to do is keep on working and growing. But I must close; it is 10 o'clock Saturday night. I must take the train for New York. To-morrow I preach in Brooklyn, and on Tuesday I will be at the school of the Prophets at Meadville, and Wednesday I will again be, Providence permitting, with the dear friends and blessed yoke-fellows at the west.

Ever for, of and with UNITY, in the interest of Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion.

J. L. J.

Boston, May 28, 1887.

THE WESTERN ANNIVERSARIES.

Opening Address Before the Western Unitarian Conference.

BY HON. D. L. SHOREY, PRESIDENT, CHICAGO, MAY 18, 1887.

Custom assigns to the chair the pleasant duty of uttering a few words of welcome and greeting at the opening of this our thirty-third annual Conference. It so happens that this duty has often fallen upon me in the years gone by. Some of those whom I have addressed in former years on these occasions are now engaged in other fields of labor, and some have gone to their rest. While I have the pleasure of looking into many well-known faces here this morning there is scarcely less pleasure in greeting those who have never met with us before; for in these is the promise of the continued existence and usefulness of this Conference.

The interesting programme, already in your hands, sufficiently indicates the subjects which will engage your attention. In addition to the time required for reading papers prepared under the invitation of the directors, ample time is given in the programme for oral discussion, in which all delegates and guests are invited freely to participate.

Some misunderstanding has arisen among Unitarians east and west during the past year, in relation to the action of the Conference at Cincinnati. The directors early in the year, in order to correct as far as possible misconceptions of that action, prepared and published a circular address, which will be laid before you in the secretary's report.

As I understand the Cincinnati resolution, it is in harmony with the traditions, policy, and spirit of Unitarianism from the beginning. It reiterates the often declared and fundamental position of Unitarianism in declaring that the Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic test. This is precisely the position of our National Conference, as set forth explicitly in the last article of its constitution. The generous words of welcome in that resolution, to all who wish to join the Conference to help establish truth, righteousness, and love in the world, are such words as ought to pass unchallenged in any body of men who have ever read the Sermon on the Mount. Only the most captious criticism can find in these great and comprehensive words of welcome narrowness, intolerance, or exclusion. Nor can any fault be found with the majority at that Conference that when it decided, in accordance with the universal custom of Unitarian bodies, to put forth no dogmatic statement whatever, it refused to adopt any other statement than that which it first resolved upon.

This Conference has a record of Unitarian work of thirty-five years. It stands on the long record it has made, and has no desire to change any part of it. The action of the Cleveland Conference simply organized the body as a legal corporation, so that it could take, hold, and convey property. That action has no effect in an ecclesiastical sense upon any part of its previous record. It is by the study of that entire record that there will be found, if anywhere, the flag, platform, and creed of this Conference. Whoever studies that record now, intelligently, will be able to sufficiently comprehend what is meant by the Unitarianism which it represents. On all its platforms, from all its pulpits, in all its Conference gatherings, there will be heard Unitarian affirmations concerning one nature, one law, one ethics, one religion, and one God.

Report of the Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference.

READ AT ITS THIRTY-THIRD SESSION IN ALL SOULS CHURCH, CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 17-20, 1887.

It becomes my duty to-day to submit to you my annual report, as approved by the Directors of the Conference.

My time has been but partially yours, two-fifths of it belonging to the Illinois State Conference. In the remaining three-fifths of the year, some things have been accomplished, and the logic of events has had its way with us as a body, shaping the course of thought, testing our courage, developing our resources, giving us possibly clearer views and wider sympathies, and let us hope, a deeper hold on things divine and eternal.

Speaking of things done,—look first at the

OFFICE WORK

of your Secretary. Hundreds of calls have been made on the office by letter,—calls for personal service, for supplies to empty pulpits, for information as to the belief of Unitarians; calls from churches in search of ministers and ministers in search of churches, and ministers in search of a better religion and a freer fellowship; calls have come from untilled fields, where to some earnest soul the need has seemed great, for publishing the liberal gospel, and planting the religion of reason and righteousness.

A letter of quite recent date comes from a leading member of a Congregational church, asking for a Unitarian minister as a candidate for a vacant pulpit of that church. He says: "Why can not a Unitarian be placed here in this Congregational church? They (the people here) all want Unitarian doctrines taught, more or less, but in the name of Congregationalism." And this appeal comes at this time by no accident into the hands of your Secretary.

Five hundred and eighty-one written communications, and more than one thousand printed ones, have gone out from the office to all parts of the country. But the correspondence has not been all. The fellowship side of the office claims more and more attention. Individuals are continually dropping in; Unitarians from distant fields; strangers to Unitarianism inquiring the way; young men lately come to the city; ministers of other denominations in pursuit of sympathy, suggestion and literature. Perhaps I can best portray this aspect of the office life by giving you a case or two in point. An orthodox minister calls, tells his story of growing liberality, and wants to know what opportunities there are for new recruits in the liberal ministry. A young man calls, come to the city to live from a Unitarian home in the country. He is much of a stranger, wants sympathy and friendly interest, is directed to the Unitarian church nearest his home, and assured of kindly welcome at the headquarters, and at one home in the suburbs. A brother newly received by the fellowship committee, on his way through the city, calls to make acquaintance and establish personal relations with the headquarters. A stranger from New York comes in and offers his hand. He is going out to Dakota, and wants a copy of Unity Hymns and Chorals, such as he saw in Spencer's church in Troy. He is told about the church at Sioux Falls, Dak., and promises to write when he is settled. An Eastern minister and his wife look in on their way to a new western parish, and with beaming faces respond to the welcome they receive, and express their enthusiasm for the breadth and freedom of this great west, and especially of western Unitarianism. A young gentleman comes in who has picked up a tract in the far south with our imprint on it; he wants another, gets it, and goes away, picking up still others as he passes the "Unity Mission" rack. In a few days he comes back wonderfully pleased and more communicative, fills up again with tracts, leaves a dollar to pay for them, remarks: "How good it is to have such documents lying around loose where people can get them!" and goes on his way to sell machinery for an eastern house. In a week or two a letter comes from him, dated —, Mich., saying: "Will you kindly send, at your earliest convenience, the following pamphlets to Mr. —, at —. Don't accompany them by any letter,—I think it would be better not to." This from one in the whirl of business, who had but lately come with surprise and delight to find his own thought and feeling written out large in our tracts.

In ways manifold and difficult to describe, the fellowship side of the Western Conference finds its uses and does its work.

FIELD WORK.

Your Secretary has traveled on the business of the Conference 13,363 miles and visited 26 places. He has assisted in organizing four new societies, which show indications of healthy growth and permanent existence. At Luverne, Minn., he spoke the first Unitarian message one Sunday in November last, which led to the organization of a Unitarian church. At Rock Rapids, Iowa, he found a cordial welcome as the representative of this Conference. A week-day evening service was held, and steps were taken at once which led to organization. At Sioux Falls, Dakota, he spent two week nights, and an experimental service was held in Lawyer Wilkes' office. As the result of that meeting religious services have been continued from Sunday to Sunday, first under the care of Mrs. Wilkes, and afterwards under the ministration of Miss C. J. Bartlett. At Hinsdale, Ill., sixteen miles from Chicago, he took the initial steps in the organization of a new Unitary church.

Your Secretary has visited twenty-two of our organized churches; took part in the dedication of the Holland Liberal church of Grand Rapids, Michigan; spent ten days at Duluth, Minnesota, in the preliminary work of the Unitarian church that is hoped for in that city; gave several days to Michigan and Kansas; in all has visited ten of the fourteen states within our territory; attended five State Conferences, and represented this body in the National Conference at Saratoga in September, 1886. In addition to this he has done considerable field work in Illinois. Sometimes he has been able to multiply himself three or four times by the help of others, but more calls for preaching have been made than he has been able to fill. These journeys have been made at some cost of dollars and cents, one nearly at the cost of life itself, but everywhere it has seemed worth while to have gone. Your representative has been cordially welcomed, and in some cases the practical results following his visits have been abundantly encouraging. The fact that he was your representative was his strongest hold on the confidence and co-operation of the people. In proportion to the efficiency of the State conferences, this field work will be less and less called for from the central office; but while in more than one-half the states covered by the Western Conference, we have no active State conferences, as is true at the present writing, it seems especially important that your Secretary should be at liberty to give some portion of his time to such personal services as the general work may require.

GENERAL WORK OF THE YEAR.

First, as to laborers: We have in the field fifty settled ministers, and thirty-nine ministers not settled as pastors, but some of them most active and inspiring workers; and we have seventy-nine organized societies, and two little circuits.

We have to record a great loss to the Unitarian body in the west, in the lamented death of Dr. W. G. Eliot, chancellor of Washington University, St. Louis, whose name has been a household word east and west for many a year; our pioneer and bishop of souls in the west, an inspiring organizing power, focalized in his own city of St. Louis, the champion of every good cause, the tireless worker for great ends. When shall we look upon his like again?

Some changes have taken place in our ministerial force. The west has given to the east during the year but one of its ministers,—John Tunis, of Quincy, Illinois. From the east have come S. M. Crothers, to Unity church, St. Paul, Minnesota; H. A. Westall, to the Unitarian church, Bloomington, Illinois; Charles F. Bradley, to the Second Congregational Unitarian church at Quincy, Illinois; Reed Stuart of the Independent church of Battle Creek, Michigan, has gone to Detroit, Michigan; J. B. Frost, of the Meadville Theological school, has been engaged at Alton, Illinois; Judson Fisher has charge at Sheffield, Illinois; C. B. Roberts, recently of the Baptist church, has been installed at St. Joseph, Missouri; G. W. Buckley, of Battle Creek, Michigan, has gone to Duluth, Minnesota, for a month; F. D. Gunning is supplying the church at Keokuk, Iowa, for three months; H. D. Stevens, of Indianapolis, is doing missionary work in Central Illinois under the direction of the Illinois State Conference; Miss C. J. Bartlett has for some months been doing efficient service at Sioux Falls, Dakota; S. S. Hunting has been doing valiant work in the missionary field in Minnesota and Iowa.

I have corresponded with four ministers of other denominations, who are considering the question of coming into the Unitarian fellowship. One of them writes under date of April 30th., 1887: "I am preaching liberal doctrines to crowded houses. I find many people in sympathy with better preaching. I think that I will organize two or three independent congregations this fall." Seventeen others, several of them from other denominations, and others from no denominational connection, have applied for work and fellowship among us. Of this number seven are now working acceptably in various parts of the west.

New societies have been organized as already mentioned at Luverne, Minnesota; Rock Rapids, Iowa; Sioux Falls, Dakota; Hinsdale, Illinois; and Winona, Minnesota, (the latter by Mr. Crooker, of Madison), and the new movement at Duluth, Minnesota, looks toward permanent organization.

Unusual missionary activity has characterized some of our churches. By invitation of the manager, the minister of All Souls church, Chicago, took charge of evening services in Central Music Hall in January last, preaching every Sunday evening for three months to large audiences in the very center of Chicago; a rare opportunity was thus offered of setting before the people of this city the inspiring truths and practical aims for which we as a body stand.

F. L. Hosmer, of the Church of the Unity, Cleveland, Ohio, has started a mission work in east Cleveland. The papers of that city report his sermons in full and speak of large audiences in attendance.

From many of our churches we hear of increasing congregations and growing interest. One writes, "We feel that our minister will do good work, and that our numbers will be increased as we become better known." From another comes the word, "Congregations are large and enthusiasm increasing." From still another, "Only one minute was required to select or call a pastor for the ensuing year, so that Miss—who had retired to our church parlor, was called back almost before she had time to reach it."—"Following the vote calling the pastor was a succession of resolutions thanking everybody for good work done during the year past, and in a thankful, hopeful spirit the meeting was adjourned." That, I take it, is the key-note of many a Unitarian parish in the west at the present writing.

CHURCH BUILDING.

The past year has been a remarkable one in our history in respect to church building and improvement.

The Unitarian church, of Cincinnati, has been offered for sale, and the trustees have bought a site for a new house two and a half miles out in the suburbs, where it is expected that building will soon begin,—amount paid for lot not reported.

In Detroit there is much talk about a new church building and a strong probability that the talk will soon take more definite shape. Over $25,000 have been spent in completing the original design of Unity Church, Chicago; Kansas City is building a church to be dedicated October 1st, the estimated cost of which, including the lot, organ and furnishing, is $40,000.00 and no outside aid has been asked. Arcadia, Wisconsin, has a new parsonage in which to house its minister, at a cost of $800.00, contributed from friends in various parts of the country,—$635.00 of this amount through the Women's Auxiliary Conference of the east. Sioux Falls, Dakota, one of our newest societies, has paid $1,200.00 for a lot, has $800.00 in hand toward a church building, and is doing missionary work in the surrounding country. Minneapolis now has a church nearly ready for dedication, at a total cost of $60,000.00, $45,000.00 of which is already paid; no aid asked for outside the parish. Denver, Colorado, is pushing a new church building to completion, which, with the lot, will cost $66,000.00, and hopes to dedicate it September 1st,—no outside aid asked. Moline, Illinois, has raised $900.00 on a church lot. Beatrice, Nebraska, has raised a building fund of $350.00. Helena, Wisconsin, has dedicated Unity Chapel at a cost of $1,900.00. Keokuk, Iowa, has raised $7,805.50 to pay off an old church debt,—$1,000.00 of this amount contributed by the American Unitarian association. Topeka, Kansas, has completed a church at a cost of $7,950.00,—$2,400.00 of this coming from the Church Building Loan Fund. Greeley, Colorado, is building at a cost of $5,800.00,—all provided for but $900,—$2400 of it borrowed from the Church Building Loan Fund. St. Joseph, Missouri, has completed a church at a cost of $9,779.00, borrowing from Church Building Loan Fund $4,000.00. Manistee, Michigan, has finished a church and parsonage,—amount of cost not reported to this office.

The Winona people have raised within the year a subscription of $2,500.00 for a church lot. The Liberal Holland church at Grand Rapids, Michigan, has completed a church building, which, with lot and furnishing, has cost $7,682.96. Midland, Michigan, has completed a church at a cost of $4,000.00, by the help of $1,500.00 borrowed from the Church Building Loan Fund. The First Unitarian church of Sioux City, Iowa, has purchased an eligible church lot for $6,500.00 (which is already estimated as being worth nearly double its cost), on which nearly $4,000.00 has been subscribed, and the work goes on.

All Souls Church, Chicago, has paid $20,800.00 for this building and the lot whereon it stands, by the help of its many friends throughout the whole United States and Territories, the A. U. A. among them.

This statement of the cost of churches built or completed during the year is a transcript of special reports made to the Chicago headquarters. It has been found difficult to estimate with exactness what portion of the whole amount has been raised within the last Conference year, because the cost of building as reported now for the first time represents more than a single year's work. The following summary is an approximate statement, though in my judgment an understatement of the money raised within the bounds of the Western Conference since its last session in Cincinnati.

Church building begun at Kansas City, Denver and Greeley, $32,600. Subscriptions preparatory to building:

Sioux City, Iowa.....	$4000
Sioux Falls, Dakota.....	2000
Winona, Minnesota.....	2500
Moline, Illinois.....	900
Beatrice, Nebraska.....	350
	$9750

Amount raised for completion of buildings previously begun, $36,500; for liquidation church debts, $6,800.

Total of money and subscriptions raised within the year, $85,650.00. All of which indicates a healthy activity, an enlarging interest and a noble confidence in the future.

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

President Livermore reports: "A prosperous and useful year. The whole number in attendance has been thirty-two, four women and twenty-eight men. They have been from all parts of the country, and from several foreign countries,—England, Holland, Germany and Sweden. The new recruits were in general better fitted than usual for admission. Good progress has been made during the year. Amid so many varieties of character and faith, there has been as much unity of the spirit in the bond of peace as could be expected, or desired even, for the best purposes of discipline and spiritual progress. The prospect is encouraging for another year. We need, very much, more means for many purposes in the school, viz.: beneficiary aid, the library, increased staff of professors, etc., etc."

This school of the prophets has given us some of our most earnest and useful ministers. May it continue to give us men and women distinguished alike for breadth of vision, for zeal and ability.

STATE CONFERENCES.

The work of the several State Conferences will be briefly reported to you this morning by the state Secretaries.

It is clear that our State Conferences are getting a better grip on their work, and have a growing consciousness of power.

The movement in Iowa to organize and equip a lay-ministry is worthy of note. Its object is to "encourage the laity to enter more largely into the aggressive, moral and religious work which it falls to our denomination to do," to organize a new ministry, on whom the conduct of religious services shall partly depend, to provide for lay meetings, meetings in halls and school-houses,—in short, to create a missionary laity for the promotion of moral instruction among the masses.

This carries us back to the days of early Methodism, when Wesley organized that body of zealous and consecrated lay-preachers, whose labors were so indispensable to the progress of that great spiritual movement to which our own denomination is so deeply in debt.

If our Iowa friends succeed (and we shall watch the experiment with great interest) in organizing such a body of helpers, it will give a strong impetus to our work both east and west.

POST-OFFICE MISSION WORK.

The Post-office Mission work moves on with the steady tread of an assured and well-organized movement. It carries our joyful message to waiting and hungry hearts in every state and territory. One of these Post-office Mission ministers in Chicago furnishes the moral and intellectual pabulum for a monthly meeting of farmers and their wives in Florida. Another reaches out a hand to a lonely soul in Oregon, and fills him with new light and joy, and sets an orthodox minister in a western state to preaching Unitarianism. Professors in colleges and students alike eagerly receive from these home missionaries a literature which stimulates and inspires to higher thought and a better life.

"And so I remain firm of heart," says Father Brown, of Kansas. "Every tract which I send away I regard as good seed, and a prayer follows it, that it may fall upon good ground. I sow in faith. I have no doubt of the fruitfulness of the Post-office Mission; in the nature of things it can not help doing good; it is good for the intellect as well as the heart; it goes where the living voice is not heard; it is a still, small voice which whispers in secret; it is clear and affirmative."

Let our Post-office mission workers persevere and faint not. From their quiet homes they are leading the evolution of thought; they are promoting that great silent, bloodless revolution which is overturning old faiths and old ideals, and nursing the new growth of spiritual freedom and moral power which are springing up in the land.

A LOOK BACKWARD.

Notwithstanding certain embarrassing conditions under which the Conference started out, thanks to the good-will of its friends it was enabled to plan and carry forward its work much as in previous years. But the increasing misapprehension of its action was such that early in the year the Directors thought it necessary to issue the following letter:

"A LETTER TO THE CHURCHES."

"Brethren of the Western Conference: It becomes our duty, as the body intrusted by you with the care of the Conference interests, to announce that several ministers and laymen, heretofore acting with the Conference, have formed a new society, to be known as the Western Unitarian Association; its basis to be that of the American Unitarian Association, and its purpose to co-operate with that body in its western missionary work, without itself receiving or disbursing money. Its constitution and names of officers and directors have been officially announced. The purpose is to encourage our churches to transfer their usual contributions from the treasury of the Western Conference to that of the American Unitarian Association, whose western representative and agent the new society hopes to be; and thus to reduce your Western Conference to the position of a talking body, deprived of all executive functions.

"The cause of this action is the resolution which was passed by our Conference at its recent meeting in Cincinnati. The resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, that the Western Unitarian Conference bases its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all who wish to join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world."

"Our brothers feel that by extending this wide welcome to our fellowship, without referring in the welcome to any doctrinal belief or name, however great and dear to us, even the names of 'Christianity' and 'God,' our Conference has placed itself on non-religious ground and crippled all its possibilities for good. Hence they organize their new association.

"In view of this protest and the wide discussion east and west to which the Cincinnati action has led, your directors wish to indicate the meaning and bearing of the resolution there adopted, as they understand it. In our judgment that resolution has not changed in the least the practical aims of the Conference, nor is it likely to do so in the future. It also leaves the beliefs of the Conference what they were before, unrevised and undiminished. Theists are theists still, Christians are Christians still; and it is well known, and known by none better than our brothers, that there are few among us, men or women, who surrender either name. In truth we think that both these names have deepened in significance and value among us these last ten years,—years of more religious life and more missionary earnestness than any previous years in our western history. But—and partly in consequence of this deepening faith—the resolution distinctly means that Western Unitarianism, so far as represented by the majority at the Cincinnati Conference, does not refuse to fellowship any person of approved character and good work who is drawn to us in spirit, but may not share in our deep beliefs. The resolution means that we neither wish, nor feel we have a right, to give our Unitarianism bounds that will exclude those who worship God in spirit and in truth and in their life, whether they worship him in name or not.

"The resolution means that if such a man, be he layman or minister, eager to establish truth and righteousness and love in the world, comes to our gates, sees us worship, hears us at prayer, hears our spoken faiths, and says, 'Let me join you; my purpose is your purpose, though my faith is not wholly your faith,' he shall be welcome, welcome unreservedly. The resolution means that we would rather take the consequences in the world's eyes of accepting, than the consequences in our own souls, and in that man's, of rejecting him.

"It means that we think our part is to look to God, not men in such a matter; that we will organize Unitarianism, but not at the cost of spirituality, lest it cease to be a movement and become a sect; and that, therefore, as Unitarians, we esteem it our best missionary success to set the higher standard of religious faith and liberty and fellowship before men, even if men at first have nothing for that standard but misunderstanding and rejection,—all they had for the ideals of Jesus! The resolution means that we believe, to do this and, if necessary, suffer for it, is Christianity, in the sense of Christ-likeness, is living faith in God. This is what in our judgment the Cincinnati resolution means.

"And inasmuch as the resolution means this to your directors, we commend it to your careful judgment. If at first thought it seem dangerous, we ask you to give it second thought and face the central questions it involves until the answers in your mind grow clear and sure. And be it, of course, remembered that the resolution at Cincinnati binds the Conference no longer than the Conference desires; that the whole matter is as open to reconsideration as it was to first consideration.

"Meanwhile we commend to your remembrance the common laws of comradeship—patience with each other's minds, trust all around, and slow, warm-hearted judgment. We would remind you of many a Conference greeting that has made less lonely our church-life on the frontiers,—and with few exceptions our churches are still frontier churches with lonely duties to perform. We remind you of the growing hopes of service we have cherished these late years, as we have learned to join hands more closely in our state conferences and headquarters work. We are very small,—too small to break, brethren. As broken pieces of the Western Conference we shall help high causes in the west far less than if we stay together. And we are too much alike to break! Our thoughts, our faiths, our ideals, our worship, all our methods, are too closely the same to break. We cannot succeed in parting if we would.

"Let us do a nobler thing,—stand together! Let discussion go on to clear our judgments; it is a noble theme,—what are the essentials of Unitarianism? and will take us among the deep things of the spirit. And let us make this year our best for spiritual life inside our churches, and for earnest work around them. This year let real giving for our faith begin among us! Let us do things we have never done before! Our poverty is in our western hearts and wills, and not in western purses. First, before all,—keep up the old activities at our Chicago headquarters; call on our western secretary for much work, and enable him to do the work.

"Our western center must be live and strong, if we are ever going to have a western circumference broad. And next, let that which has hitherto been done occasionally by a few, become a custom with all our western churches,—the sending of an annual contribution, however small, to our mother-conference, the American Unitarian Association, in recognition of our larger fellowship and to keep strong the household bond. And then build up the state conferences.

"In the fellowship of faith and service, sincerely yours,

D. L. SHOREY, President.	S. S. HUNTING.
J. R. EFFINGER, Secretary.	C. J. K. JONES.
JAMES B. GALLOWAY, Treasurer.	J. LL. JONES.
HORACE H. BADGER.	A. M. JUDY.
J. V. BLAKE.	J. C. LEARNED.
W. C. GANNETT.	MRS. A. B. MCMAHAN.

F. L. HOSMER.

DIRECTORS OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

UNITARIAN HEAD-QUARTERS, 175 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill., July 27, 1886."

This letter was sent to all our churches east and west, and is the only official answer your Directors have made to the charges that have been preferred against the Conference, in consequence of the action at Cincinnati. The Conference has endeavored to go on its way with courage and hope, to meet contradiction and misunderstanding in a spirit of meekness and steadfastness, trusting to the sure verdict of time for its explanation and vindication. Its head-quarters, with all the activities centering there, has been maintained as usual. The lease of its rooms at 175 Dearborn street has been renewed for another year. Its work of fellowship and its missionary activities have been carried on as heretofore. The results of the year in missionary work, in self-reliant church-building work, in the development of home resources, have been reassuring.

CO-OPERATION WITH THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

In the month of April, a proposal was received by the Directors of the Western Unitarian Conference, from brethren in the east, to hold a consultation with representatives from the American Unitarian Association in regard to co-operation with that body in missionary work. Your Directors acceded to this proposal and invited a committee of the American Unitarian Association to meet them at the headquarters, 175 Dearborn street, at 2:30 P. M., April 28th. A consultation was held on the date named, the American Unitarian Association being represented by Secretary Reynolds, Rev. H. N. Brown, Rev. James De Normandie, Mr. A. L. Calder, and Rev. George A. Thayer,—certain brethren of the west who have differed with the Western Conference position, being also present. There was a frank interchange of opinion, but no definite results were reached. This was to be regretted, as the desirability of co-operation between the American Unitarian Association and the Western Unitarian Conference must be apparent to all. Our aims are essentially the same, and the interest of our cause in the west can best be promoted by joint action.

The Western Unitarian Conference with its thirty-five years of honorable work behind it, with its growing powers of usefulness, its fresh, inspiring outlook upon truth and duty, with its experience in the western field, and its ringing voice, as expressed in its literature, is fitted, as never before, for aggressive work and for active co-operation with the American Unitarian Association, and cordially welcomes such co-operation, provided it can be based on mutual confidence and equality of rights.

THE OPPORTUNITY BEFORE US

is one of increasing usefulness. This great empire of the west, with its rapidly developing material resources and population, with its own peculiar claims and needs, is making demands upon us far in excess of our ability to respond. The opportunity to lay the foundations of the church of the future is ours, and no thought of failure or looking back, of relapsing into inaction or dropping our task into other hands, should for one moment be allowed.

My heart was touched by the closing words of the Conference sermon by Brother Covell, one year ago, at Cincinnati, and they shall be the closing words of this report:

"Let us remember that we are not working alone for to-day, but the religion we represent has come to stay, not in its theories and forms but in its principles and influences, and whatever we do, is so much of a bequest to the ages. Our position is susceptible in the highest degree to zeal and missionary spirit. If we but observe the hands on God's time-piece and regulate our time by it, the future will hold for us glad surprises."

JOHN R. EFFINGER,
Secretary.

Religious Study Classes.

REPORT MADE BY MRS. E. A. WEST, PRESIDENT OF THE WOMEN'S WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

In conducting our Conference work the past year we have realized that the best way to promote religion is to diffuse a knowledge of its truths. We have, therefore, continued to encourage religious study classes.

Last fall we published an appeal to the members of our Conference urging the importance of this subject. This appeal was widely distributed through our directors, post-office mission workers and the churches.

From the reports of the churches, just received, we learn that in some instances the ladies are conducting their religious study in connection with the Sunday-school, a plan to be most heartily commended because of the advantage of weekly meetings and of its influence upon the children. If the mature people are not members of the Sunday-school, the children soon feel that they, too, should leave it. The presence of a large class of adults would correct this false impression. We trust that in every church where a study class does not exist the ladies will form one in the Sunday-school; and if gentlemen would also join it, the influence would be proportionately increased. In connection with the church at Minneapolis there is such a class, and at Topeka, Kansas, an adult class is led by the president of the Board of Education. At Lawrence there is a Liberal club of fourteen members, meeting on alternate Fridays. The ladies of Denver, Colorado, are thoroughly interested in this work, as their report will show. At Sioux Falls, Dakota, seven ladies meet weekly for study and consultation. At Sioux City, Iowa, there is a class of forty-two members which is holding thirty-six meetings this year, at which have been considered "Religious Training of Children in the Home," "The Public Schools," "Church and Sunday-school," "The Eight-hour System," "Dress, Food, Drink and Exercise in their Relation to Health." The ladies of the two churches in St. Louis continue their association, holding eight meetings during the year, with papers and discussions upon the "Unities of Unitarianism," "Relation of Health to Religion," "Relation of Parent to Teacher in Sunday-school," "Conference Work," "Development of Religious Truth," "Life of Lydia Maria Child" and "Present Tendencies in Religion."

The branch of the Women's Auxiliary Conference at Cincinnati have happily blended the continuous study of one subject with a miscellaneous programme. Every alternate meeting has been devoted to the life of Jesus, with the special topics, his Childhood, Doctrines, Friends, Miracles, Death and Resurrection; and at the other meetings papers have been read upon "Dress in its Relation to Health," upon "Punishment," and the "Higher Education of American Girls."

The Chicago Women's Unitarian Association is composed of members from the four churches, with a usual attendance this year of 120. At its monthly meetings a deeper and more earnest interest has characterized the gatherings. Thoughtful consideration has been given to the following subjects: "Women's Philanthropic Work in our City," "Organized Unitarianism," "Inspiration," "The Place of Emotion in the Moral and Religious Life," "Evolution of Religious Freedom," "What shall we do with our Doubts?" "Our Creeds," "Poets of the Liberal Faith," "Alice and Phoebe Carey."

The church in Denver reports a Religious Study class of twenty-six members, which has had papers and discussions upon "Love to Neighbor," "Prayer," "Church History," "William E. Channing," "Theodore Parker," "Organized Unitarianism in the West," "Poets of the Liberal Faith," "Religious Education of Children," "Bible in the Light of Modern Criticism," and "Inspiration of the Bible."

At Madison, Wisconsin, the study class consists of twenty-five members, who have held forty-seven meetings and studied the books of Corinthians and Galatians, "History of the Unitarian Movement," "The Present Aspect of our Liberal Movement," by Rev. Joseph Allen, "The Destiny of Man," "Darwin's Theory of Evolution," "History of the Charleston Church," "Yeal's Outlines of History of Religion," "Chinese and Egyptian Religion," "The Higher Education of Women," and "Brahmin's Religion."

Such a wide range of subjects must give food and enjoyment to the thoughtful members. When the associations for religious study are large and the majority of the members will not participate in the discussion, it may be wise to alternate the general meetings with smaller classes, designed mostly for conversation. By this plan a larger number will be induced to take part, and greater benefits will result.

Although these reports do not cover our entire field, they show that the good work is progressing.

Sixth Annual Report of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference. 1886-1887.

(1) WOMEN'S WORK IN THE CHURCHES.

Ohio. In Cleveland the Ladies' Aid society with twenty-five members has held thirty-nine meetings and raised $570, nearly one-half of which has been devoted to charitable purposes. $20 contributed to the W. W. U. C. Many of the women have been actively engaged in the kitchen-garden, which has been conducted in the church kitchen and parlors. The young ladies of this society started the free kindergarten which for three months also met in these rooms, although not directly connected with the church. The Unity club has been largely attended and has done very interesting work.

Cincinnati.—The Ladies' Benevolent society, which has eighteen paying members beside many occasional workers, held weekly meetings from January 1 to March 1; by a fair raised $500, for church purposes; spent a part of the fund on hand for material to make up for use in the day nursery, and to be given out through other channels to the needy. The Women's Auxiliary at its monthly meetings has attended to the reading and discussion of essays on the life of Jesus, alternated with papers on social topics. A continuance is reported of the usual activities. The day nursery is entirely carried on by the women of this church; the Associated Charities of the city, the free kindergarten and kitchen-garden, the hospital for women and children, the society for the prevention of cruelty to dumb animals, with other similar philanthropies and local literary societies, all have their zealous supporters. Unity Club was never more active. From Marietta comes a brief word breathing the true spirit of consecration to a noble purpose. The ladies try to meet every other week in the interest of the social life of the church society, and to do other necessary work for the church.

Iowa. Sioux City.—Unity circle, numbering forty-two, has held during the year thirty-six meetings and has raised $440.90; has re-paid to the American Unitarian Association a $200 loan, has spent for the publication of pastor's sermon in UNITY, $15; has contributed $5 to the Western Conference, and $5 to the W. W. U. C., besides four annual membership fees, and has helped defray the current expenses of the church. The work of the several sections of the Unity club is sufficiently indicated by the name of each, Dramatic, Shakespeare, Social, Social Science, and Young People's. This frontier church also furnishes workers for the temperance and White Cross movements, and to the Chautauqua and other societies.

Humboldt.—The Ladies' circle has had at its thirty meetings an average attendance of fourteen, has raised $213.68; $100 have been applied on minister's salary; $15 sent to Western Conference; $85.02 devoted to church improvement and other expenses. The "Light of Asia" and "Miss Toosey's Mission" have been read in the Circle. The whole society has been constituted a benevolent committee. The W. C. T. U., the Chautauqua, Unity club, Woman's Relief home, Woman's Relief Corps of the G. A. R., and the Association for the Advancement of Women, have members in this church.

Davenport.—The Ladies' Working society numbers twenty-seven; has held eighteen meetings. Money raised $580.27; part applied on minister's salary, and the rest used to meet running expenses. There are also a society composed of the young ladies, and a Lend-a-hand club, of the boys and girls of the church. Monthly teas are held, a success socially and financially, the proceeds being devoted to church repairs. Women of this church are active in the Associated Charities, the Industrial Relief Association and the Davenport Cooking School.

Des Moines and Algona have but one pastor, a woman, who preaches at each place on alternate Sundays. At Des Moines the ladies meet on Tuesday afternoons for sewing and reading. On Sunday evenings inquiry meetings are held, the subject discussed during the winter being Religious Evolution. The Algona ladies have raised $200 this year for church expenses. Every other Monday evening the minister meets the little children from seven to eight o'clock, and the older young people later, for the reading and discussion of moral and religious topics.

All Souls' church, at Sioux Falls, Dakota, yet in its first year, has a recently organized Ladies' circle of eight members, and a religious study class of seven. It has also a Unity club, with its Lowell section and Social Science section. Monthly socials are held.

Minnesota. St. Paul.—The women's side of Unity church work remains much the same as last year. The Ladies' Benevolent society continues to act in connection with the City Relief society, meeting one day each week to cut out and distribute work to poor women who come regularly for it. The church cupboard still serves its purpose of furnishing the sick and needy with delicacies, medicine, clothing and a friend. In December the annual Christmas sale netted $290. Unity church is represented by active workers in the Flower mission, Relief society, Home for the Friendless, Orphan asylum and Mitford home.

Minneapolis.—A ladies' circle of thirty-one members, has held sixteen meetings, has raised $180 and disbursed $138. Of this $30 were given to Rev. Mr. Janson's society and to Maternity hospital. Another sum was used in furnishing a room in the hospital, the rest has been applied to church furnishing. Other centers of interest and activity are the Sunday-school, including a Bible-class, a Young People's club and a Browning club. A Thanksgiving dinner was given to the boot-blacks and news-boys. In the new movements at Luverne and Winona, devoted women have been from the first among the most earnest and efficient workers. Luverne has already a ladies' reading and working circle.

Missouri. St. Louis.—Church of the Unity. Unity Working society has twenty-five members. $400 raised during the year have been spent in paying the organist and in meeting sundry small expenses, a reserve fund always being kept on hand for emergencies. The St. Louis association of Unitarian women devoted to religious study has thirty members from this church. A day nursery for the children of working mothers was started by the women of this church in June, 1886. Helping hands are also lent to the hospitals for children, the Flower mission, the Fresh Air mission, the Nurses' Training school, and the Industrial home for girls. Four ladies constituting a board of almoners dispense from a charity fund such sums as reason dictates or friendliness suggests. On Sunday evenings have alternated a Wordsworth class, and an ethical class, which has taken Jewish history in connection with Hall's "Lessons on the Bible."

Kansas. Lawrence.—The Ladies' Aid society in the year ending April 1, had eighteen regular members, but others often came to the meetings and helped in the work, of which the financial result was $206.70. Part of this was applied on the minister's salary, the remainder on church repairs and other incidental expenses. The Ladies' Liberal club meets on alternate Fridays, is studying the religions before Christianity, also English history and literature. Unity club meets every Friday evening for the reading of papers and discussion. Members of this are connected with the W. C. T. U., the Equal Suffrage society, and other literary clubs.

Topeka.—The proceeds of a May party, a New England supper, and four social teas amounted to $125, the greater part of which has been spent in fitting up a church kitchen and in furnishing the tables. In the church parlor, at the Sunday School Home, an adult class made up on the co-educational plan has been enthusiastically investigating theories of modern scientists. Unity club represents all the various activities of the church, its work being largely carried on by women on its various committees, social, dramatic, literary and musical. Concerts, lectures and other public entertainments have been given. A number of the ladies belong to the Hospital Guild, to Ingleside, a temporary home for friendless women and children, to the sewing school for poor children, also to the Literary Friends in Council.

Colorado. Denver.—The Ladies' Aid society, 48 members.

has held thirty-one meetings and raised $1,381.46. Part has been spent for rent of rooms; the remainder is to be appropriated to the purchase of an organ for the new church. A religious study class of twenty-six members has held ten meetings. Four annual members of the W. W. U. C., five of the Ladies' Relief society, two of the Orphan's home, and ten of the Young Ladies' reading club. At Greeley good work is being done; the matter of joining the W. W. U. C. is under consideration. At Boulder the women are active in literary and in local charitable work.

Wisconsin. Arcadia.—The Ladies' Benevolent society of about thirty members meets fortnightly, working in every possible way to help along the life of the church. Has raised $100, applied on minister's salary and running expenses.

Gilmanton.—The Ladies Aid society of the Union church association, including both liberals and orthodox, has been active in raising funds to furnish and decorate the church.

Baraboo.—The Ladies' auxiliary, twenty-five members, has raised $349, used for church repairs and incidentals, and applied on salary. The work of the women has been to make the Free Congregational society a living one, and the church home neat and cheery. They belong to various charitable and literary societies, notable among them being the Goose club, a reading circle whose Saturday evening meetings for twenty years have rarely failed.

Helena Valley.—A faithful few keep the society and Sunday school in working order.

Madison.—The Women's society has held weekly meetings, except in August, and has raised $209.63, expended on post-office mission, on music, for kitchen utensils, carpenter work, etc. A study class of twenty-five has taken up, mostly, religious topics; has also given some attention to scientific and educational questions. In the Sunday-school has just been organized a Lend-a-hand club to help in all good work. A choral club is to assist the choir in an occasional song service. The Contemporary club is a popular literary society of several years existence. The Channing club of university students studies Unitarian literature.

Milwaukee.—The Ladies' Benevolent society of twenty-four members has held twenty-two meetings, and raised $60.42. Partly expended in charity and for hospital bedding. The ladies are now furnishing rooms in the new home for working girls. Women of this church are connected with every Protestant charity and with the prominent literary societies of the city. A religious study class under the pastor's leadership is at work on the history of the children of Israel. The Social Life club of old and young has monthly meetings at the homes for social enjoyment, and provides also public entertainments at the church parlors.

Kenosha.—In the efficient hands of a committee of one the Post-Office mission is in a state of healthful activity. At Janesville the women are busy and helpful. At Cooksville the brothers and sisters have a common interest in the faith and bear for it a common toil, with only an occasional hearing of the preached word. Besides all these, the director for the State notes with pleasure how many are the helpers in the direction of liberal thought and charitable activity.

Illinois. Geneva.—The Ladies' society and Unity Help society have raised $305.35 for church expenses and charitable purposes. The ladies are also active in the W. C. T. U., the Flower mission, Unity industrial school and a George Eliot class. Geneseo has a Ladies' society and Unity club of twenty members, meeting every week, and also taking part in the Chautauqua society; $150 raised for church purposes.

Sheffield.—Much energy and enthusiasm among the ladies, thirty names on the society list, working at whatever their hands find to do. Mattoon still lives, although it has no Sunday-school and no religious study class. Boston and Chicago friends supply much good literature for missionary work.

Quincy.—The Ladies' Industrial society with thirty members, meeting fortnightly, and a weekly Monday club of fifteen members, have raised $365 for the church choir. The Monday club is reading "Stanley's Jewish Church." Members of this church contribute to the Blessing hospital, Free Reading room, and Woodland home. The president of the Associated Charities is a member of this church, as are three district visitors. The ladies are active members, of the Friends in Council, Atlantis, Round Table and Unity clubs.

The smouldering embers of Unitarianism in Princeton have been quickened this winter by the fierce blasts of continuous revivals. It seems now is the best time for years for this Conference to send a man, or better perhaps a woman, there to fan the flame. She has shown her revival by contributing thirty-five dollars to the various churches of the Conference, and added several new subscribers to UNITY.

Greater activity and interest have been displayed by the Chicago churches this year. Their work can not be fully described. Briefly condensing their reports, we may say in the Church of the Messiah, the Industrial society has raised $600. The fraternity has three sections, musical, dramatic and literary, and takes charge of the industrial school. The ladies also sustain a kindergarten and work in the Postoffice mission, and are interested in sixteen charitable and literary societies outside the church.

The Ladies' Aid society of Unity church, with fifty members, has raised about $1000. The industrial school, with its kindergarten and crèche, continues the excellent work of last year, with the addition of an evening school for men and boys. The young ladies also have a society meeting weekly for charitable work.

The Third church and All Souls' are conducted so as to avoid the sex line. This does not bespeak less activity, but more on the part of the women. The charity, social, missionary and educational sections have charge of their respective interests. The charity section of the Third church has thirty-six members and has held fourteen meetings and co-operated with the Associated Charity organization. Meeting fortnightly are the Literary, the Musical and the Longfellow clubs.

In All Souls' church the charity section has assisted seven efficient charitable institutions, besides needy individuals. The missionary section has carried on Postoffice mission work and has raised $150, which it has contributed to the American Missionary association and to the four Unitarian missionary organizations in the west. The Unity club is divided into three sections, which have been studying Emerson, Browning and philosophy. The four Chicago churches have from thirty-five to forty-five members each of the W. W. U. C., and have also contributed liberally, as the treasurer's report will show.

POSTOFFICE MISSION.

This work is being done with greater care year by year. The agents are becoming better acquainted with the material they are using, and are taking more and more pains to send only where it will be appreciated; more and more, working in the sublime spirit of consecration to noble endeavor which makes drudgery divine. An examination of the reports that have come in from Denver, Colorado; Lawrence, Kansas; Aberdeen, Dakota; Church of the Unity, St. Louis; Davenport, Des Moines, Humboldt and Mt. Pleasant, Iowa; Baraboo, Cooksville, Janesville, Kenosha, and Madison, Wisconsin; Athens, Grand Rapids, and Muskegon, Michigan; Cincinnati and Cleveland, Ohio; and from Geneva, Geneseo, La Fox, Normal Park, Princeton and Chicago, Illinois, yields these Mission results: Postal cards and letters sent 2030; Unity tracts, 2821; Unity Short tracts, 3156; Unclassified, 9615; American Unitarian Association tracts, 10,777; Register, 2914; UNITY, 4165; Miscellaneous, 1840. Total, papers, 8744; tracts, 26,805. Number of people receiving, 853. Postal cards and letters received, 740. Books loaned, 72; sold, 17; given away, 4. In Cincinnati, 136 copies of "Miss Ellis's Mission" were given away by Mrs. Smith and Mr. Ellis, and 61 copies sold by mail and at the church door.

These figures tell but a part of the story. They must be supplemented.

Our veteran Post-office missionary, Rev. J. S. Brown of Lawrence, Kansas, has sent out about 4000 tracts and papers of which he has not kept an itemized account. Another enthusiastic defender of the faith, living in Michigan, gives an account only of the $46.75 spent.

The Denver distribution of tracts, 945 in all, beside numerous papers unrecorded, has been thus far mainly at the church door; but the committee have begun to reach out into the country with their literature, and are purposing to do more in that direction. Among the good things planned for the near future are a Free Readingroom and a Loan Library. To the list already given should be added the church door distribution at La Fox, Illinois, 240 tracts; Davenport, 338; Cincinnati, 1688 and 113 papers. Also at Ann Arbor, Mich., a large number carefully selected, often with reference to the subject of the morning sermon.

The St. Paul branch of the Post-Office mission has been adopted by Unity church as a part of its missionary work for the future. Here, as elsewhere, more liberal advertising has brought an increased number of applicants, showing that the work is limited only by the amount of money to be spent, and the time one can afford to give for love's sake only. At Luverne and in Duluth the ground was well seasoned with liberal literature by the Post-office mission before any effort was made to hold services. Our St. Paul friends have brought into the field a new laborer, an Icelander, who has translated some of Rev. Kristofer Janson's tracts into his native tongue, and is now having them printed for distribution among his countrymen.

The report from Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, says: "In the general distribution of literature for the Women's Auxiliary conference we have perhaps done more than in previous years. But this is their work, not ours. Ten barrels of books, papers, and valuable magazines have been placed in active circulation where the help and stimulus was both needed and appreciated. This material has brightened the Anamosa penitentiary, the Girls' Reform school, the Benedict home, an Indian Agency school, several Union Sunday-schools, two temperance headquarters kept open all the while, and many country homes. On our Post-Office mission list we had in December 159 names, with over one hundred on special lists, that we did not try to supply regularly. All of these names have been given out in groups, varying from ten to fifty names, to New England committees who are now dealing more faithfully with them than we have been able to do with so large a parish and only a committee of one to care for it. . . . We believe the Post-office Mission is destined to play an important part in the work of religious reconstruction that is only now fairly begun."

Humboldt, Iowa, writes, "We have supplied a large number of people in the country and awakened considerable interest in the work; have done some advertising and mailed quite a large number of A. U. A. tracts, UNITYS, Registers and UNITY tracts. Expended for postage about $4.50, the Ladies' society supplying the funds."

(3) CENTRAL OFFICE WORK.

May 15, 1886 to May 15, 1887.

Postal cards and letters sent out, 683; Church Door Pulpit, 3874; American Unitarian Association tracts, 2727; Unity Mission, 1428; Unity Short, 1071; Miscellaneous, 1339; Loan Library catalogues, 116; Religious Study Class and Programmes leaflets, 135; Secretary's report last year, 59; Post-office Mission circular, 84. Register, 353; Unity, 424; Miscellaneous, 356. Belief leaflets and cards, 371. Postal cards and letters received, 666. The subscription to Mr. Savage's Unity Pulpit sermons from P. O. M. agents which passed through the secretary's hand to Mr. George H. Ellis, publisher, was $64.99. Postage on Mr. Chadwick's sermons, $6.77.

Reading matter received. From the American Unitarian Association, Boston, four packages of tracts delivered at the office free of charge; from Mr. Charles H. Kerr, papers and some 4000 Church Door Pulpit tracts; from Rev. J. T. Sunderland, fifty copies of the Unitarian for March and May, 1886, 51 copies of "What Unitarians Believe," and 150 "Sermons on Great Themes," papers, and Unity Pulpit sermons from several individuals; from Church of the Disciples, Boston, branch of the Women's Auxiliary Conference, a box of papers and 884 sermons by Rev. J. F. Clarke, including the first two of the monthly series of eight, of which 1600 were promised in all; from the Barton Square W. A. C., Salem, Mass., a box of papers and magazines: The Boston box also brought ten books to the Loan Library, of which the secretary has had charge during the year.

From the Sunday-school society, Boston, in December, 50 copies of "Every Other Sunday," the ten copies that had been coming to this office fortnightly having been shortly before transferred to the Sunday-school at Arcadia, Wisconsin.

(4) OUTSIDE WORK OF THE SECRETARY.

In October at the State Conference held in Chicago, the secretary responded to a call for a few words on the work of the Woman's Conference. Later, a vote of the directors sent her to Winona, Minnesota, where she read a paper on the general subject of woman's work in the churches, and gave an account of Miss Ellis and the Post-Office Mission.

The secretary has preached in Mattoon and Warren two Sundays each, in Tremont one Sunday, and has also supplied the pulpits of Rev. Mr. Judy in Davenport and Moline, and of the Third Church in this city, once each,—in all eleven sermons.

Our Women's Conference needs more members. And more women in our churches need this added stimulus to noble living which comes from joining an association devoted to helpful work for humanity. The Post-Office Mission is but the beginning of good to be done by us and those who will join our ranks in the future. As was beautifully shown by Miss Ellis, this work has been done at its best by an invalid, a living aspiring soul pent in a feeble body restricting her to stay-at-home work alone. Scores are taking this up where she left it. Will this service satisfy all? Where are the young and the strong who will take up the work she longed to do, go out into little villages and hamlets and preach the gospel of the larger hope; with our Iowa sisters, illustrating the "fitness of women for the ministry of religion."

MARY H. GRAVES, Secretary.

Fourteenth Annual Report of the Western Unitarian Sunday-School Society. 1886-1887.

REPORTS FROM THE FIELD.

This year has brought fuller returns than any previous one from the Sunday-schools within the range of the Western Conference. Blanks were sent out to sixty-six parishes to be filled from the Sunday-school records; forty-five have been returned, and two reports have been made in person—over two-thirds of the whole. Last year it was not quite half. Of these, thirty-seven gave definite statistics of school work, and ten replies by postal were received with reasons why no school was sustained. The cause of discontinuing, in most cases, is said to be that no minister is in charge. All but two of these have been discontinued for several years. Of these two, one hopes that "another year this will not be the case," and the other believes that the present Unitarian difficulties are responsible for the depressed condition of church and school work in that locality. This, possibly, may be true; for so earnest a state of activity in thought and life, abroad in the field at large, must of necessity work both ways,—depress for a time in some instances, as well as generate fresh life in others. The west has given birth to more new beginnings this year than in any other year during the charge of the present secretary. These are Moline and Hinsdale in Illinois; Helena and Gilmanton, Wisconsin; Sioux Falls, Dakota; Luverne, Minnesota; Keokuk and Rock Rapids, Iowa. Minneapolis, Minnesota, recommenced work last fall in the new church, and sends in a good Sunday-school report for the winter. Five of the reports were accompanied by a cordial letter giving a few further particulars.

We have statistics from nine schools in Illinois—Alton, Buda, four in Chicago, Geneva, Geneseo, Quincy and Sheffield; two in Indiana—La Porte and Hobart; two in Michigan—

Jackson and Midland; six in Wisconsin—Arcadia, Gilmanton, Helena, Madison, Milwaukee and Janesville; two in Minnesota—both in Minneapolis; five in Iowa—Davenport, Humboldt, Iowa City, Keokuk and Sioux City; one in Dakota, at Sioux Falls; one in Missouri,—Church of the Unity, in St. Louis; one at Omaha, Nebraska; two in Colorado—Greeley and Denver; one at Louisville, Kentucky; and three in Ohio—Cleveland, Cincinnati and Marietta.

The number of pupils enrolled in these schools is 2785, of which the average attendance is about two-thirds. In three instances there are more boys in the school than girls, but a general average shows about three-fifths as many of the former as of the latter. There is gain, though slow and small, in favor of giving the freshness of the morning hour to the Sunday-school. Two years ago, when this question was last asked, there was a trifle less than half preferring it; now, the trifle is a degree larger on the other side of the half. Then, there were four which held their session in the afternoon; now, only one; and one also during church service in the morning.

Sixteen of the schools have followed but one line of study; while in nineteen from two to six or more different lesson-courses have been in use during the year. Two take their study from the Bible only, and one reports itself as "doing independent work." The proportion of sixteen single-course to nineteen graded schools is nearly the same ratio as has been found before; but those using several different courses of lessons have gained a little in number over those using but one. Our schools are in a condition which calls for the systematization of lesson-work, and our programme this morning endeavors to meet this want in some measure, through the thought and experience of a few who have been earnestly engaged in this part of the Sunday-school work.

"Unity Services and Songs" is used in twenty-five schools. A few speak of it as difficult, but most express a growing satisfaction with it. The "Sunny Side" is still used in connection with this, and also now the new "Carol," lately published. Two or three are changing from the former to the latter. Rev. H. G. Spaulding's "Hymnal" is used in three schools, and in three also they sing from the song-tract, "Love to God and Man."

The fact that so large a proportion as nineteen to sixteen of the schools follow several lines of study, naturally leads to the expectation that teachers' meetings are not as well sustained as a year ago. The proportion is a little less this year, being about one-third against nearly one-half last year. Wherever these meetings are held, expression is most hearty in appreciation of the direct benefit and pleasure derived from them, and they are generally considered indispensable for really good work. One school, young and small, reporting no teachers' meetings, surely ought to be counted among those holding them, for the superintendent replies, "I have informal talks with the one teacher whenever I please." Another answers, "not yet; just beginning." That is precisely the time when they are needed. The fewer the teachers, the less difficulty in securing full attendance; and the newer the work, the more need of consultation. It is hard to tell with which they are needed most—with the young and unsettled beginners, as a means of infusing spirit into the new work, or with the well-filled, established and prosperous ones, to prevent the external life from overtopping the internal quickening powers. Have teachers' meetings in new schools as a preliminary movement toward external growth, and hold them firm and fast though there be but two or three who meet. Let every part of the work pass into consideration, if you really aim to grow into a live school. Not only study the lesson in company, but choose the worship service carefully, and rehearse it; sing the songs together, look over the records, loosen the earth and pour water around the roots of every difficult and unfruitful question in the work before you. In small parishes, where the growth can never be a matter of much increase in numbers, this united foundation is indispensable. And have teachers' meetings in the older and larger schools, as a continual quickening of internal growth. Keep the hidden fountains flowing; put individual interest and effort into the work;—the union of individual efforts brings high standards and noble results in any work; it is disunion that scatters and destroys. Happy is that school whose standards do not rest in its external conditions, but which places its hopes of growth upon an entirely different scale of being! To have a fundamentally vigorous life, a school depends more upon the religiously earnest spirit which prevails, than upon the lesson used or the methods applied. It is a something which is unseen, but pervading; it is in the air, and is catching. The teachers' meeting is the place where it is generated.

Twelve schools observe the four regular services,—Christmas, Easter, Flower and Harvest. Nearly all observe one or more of them, and several have concerts and other celebrations.

The library continues to be a real help to most of the schools using one at all. It does good missionary work for the scholars and through them for the homes into which the books enter. There are five which either do not use a library, or consider it a very unimportant contributor to the vigor of the school. All but one of these are city schools where a good public library is at hand. As to its being a real help or a necessary evil, two consider it both and two neither, which places the estimate of these four on about the same footing. It also leads to the inference that in these places the library holds as nearly as possible its rightful average valuation as one of the useful benefits to the school, but not an essential to its actual vitality.

It is probably one of the best evidences of good religious tone in our Sunday-schools, that the spirit of being helpful as well as receiving help is steadily gaining ground. Each year the average increases in favor of an outside missionary interest. Last year's report showed that nearly half the schools,—ten to twenty-three,—were contributing to some outside interest either by work or money. Now we have more than half,—twenty-one to thirty-four. Some of these schools, like people, forget their good deeds in keeping their faces set toward what they are aiming to attain. But the recipient of the benefits does not forget, and although four of the blanks from schools which had made generous contributions to the Western Unitarian Sunday-school Society, omitted to record the same, it was the secretary's pleasure to supply that defect and count them in for more than they claimed. It suggests also the probable existence of other unrecorded interests of similar character. Day nursery, industrial school, supporting a bed in a hospital, flower mission etc., are some of the channels into which this missionary work is directed. There is a first and primary outgo that any Sunday-school, which has life enough to exist at all, cannot fail to sustain; that is, the influence it scatters abroad through the individual lives of those who meet together for its purposes and who carry that influence away with them into daily contact with other surroundings. Later on, as the school gathers vigorous activity and grows, friction increases and the prevailing spirit tends toward the formation of its individuality as a body. This needs a definite outward expression, and to strengthen this tendency by giving to the school some one direct interest outside of itself has a thoroughly wholesome effect upon its character. The former tendency is to scatter, the latter to crystallize. It is the beautiful correlation of forces in a school complete and well-poised as a body, as in any other body; the power that concentrates only to diffuse,—that diffuses only to concentrate. It takes a long time in small country schools, where the tendency of surrounding nature is toward slow and quiet growth, to recognize and respond to this law, and many never come to it, yet continue to do good work while being only half what they might be; but in city neighborhoods teeming with life, the immediate pressure of surrounding forces compels more rapid growth, and to sustain well-balanced conditions these schools must the more promptly and efficiently meet and subject themselves to the outer and inner relations of life.

The total sum of money raised by the 37 schools reporting is $1708.42 making an average of $46.11 to each. Most of this has gone into the current expenses of the schools, not more than one-fourth being approximately the proportion put into the missionary work. Among the expenses we are glad to notice such items as pictures and piano, beside library and text books, children's papers, entertainments, etc.

The two main difficulties of previous years to be met in Sunday-school work, are still the difficulties of to-day. The obtaining of teachers who can grasp, and yet hold themselves subject to, the demands of the situation; and the remoteness of the parents' relation to the school. More earnest teachers, and more interest from the parents are still the anxious demands. These two difficulties really resolve themselves into one and the same, whose cause lies far back of Sunday-schools, and reflects a similar deep-seated difficulty in homes, day-schools and social life. This is the too great separation of mutual interest and kinship of relation between old and young, parent and child; between those who direct and those who execute, those who are to teach and those who are to learn. Parents and teachers do not sufficiently recognize that they must follow the children's lead, if they expect the children to follow theirs; that they must respect the instincts born in the incoming generation, if they would win respect for the experience of the one going out; that they must be guided not only by what they know of the past, but by what they do not know of the future; and that this future can be shown them through a genuine union of their interests with those of the children, more than through any other power in their lives. It should not be understood from this, however, that there is no gain in this particular on the part of the schools. Several of them report progress in the right direction, but most of them continue to lament the deficiency. With some there has been gain in the attendance of visitors at the opening services, in help toward the preparation of lessons, or in sending the children regularly. But probably in no religious denomination have the Sunday-schools so small a proportion of adult members as in the Unitarian.

The minister is, in nearly every case, closely connected with the school either as Superintendent or teacher of Bible Class, or both. Where this is not the case, he is a frequent visitor and contributes actively to the interest of the exercises.

The needs for the future, and the encouragements from the past, are many and varied. It has been already indicated what are the two needs most distinctly expressed. The next, that of more adequate lesson methods, will be treated here to-day. An improvement in black-board system is wanted by one; by another, a good chorister; and by several, better musical discipline. There is a tone of good cheer in the sources of satisfaction named which, if this report can convey it, may perhaps lead others to go and do likewise, although there is perhaps but one new hint among them. One thinks the special attention given to the music has been the greatest improvement of the year. "Sunny Side" and "Services and Songs" were both used, and several concerts were a result of their efforts. With two or three a monthly sociable has proved thoroughly helpful as a means of bringing together the children and promoting the interests of the school. Kindergarten features have been successfully introduced in the primary department in one place; while the infant class work done in another, where a separate room, organ and library for seventy pupils make it a school within a school, has been their best work for the winter. The school of the Church of the Messiah in this city has found, in a monthly tea party for the teachers, a means of much helpful exchange of thought upon the work in hand. In the same school also a careful inspection each week of the answers to the lesson-papers of the Union course, before returning them to the pupils, with written estimates of the same, has proved a stimulus to more thoughtful study. Temperance work is a specialty at Hobart, Ind., and the report says they are doing the best work religiously that they have ever done. The mission school in St. Louis, which has been carried on in connection with the Church of the Messiah, holds its session at 3 P. M., and has 367 pupils enrolled. These figures were not included in the total number of scholars given, because the school is now working on an undenominational basis and hardly considers itself as belonging among those who should make report to this society. It has this year abolished the prize system and finds that better results are obtained without than with it. They find also that the use of the Bible as text-book has proved much better than any thing among the children they have to teach, and they believe that a real church of the people can be gradually built up from the school.

Turning from the field and the interests of the schools at large, the work of the Sunday-school Society at the has been substantially the same as shown in reports of previous years. Its Board of Directors has met each month excepting July and August, with a good attendance. Matters of business import at the headquarters, together with those of interest in relation to the schools at large, have occupied the attention of the members.

HEADQUARTERS

The Union Teachers' Meetings have been held here and attended by teachers from three of the Chicago schools. Unity church, having adopted a graded course of study, did not find it to the advantage of its teachers to join the meetings. The lessons have been a continuation of last year's study of the prophets in the Old Testament. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and Job have been the ones chosen, and the course is not yet completed. Next winter the lessons will be upon Jesus and his associates.

There has been no change in the business relations of the society. As heretofore, it has occupied the position of home-keeper for the three branches of Western Unitarian work known as the Western Unitarian Conference, the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, and the Sunday-school Society. The sale of publications of the society, and of those of the Boston society and the London association, has been carried on here. Also books of Unitarian interest held on sale from the American Unitarian Association and George H. Ellis of Boston, or owned by the society, have been supplied through this office to order of our customers so far as possible. Such hospitality as could be extended from these rooms to friends living in and out of the city has been one of the pleasant duties of the society and its secretary.

Publications have been only a few leaflets, such as a little drama for the Christmas season; a New Year's story in tract form with a pretty woodcut as title page, over 2,000 of which were distributed freely to the schools as a greeting, and cards containing the Ten Commandments. Two new editions of "Services and Songs" show the generally increasing favor which the book finds by acquaintance. As to the future needs, there are many plans in waiting, and the calls for new publications are accumulating. This year we had one very distinct plan which outweighed every other, and that was to come to the next annual meeting with our debts all paid. In the hope of realizing this, nothing has been issued during the year that could involve much expense. A class-book for Sunday-school records, which has been one of the demands of the last few years, was projected, and a committee has prepared the plan. Its publication is delayed until more means are forthcoming, and those interested here to-day are invited to examine and make suggestions. Among the publications asked for are lessons specially adapted to temperance work, lesson series on Jesus for children just beginning to read; also Bible stories related from a Unitarian standpoint, for children under ten years of age to read for themselves; another Christmas drama—a thoroughly cheery, spirited, yet simple and homelike one; a pamphlet biography series on Marcus Aurelius and others, to put into the hands of the pupils; and others which have been suggested in previous years and are still waiting.

The cordial help which has been given us this year is a matter of much encouragement. Why may it not grow, and the plan of an annual entertainment in each school for the benefit of the Sunday-school Society become one of the fixed festivities in the calendar of every society? This plan, proposed at the last annual meeting, has been carried out in some seven or eight schools, and some who have not chosen to gather up their contribution in this manner have done it otherwise. The schools which have so loyally joined hands with us are Cleveland, $20; Chicago, Church of the Messiah, $20; Third church, $55, and All Souls, $20; Geneseo, $10; Humboldt, $5; Quincy, $20; Sioux City, $10; Mr. Janson's church at Minneapolis, $5; Unity church, of St. Louis, $21; and Davenport, $10.

This Sunday-school society has been in existence fourteen years. Its schools have been increasing in number, and its own executive functions have been steadily growing. Its first effort was the issuing of lesson manuals, to bring out the activity of class-work and enlarge the thought-life of its schools. That line of work being taken up by abler hands, its second was to gain a stronger foothold of its own and establish more mutual relations between itself as a body and its schools as individuals. The next should be the binding together of those mutual relations for a fuller exchange of services toward the growth and development of stronger and truer Sunday-school work. The times are ripe for it. Our schools and this society are ripe for it. It will take heart and confidence, which means time and money. There must be more personal relations between the schools on the one side and the society on the other. There must be more interchange of thought and experience on both sides, more emphasis put into the establishment of just this relation, if we would strengthen the main cause for which we both exist. Let us join hands, both hands, and pledge ourselves for more co-operation. We shall all fall short of our deepest obligations toward this main cause if we do not recognize, and recognizing, grasp this fullness of time.

ELLEN T. LEONARD, Secretary.

Treasurer's Report of the Western Unitarian Conference for 1886-7.

1886.	Dr.
May 22,	To C. S. Udell, Treasurer, certificate of deposit in Grand Rapids National Bank.....	$3000 00
June 2,	" Interest thereon from March 22d to June 22d, 3 months @ 3 per cent.	22 50
" "	" W. C. Gannett, loan, to meet current expenses.....	600 00
Aug. 2,	" Interest for 6 months on C., B. & Q. R. R. bonds, $3000 @ 4 per cent.	60 00
Nov. 26,	" Estate of S. Patterson, loan on call, 1887.....	250 00
Feb. 1,	" Interest for 6 months on C., B. & Q. R. R. bonds, $3000 @ 4 per cent.	60 00
Mch. 17,	" Estate of S. Patterson, loan on call, 1887.....	250 00	$4242 50
	To Western Unitarian Sunday-school Society for shelving.....	$ 40 00
" "	" Women's Western Unitarian Conference for shelving.....	5 00	45 00
" "	" Contributions from churches.....	1206 25
" "	" Contributions from individuals.....	880 61	2086 86
			$6374 86
1886.	Cr.
June 25,	By C., B. & Q. R. R. (Denver extension) bonds, $3000 @ 99½ cents.....	$2985 00
	Accrued interest from Feb. 1st, 1886, 4 per cent.....	47 01
	Brokerage, ⅛ of 1 per cent.....	3 75	3035 76
	By Printing bill for Conference of 1886.....	$ 18 75
" "	" J. T. Sunderland, Secretary, salary for June, 1886.....	125 00
" "	" J. T. Sunderland, bill for sundry expenses.....	36 61
" "	" Charles H. Kerr & Co., printing proceedings of Conference of 1886.....	100 00
" "	" J. R. Effinger, Secretary, salary from June 1, 1886, to May 1, 1887, 11 months @ $125.....	1375 00

(Brought forward from other column.)

" Rent of headquarters one year, to May 1, 1887.....	780 00
" Janitor, care of headquarters for one year, to May 1, 1887.....	63 00
" Stationery, printing, and sundry expenses on Secretary's requisitions.....	88 20
" Sundry expenses on Treasurer's account.....	15 50
" Printing for Conference of 1887.....	28 50
" Exchange, collection two checks.....	50
" Secretary's traveling expenses.....	156 19	2787 25
		$5823 01
Debit, total.....		$6374 86
Credit, ".....		5823 01
Balance.....		$551 35

ASSETS.

C. B. & Q. R. R. bonds, par.....	$3000 00
Accrued interest, May 1, 1887.....	20 00	3020 00

LIABILITIES.

W. C. Gannett.....	$ 600 00
Interest, 6 per cent. to May 1, 1887.....	33 00
Estate of S. Patterson.....	500 00
Interest, 6 per cent. to May 1, 1887.....	8 75	$1141 75

JAMES B. GALLOWAY, Treasurer.

Receipts from Churches for 1886-7.

Algona.....	$ 5 00
Alton.....	10 00
Buda.....	10 00
Chicago—Church of the Messiah.....	10 00
" Third Church.....	60 00
" All Souls.....	52 50
Cincinnati.....	25 00
Cleveland.....	125 00
Davenport.....	25 00
Des Moines.....	15 00
Detroit.....	10 00
Geneseo.....	30 00
Geneva.....	20 00
Grand Rapids.....	10 00
Greeley.....	10 00
Hinsdale.....	10 00
Helena.....	10 00
Hobart.....	5 00
Humboldt.....	15 00
Janesville.....	20 00
Kenosha.....	10 00
Madison.....	30 00
Marietta.....	12 35
Minneapolis (American).....	30 00
Muskegon (Unity Club).....	15 00
Omaha.....	18 00
" balance for 1885-6.....	10 00
Princeton.....	10 00
Quincy.....	77 40
Sheffield.....	24 00
Sioux City.....	50 00
Sioux Falls.....	7 00
St. Joseph.....	10 00
St. Louis (Church of the Unity).....	290 00
St. Paul.....	125 00
Topeka.....	10 00
	$1206 25
Members of the Church of Messiah, Chicago, paid individually.....	$ 190 00
Members of Unity Church, Chicago, paid individually.....	45 00

Guaranty Report.

When it was known, immediately after the Cincinnati Conference of 1886, that some of the churches were likely to withhold their usual contributions to the Conference treasury, a guaranty fund of $1520 was at once raised by a few friends to meet the expected deficit. Of this amount it has been necessary to call for $974.15, as the following items show:

Total current expenses for year 1886-7, as above, ... $2787 25
 Contributed by churches, as above, ... $1206 25
 Contributed by individuals other than guarantors ($880.61 mentioned in Treasurer's account, less $425.50 of this, advanced by guarantors) 455 11 Received from other sources ($187.50 mentioned in Treasurer's account, less $35.76 cost of investing permanent fund) 151 74

$1813 10
 Deficit made good by twenty-one guarantors 974 15
 $2787 25

W. C. GANNETT, Agent for Guarantors.

Treasurer's Report of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference.

May 12, 1886 to May 17, 1887.

RECEIPTS.

Cash in hand, May 12 $ 4 36
 By the Unitarian Soc., Algona, Iowa 5 00
 " " Cincinnati branch of the W. A. C. 5 00
 " " Church of the Unity, Cleveland, O. 20 00
 " " Unity Church, Denver, Colo. 5 00
 " " Unitarian Soc., Davenport, Iowa 5 00
 " " " " Des Moines, " 10 00
 " " " " Janesville, Wis. 5 00
 " " " " Madison, " 5 00
 " " Unity Church, St. Louis, Mo. 35 75
 " " St. Louis branch of the W. W. U. C. 20 00
 " " Unity Circle, 1st Unitarian Soc., Sioux City, Iowa 5 00
 " " Church of the Messiah, Chicago, Ills. 50 00
 " " Third Church, " " 21 00
 " " All Souls Church, " " 20 00
 " " Contributions for P. O. Mission work, ... 25 50
 " " Personal contributions 39 00
 Annual memberships, $1 each $ 234 00
 Life " $10 " 20 00
 $280 61
 $254 00
 $534 61

PAYMENTS.

To Traveling Expenses of Secretary $ 20 26
 " C. H. Kerr & Co., for stationery 12 25
 " Bookshelves, twine, and paper 5 12
 " Postal cards for office use 10 00
 " Unity Mission Tracts 18 13
 " Postage, wrapping paper, &c., for Secretary ... 4 77
 " Incidentals—Secretary 4 05
 " Secretary's salary 200 00
 " Rent and expenses of Central Office 216 00
 " Subscription for Christian Register 15 62
 " " " Unity 18 75
 " Postage and stationery for Treas. 6 34
 " Balance 3 32
 $534 61

STATE EXHIBIT.

	Annual Memberships.	Life Memberships.	Other Contributions.
Colorado	$ 6	$--	$ 5 00	$ 11 00
Dakota	1	--	---	1 00
Iowa	11	--	25 00	36 00
Illinois	176	20	134 50	330 50
Kentucky	---	--	5 00	5 00
Massachusetts	1	--	---	1 00
Michigan	2	--	3 00	5 00
Minnesota	11	--	---	11 00
Missouri	1	--	55 75	56 75
New York	1	--	---	1 00
Ohio	8	--	25 00	33 00
Texas	2	--	---	2 00
Wisconsin	14	--	23 00	37 00
				$530 25

MRS. J. C. HILTON, Treasurer.

Treasurer's Report of the Western Unitarian Sunday School Society.

May 1, 1886, to May 20, 1887.

RECEIPTS.

Balance on hand May 1, 1886 $ 57 83
 Received on bills outstanding, May 1, 1886 103 30
 " from sale of mdse. 1,375 67
 " " Annual Memberships 86 00
 " " Life " 70 00
 " " Donations:
 " " Cleveland 20 00
 " " Chicago, Church of Messiah 20 00
 " " " All Souls Church 20 00
 " " " Third Church 55 00
 " " Davenport, Ia. 10 00
 " " Geneseo, Ills. 10 00
 " " Humboldt, Ia. 5 00
 " " Minneapolis (Scandinavian) 5 00
 " " Quincy, Ills. 20 00
 " " St. Louis (Church of Unity) 21 00
 " " Sioux City, Ia. 10 00
 " " Friends 4 28
 $200 26
 " " Rentals at Head-quarters:
 " " W. W. U. C. $216 00
 " " Charles H. Kerr & Co. 120 00
 " " J. T. Sunderland 15 00
 351 00
 $2,244 06

DISBURSEMENTS.

Paid on bills outstanding prior to May 1, 1886 $ 310 84
 " for mdse. bought and publications made 869 36
 " " Room rent and Clerk 432 79
 " " Boy 143 00
 " " Secretary and Treasurer 150 00
 " " General expense, stationery, expressage, printing, &c. 126 71
 " " Room expense, repairing furniture, laundry, &c. 15 77
 " " Insurance 12 93
 " " Gas 8 20
 " " Advertising in Unity 30 00
 " " Postage 67 00
 " " Carpenter's bill to W. U. C. 40 00
 Cash on hand 37 46
 $2,244 06

RESOURCES.

Cash on hand $ 37 46
 Mdse. and plates 862 11
 Furniture 40 00
 Accounts receivable 70 81
 $1,010 38

LIABILITIES.

Notes payable $ 103 17
 Accounts payable 5 10
 Present worth of W. U. S. S. Society 902 11
 $1,010 38

ELLEN T. LEONARD, Treasurer.

Report of the Proceedings of the Thirty-third Annual Meeting of the Western Unitarian Conference.

ALL SOULS CHURCH, CHICAGO, May 17, 18, 19, 20, 1887.

A large audience assembled at 8 P.M., May 17, to hear the opening sermon, by Rev. H. M. Simmons on "The Divine Unity." Rev. F. L. Hosmer and J. L. Jones conducted the devotional exercises.

The exercises were opened May 18, at 9 A.M., by a devotional meeting led by Rev. S. S. Hunting, of Des Moines, Iowa. At 10 A.M., Rev. J. L. Jones, minister of All Souls Church, welcomed the Conference.

President Shorey delivered the opening address.

On motion Rev. Judson Fisher, of Sheffield, was elected Assistant Secretary.

Moved and passed that a business committee of seven be appointed.

The chair announced the committee as follows: Rev. J. C. Learned, Rev. W. C. Gannett, Mr. J. M. Good, Mr. J. D. Ludden, Rev. Mary A. Safford, Rev. M. J. Miller, Rev. J. L. Jones.

Mr. J. R. Effinger, the Secretary, then made his report, which was referred to the Business Committee.

Mr. Galloway, the Treasurer, submitted his report.

Mr. Effinger moved the appointment of a committee on credentials, carried. Mr. Effinger, Mr. Copeland, and Miss Hultin were announced as the committee.

Reports from State Conferences were called for.

Mr. Crothers reported for Minnesota; Mr. Hunting for Iowa; Mr. Powell for Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri; Mr. Rowen for the church at Detroit; Mr. Sunderland for Michigan and Mr. Effinger for Illinois.

Mr. Galvin asked the privilege of the floor. He stated that he was the bearer of "a printed address in the interest of harmony and co-operation," to the members of the Conference from "the Executive Committee of the Western Unitarian Association," and desired permission to distribute copies of the same. Referred to the Committee on Business.

Mr. Gannett and Mr. Blake reported on publications. A supplement to the Treasurer's report in reference to the guaranty-fund, was made by Mr. Gannett. Mr. Gannett, Mr. Utter, Mr. Miller and Mr. Hunting offered various resolutions which were referred without reading to the Business Committee. The Conference adjourned.

At 2 P.M. President Shorey called the Conference to order and introduced W. W. Clay, of Chicago, who read a paper on "Church Architecture."

At 2:30 P.M. Rev. F. W. N. Hugenholtz, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, gave a paper entitled "Church Organization and Membership." A discussion followed, Messrs Powell, Blake and Jones taking part.

At 3:30 P.M. Rev. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul, Minnesota, read a paper on "Prayer." A brief discussion followed, in which Rev. Charles Ellis, of Michigan, Rev. J. C. Adams, of the Universalist church, Chicago, Rev. J. H. Allen, of Cambridge, and William Salter of Chicago, participated.

The Business Committee reported back the resolutions referred to them, recommending that they be taken up in the order in which they were presented. In reference to Mr. Galvin's request, they reported that, while in their judgment "the printed address" offered to the Conference, presented no new suggestions not already made familiar in recent discussions, they yet recommended that copies of it be placed on the rack near the door for distribution.

Mr. Copeland moved that this recommendation of the Business Committee be adopted. Mr. Judy seconded. Mr. Blake opposed. Mr. Cole moved to adjourn. Lost. Mr. Sprigg offered as a substitute: Resolved—That this Conference concur in the recommendation to place the pamphlet at the door. Passed. The Conference then adjourned.

At eight o'clock in the evening the church was filled to hear addresses on "Church Union", by Dr. H. W. Thomas, Chicago, Rev. Reed Stuart, Detroit, Michigan, and Rev. Amos Crum, Dubuque, Iowa.

The exercises opened Thursday at 9 A.M. by devotional meeting, led by Rev. Marion Murdock, Humboldt, Iowa.

At 10 A.M. the Committee on Delegates reported one hundred and nine accredited delegates, from thirty-two societies and associate organizations. Mr. Jones moved that the report be accepted subject to further revision. Passed.

Mr. Powell moved that each person having a right to vote in the Conference, presenting a resolution, shall be given ten minutes. All others having a right to vote in the Conference shall be given five minutes to each separate resolution. An amendment was offered that the time be extended to fifteen minutes. Amendment lost. The original motion was then carried.

Mr. Gannett addressed the Conference, and submitted the following resolution.

Resolved, THAT, WHILE THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE HAS NEITHER THE WISH NOR THE RIGHT TO BIND A SINGLE MEMBER BY DECLARATIONS CONCERNING FELLOWSHIP OR DOCTRINE, IT YET THINKS SOME PRACTICAL GOOD MAY BE DONE BY SETTING FORTH IN SIMPLE WORDS THE THINGS MOST COMMONLY BELIEVED TO-DAY AMONG US,—THE STATEMENT BEING ALWAYS OPEN TO RE-STATEMENT, AND TO BE REGARDED ONLY AS THE THOUGHT OF THE MAJORITY.

Therefore, SPEAKING IN THE SPIRIT AND UNDERSTANDING ABOVE SET FORTH, WE, DELEGATES OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CHURCHES IN CONFERENCE ASSEMBLED AT CHICAGO, MAY 19, 1887, DECLARE OUR FELLOWSHIP TO BE CONDITIONED ON NO DOCTRINAL TESTS, AND WELCOME ALL WHO WISH TO JOIN US TO HELP ESTABLISH TRUTH AND RIGHTEOUSNESS AND LOVE IN THE WORLD.

AND, INASMUCH AS MANY PEOPLE WISH TO KNOW WHAT UNITARIANISM COMMONLY STANDS FOR, SPEAKING ALWAYS IN THE SPIRIT ABOVE SET FORTH WE MAKE THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT OF ITS PAST HISTORY AND OUR PRESENT FAITHS.

OUR HISTORY.

In this country Unitarians came out from the Congregational churches of New England some eighty years ago,—came out as New Protestants, asserting—

- (1) The Supremacy of Character above Belief, in Religion.
- (2) The Rights of Reason in the use of the Bible Revelation.
- (3) The Dignity, as against the Depravity, of Human Nature.
- (4) The Unity, not Trinity, of God; the Divinity, not Deity, of the Christ; and that Jesus was sent as teacher to save us from our sins, not as substitute to save us from the penalties of sin.

Channing was their leader then. Since Channing's day belief in the Bible as a miraculous revelation, and in Jesus as having any authority save as his word coincides with natural reason and natural right has largely faded away among them. This second movement of their thought began some fifty years ago; and Emerson and Theodore Parker have been their real, though at first their unaccepted, leaders in it.

To-day few Unitarians but trust free thought and trust it everywhere; we only fear thought bound. Therefore our beliefs are still deepening and widening, as science, history and life reveal new truth; while our increasing emphasis is still on the right life and great faith to which the right life leads,—faith in the Moral Order of the Universe, faith in All-Ruling Righteousness.

OUR FELLOWSHIP.

In all matters of church government we are strict Congregationalists. We have no "creed" in the usual sense; that is, no articles of doctrinal belief which bind our churches and fix the conditions of our fellowship. Character has always been to us the supreme matter. We have doctrinal beliefs, and for the most part hold such beliefs in common; but above all "doctrines" we emphasize the principles of Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion. These principles make our all-sufficient test of fellowship. All names that divide "religion" are to us of little consequence compared with religion itself. Whoever loves Truth and lives the Good, is, in a broad sense, of our religious fellowship; whoever loves the one or lives the other better than ourselves is our teacher, whatever church or age he may belong to. So our church is wide, our teachers many, and our holy writings large.

OUR DOCTRINES.

With a few exceptions we may be called Christian theists; theists, as worshipping the One-in-All, and naming that One, "God, our Father"; Christian, because revering Jesus as the greatest of the historic prophets of religion; these names, as names, receiving more stress in our older than in our younger churches. The general faith is hinted well in words which several of our churches have adopted for their covenant: "In the freedom of the Truth, and in the spirit of Jesus Christ, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man." It is hinted in such words as these: "Unitarianism is a religion of love to God and love to man." "It is belief in the humanity of God and the divinity of man." "It is that free and progressive development of historic Christianity, which aspires to be synonymous with universal ethics and universal religion." But because we have no "creed" which we impose as test of fellowship, specific statements of belief abound among us,—always somewhat differing, always largely agreeing. One such we offer here.

We believe that to love the good and live the good is the supreme thing in religion:

We hold reason and conscience to be final authorities in matters of religious belief:

We honor the Bible and all inspiring scripture, old or new:

We revere Jesus and all holy souls that have taught men truth and righteousness and love, as prophets of religion:

We believe in the growing nobility of Man:

We trust the unfolding Universe as beautiful, beneficent, unchanging Order; to know this Order is truth; to obey it is right, and liberty, and stronger life:

We believe that good and evil inevitably carry their own recompense, no good thing being failure and no evil thing success; that heaven and hell are states of being; that no evil can befall the good man in either life or death; that all things work together for the victory of Good:

We believe that we ought to join hands and work to make the good things better and the worst good, counting nothing good for self that is not good for all:

We believe that this self-forgetting, loyal life awakes in man the sense of union, here and now, with things eternal,—the sense of deathlessness; and this sense is to us an earnest of a life to come:

We worship One-in-All,—that Life whence suns and stars derive their orbits and the soul of man its Ought,—that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, giving us power to become the sons of God,—that Love with whom our souls commune. This One we name,—the Eternal God, our Father.

Mr. Utter offered as a substitute to Mr. Gannett's resolution the following:

Whereas, by virtue of its act of incorporation the Western Unitarian Conference exists for the purpose of promoting the interests of the churches associated in it; and,

Whereas, according to the principles of congregationalism, all questions of doctrine and of fellowship, so far as the latter may be limited by or hinges upon the former, pertain to the individual churches and can be decided only by them; therefore,

Resolved, that any action on these questions is beyond the province of this Conference, and consequently null and void.

A discussion on these resolutions followed, in which Messrs. Robbins, Sprigg, Van Inwagen, Powell, Jones, Tiffany, Crothers, Blake, Judy, Hosmer, Learned, Cole, Ellis, Copeland, Hunting, Thayer and Mrs. Sayres took part.

The substitute was then voted down.

Mr. Thayer offered the following amendment.

Resolved, That, while the Western Unitarian Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member by declarations concerning fellowship or doctrine, it yet thinks some practical good may be done by setting forth in simple words the things most commonly believed to-day among us,—the statement being always open to restatement, and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority.

Therefore, speaking in the spirit and understanding above set forth, we, whose names are hereto appended, delegates from Western Unitarian churches in Conference assembled at Chicago, May 19, 1887, declare our fellowship to be conditioned on no doctrinal tests, and welcome all who wish to join us, to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world. (Then followed the rest of Mr. Gannett's statement as printed above.)

The amendment was lost.

Mr. Galloway spoke to the main question.

Mr. Hunting moved as an amendment to the resolution to strike out the words between "therefore" and "to know."

Mr. Judy seconded the amendment. This amendment was lost.

Mr. Gannett's resolution was then carried by a vote of 59 to 13.

Mr. Utter moved that the seventh resolution be taken up. Seconded and carried.

Mr. Utter read the resolution as follows:

Whereas, the American Unitarian Association, the Western Unitarian Conference, and the several state conferences are doing missionary work with the same aims and purposes in the same territory; therefore,

Resolved, that the Western Unitarian Conference, now assembled, hereby suggests the formation of a general missionary board, to consist, if agreeable to the other bodies named, of the secretaries of the American Unitarian Association, the Western Unitarian Conference, and the several state conferences, with the addition perhaps of the missionaries at work in this territory, said board to have consultative and advisory power in regard to all missionary work within the limits of the Western Unitarian Conference, its recommendations to be honored by the executive boards of the several organizations so far as it seems possible and right to them, and to this end

Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed to act for the Conference in perfecting the organization of such a general missionary board in connection with the other missionary bodies above named. This resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote.

Rev. Mr. Miller offered the following resolution.

Resolved, that the Western Unitarian Conference at each annual session shall give an opportunity for any duly accredited delegate to read such brief statements of religious faith as the individual may wish to offer. The same to be received without debate or vote and published with the Conference minutes. Provided that the person who makes the statement shall subscribe his name and pay the cost of publication. This was adopted.

The fifth resolution was called for. It was read by Mr. Hunting. Mr. Judy moved an amendment by striking out two clauses. Amendment carried. Resolution was adopted as follows:

Whereas, this Conference aims to be strictly representative of the churches composing it according to the article of its incorporation which says, "The object for which it is formed is the transaction of business pertaining to the general interests of the societies connected with the conference;" therefore,

Resolved, that this Conference will endeavor to carry out the aims, teachings and spirit of the churches forming it.

The sixth resolution was adopted as follows:

Resolved, that the interest of the Western Unitarian Conference is identical with that of the American Unitarian Association in everything pertaining to the missionary work to be done, that their cause is our cause, that we know no east or west in the grand work of spiritual emancipation which this time demands of us, and that we extend to them a fraternal hand and a consecrated heart and ask their co-operation, as in years past, in the propagation of Unitarianism in the west.

The meeting adjourned.

In the afternoon Rev. S. J. Barrows, of Boston, read a paper on "A New Study of Celsus."

Mr. Hosmer offered the following resolution:

Whereas, since the last meeting of this Conference the Rev. W. G. Eliot, D.D., of St. Louis, for so many years identified with the Unitarian cause in the west, has passed from this earthly life; therefore,

Resolved, that the delegates and members of the Western Unitarian Conference, in conference assembled, desire hereby to express our deep and enduring regard for this elder brother and associate so widely beloved, our grateful appreciation of his noble life, of his great services to the cause of true religion and the educational interests of his adopted city and state, as well as through the entire west; and that our sense of loss in his death finds its comfort in the deeper sense of joy and quickened faith as we look back over a life so prolonged, so blessing, and so blessed, so rich in accomplishment even up to its last hour. To us he has but joined that great company who "being dead, yet speak."

Resolved, that this expression of our feeling be entered upon our records, and that copies be sent to the family of our friend and to the church of which he was senior minister.

This resolution was seconded by Mr. Learned, and passed unanimously by rising vote.

Mr. Learned reported for the Business Committee, nominating the following officers:

President, Hon. D. L. Shorey, Chicago; Vice-President, Rev. S. S. Hunting, Des Moines; Secretary, Rev. J. R. Effinger, Chicago; Treasurer, Mr. J. B. Galloway, Chicago.

Directors for three years: Messrs J. V. Blake, W. C. Gannett, D. L. Shorey, J. C. Learned, J. N. Sprigg, S. M. Crothers, Miss S. A. Brown.

Directors to fill vacancies for two years: Mayor John A. Roche, Mr. John Wilkinson, Rev. Mary A. Safford.

Moved that this report of the Committee be adopted, and that the Secretary cast the ballot of the Conference. Adopted.

The officers named were declared elected. The financial outlook was considered. It was determined to engage the whole time of the Secretary, instead of three-fifths of it as last year, at a salary of two thousand dollars; and to announce no definite apportionments for the churches for the current year, but to look to them as heretofore for the help they usually give. The Business Committee recommended the raising of a guaranty fund to meet possible deficit for coming year. Over eighteen hundred dollars was secured for this purpose from delegates and friends during the afternoon and evening sessions. Mr. Effinger moved that the thanks of the Conference be given to the people of All Souls church for their hospitality and courtesy during the Conference. Seconded and passed by a rising vote. The meeting then adjourned.

Thursday evening session.

The meeting was called to order by the president. Rev. C. Covell, of Buda, led in prayer. Rev. Mary A. Safford read a paper on "Reasons for Church Going."

Rev. Joseph Waite followed with a paper on the same topic.

The chair announced David Utter, J. R. Effinger and A. M. Judy as the committee to confer with committees from the American Unitarian Association and the several State Conferences concerning the appointment of a missionary board.

Mr. Utter moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas, there is a vacancy of five of the members of the school board of Chicago, which is about to be filled by appointment by the newly elected mayor,

Resolved, that we heartily favor the movement for the appointment of women upon said board, and we recognize the wisdom and justice of permitting the mothers of Chicago to share with the men in the management and control of those who have charge of the education of their children. Adopted.

After a reception in the church parlors the Conference adjourned, sine die.

J. R. EFFINGER,
Secretary.
JUDSON FISHER,
Assistant Secretary.

Sixth Annual Meeting of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the W. W. U. C. was held in All Souls church, Chicago, on Tuesday afternoon, May 17, 1887, Mrs. E. A. West presiding.

Opened by devotional meeting led by Rev. Mary A. Safford, of Sioux City. Psalm read and prayer offered by Rev. Augusta J. Chapin, of Oak Park. Soulful words were uttered by Miss Safford on the strength and comfort derived from the thought of God as all good and ever near.

The president delivered her annual address, and the reports of the secretary and treasurer were read and accepted.

A report of missionary work in Dakota, prepared by Rev. Eliza T. Wilkes, Sioux Falls, Dak., was read by Miss Jennie Dow. Report of the church activities of Michigan was given by Mrs. E. R. Sunderland; of Wisconsin by Mrs. Minnie S. Savage, Cooksville, Wis.; of Illinois by Mrs. C. J. Richardson, Princeton, Ill. The report of the work in Colorado, prepared by Mrs. E. H. Hiscock, of Denver, was read by Mrs. H. A. McConnell.

An address upon "What did Phœbe do?" was delivered by Rev. Marion Murdock, Humboldt, Iowa.

Mrs. A. L. Moss, a member of the St. Louis Branch Conference, instructed by the ladies of the Church of the Messiah of that place, presented the following statement and notice:

"Whereas it has been determined to send a delegate to the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, to be held at Chicago, May 17, 1887, and it is thought to be proper to formulate an expression of feeling in regard to the purpose and object of this Conference, it is Resolved, that we, the ladies of the Church of the Messiah, who are also members of the St. Louis Branch of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, do hereby emphasize our belief in the necessity of a clearly defined religious basis of action, founded on Theistic and Christian principles." Passed almost unanimously at St. Louis, May 8, 1887.

In accordance with the resolution of the ladies of the Church of the Messiah, just read, I give notice that I shall, at the next annual meeting of this Conference, move an amendment to our Articles of Incorporation, substituting in Article 2 for the words "The Advancement of Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion," the words "The Promotion of Unitarianism, whose Central Principles are Love to God and Love to Man."

ANNA L. MOSS.

The Nominating Committee made the following report:

President, Mrs. E. A. West, Chicago, Ill. First Vice President, Mrs. J. C. Learned, St. Louis, Mo. Second Vice President, Mrs. A. G. Jennings, La Porte, Ind. Secretary, Miss Florence Hilton, Chicago, Ill. Treasurer, Mrs. J. C. Hilton, Chicago, Ill.

For Directors for three years: Mrs. E. A. West, Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. O. C. Dinsmore, Omaha, Neb.; Mrs. C. C. Warren, Hinsdale, Ill.; Mrs. C. J. Richardson, Princeton, Ill.; Mrs. M. S. Savage, Cooksville, Wis.; Miss S. A. Brown, Lawrence, Kan.; Mrs. J. C. Hilton, Chicago, Ill.

For Post-office Mission Central Committee: Rev. A. M. Judy, Davenport, Ia.; Miss F. Le Baron, Elgin, Ill.; Miss Florence Hilton, Chicago, Ill.

For Study Class Committee: Mrs. E. R. Sunderland, Ann Arbor, Mich.; Mrs. E. A. West, Chicago; Miss Florence Hilton, Chicago.

For Literature Committee: Mrs. E. A. West, Chicago; Mrs. S. C. Ll. Jones, Chicago; Mrs. E. E. Marean, Chicago; Mrs. E. C. Whipple, Sheffield; Miss F. Hilton, Chicago.

The officers nominated were elected.

Miss F. Le Baron presented the following, which was carried unanimously:

I move a vote of thanks to our retiring secretary, Miss Mary H. Graves, for her faithful and efficient service during the past year, together with our sincere regret that Miss Graves feels obliged to terminate her official connection with this association.

A letter was then read from Mrs. Judith W. Andrews, of Boston, President of the Women's Auxiliary Conference, conveying the greetings of the directors of that Conference and messages of sympathy and encouragement. It was moved by Mrs. C. T. Cole, and carried, that Miss Mary H. Graves convey to the meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Conference, to be held at Boston, May 23d, the thanks and kind greetings of this Conference.

Meeting adjourned.

MARY H. GRAVES,
Secretary of W. W. U. C.

Fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Western Unitarian Sunday School-Society.

The Annual Meeting of the Sunday-School Society was held in Chicago, Friday, May 20, 1887, at All Souls Church. The session opened at 10 A. M. with a service selected from "Unity Services and Songs," and with the singing of several songs from the same book.

An address followed by the President, J. V. Blake, after which the annual report of the work of the Society and its schools was read by the Secretary, and the Treasurer's report by the treasurer.

A Business Committee was appointed consisting of F. L. Hosmer, of Cleveland, J. N. Sprigg, of Quincy, A. M. Judy, of Davenport, J. Ll. Jones of Chicago, and Mary A. Safford of Sioux City, Iowa.

The Treasurer's report showed that the indebtedness of $175 last year, had been reduced to $32.76. Three life memberships of $10 each were promptly subscribed, one from Sioux City, Iowa, one from All Souls Church, Chicago, one from the Church of the Unity, St. Louis, and the remaining $2.76 was paid by a friend. This canceled the debt and, offsetting the cash on hand and accounts receivable against the notes and accounts payable, gave the society an even balance sheet with which to begin the new year. Rev. A. M. Judy, of Davenport, Iowa, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, that we recognize that a Sunday-school manual in which the early history of the Christian church is illustrated by its art and by appropriate text, would be of great service to the Sunday-schools; and that therefore we would suggest to the Unitarian Sunday-school Society, of Boston, the preparation of such a manual; and that this Society will co-operate as far as possible, if so desired.

It was further

Resolved, that this Board of Directors confer with Rev. Arthur Knapp, and, if possible, arrange for him a lecture course, looking toward the preparation of the above manual, under the auspices of the Western Sunday-school Society.

These resolutions were adopted.

Rev. David Utter introduced the subject of lesson-papers under the Union Course system of study for the coming winter. This course of study is upon Jesus and his associates, and is intended for use not only in the three schools of Chicago, which are following the Union series, but also for any schools outside which may wish to join. Sample lesson slips were distributed for examination,—the entire course being now ready, so that it can be supplied complete in advance.

A paper was read by Prof. Alexander Kerr, of Madison, Wis., upon Bible Class Work, which engaged the interest of the audience; and following this, Mrs. S. W. Conger, of the Church of the Messiah, Chicago, gave some excellent suggestive thoughts in her paper entitled, "What shall our Unitarian Sunday-schools Study?" That part of the programme which called for "Queries and Discussion," in charge of Miss E. E. Gordon, of Sioux City, Iowa, owing to the lateness of the hour was reluctantly postponed to some future time.

The Business Committee reported nomination of officers for the coming year, as follows: For President, J. V. Blake; Vice-President, Mrs. S. W. Conger; Secretary and Treasurer, Ellen T. Leonard. For Directors for three years, in place of those whose term expired with the date of this meeting, Miss M. L. Southworth, of Cleveland, William Bouton, of St. Louis, W. C. Gannett and E. T. Leonard, of Chicago. The officers nominated were elected.

The returns from the subscription cards, which had been circulated for memberships earlier in the meeting, were announced as amounting to $49, life and annual, cash in hand, and three annual to be paid during the year. The plan for a Sunday-school Record Book, to be published in the fall of 1887, was presented, with sample copy modeled by hand, and suggestions with regard to the same were invited.

It was moved by Mr. Jones that a committee of three be appointed from this Society by the Chair, to confer with a committee from the two Conferences at the Headquarters, for the adjustment of the business relations between these three bodies during the year ending May, 1888. The Chair appointed J. Ll. Jones, Mrs. S. W. Conger, and Mrs. Jonathan Slade, all of Chicago.

A motion was made by Rev. Mary A. Safford, of Sioux City, Iowa, and carried, that the thanks of the Society be tendered to the officers thereof for the faithfulness of their efforts in promoting the welfare of the Society and its schools.

Meeting adjourned.

ELLEN T. LEONARD, Secretary.

The Discussion on the Resolution Concerning a Declaration of Fellowship and Faith.

REPORTED BY MRS. R. HOWARD KELLY, AND SLIGHTLY REVISED.

The Conference met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 o'clock A. M., May 19th, 1887.

The President, D. L. Shorey, in the chair.

After a report by the Committee on Delegates, giving the names of delegates entitled to vote, and a report from the Committee on Business, Rev. Enoch Powell moved that the time given to the speakers be limited to ten minutes for the mover of a resolution, and to five minutes for those following. The motion was seconded by Rev. J. Ll. Jones, and carried.

REV. W. C. GANNETT, of Chicago:

Mr. Chairman: The resolution I am to offer and to speak to, is in the nature of a substitute for, and enlargement of, the resolution passed at Cincinnati last year. It is so long that it ought to be before our eyes, as we can not take it in unless we read it; therefore I would like to have everybody here have one of these little leaflets, entitled "The Things Most Commonly Believed To-Day Among Us."

[The printed leaflets were distributed. The resolution and appended "declaration" will be found on page 200 above, in the official report of the Conference.]

I want to speak to three points:

First, as to the form of the resolution that I offer.

Second, as to the congregational right of this resolution.

Third, as to the advantages of this resolution.

AS TO THE FORM.

I said just now, it is in the nature of a substitute for the resolution passed last May at Cincinnati. At Cincinnati I offered two resolutions, which are now familiar. The first was;

Resolved, "That the Western Unitarian Conference conditions "its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all who wish to "join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the "world."

This resolution passed by a large majority, thirty-four to ten.

The second resolution was not passed, but was lost by a small majority, and that one read:

Resolved, "That while the above expressly represents the basis "and width of our fellowship, and while the Conference has neither "the wish nor the right to bind itself or any single member by a "declaration of doctrines, it yet thinks some practical good may be "done by setting forth in simple words the things most commonly "believed to-day among us, the statement being always open to re- "statement, and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority; "and that to this end a committee of five be appointed to draw up "such a declaration of belief, to be submitted to the Conference at "its next annual meeting,"—which meant this present meeting.

The first resolution, the one passed, was very sweeping. It said, as if speaking for the whole of us, "The Western Unitarian Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all," etc. In the course of the year, the question has been raised whether that were "congregational," and there are some who feel that, strictly and literally taken, it did perhaps infringe upon the rights of congregations. Therefore I offer now a change in the wording of that "fellowship" resolution as passed at the last Conference at Cincinnati; and what I further do to-day is to offer in one resolution the substance of those two resolutions offered at Cincinnati. You will notice that the change consists in making the "fellowship" resolution, which at Cincinnati we made to cover everybody, in the present resolution apply only to the majority, binding nobody, and not extending beyond to-day:

I will read the present preamble, and will you please follow:

Resolved, "That, while the Western Unitarian Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member by declarations concerning fellowship or doctrine, it yet thinks some practical good may be done by setting forth in simple words the things most commonly believed to-day among us,—the statement being always open to re-statement, and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority."

You notice that I say "concerning fellowship" as well as doctrine, —to that extent modifying the resolution passed last May at Cincinnati. To continue:

"Therefore, speaking in the spirit and understanding above set forth, we, delegates of the Western Unitarian Churches in Conference assembled at Chicago, May 19, 1887, declare our fellowship to be conditioned on no doctrinal tests,"—changing dogmatic to doctrinal—"and welcome all who wish to join us to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world."

"And, inasmuch as many people wish to know what Unitarianism commonly stands for, speaking always in the spirit above set forth, we make the following statement of its past history and our present faiths."

That is the resolution that I offer, and appended to it comes the "Statement."

Now I am going to risk the fate of this whole declaration by pointing out one word which is ambiguous. This is a word whose ambiguity has been developed this year in the course of the discussion. Of course I ought to make this explanation. The one ambiguous word here is the word "fellowship." At the risk of losing the whole thing, I am going to tell you what the offerer of the resolution means by that word "fellowship." I mean fellowship absolute and unconditioned; full, co-equal fellowship; applying to all, to lay-men and lay-women and to ministers, equally; full co-equal fellowship in everything which lies within the privilege and title of Unitarians, and that governs the use of our Unitarian name. I mean that. I do not mean mere church hospitalities, nor mere right to the office of Sunday-school teacher or trustee. I do not mean anything short of full, co-equal fellowship. I think the word "fellowship" means just that. "Church-fellowship" is almost a technical phrase, as I understand it, and means whole, co-equal fellowship. I dwell on this point because a good deal has been said about it. The right to the name, the right to our Unitarian name, as well as the right to be a Unitarian, is the meaning of "fellowship" to me.

That whole phrase was caught out of our old 1875 declaration, which was something like this one. Away back in 1875, when the Western Unitarian Conference had a sort of resurrection, after years of almost stagnation and death, they passed this resolution: "Resolved, that the Western Unitarian Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests, but welcomes all thereto who desire to work with it in advancing the Kingdom of God." Let me remind you how that resolution came to be offered, and to be passed, I believe, unanimously. In the east, the American Unitarian Association was dropping from its official Year-Book list of ministers, the names of a few ministers who did not take the "Christian" name, or did not claim it,—dropping from the Year-Book those names, saying, "You have no right there, because you do not take the Christian name." The Western Conference passed their resolution directly looking toward that action of the A. U. A. I think that showed very clearly what the word 'fellowship' meant at that time. It meant, "Whether you take the 'Christian' name or not, you are entitled to the 'Unitarian' name. Christian name or not, you are entitled to the Unitarian name. The Western Conference conditions its fellowship on no dogmatic tests." That has been ringing in our ears twelve years. I caught that into the phrase used at Cincinnati; and here it is again. That is my reason for keeping the word "fellowship," and I keep it in its absolute sense. I know some of you do not agree with me. Some of you use the word in a much narrower sense, but I risk the whole resolution on that word "fellowship."

Now, to go on. You see this "declaration" is divided into three parts: a little sketch of "our history," a word about "our fellowship," and then some words about "our doctrines."

In the history, if you will read it carefully, you will find that, in a nut-shell, it states the three phases of our history,—the Channing phase, when it began,—the Parker and Emerson phase, later on,—and the out-look to-day.

Then come a few lines about our fellowship; I will not read that. I would like to read the rest of it, about our doctrines. Please notice how frank it is. Frankness is essential; there ought to be nothing unfrank in a Unitarian word or deed.

"With a few exceptions"—notice those words allowing for exceptions—"with a few exceptions we may be called Christian theists; theists, as worshipping the One-in-All, and naming that One, 'God, our Father;' Christian, because revering Jesus as the greatest of the historic prophets of religion; these names, as names, receiving more stress in our older than in our younger churches. The general faith is hinted well in words which several of our churches have adopted for their covenant: 'In the freedom of the Truth, and in "the spirit of Jesus Christ, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man.'" That is Charles Ames' form, which has been copied by quite a number of our churches.—"It is hinted in such words as these: 'Unitarianism is a religion of love to God and love to man.'" We have been saying that for fifty years. Those words were put into a resolution offered in Cincinnati, and it was refused there because from the way in which it was offered it seemed to be in the nature of a binding creed. With this preamble here, it becomes something which everybody can say.—"It is hinted in such words as these: 'Unitarianism is belief in the humanity of God and the divinity of man.'" There is a whole sermon, a month of sermons, in that little phrase by Edwin Browne of Charleston: "Unitarianism is belief in the humanity of God and the divinity of man." And here is Mr. Barrows' word: "It is that free and progressive development of historic Christianity, which aspires to be 'synonymous with universal ethics and universal religion.'" So there we have four short statements of Unitarianism: Charles Ames', Mr. Sunderlands'—or that of Jesus, we will call it; Edwin Browne's, and Mr. Barrows'.

"But because we have no 'creed' which we impose as test of fellowship, specific statements of belief abound among us,—always somewhat differing, always largely agreeing. One such we offer here." And a little statement follows. It contains words from the Bible; it contains words which Socrates uttered at Athens after he had been sentenced to death for his faith; it contains some heart-words, I think, by Samuel Longfellow; it contains a great line of William Salter's; it contains the old watch-words of Unitarians. To me this statement seems very noble; it has on my mind somewhat of the effect of the chanting of a great Psalm. Yet I can easily understand how a more ennobling, how a larger,—no, not larger, but a better, more inspiring statement, could be made. I do not expect all of you to have my feeling about it. I am going to read it to you, though.

"We believe that to love the good and live the good is the supreme thing in religion:

"We hold reason and conscience to be final authorities in matters of religious belief:

"We honor the Bible and all inspiring scripture, old or new:

"We revere Jesus and all holy souls that have taught men truth and righteousness and love, as prophets of religion:

"We believe in the growing nobility of Man:

"We trust the unfolding Universe as beautiful, beneficent, unchanging Order; to know this Order is truth; to obey it is right, and liberty, and stronger life:

"We believe that good and evil inevitably carry their own recompense, no good thing being failure and no evil thing success; that heaven and hell are states of being; that no evil can befall the good man in either life or death; that all things work together for the victory of Good:

"We believe that we ought to join hands and work to make the good things better and the worst good, counting nothing good for self that is not good for all.

"We believe that this self-forgetting, loyal life awakes in men the sense of union, here and now, with things eternal,—the sense of deathlessness; and this sense is to us an earnest of a life to come:

"We worship One-in-All,—that Life whence suns and stars derive their orbits and the soul of man its Ought,—that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, giving us power to become the sons of God,—that Love with whom our souls commune. This One we name,—the Eternal God, our Father."

AS TO THE RIGHT.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as shortly as I can, I wish to speak about the right of passing this as a resolution by the Conference, and then about the advantages of doing so.

If there is any wrong in passing it, it is because it is uncongregational, because it infringes on the rights of our congregations. That objection will be raised in a moment before you; it will be discussed this morning, no doubt. In the first place, let me say that this thing, in principle, is no new thing. This is not the first time it has been done; there is ample precedent for it. Precedent made by bodies whom you know well, and respect. In the American Unitarian Association's by-laws, stand the words, "The object of the Association is to promote the interests of pure Christianity." I call that a statement of faith; don't you? Is not the A. U. A. to-day almost insisting on that as a statement of faith, if it take the position that it won't grant aid to churches that do not take the "Christian" name? I am not now criticising the position; but there is the A. U. A. basing itself on those words "pure Christianity,"—and I don't know that anybody has ever challenged them as uncongregational; and the A. U. A. is to-day a delegate body as ours is. If nobody challenges them as uncongregational, the mass of Unitarian people in America does not take it as uncongregational to use them so. Another precedent: in the constitution of our National Unitarian Conference certain doctrinal phrases are embedded,—the Lord Jesus Christ," and others. Those words Dr. Bellows said were incorporated there in order to keep out certain people. Four or five years ago the National Conference, leaving in those words, added this article to its constitution: "While we believe that the Pream-

"and Articles of our Constitution fairly represent the opinions of the majority of our churches, yet we wish distinctly to put on record our declaration that they are no authoritative test of Unitarianism, and are not intended to exclude from our fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our purposes and practical aims." In other words, the National Conference, in rather a blundering way, states its beliefs and then says, "Never mind." What we do, we do in a frank way, first saying the "Never mind", and then saying, "Hallelujah! we believe." And if you want another precedent, I hold in my hand here, what is called "a Statement of Belief adopted by the New-Hampshire Unitarian Association." It was passed unanimously at Concord in 1878. It is a little statement of twelve articles, each article having notes, commenting on and describing it, and at the end are these words; "This Statement of Belief was unanimously adopted by the N. H. Unitarian Association, not as a creed in the sense of a limit of inquiry or a test of fellowship, but as an affirmation of the most distinctive views that are now generally held by Unitarians." Precisely the sort of statement which I offer you here. Here, then, are three precedents, those of the A. U. A., the National Conference, and the New Hampshire Association. The last statement has been put in a tract by the A. U. A. and has been circulated widely, and I do not think it has ever done a bit of "binding;" I don't see how it could. Those are the precedents.

But now look straight at this resolution itself; if you please, put all your common-sense and all your common sympathies, and all your dis-sympathies, if you will, right on the Preamble. The word "uncongregational" means, somehow infringing on the rights and liberties of congregations and individuals. Does this? Can it? "It yet thinks some practical good may be done by setting forth in simple words, the things most commonly believed to-day among us,—the statement being always open to re-statement,"—any time, five years from now, or next year,—and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority." Can that infringe on the right of a congregation? Suppose Mr. Jones' church reads something in this statement which it does not believe, while the rest of the Conference does believe it,—are the rights of Mr. Jones' church infringed by that expression of belief? Infringed when it says, "The Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member by declarations concerning fellowship or doctrine"? Surely Mr. Jones' congregation has its rights absolutely intact. Isn't that common-sense, and the real truth of the matter?

But I claim more than that; instead of being merely congregational in the old sense, I say this kind of a statement protects the rights of a minority better than if we say nothing at all. Do you remember how all this "issue" began, eighteen months ago? It began in somebody's challenging the right of certain Unitarian ministers to the name "Unitarian," and the challenge went on persistently. Five persons were pointing fingers and saying, "There is the door for persons who think like you." There is where all this discussion began. And now I say, that the man who is pointed to the door, or this church if it is pointed to the door, or any church that is pointed to the door, will be protected by this statement here, and that those door-pointers are the ones who will be condemned out of the Conference words,—the words which say, "So far as only the majority of us are concerned, do we make the statement on these matters; it binds none, is always open to re-statement, and is to be regarded only as the thought of the majority." That is more congregational than our common congregationalism, inasmuch as the rights of the minority to dissent are maintained as well as the rights of the majority to speak.

THE ADVANTAGES.

Now, on the point of the advantages. I think there will be four advantages from passing the resolution.

The first is the missionary advantage. That is my main reason for proposing the "declaration." I believe we owe our Unitarianism in the most voiceful way to the broad world. Anything that is safe to do, safe for a Unitarian to do in missionary ways, he ought to do. We owe to the world a statement of faiths; and if it be right to make Conference statements, we owe that kind of statement. For the language of the choral "We believe, we believe, we believe," is heard by many; it spreads into literature, into encyclopedias, into newspapers and sermons, into tracts, into leaflets; spreads in all sorts of ways, and more widely than the individual's statement can.

We owe the most voiceful Unitarianism to the broad world. Then shall we see the real missionary effect. We shall see the faith spread wider and wider,—not like the wild fire over the prairies; nothing rational spreads like that,—things rational spread like the morning light. This kind of word, a Conference word, will have more effect than any individual's word, to spread it.

Secondly, I think for us Unitarians to base our faith on those deeper things of the Spirit—righteousness, truthfulness, love—in a man, will tend to spiritualize our Unitarianism; and we need that spiritualizing. What faith does not? Get down to the deepest thing in your nature,—isn't it love of truthfulness, love of righteousness, and love of love? If we base our Unitarian fellowship on those deepest things of God in man, it will surely help to spiritualize our faith.

Then there is a third point on which I cannot now enlarge, but which I believe will be enlarged on considerably during the next ten years. This resolution would remove the inconsistency which has been dangling around our Unitarianism for the last seventy years. We have been trying to be creedless, and all the while have been holding on to a "creed." I say, we have always been affirming that we are creedless, and always, when the pinch has come, have held on to a "creed in a testing sense." Now, this kind of declaration has the advantage of absolute creedlessness, opening fellowship to all, and yet is a declaration of the things commonly believed to-day among us. It will remove that inconsistency from our Unitarianism.

Finally, I believe the passage of this resolution will have a real effect to allay the "issue" trouble in the west. If it be passed, see where our friends will be put. We shall be a Conference stating these great "We believes" of Unitarianism,—stating them more boldly than perhaps any large body of Unitarians has ever done; we shall be a body stating these things, and here will be a set of friends, (I will not call them enemies), saying, "We are going to leave you because you won't say to other men, 'You have got to believe those things.' They say, 'You must believe those things in order to be a 'Unitarian';" we leave that matter of believing open, and bind none. I think, if we make this declaration, we shall put our friends in a position from which they themselves will wish to retire in three or four years. At any rate we put ourselves in a position where we shall at last be understood. I repeat—the difference between us is just this: We say what they say about beliefs, but they add, "You must believe this in order to be a 'Unitarian.'"

Friends, for these reasons I offer this resolution, hoping it may pass by a large majority vote. If it do not get a majority vote, of course that ends it. If it get only a small majority, I shall myself move to re-consider and table it, convinced it will not have the good effect I hope from it. If it pass by a large majority vote, I think it will be a very great benefit to ourselves and to our friends in the east and in the west, and that it will tend to the energizing of the spirit of the church.

[Mr. Gannett's "time" had been twice extended by courtesy of the Conference.]

Rev. David Utter, of Chicago:

I wish to move as a substitute to Mr. Gannett's motion the following:

Whereas, by virtue of its act of incorporation the Western Unitarian Conference exists for the purpose of promoting the interests of the churches associated in it; and

Whereas, according to the principles of Congregationalism all questions of doctrine and of fellowship, so far as the latter may be limited by or hinges upon the former, pertain to the individual churches, and can be decided only by them, therefore,

Resolved, that any action on these questions is beyond the province of this Conference, and consequently null and void.

Mr. Utter's substitute was seconded by Mr. J. N. Sprigg.

Mr. Utter:

I move this at this point in order that we may discuss the objections to Mr. Gannett's motion, discuss the two questions at once, upon their merits.

You all know, friends, that I agree very largely with Mr. Gannett. You know, or I can tell you, that I believe as much in liberty and the absolute freedom of the individual as he. I am as far from wishing to bind anyone as he; indeed I think even farther. My objection to Mr. Gannett's motion is its binding force; it is because it is a creed and it will have that force. We are bound by the simple statements of men whom we reverence. The trouble to-day with our conservative friends in the east, or the difference that exists between us and them, is because of the reverence in which they hold certain words,—mere words spoken by the fathers of our faith. It is the reverence in which they hold, perhaps, that little statement passed by the New Hampshire Association. That is "binding." And because the preamble to this statement of Mr. Gannett's says it shall have no binding force, that will not prevent its having a binding force. It does infringe upon our congregational rights, and therefore I have moved this substitute for it, which, if passed, leaves the Conference upon the business basis where its articles of incorporation placed it—a basis which puts us in the best position that has ever been contrived by the mind of man for absolute liberty in religious ways. No scheme or plan that has ever been devised has given so great liberty to individuals within churches as the congregational scheme or plan, and that plan says simply that the individual church shall decide all matters of doctrine. The church settles with the minister the matters of doctrine between itself and himself. A Conference has no fellowship except the fellowship of the churches composing it; therefore it does not belong to this Conference, it is beyond its province, to pass such a resolution as Mr. Gannett's. This is the theoretical objection, which others will state doubtless much better than I can state it.

Now as to the practical good that Mr. Gannett's resolution will do. With all due respect I think we have had a specimen of it during the year that is past. I think the year has been disastrous. I think there is a line of cleavage running all through our churches which this resolution will deepen, and which even my resolution will not wholly mend. The only thing that even a congregational resolution would do would be to put the churches upon grounds that are defensible, would be to put our Unitarian churches upon ground where they would just barely live for a while, and then would grow. But that resolution means war and division all through our churches. My friends, it has begun already. I stand here on your sufferance not as a representative of my church, not as a delegate from any church. You know there is this line of division in all our churches. But I urge not consequences; for one I can stand, if I stand alone, forever, in the defense of any principle in which I believe; and can be one of a small minority, if need be, working with the Western Conference, though defamed as atheistic around the earth,—it will make no matter. I do not plead consequences. What I say is simply in rebuttal of the great good our dear friend Mr. Gannett has said he thinks will come from his resolution. I think he is entirely mistaken; I hope you know he is mistaken, and will vote down his resolution. It can do no good. I urge this, because it is right, as it seems to me; because it is the true ground upon which our churches can stand, and can find a real ground of union. No Unitarian church ever yet stood upon a creed; no Unitarian church or body of churches ever did stand on or can formulate a statement of faith upon which they can all agree. Oh, friends, let us stop trying to state our beliefs, as I pleaded with the Conference last year at Cincinnati, and go on and do the work that is before us to do. Now this we can do under this congregational plan.

As I say, experience has proved in all the history of religion in the United States, and even back in old England, that the autonomy of the individual church, absolute as you can make it, is the best way. I plead for my liberty. I don't want your creed, brother Gannett, good as it is. There are things in there contrary to my taste. For one thing there is a little literary statement. It calls "fellowship" a principle, and it calls "character" a principle. I don't know that these things are "principles,"—the standing up for them may be somebody's principle of action. But I speak of that not as an objection. I like the statement, it is grand as Gannett's statement, but not as my own, you see—not as a thing we should vote up or down. Let us have none of them, but stand on simple congregationalism and be free.

The Chairman:

The question before the house is on the substitute offered by Mr. Utter. If this substitute is adopted, it will take the place of the motion offered by Mr. Gannett.

Rev. George A. Thayer:

Is this in the nature of a first amendment to the resolution, and, if so, may I offer a second amendment?

The Chairman:

This is a substitute for Mr. Gannett's motion. My idea as chairman is that we should first decide whether this shall be accepted as a substitute, and then any amendment you may wish to offer may be made.

Rev. J. V. Blake:

I want to announce to all members of the Board of Directors of the Sunday-school society, if they do not understand it so already, that they are entitled ex officio to a vote, whatever else they may not represent.

Doctor Joseph Robbins, of Quincy:

I hope the amendment proposed by Mr. Utter will prevail, and that we shall place ourselves upon the ground which we ought to have taken affirmatively, instead of negatively, last year,—at least in my judgment. I do not believe that the action of the Conference then, although it voted down a resolution affirming the congregational position and the right of the churches only, the individual bodies, and not this Conference, to deal with this question,—I do not believe, notwithstanding the Conference voted that resolution down, that it abandoned by its action the congregational position. I do not regard the statement of fellowship made by the Conference last year as being a departure from the congregational position. In fact, I differ with my friend from the Church of the Messiah [Mr. Utter], because, as I understand that resolution adopted by the Conference last year, it not only did not deal with any doctrinal question, but absolutely refused to do so. The Conference should always be its own best interpreter, and the declaration that it started out with, namely, that it conditions its fellowship upon no dogmatic test, is interpreted by the statement that follows,—that it welcomes all who wish to join it to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world.

My advocacy of Mr. Utter's resolution as a substitute for Mr. Gannett's is based upon two grounds. First, I do not think the Conference ought to run any risk of being accused of adopting a creed. The Unitarian body, on being accused by Evangelistic bodies of having no creed, has boasted that that is a fact; it has been proud of the position; but when one portion of the Unitarian body itself accuses another portion of having no creed, we begin to get nervous. Now, I apprehend that it is more important that we do right, than that we have peace; although I see no reason, if we adopt the substitute proposed by Mr. Utter, why we should not have peace. His substitute being adopted, there are then no grounds for anybody that is disposed to be peaceful, to find fault; we have placed ourselves upon the platform to which Unitarianism has grown, to which it owes its growth and liberty, and from which it ought never to depart. It is true that a line of division does, more or less, run through the bodies connected with this Conference; but it is also true that the great bulk of the individuals represented in this Conference, that the great bulk of the societies represented in this Conference, are true to the broad position which this Conference has laid down.

And I advocate this resolution of Mr. Utter's, because I believe that it is taking no step backward from the step which was taken last year. Our word then was simply reiterating what the Conference had said before, that it conditioned its fellowship upon no dogmatic test. If the question were reduced to this, whether this Conference should take a position any less broad than that, or die, I should say, "Let it die." But I understand that, if we pass this substitute, we simply say that, if anybody believes that the declarations we made last year, trenched upon the doctrines or the rights of anybody,—if anybody believes that, they would know from our present declaration that any such interpretation is annulled by the action now taken. We should now say that last year's action did not have a dogmatic significance, and that we will not have a dogmatic significance in any declaration we make.

Rev. Geo. A. Thayer, of Cincinnati:

I think I heartily agree with the gentleman who has just spoken, that our main resource, or only way out of our difficulty, is to fall back upon our simple position of congregationalism. I wish to say here, that any action taken by this Conference that did not approve itself to my judgment or to the belief of my church, would have not the slightest weight with me, and I should wash my hands of it altogether, saying that the Conference is simply speaking for the churches that endorse it. I think our safety would be in declining to pass any resolution. But supposing we should not decline,—I simply say what I say, because somebody wants, to know what I would like to say,—supposing that it were not the sentiment of this convention that it was unwise to pass any resolutions of fellowship or statement of belief, then I should insist that it was the duty of this and all conventions to attach to any resolution touching religious beliefs or fellowship the names of the individuals who voted for it, and of the churches who voted for it; and some day, if we lived to read it, we would see something like this: "Whereas the name 'Western Unitarian Conference' attached to a statement of beliefs, or to a resolution concerning fellowship, means to many of our brethren the body of Unitarian churches in the west; Therefore, in order to avoid producing false impressions as to the significance of such statements passed in any annual association of the Conference, it is resolved that any such statement or resolution should be signed by those who have voted for it, and go forth to the public as simply their expression of opinion, or the opinion of the churches which may authorize their signature." That seems to me to be good, sound, Unitarian, congregational doctrine; call it by whatever name, it is doctrine that recognizes the right of each man to think for himself, and his duty to speak for himself.

Mr. J. N. Sprigg, of Quincy:

I do not see why the suggestion of the gentleman would not be entirely proper, and from a Unitarian stand-point. It seems to me that each of us is quite as competent to say what he believes over his own signature, as to say what he believes as delegate to this Conference; and if it is necessary to correct any improper impression that has gone out, it would be a good deal safer correction should the names of these people be attached to this declaration individually; because we must remember that these statements have gone out far beyond the limits of this Conference. I wish I could vote for Mr. Gannett's proposition. I don't suppose there is a society in our Western Conference that does not wish it. But does this ask that the majority of the delegates to this Conference express such a proposition? Now, the delegates of this Conference, from a fundamental view of the question, are the Conference itself. When the Conference is adjourned, they are no longer delegates. And a majority of the delegates is a majority of the Conference, and the Conference acts only by the majority vote. If a statement were to go out that this Conference had adopted a certain proposition and it were not stated that they unanimously adopted it, it is understood that they adopted it by a majority vote; so whether we say that a majority of the delegates adopted this proposition, or that the Conference adopted it, it is precisely the same thing. If the majority of the persons here in this room, after the Conference is adjourned, see fit to call themselves together as individuals to take action in regard to this matter or any other matter, they are then entirely free to form their own opinion; but as long as they are delegates, they represent the societies. Now, so far as our society in Quincy is concerned, we cannot come here as delegates to this Conference to vote in favor of any proposition. Our society stands by this Conference, and it will stand by this Conference as long as it shows the great heart that it has shown in times past; stands by it, not for the purpose of adopting statements, which we reserve entirely to ourselves, but for the purpose of missionary work, for the building up of our cause. Now, what is a "majority" statement? If Dr. Channing was right, if the people whom we heard from that platform last night are right, if our friend there and the leaders of this convention, whom we have heard from year to year, are right, each individual soul is a majority. because God is with it.

Mr. J. Van Inwagen, of Hinsdale:

After attending this convention yesterday morning, and getting pretty clear ideas in regard to this question which is now before us, and aided by the attention which I have given it the last year, I took my pencil last evening and jotted down a few sentiments that I would like to read, before we vote upon the resolution that is before us.

It seems to me that it is more important to agree in our work than in our words. Inasmuch as such a Conference as this represents very many churches, in which a congregational freedom is allowed for each church society as well as a proportionate freedom for the individual members of these churches, is it best to try to fasten any declaration upon this body, unless it is a statement that not merely represents the views of a majority of delegates present, but, instead, is one that all, without any dissent, can adopt? The great strength and growth of the Unitarian system of religion in this country up to the present time, is clearly due to the unity that has prevailed in its work and purposes. Anything that shall now divide this unity of action and purpose, will, I believe, weaken and permanently impair the future growth and usefulness of our most loved denomination. Is that desirable or necessary? It is my judgment that not one clerical member of this body, especially among those who have given the deepest thought to the subject which is now agitating this Conference, has changed an iota in his inward purpose or zeal to devote himself, in the future as in the past, to the establishment of either "pure Christianity", from a liberal standpoint, or "truth, righteousness and love". It seems to me that there can be no question or debate as to the importance of the work that the American Unitarians ought to accomplish in their old-time fashion, standing shoulder to shoulder in the Father's service. Will you not sink your individual propositions, for the sake of keeping in one line all of the strong heads, hearts and hands, that are capable of, and so necessary to, the work that properly belongs to our great and growing religious system?

With these convictions, my better judgment impels me to vote against any more word statements or declarations, that seem calculated to divide the Unitarian forces in twain in their future work and in their great opportunities as well as responsibilities.

Rev. Enoch Powell, of Topeka:

I would like to offer one suggestion before the motion is put. I want to call attention to the first statement in Mr. Gannett's resolution—"Resolved, that while the Unitarian Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member".—Well, if we haven't the wish nor the right to bind a single member, the first question that arises is, Would the statement of belief that follows, do this binding? I think it is the general sense, at least the feeling of a great many of us, that it would do so; and consequently, I for one, shall vote, and I think a great many will vote, for this substitute. Then, the next question that comes up is, whether we feel or think that some practical good may come from it. I for one, say that I do not think any practical good ever did come, or ever will come, from a Unitarian Conference of this kind formulating our belief. I would like this statement, if there were no authority in it; but as authority coming from this Conference, I believe it would do a great deal of harm instead of a great deal of good.

Rev. J. L. Jones, of Chicago:

Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak a word to the substitute. Congregationalism cannot be so interpreted as to rob a body having this significance of the power of utterance on living questions. If it can, then, so much the worse for congregationalism. The argument made is just the argument that was made in 1857 on the floor of this same body against an utterance concerning slavery. The utterance was made, and delegates withdrew, and the Conference acquired strength thereby. The same argument can be made, and has been made, against an utterance upon the Temperance question, upon the Woman's Suffrage question, upon any other question.

Those of us who were in favor of the Cincinnati resolution were confronted soon by the argument, "Your resolution was all right, your principle is true, but you must not undertake to work under it; give up your hands, and you are all right." To-day we are asked not only to give up our hands but to hold our tongue, and then we are all right. We are all right; but this Conference has a moral power which it has a right to give expression to, if the right of the minority be guarded so wisely as it is here.

But I object to the substitute because it seems to imply that the position taken at Cincinnati was an uncongregational one and must be rescinded. Technicality is out of the question, gentlemen. We have had a great deal to say about misunderstanding and misrepresentations, and there has been ground for it; but the truth remains that the division has sprung largely because the issue has been understood, and because the world, even the Unitarian world, is not prepared to take that Cincinnati position. It is not a question of the west nor a question of Unitarianism. It is a question as to whether the time has come when a religious body, organized for religious purposes, dare plant itself upon the large proposition which received your hearty enthusiasm as expressed in the utterances of last night and the night before. I stand against this substitute because it seems to take that plank out of the Cincinnati resolution—which is, as Dr. Robbins has well said, a non-doctrinal, non-dogmatic statement, insisting that religion is a matter of character and not of words. Ladies and Gentlemen, we may, if we dare, by some insinuation seem to discredit that statement, but, if we do, the world will wait and will rebuke us for it some day.

Now, one word about the results. There has been a great deal done and said in the way of alarming our friends here and in the east, but I see none of the catastrophes coming that have been predicted. Where have we had, gentlemen, a more enthusiastic, more potent, session of the Conference than this? The returns will come next week that the American Unitarian Association has received three or four or five thousand dollars more than the year before. The depths of our churches have been stirred nobly and grandly, and there are no consequences to be feared. I believe this Conference has a right to a tongue, and having a tongue, I believe it has a right to hands; and I believe the main issue,—when it is not overlaid with technicalities,—that the main issue is, whether a body of men and women can find religious life enough upon the great imperishable realities about which there can be no quarreling—truth, righteousness, love; whether these things do not imply all the inspiration and all the truths which religion and the church imply. I hope this substitute will be voted down because it has a tendency to blur in some way and to cast a reflection upon what future generations will regard as a brave, large, true and perfect utterance, which has enkindled the western churches, which has deepened the religious life east and west, and which will enrich our treasury, and which will enrich our own lives religiously.

Friends, let us stand on the largest thing; let the word of the Conference be the same word as that which stimulated us in our opening sermon, and which came to us again last night. I believe that "congregationalism" cannot be so interpreted as to emasculate such a body as this, as to devitalize our churches. Let the friction come, let the division come—we will see more clearly eye to eye and touch more closely elbow to elbow. Only keep unsullied the great non-doctrinal and non-creedal basis. This is not Brother Gannett's statement, nor any man's statement; it is the product of the teeming centuries, it is the utterance of prophetic voices. Call that "Gannett's" statement? I deny the imputation on the honor of Socrates and Jesus, I deny the imputation on the honor of Christianity. If we can find more gold and better gold in the treasury of the past, we will pay tribute to it in the long run. We will stand, if we may, by that statement, together; if we must, we will stand by it individually. Any how as a Conference, friends, we will stand by that utterance made at Cincinnati, which is congregationalism with a tongue; and we will yet minister unto this congregationalism with such hands as it has never yet had in America.

Judge Joel Tiffany, of Hinsdale:

I rise to inquire whether an association, or a congregation, or an associated congregation of churches, have a right to assume a name and make it their own, to represent both government and practice. Early Unitarian churches asserted the right to separate from the orthodox churches and to place themselves before the world as congregations having congregational authority, to be interfered with by nobody—each congregation to determine what should be its mode of government. They assumed that name and became known by it, so that when the word "Unitarian" was given to represent a church or a society, we knew something about what it signified. In law, your Honor will remember that where we get a trade mark we are entitled to it. When we take a name to represent a principle or a business, we are entitled to keep it, and nobody else has a right to take from us that name and make it mean something else. Now, as I understand, the Unitarian society was purely congregational, and that left each congregation to determine what should be the expression of its faith, and what should be the mode of its practice; but are we now to take the name "Unitarian" and make it mean something different from what it formerly meant? Have we a right to do that? Has a Unitarian Conference a right to do anything of the kind, to eliminate any of those principles which entered into the early congregations calling themselves Unitarians? If any of those eastern congregations object to this being put forth by the Western Conference, they have a right to object. If the original proprietors of the name "Unitarian" and "Unitarian society," object to being represented by what the Western Conference puts forth before the world, I say they have a right, they have a legal right, they have a religious right, to object to it, and not be interfered with. Now, I do not know by what authority the Western Conference, or these western societies, that are more modern a good deal than the original ones, can come and take that name and use it. It seems to me it is not called for; and, furthermore, it seems to me that this Western Conference by this action is trying to give us the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out.

Rev. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul:

I suppose I am the only person who came to this Conference with his mind absolutely free on this question of creed. I came with the thought uppermost in my mind which Mr. Simmons had in his,—that what we wanted was unity; not the name, but something that was absolutely going to unite; and I have been waiting until I could hear some proposition that showed some sign of doing that. My mind has been open. I heard Mr. Gannett's remarks and I thought of an old member in my Presbyterian church in California. When I began to preach Unitarianism, some of his neighbors said to him, "Your minister is getting heretic," and he used to always say, "That is the pure milk of the word." I thought Mr. Gannett was reading the pure milk of the word; and the question comes to me, does that, and will that, as a matter of fact, unite these churches of ours? Now, I don't care to argue about that; the question is, After those propositions are printed and scattered through the country, will they then have a uniting force? For one, I believe that no form of words possibly can unite our Unitarian churches here or elsewhere. You know that Fielding says that virtue is like a saint,—it is not canonized until it is dead; and I have sometimes thought that was the trouble with our fellowship,—most of you kill fellowship practically before you are going to exalt it and make it a better word.

As I have listened here to the proposition of Mr. Utter, I felt very much as I did when I heard my first Unitarian sermon. I said, "That is what has been in my mind, floating about." And what seems the practical, sensible, free, brotherly thing to do? Simply to stop this thing where it is. I feel about this whole Western issue as some one did about the Indian,—that the only good issue is a dead issue. I don't want anybody to take anything back. I was disappointed when I heard Mr. Jones speak. I sympathize with the Western Conference; but when you say we want these words, I answer, Wait till we are united. Wait till we have a Conference that is so large that the biggest church in Wisconsin won't hold it. I like that idea of the choral chant, but I say, First get your chorus and then get your chant; one thing at a time. Mr. Jones has spoken about taking off your hands or your tongue. I think you have reduced it to just that,—you have either got to make this a working body or a talking body. If you are going to make it a talking body you can pass all the resolutions you want. If you are going to make it a working body, you have got to stop talking. Horace Greeley's idea that the only way to resume is to resume, is right; that is the best way for us,—not to ask anybody to put anything down, or take anything back, but simply to go ahead.

If you want to know what I think, as a stranger, of this whole convention, my diagnosis is this: it is suffering from a morbid self-consciousness that is peculiar to all little bodies. What you want is to get all sorts of people in here. First enlarge your tea-pot, and then there won't be so much of a tempest in it.

Rev. J. V. Blake, of Chicago:

I would suggest that Brother Crothers' idea of resuming work cannot be carried out, as we have never stopped.

I am not going to argue the matter at all. It is a custom in my church for the minister to appoint delegates to the Conference, and I regard it as a very good custom indeed. I did so on this occasion. I took special pains to represent, in the four delegates that have come here from my church, every shade of opinion that I could gather in that four, and I think I was very successful in doing so. I will simply speak a word to them; and the rest of you, if you can profit by it, may do so. I want to say a word of instructive information to these delegates, and also to those members of the Sunday-school society board who belong to my society and can vote. The first thing is this, that if you vote for Mr. Utter's substitute and it is passed, the consequence is that all possibility of considering Mr. Gannett's resolution is ended. You cannot have any more to do with that. This resolution of Mr. Utter's then has the attention of the house as the original motion, and you will have to consider that on its merits; but you cannot take up Mr. Gannett's again, unless by some subsequent action it be brought forward anew. The effect of not passing this substitute resolution is to leave Mr. Gannett's motion just as it was before, before the house for consideration. You have not done anything, then, by voting against the substitute and by not passing it, except to say, "We will consider the other in debate, and see what wisdom there is in it." I want you all to understand that fully.

Then I want to say with regard to this resolution of Mr. Utter's, that, if it is passed, the effect will be to make it the voice of the Conference and that would be the same thing as to disown and to repudiate the expression set forth at Cincinnati a year ago. Now, if you are ready to do that, do it, but understand what you are doing. I am speaking entirely to my own people. I want you to know that if Mr. Utter's resolution is passed as a substitute, and then adopted, you have repudiated and disowned the free-fellowship principle set forth at Cincinnati, and have condemned the action of that Conference.

And then I want you to know this, that, as regards the congregational right itself, in my humble judgment it is a glaring folly to say that this Conference has no right of utterance. For instance, if you had a consensus of opinion in your church, and Brother Jones' church has the same consensus of opinion,—and that would very likely be the fact,—isn't it competent for each one of those churches representing that fact to appoint three or four people to meet together and express certain things they want to do and say in common? How unsound it is to say that it is not competent! How unreasonable to say that that would be an infringement of the congregational right and liberty of each church! Not to have that power would be simply to deprive yourself of a congregational right, namely, the congregational right to meet with other churches for the purpose of setting forth certain propositions and facts. So understand that, unless you wish to deny your right in that respect, you will not vote for this substitute.

Rev. A. M. Judy, of Davenport:

I want simply to call the Conference back to what seems to me the most fundamental question at issue, namely, Is this declaration likely to become in effect a creed? Is Mr. Utter's position right that, although we say we do not intend to have a creed, it would practically have a credal effect? Friends, I tell you that is the real question at issue now, the important one. Do you think that, although we say here we do not mean this for a creed, in the course of time those words will come to be so honored, that people will scarcely dare to speak out against them, and so the free development of our church may be practically stopped? I say that is the issue. I can not say that I think that will be the effect, but I think that the point is worth the most serious consideration.

Rev. F. L. Hosmer, of Cleveland:

I stand here as a congregationalist of the congregationalists; and as such, I want to call attention to what Mr. Gannett so very plainly, as it seems to me, showed,—that his resolution binds no one, no one who dissents from it. That is so plainly put in and connected with what follows, that I do not see how the congregational polity is in any way infringed. If it be, then this Conference has no business at any time whatever to pass a resolution by which any great measure is affected,—temperance, or any thing else; and the venerable Doctor Eliot was quite right in stepping out of the Conference when it passed upon the question of slavery,—right, because by this theory the Conference vote bound all in the Conference. But this resolution guards against even the possibility of that.

I voted for the resolution concerning a declaration of faith, last year at Cincinnati; I voted for it, not because I particularly wanted it, but because there are many who say Unitarianism is not clear to outsiders. I want to tell you a little story that some of you may have heard. It is said that a stranger was in the town of Meadville, where our theological school is situated, and, stopping one night at the hotel, he was out walking in the town and said to a man, "What building is that on the hill?" "I don't know." Another man who was passing and heard the question said, "That is the Unitarian theological school." "Oh, what do they believe?" "Well, I don't know." And it is said that a small boy, who stood by, spoke up and said, "There doesn't anybody know except Professor Huidekoper, and he won't tell." Now, whether justly or not, that is the common feeling around the country; not in our churches, or where our churches are well known, but in the country at large. And it seems to me, as Mr. Gannett said, this statement does have a great moral effect as being a sort of expression of the thought of the Conference, like what the Quakers call "bearing testimony," and without committing any individual who dissents from it; and while I find myself in sympathy with my friends on the right, and while I agree with them generally, I do believe that Mr. Gannett's statement is the braver, the bolder, and the nobler statement, and will have more effect for the Unitarian name in this country.

Rev. J. C. Learned, of St. Louis:

I am rather a late convert in some respects. Last year I voted for indefinite postponement of this matter. When it came to the final test, I voted for the resolution that was passed at Cincinnati and for tabling the rest of it,—the proposition to have a theological statement.

One fact has been overlooked I think. Our friend from the northwest, who comes with such an unprejudiced eye to look in upon us and give us his diagnosis of our looks, seems to imply that the trouble began with that resolution passed at Cincinnati. No mistake could be greater. It is to be remembered, and not lost sight of, that the agitation of this whole matter was begun before any such proposition was thought of. Why, it was declared that by the constitution of our Conference we were already not merely non-Christian, but un-Christian, and even atheistic. We had not got "God" in our constitution, we had not got theism there. But the whole trouble was that we did not have any belief! The whole effort was to have a statement made. Now here comes a proposition which would seem, at least, to offset some of those charges, and which, thinking it over more and more, I am inclined to think might disabuse some of the good people down east of their impression that we are atheistic and un-Christian. I think, on the whole, that it might be a good thing. This is a resolution which leaves everybody free,—congregations, individuals, everybody. We might pass it as a vote of the majority and no man's right would be infringed on. Therefore I shall vote for Mr. Gannett's resolution.

Mr. W. R. Cole, of Mount Pleasant, Iowa:

I came here very much a friend of congregationalism, but I believe if congregationalism stultifies a man's conscience, closes his lips, and makes the Western Conference impotent to make any great moral declaration, then I don't want anything to do with congregationalism. Now, friends, let us look at this matter squarely. Does this resolution of Brother Gannett's infringe upon our congregational liberty? I don't think it does in the least degree. If it did, I would not favor it. I could not vote for it, because congregationalism interpreted in its true sense is a sublime principle, which we cannot afford to violate. But let us look at it closely. How does it affect us? It does not bind us. No one will be bound at all, and that kind of congregationalism is just what we want to-day. Does it infringe upon the freedom of any church, or the freedom of any individual in any church?

The question is to be answered by the declaration, just as it is. Now, it says, "The Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member by declarations concerning fellowship or doctrine." What can be broader? What can be more emphatic? Nothing can be, but this is carried still farther. It seems as though our friends are agonizing not to touch congregationalism, and they say, "Speaking in the spirit and understanding above set forth:"—what is the spirit, what is the understanding? It is the understanding that we have no right to bind any church or any individual in the church. That is the spirit and the understanding. Then they go on and repeat that again; they say "Always in the spirit above set forth, we make the following declaration." That covers the whole ground. Now, I will vote for this. I shall vote against that substitute. We do not want anything forced in here, to cut off a consideration of this. Let us consider this on its own merit, then take up something of that kind on its own merits. Whether we are in favor of this resolution or not, let us at least vote down that substitute, and take things fair and square on their own merits.

Some say, this is too inclusive, it makes our fellowship too broad. We differ in regard to that. The only trouble I have with this is, it isn't broad enough. I want this so broad that we not only invite those to our fellowship who are willing to work for the filling of the world with truth, righteousness and love, but I want to invite those to our fellowship who do not know anything about truth, righteousness and love. This is the business of the Western Conference, to make men conscious of these great principles. For my part, I think the example of Jesus in this respect is good enough as a guide in fellowship for this Western Conference; when we see him eating and drinking with publicans and sinners, as a matter of fellowship I think that is a grand idea.

Rev. Charles Ellis, of East Saginaw, Michigan:

Mr. Chairman, I was delegate twenty-two years ago to the first National Unitarian Conference in New York. Toward the close of that meeting there was a great debate on the adoption of a preamble to the constitution. Among the delegates was a man sent by the Independent Congregational Society of Florence, Massachusetts—a society that did not call itself religious, did not call itself Christian, did not call itself Unitarian; but the man who was there as its delegate was a man who in his boyhood gave up all chances of preferment, and threw himself into the cause of the slave and worked with the abolitionists and for the slaves for half a century. He lived and labored in poverty all that time; if ever a man lived and worked in the spirit of Jesus of Nazareth, it was that man. And yet because he was poor, and his clothes were old and almost ragged, men, Unitarians, rich men of New York backed by the ministers of the Unitarian Church in New York, stood on the platform and derided that man, and they called him "rag-tag and bob-tail;" they didn't want any such in the Unitarian church; and it was because he was there, that such a tremendous effort was made against Frothingham and Abbot, the men who opposed the resolution.

I went out of that Conference, and I said, "Never again will I enter it as a delegate, or in any other way, until it has grown large enough to welcome such men as Charles C. Burleigh as a Unitarian and a delegate."

Now, for the first time, after twenty-two years, I am here again as a delegate to a Unitarian Conference, and I see here a disposition to call the same part over again, which was acted toward Charles C. Burleigh. Some of you don't want anybody in here, who can not swear that he is a Unitarian and has been all his life. I think that is all wrong. I agree with this declaration of Mr. Gannett's. It says in the outset, we don't propose to bind anybody, but it goes to show, to some extent, what Unitarianism is.

You are but a handful, but the world is full of men and women growing out of the old churches, who are hungry, starving for the word that Unitarianism has to give them, and you, by adopting this resolution, will cast abroad these little leaves like snow-flakes from the skies, and they will tell the world, to some extent, what Unitarianism is and what you can do for it.

Rev. W. E. Copeland, of Omaha:

I have been pretty nearly converted to the congregational side, but I object to its coming up in the form of a substitute. I want a square vote on Mr. Gannett's proposition. He has said that if it can not be passed by a strong vote of the Conference, he don't want it at all. If we pass this substitute by one or two votes, it cuts off the discussion on the original question.

Mrs. Henry Sayres, of Chicago:

I stand before you, perhaps not the oldest in years, but I think the oldest delegate here. Thirty-five years I have stood in the Conference, and it has been a Conference of unity. I have been termed, and always supposed that I was, a conservative Unitarian; but that did not hurt the work I was to do for my fellow-creatures. When we stand by that banner, "Truth, love and righteousness," it don't hurt the work we want to do for our Father, God. I thank God to-day that I have the privilege of sitting under that deep searcher after truth, our Brother Jones, and it hurts me when I hear him pronounced an atheist or a non-believer in God. It hurts me very much; no one can sit under his preaching and not go away feeling that he has been lifted way above. And I am in sympathy with Mr. Gannett's resolution, whatever my friends may think, and even though I did receive a little notice—"Be very careful, Mrs. Sayres, don't get on the slippery path." That note, an anonymous note, I have received within a few days: "Be very careful, my dear old Unitarian friend, that, when you attend the Western Conference, you don't get on the slippery slide." I do not feel that I am on the slippery side when I stand up boldly and endorse that resolution, but that I am strong in my great belief in God, our Eternal Father.

On vote of the Conference, Mr. Utter's substitute for the original motion was lost.

Rev. George A. Thayer, of Cincinnati:

I offer the following amendment to Mr. Gannett's resolution,—words to be inserted after the first "therefore," so that the whole shall read:

Resolved, That, while the Western Unitarian Conference has neither the wish nor the right to bind a single member by declarations concerning fellowship or doctrine, it yet thinks some practical good may be done by setting forth in simple words the things most commonly believed to-day among us,—the statement being always open to restatement, and to be regarded only as the thought of the majority.

Therefore, speaking in the spirit and understanding above set forth, we, whose names are hereto appended, delegates from Western Unitarian churches in Conference assembled at Chicago, May 19, 1887, declare our fellowship to be conditioned on no doctrinal tests, and welcome all who wish to join us, to help establish truth and righteousness and love in the world. [Then followed the rest of Mr. Gannett's statement as printed above, in the minutes of the Annual Meeting on page 200.]

The motion was seconded, and, on being put to the Conference, was lost.

Mr. J. B. Galloway, of Chicago:

I can readily see that this Conference is being carried off its feet by Mr. Jones' eloquence and Mr. Gannett's inspiring declarations, and I think it will land where anything lands that is carried off by the waves of the ocean—in gravel. As treasurer of the Conference I have been in that gravel during the whole year financially, and I don't wish to be there another year. I believe everything that Mr. Gannett has said in that resolution, but, as I understand it, this is but the opening wedge, and if we once begin to say, "We believe," no matter what it is, that is a creed.

We believe that "pure Christianity" will cover it all; if any man can say that he does not stand for pure Christianity, then he may as well say, "I do not stand for truth, righteousness and love." Now, have we not the right to define what pure Christianity is? And if we have, we have just as much right to say, "We believe in pure Christianity." I was asked in the Christian Association rooms one day if I were a Christian. I did not tell the man it was none of his business, whether I was or not; I said, "That depends on what you call a Christian." Now then, if we are asked whether we are Christians, let us say to those who ask the question, "Define your meaning of Christianity, then we can answer the question; if you define it as the spread of truth, righteousness and love through the world, then I am standing for pure Christianity." If the man says, "I mean a man who believes in the divinity of Christ, and the immaculate conception," then I would tell him I was not a Christian, for upon that point my mind for twenty years has been made up. I left the church in which I was brought up, to become a Unitarian. I am one by sufferance. I do not believe your most radical minister is as radical as I am, but I am not called on to state what my beliefs are.

The only question is, Are you going to start out to say, "I believe." I think the trouble arose at the Conference last year, simply because there was an entering wedge entered in a resolution there.

Rev. S. S. Hunting, of Des Moines:

I move an amendment to Mr. Gannett's resolution by striking out the whole of the paragraph between the words "Therefore" and "to know."

Motion seconded by Rev. A. M. Judy.

Mr. Hunting:

I was not at the Cincinnati Conference. I have supported this Western Conference in its work and shall continue to do so. I am not in favor of reiterating any thing said last year. I am satisfied with what was done by the brothers at the Western Conference last year on the technical question of fellowship. That resolution read a little differently from this. I stand fairly and squarely upon our Conference as it has been. I find introduced here a special definition of the word "fellowship," to which I object. The devil in the Western Conference is the devil of definitions. We don't want it. I am told if we vote on this thing, we vote on the definition, and therefore especially I would like to have this part stricken out, leaving it as it was last year so far, but the other part I can heartily accept. I object to the word doctrinal, as substituted for the word dogmatic, because dogmatic has a little stronger meaning. I move that we simply preface this resolution by the words, "that it is proper and desirable that people should know," etc., in order to put simply that issue before us, and that we leave the rest of it as it is; then I shall vote for it; otherwise, I shall not.

Rev. A. M. Judy, of Davenport:

This question has always been essentially a question not as to who is to come into the Unitarian churches and Conference to-day, but as to who is to be put out of the churches and Conference in the future. If we make a statement here which somebody outgrows in the future, we don't want to give the church in the future a right to say, "You don't believe that statement, so get out; here is our statement." Now, by cutting out that portion there about "fellowship," which I think is unnecessarily reiterating and adds nothing to the spirit of the resolution, we project the statement as a majority statement, so it stands simply thus: "Here is our statement; but anybody who don't believe that statement has a perfect right to stand in our Conference and maintain his position. No one has the right to bind the church or the individual."

Many people think that our aim is to invite in, when the truth is, that I cannot conscientiously say that I can really, heartily, welcome a man who is ready to preach atheism. I can vote for all the rest of that resolution, but I cannot heartily welcome a man who wants to preach atheism. I do not want to run the danger of making an essential statement, which is what every orthodox church in the world has done. But I cannot heartily say that I want to back up, give my money, and all that, to a man who preaches atheism.

Mr. Gannett:

Mr. Hunting, will your amendment in your judgment rescind the Cincinnati resolution?

Mr. Hunting:

Not in the least.

Mr. Gannett:

Mr. Judy, will this amendment, which you have seconded, in your judgment rescind the Cincinnati resolution?

Mr. Judy:

You have yourself proposed to change that resolution.

Mr. Gannett:

Yes: and will this amendment, which you second, in your judgment rescind it otherwise and more?

Mr. Judy:

I think it will.

Mr. Gannett:

That is the trouble, friends. If we adopt this suggestion, it will, in the minds of some people at least, take out a great deal of what you said last year; that is why I object to it.

Rev. W. E. Copeland:

I think Brother Gannett is mistaken. If I understand the English language at all, we do not rescind any thing that is on the books. What we want is something with which to answer the people, when they ask us the question, What do Unitarians believe? I meet in my western field very often just this question as to what we believe. I want to leave that "fellowship" clause out.

The question on the amendment offered by Mr. Hunting was put to the Conference, and lost.

The question on the adoption of the original resolution offered by Mr. Gannett, was then put to the Conference and carried, fifty-nine voting Aye, and thirteen, No.

THE WESTERN UNITARIAN YEAR-BOOK.

I.

The West.

Western Unitarian Conference.

HEADQUARTERS, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ills.
ORGANIZED at Cincinnati, 1852. INCORPORATED under laws of Illinois, 1882.

OBJECT: "The transaction of business pertaining to the general interests of the societies connected with the Conference."

MOTTO ON SEAL: "Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion."

INCOME: The Conference depends mainly on the annual contributions of the western Unitarian churches. About $3500 is needed for this year's work, and the work would enlarge with larger resources.

ANNUAL MEETING, in May.

FELLOWSHIP AND FAITH: The following resolution was adopted at the annual meeting in Chicago, 1887, by vote of 59 to 18 of the delegates present:

Resolved, THAT, WHILE THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE HAS NEITHER THE WISH NOR THE RIGHT TO BIND A SINGLE MEMBER BY DECLARATIONS CONCERNING FELLOWSHIP OR DOCTRINE, IT YET THINKS SOME PRACTICAL GOOD MAY BE DONE BY SETTING FORTH IN SIMPLE WORDS THE THINGS MOST COMMONLY BELIEVED TO-DAY AMONG US,—THE STATEMENT BEING ALWAYS OPEN TO RE-STATEMENT, AND TO BE REGARDED ONLY AS THE THOUGHT OF THE MAJORITY.

Therefore, SPEAKING IN THE SPIRIT AND UNDERSTANDING ABOVE SET FORTH, WE, DELEGATES OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CHURCHES IN CONFERENCE ASSEMBLED AT CHICAGO, MAY 19, 1887, DECLARE OUR FELLOWSHIP TO BE CONDITIONED ON NO DOCTRINAL TESTS, AND WELCOME ALL WHO WISH TO JOIN US TO HELP ESTABLISH TRUTH AND RIGHTEOUSNESS AND LOVE IN THE WORLD.

AND, INASMUCH AS MANY PEOPLE WISH TO KNOW WHAT UNITARIANISM COMMONLY STANDS FOR, SPEAKING ALWAYS IN THE SPIRIT ABOVE SET FORTH WE MAKE THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT OF ITS PAST HISTORY AND OUR PRESENT FAITHS.—(See page above.)

MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: Life membership, $25.00. Annual membership, $1.00. "Delegate membership shall be acquired by certificate of appointment by any religious society or organization that shall have, during the previous year, contributed not less than ten dollars to the Conference. Such society or organization may be so represented by three general delegates, and an additional one for each thirty families therewith connected. And such delegates, together with all officers of the Conference, the officers of the State Conferences within its limits, the Sunday-School Society, the Women's Western Conference, and all missionaries at work within its boundaries, alone have the right to vote."

Blanks are sent by the Secretary to the churches, which should be filled out by the proper authorities with the names of the delegates appointed, and returned to him by mail before the annual meeting, as certificates of election.

OFFICERS: President, Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer, elected at each annual meeting from the Board of Directors. Twenty-one Directors chosen for three years, seven annually. Vacancies in the Board may be filled by the remaining members. Five members a quorum for business. Directors' regular meetings on second Wednesday of September, November, January and March, and on the first and last days of the annual meeting.

OFFICERS FOR 1887-8.

President,.....HON. D. L. SHOREY, Chicago, Ills.
Vice-President,.....REV. S. S. HUNTING, Des Moines, Ia.
Secretary,.....REV. J. R. EFFINGER, Chicago, Ills.
Treasurer,.....J. B. GALLOWAY, Chicago, Ills.
(Treasurer's address, 605 Rialto Building, Chicago.)

Board of Directors.

To May, 1888.

Rev. S. S. Hunting, Des Moines, Ia.
Rev. C. J. K. Jones, Louisville, Ky.
Rev. A. M. Judy, Davenport, Ia.
John A. Roche, Chicago, Ills.
Rev. Mary A. Safford, Sioux City, Ia.
John Wilkinson, Chicago, Ills.
C. S. Udell, Grand Rapids, Mich.

To May, 1889.

Horace H. Badger, Chicago, Ills.
Rev. J. R. Effinger, Chicago, Ills.
J. B. Galloway, Chicago, Ills.
Rev. F. L. Hosmer, Cleveland, O.
Rev. J. L. Jones, Chicago, Ills.
Rev. J. G. Milsted, Chicago, Ills.
Rev. D. Utter, Chicago, Ills.

To May, 1890.

Rev. J. V. Blake, Chicago, Ills.
Miss S. A. Brown, Lawrence, Kas.
Rev. S. M. Crothers, St. Paul, Minn.
Rev. W. C. Gannett, Chicago, Ills.
Rev. J. C. Learned, St. Louis, Mo.
D. L. Shorey, Chicago, Ills.
J. N. Sprigg, Quincy, Ills.

Executive Committee:—J. R. Effinger, J. B. Galloway, J. L. Jones.

LIFE MEMBERS OF THE W. U. C.

Including all names on the list from the beginning.

ILLINOIS.

Cheney, C. C.....Chicago.
Effinger, J. R....."
Felix, B. F....."
Furness, W. E....."
Mearns, Mrs. E. E....."
Mears, N....."
Moulton, B. P....."
Shorey, D. L....."
Tilton, Miss C. P....."
Tilton, Mrs. L. J....."
Tucker, Mrs. E. C....."
Wilkinson, J....."
Wilson, F. C....."

MASSACHUSETTS.

Batchelor, G.....Wellesley Hills.
Batchelor, Mrs. P....."
Ferry, C. B.....Northampton.
Frothingham, F.....Milton.

MISSOURI.

Rowse, E. S.....St. Louis.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Clark, E. W.....Philadelphia.

LIST OF SOCIETIES,

WITHIN THE LIMITS OF THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE, WITH THEIR MINISTERS.

Where there is no settled pastor, the name of one of the officers or interested laymen is printed in italics. The list is only approximately correct, as some embryo societies are not included.

Colorado.

PLACE.	NAME.	MINISTER.
Boulder.....	First Unitarian.....	Col. I. Phillips.
Denver.....	First Unitarian.....	Thomas J. Van Ness.
Greeley.....	Unitarian.....	N. S. Hogeland.

Dakota.

Sioux Falls.....	All Souls Church.....	Miss C. J. Bartlett.
" " Circuit.....		Mrs. Eliza Tupper Wilkes.

Illinois.

Alton.....	First Congregational.....	J. B. Frost.
Bloomington.....	Unitarian.....	Henry A. Westall.
Buda.....	Christian.....	Chester Covell.
Chicago.....	Church of the Messiah.....	David Utter.

Chicago	Unity Church	Thomas G. Milsted.
"	Third Unitarian	J. Vila Blake.
"	All Souls Church	Jenkin L. Jones.
Geneseo	First Unitarian	Milton J. Miller.
Geneva	First Unitarian	James H. West.
Hinsdale	Unity Church	J. Van Inwagen.
Mattoon	Unitarian Society	Judge Bennett.
Monmouth	Unity Church	Mrs. J. R. Webster.
Moline	Unitarian	Arthur M. Judy.
Quincy	Second Congregational	Charles F. Bradley.
Rockford	Christian Union	Thomas Kerr.
Sheffield	Unitarian	Judson Fisher.
Shelbyville	First Congregational	Jasper L. Douthit.
Tremont	Liberal Christian Church	Mrs. W. L. Robison.
Warren		S. A. Clark.

Indiana.

Evansville	Church of the Unity	Miss C. F. Pushee, Sec'y.
Hobart	First Unitarian	W. H. Rysenburg.
La Porte	First Unitarian	Allen G. Jennings.

Iowa.

Algona	Unity Society	Miss Ida C. Hultin.
Davenport	First Unitarian	Arthur M. Judy.
Des Moines	First Unitarian	Miss Ida C. Hultin.
Humboldt	Unity Society	Miss Marion Murdock.
Iowa City	Unitarian and Universalist	Arthur Beavis.
Keokuk	First Unitarian	Dr. J. M. Shaffer.
Rock Rapids	Unitarian	T. C. Puckett.
Sioux City	First Unitarian	Miss Mary A. Safford.

Kansas.

Lawrence	Unitarian	Clark G. Howland.
Topeka	First Unitarian	Enoch Powell.

Kentucky.

Louisville	Church of the Messiah	Charles J. K. Jones.
------------	-----------------------	----------------------

Michigan.

Ann Arbor	First Unitarian	Jabez T. Sunderland.
Big Rapids	Unitarian	Henry A. Wales.
Detroit	First Congregat'nal Unitarian	Reed Stuart.
East Saginaw	First Unitarian Society	Rowland Connor.
Grand Haven	First Unitarian	George Stickney.
Grand Rapids	First Unitarian	John E. Roberts.
"	Free Holland Church	F. W. N. Hugenholtz.
Jackson	First Unitarian	Charles F. Elliott.
Kalamazoo	First Unitarian	Hon. Charles S. May.
Leslie	Unitarian Society	Frank E. Kittredge, (add. Quincy.)
Manistee	Unitarian Church	Albert Walkley.
Midland	Unitarian Church	Leverett R. Daniels.
Mt. Pleasant	First Unitarian
Muskegon	Unity Club	Maj. G. Davis.
Sherwood	Church of Sherwood	Miss Bertha Sawin.

Minnesota.

Duluth	Unitarian	Judge O. P. Stearns.
Luverne	Congreg'nal Unitarian Church	F. C. Mahoney.
Minneapolis	First Unitarian	Henry M. Simmons.
"	Scandinavian Liberal Church	Kristofer Janson.
St. Paul	Unity Church	S. M. Crothers.
"	Scandinavian Liberal Church	Kristofer Janson.
Brown County	Scandinavian Circuit	Kristofer Janson.
Winona

Missouri.

St. Louis	Church of the Messiah	John Snyder.
"	Church of the Unity	John C. Learned.
Kansas City	First Unitarian	James Scammon.
St. Joseph	First Unitarian	C. B. Roberts.

Nebraska.

Beatrice		Enoch Powell.
North Platte	First Unitarian	George Vroman.
Omaha	First Unitarian	William E. Copeland.

Ohio.

Cincinnati	First Congregational	George A. Thayer.
Cleveland	Church of the Unity	Fred'rick L. Hosmer.
Marietta	First Unitarian	James T. Lusk.

Pennsylvania.

Meadville	Independent Congregational	Henry H. Barber.
"	Theological School	Pres't. A. A. Livermore.

Wisconsin.

Arcadia	People's Church	T. Grafton Owen.
Baraboo	Free Congregational	Joseph Waite, (add. Janesville.)
Cooksville	Unity Society	Mrs. M. S. Savage.
Gilmanston	Unitarian	Nathaniel C. Earl.

Helena	Unitarian Society	Thomas L. Jones.
Janesville	All Souls	Joseph Waite.
Kenosha	First Unitarian	Z. G. Simmons.
Madison	First Unitarian	Joseph H. Crooker.
Milwaukee	First Unitarian	Trowbridge B. Forbush.

LIST OF MINISTERS,
WITH THEIR RESIDENCES.

Those marked † are not settled as pastors of churches.

NAME.	ADDRESS.
Barber, H. H.	Meadville, Pa
Bartlett Miss C. J.	Sioux Falls, Dak
Beavis, Arthur	Iowa City, Iowa
Blake, James Vila	Chicago, Ill
† Bowker, S. D.	Kansas City, Mo
Bradley, Charles F.	Quincy, Ill
† Brown, John S.	Lawrence, Kas
† Brown, James	Mode, Ill
† Cary, George L.	Meadville, Pa
† Clute, Oscar, Miss'y of A. U. A.
for Iowa, Dak., Minn	Iowa City, Iowa
† Cole, William R.	Mt. Pleasant, Iowa
Connor, Rowland	East Saginaw, Mich
Copeland, Wm. Ellery	Omaha, Neb.
Covell, Chester	Buda, Ill
Crothers, S. M.	St. Paul, Minn
Crooker, Joseph H.	Madison, Wis
Daniels, Leverett R.	Midland, Mich
† Davis, Joel P.	Des Moines, Iowa
Douthit, Jasper L.	Shelbyville, Ill
† Dudley, John L.	Milwaukee, Wis
Earl, Nathaniel C.	Gilmanston, Wis
† Eddowes, Timothy H.	Geneva, Ill
† Effinger, John R., Sec'y W. U. C.	Chicago, Ill
Elliott, Charles F.	Jackson, Mich
† Ellis, Charles	East Saginaw, Mich
Fisher, Judson	Sheffield, Ill
Forbush, Trowbridge B.	Milwaukee, Wis
Frost, J. B.	Alton, Ill
† Galvin, Edward I.	Chicago, Ill
† Gannett, William C.	Chicago, Ill
† Gibbs, Edward P.	Grand Haven, Mich
† Gibbs, Joseph F.	Greeley, Col
† Gibson, C. K.	Grand Rapids, Mich
† Gordon, Gustavus E.	Milwaukee, Wis
† Graves, Miss Mary A.	Chicago, Ill
† Gray, J. Fletcher	Beardstown, Ill
† Hassall, Robert	Keokuk, Iowa
Headle, Edwin C.	Mt. Pleasant, Mich
† Hewett, James O. M.	Chicago, Ill
Hogeland, Napoleon S.	Greeley, Col
† Hoisington, William H.	Roscoe, Ill
† Hoskin, A. A.	Milwaukee, Wis
Hosmer, Frederick L.	Cleveland, Ohio
† Hosmer, James K.	St. Louis, Mo
Howland, Clark G.	Lawrence, Kan
Hugenholtz, F. W. N.	Grand Rapids, Mich
† Huidekoper, Frederic	Meadville, Pa
Hultin, Ida C.	Algona, Iowa
† Hunting, Sylvan S.	Des Moines, Iowa
Janson, Kristofer, Miss'y of A. U. A.	Minneapolis, Minn
Jennings, Allen G., Miss'y of A. U. A. for Ind., Ohio, Ky	La Porte, Ind
Jones, Charles J. K.	Louisville, Ky
Jones, Jenkin Lloyd	Chicago, Ill
Judy, Arthur M.	Davenport, Iowa
Kerr, Thomas	Rockford, Ill
† Kittredge, Frank E.	Quincy, Mich
† Krauss, E. C. F.	Kansas City, Mo
Learned, John C.	St. Louis, Mo
† Livermore, Abiel A., Pres. Theol. School	Meadville, Pa
† Loomis, Simon B.	Lone Rock, Wis
Lusk, James T.	Marietta, Ohio
† MacCauley, Clay	Minneapolis, Minn
Miller, Milton J.	Geneseo, Ill
Milsted, Thomas G.	Chicago, Ill
† Morton, Frederic W.	Bloomington, Ill
Murdock, Miss Marion	Humboldt, Iowa
† Norris, Miss Anna J.	Sinaloa Colony, Mexico
Owen, Thomas Grafton	Arcadia, Wis
Powell, Enoch	Topeka, Kansas
† Roberts, Abraham A.	Aberdeen, Dakota
Roberts, C. B.	St. Joseph, Mo
Roberts, John E.	Grand Rapids, Mich
Safford, Miss Mary A.	Sioux City, Iowa
† Spencer, Abraham A.	Madison, Wis

Snyder, John	St. Louis, Mo.
Simmons, Henry M.	Minneapolis, Minn.
†Stone, William G. M.	Denver, Col.
Stuart, Reed	Detroit, Mich.
Sunderland, Jabez T.	Ann Arbor, Mich.
†Taft, Stephen H.	Humboldt, Iowa
Thayer, George A.	Cincinnati, Ohio
Utter, David	Chicago, Ill.
Van Ness, Thomas J.	Denver, Col.
Waite, Joseph	Janesville, Wis.
Wales, Henry A.	Big Rapids, Mich.
Walkley, Albert	Manistee, Mich.
Westall, Henry A.	Bloomington, Ill.
West, James H.	Geneva, Ill.
†Wilkes, Mrs. Eliza Tupper	Sioux Falls, D. T.
†Woodward, George W.	Chicago, Ill.

Women's Western Unitarian Conference.

HEADQUARTERS: 175 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

ORGANIZED at St. Louis, 1881.

INCORPORATED under laws of Illinois, 1882.

OBJECT: "The advancement of Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion."—at present, by uniting the women of our churches (1) in a central organization, (2) in religious study classes, (3) in Post-office Mission work.

INCOME: The Conference depends wholly on the contributions of the women of the western Unitarian churches. About $800.00 is needed for the year's work, and the work would enlarge with larger resources.

ANNUAL MEETING, in May in connection with the W. U. C.

MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: "Life membership, $10.00; annual membership, $1.00. Delegate membership: "Delegate membership shall be acquired by certificate of appointment by any religious society or organization that shall have, during the previous year, contributed not less than five dollars to the Conference; and such society or organization may be represented by two general delegates."

OFFICERS: President, two Vice-Presidents, Secretary, Treasurer, elected at each annual meeting from the Board of Directors. Twenty-one Directors chosen for three years, seven annually. Vacancies in the Board may be filled by the remaining members. Five members a quorum. Directors' regular meetings on the first Thursday of June, September, December, March.

OFFICERS FOR 1887-8.

President	MRS. E. A. WEST, Chicago, Ills.
Vice-Presidents	{ MRS. J. C. LEARNED, St. Louis, Mo. MRS. A. G. JENNINGS, La Porte, Ind.
Secretary	MISS FLORENCE HILTON, Chicago, Ills.
Treasurer	MRS. J. C. HILTON, Chicago, Ills.

(Treasurer's address, 561 Webster Ave., Chicago.)

Board of Directors:

To May, 1888.

Mrs. E. L. Brown, Hyde Park, Ills.	Miss M. C. LeDuc, Minneapolis, Minn.
Mrs. W. C. Dow, Chicago, Ills.	Mrs. E. E. Marean, Chicago, Ills.
Miss Florence Hilton, Chicago, Ills.	Mrs. A. A. Roberts, Aberdeen, Dak.
Mrs. E. H. Hiscock, Denver, Col.

To May, 1889.

Miss M. H. Gale, Cleveland, O.	Mrs. J. C. Learned, St. Louis, Mo.
Miss E. M. Gould, Davenport, Ia.	Miss F. L. Roberts, Chicago, Ills.
Mrs. A. G. Jennings, LaPorte, Ind.	Mrs. C. S. Udell, Grand Rapids, Mich.
Mrs. S. C. L. Jones, Chicago, Ills.

To May 1890.

Miss S. A. Brown, Lawrence, Kan.	Mrs. M. S. Savage, Cooksville, Wis.
Mrs. O. C. Dinsmore, Omaha, Neb.	Mrs. C. C. Warren, Hinsdale, Ills.
Mrs. J. C. Hilton, Chicago, Ills.	Mrs. E. A. West, Chicago, Ills.
Mrs. C. J. Richardson, Princeton, Ills.

Post-office Mission Central Committee: Rev. A. M. Judy, Davenport, Ia.; Miss F. Le Baron, Elgin, Ill.; Miss F. Hilton.

Literature Committee: Mrs. E. A. West, Mrs. S. C. L. Jones, Mrs. E. E. Marean, Mrs. E. C. Whipple, Sheffield, Ill., Miss F. Hilton.

Study Class Committee: Mrs. E. R. Sunderland, Ann Arbor, Mich., Mrs. E. A. West, Miss F. Hilton.

LIFE MEMBERS OF THE W. W. U. C.

Including all names on the list from the beginning.

ILLINOIS.		ILLINOIS—continued.
Adams, Mrs. G. E.	Chicago.	Ingalls, Mrs. E.	Chicago.
Beecher, Mrs. J.	"	Jones, J. L.	"
Blackman, Mrs. E.	"	Jones, Mrs. S. C. L.	"
Chambers, Mrs. G.	Riverside.	LeBaron, Miss F.	Elgin.
Driver, Mrs. H. M.	"	McFadon, Mrs. A. C.	Quincy.
Felix, Mrs. B. F.	Chicago.	Moulton, Mrs. B. P.	Chicago.
Foster, Mrs. N. S.	"	Root, Mrs. H. E.	Alton.
Gore, Mrs. G. P.	"	Sayres, Mrs. H.	Chicago.
Hull, Mrs. M. D.	"	Spears, Mrs. E. R.	Riverside.

ILLINOIS—continued.

Tilton, Miss K.	Chicago.
Tilton, Mrs. L.	"
Van Inwagen, Mrs. J.	Hinsdale.
West, Mrs. E. A.	Chicago.
Wilkinson, Mrs. J.	"
Wilson, Mrs. F. C.	"
Wright, Mrs. E.	"

IOWA.

Cole, Mrs. C. T.	Mount Pleasant.
French, Mrs. G. H.	Davenport.
Harkness, Mrs. C. F.	Humboldt.
Hunting, Mrs. J. M.	Des Moines.
Safford, Rev. Mary A.	Humboldt.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Davis, Mrs. C.	Shrewsbury.
----------------	-------------

MICHIGAN.

Ashley, Mrs. J. M.	Ann Arbor.
Bagley, Mrs. J. J.	Detroit.
Davis, C.	Muskegon.
Hall, Mrs. P.	Ann Arbor.
Palmer, Mrs. T. W.	Detroit.
Papineau, Mrs. S. L.	Lansing.
Scheffeler, Mrs. J. A. F.	Tawas City.
Sunderland, Mrs. E. R.	Ann Arbor.

MINNESOTA.

Ludden, Mrs. J. D.	St. Paul.
--------------------	-----------

MISSOURI.

Brockhauser, Miss	St. Louis.
Chapman, Mrs. J. G.	"
Chapman, Mrs. N. C.	"
Crane, Mrs. W.	"
Cutter, Mrs. N.	"
Goddard, Mrs. J. W.	"
Hagardine, Mrs. W.	"
Jones, Mrs. R.	"
Kefenstein, Mrs.	"
Leighton, Mrs. G. E.	"
Louderman, Mrs. J. H.	"
Moore, Mrs. R.	"
Noyes, Mrs. W.	"
Partridge, Mrs. G.	"
Powell, Mrs.	"
Reed, Mrs. A. P.	"
Richards, Mrs. E.	"
Rowse, Mrs. E. S.	"
Todd, Mrs. A.	"

OHIO.

Ellis, Miss S. E.	Cincinnati.
Peters, Miss J.	"
Strong, Mrs. S. M.	Cleveland.

WISCONSIN.

Allis, Mrs. E. P.	Milwaukee.
Button, Mrs. H. H.	"
Metcalf, Mrs. W. H.	"
Norris, Mrs. G. D.	"

WESTERN DIRECTORS OF THE WOMEN'S NATIONAL AUXILIARY.

(See page 214, below.)

Mrs. Fayette Smith,	Ohio Conference,	Mrs. J. R. Effinger,	Ills. Conference.
Miss M. H. Gale,	"	Mrs. C. T. Cole,	Iowa "
Mrs. T. B. Forbush,	Wis. "	Mrs. A. G. Jennings,	Ind. "
Mrs. J. T. Sunderland,	Mich. "

Western Unitarian Sunday-School Society.

HEADQUARTERS: 175 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

ORGANIZED 1873: Incorporated under laws of Illinois, 1882.

OBJECT: "To improve the quality of Sunday-school publications, and to aid in making Sunday-schools effective nurseries of progressive, reverent and helpful churches."

MOTTO ON SEAL: "The world is saved by the breath of the School-Children."

INCOME: The Society depends in part on the sale of its publications, in part on the contributions of friends of its work in our western Sunday-schools. About $500 is needed for this year's work.

ANNUAL MEETING, in May, in connection with the W. U. C.

MEMBERS: Life membership, $10.00. Annual membership, $1.00.

OFFICERS: President, Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer, elected at each annual meeting from the Board of Directors. Twelve Directors, four retiring each year. Vacancies in Board may be filled by remaining members. Five members a quorum for business.

Directors' meetings held on the first Monday of each month.

OFFICERS FOR 1887-8.

President	REV. J. V. BLAKE, Chicago, Ills.
Vice-President	MRS. S. W. CONGER, Chicago, Ills.
Secretary and Treasurer	ELLEN T. LEONARD, Chicago, Ills.

Board of Directors.

To May, 1888.

Mrs. H. H. Badger, Chicago, Ills.	Rev. D. Utter, Chicago, Ills.
Mrs. J. Slade, " "	Rev. J. L. Jones, " "

To May, 1889.

Rev. J. V. Blake, Chicago, Ills.	C. H. Kerr, Chicago, Ills.
Mrs. S. W. Conger, " "	Mrs. W. C. Dow, " "

To May, 1890.

Wm. Bouton, St. Louis, Mo.	Rev. W. C. Gannett, Chicago, Ills.
Miss M. L. Southworth, Cleveland, O.	Ellen T. Leonard, " "

For list of the Western Sunday-school Society's publications see second page of cover.

LIFE MEMBERS OF THE W. U. S. S. S.

Including all names on the list from the beginning.

ILLINOIS.		ILLINOIS—continued.
Adams, Mrs. G. E.	Chicago.	Miller, M. J.	Geneseo.
Blackman, Mrs. E.	"	Root, Mrs. A. K.	Alton.
Furness, W. E.	"	Shippen, Joseph.	Chicago.
Gannett, W. C.	"	Utter, Mrs. D.	"
Harvey, J. D.	"	Wilkinson, Hilda.	"
Jones, J. L.	"	Wilkinson, J.	"
Jones, Mrs. S. C. L.	"	Wilkinson, Mrs. J.	"
Leonard, Myron	"	Wilson, F. C.	"
Loveday, Mrs. F. M.	"
McFadon, Mrs. A. C.	Quincy

IOWA.		NEW YORK.
Booge, Miss L.	Sioux City.	Angle, J. L.	Rochester.
Taft, Mrs. M. A.	Humboldt.	Mann, N. M.	"
MISSOURI.		OHIO.
Case, J. B.	St. Louis.	Caldwell, J. D.	Cincinnati.
Goddard, Mrs. J. W.	"	Hosmer, F. L.	Cleveland.
Learned, J. C.	"	Kilpatrick, T.	"
Learned, Mrs. J. C.	"	Noyes, C.	Cincinnati.
Richardson, Mrs. L. S.	"	Payne, Mrs. M. P.	Cleveland.
Rowse, E. S.	"	Southworth, Miss M. L.	"
Smith, Mrs. J.	"	Wade, J. H.	"
Snyder, J.	"	Wade, Mrs. J. H.	"
Tilden, G.	"	White, J. H.	"
MICHIGAN.		RHODE ISLAND.
Brigham, Mrs. G. N.	Grand Rapids.	Richmond, Miss O.	Providence.
Davis, C.	Muskegon.
Udell, Mrs. C. S.	Grand Rapids.
MINNESOTA.		WISCONSIN.
Clark, Mrs. M. C.	St. Paul.	Allis, Mrs. E. P.	Milwaukee.
Ludden, J. D.	"	Cook, Mrs. F. B.	Janesville.
Ludden, Mrs. J. D.	"	Harris, J.	"
NEW JERSEY.		Robinson, Miss J.	Milwaukee.
Dix, Miss D. L.	Trenton.	Wells, Miss M.	"
		Wells, Miss S.	"
		Whitehead, Miss J.	"

Western State Conferences.

1866.—Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies.

Rev. T. B. Forbush, Milwaukee, President; Rev. Joseph Waite, Janesville, Vice-President; Rev. J. H. Crooker, Madison, General Secretary; Miss M. E. French, Kenosha, Recording Secretary; Mrs. M. S. Savage, Cookville, Secretary Post Office Mission work; Miss E. A. Giles, Madison, Treasurer.

1875.—Michigan Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches.

_____, President; Rev. E. P. Gibbs, Grand Haven, Secretary; George Stickney, Grand Haven, Treasurer.

1875.—Illinois Conference of Unitarian and Other Independent Societies.

John A. Roche, Chicago, President; Rev. J. R. Effinger, Chicago, Secretary; Mrs. M. A. Dow, Chicago, Treasurer.

1877.—Iowa Association of Unitarian and Other Independent Churches.

Rev. Mary A. Safford, Sioux City, President; T. C. Puckett, Rock Rapids, Vice-President; Rev. A. M. Judy, Davenport, General Secretary; G. S. Garfield, Humboldt, Sec'y Unity club work; Miss C. J. Bartlett, Sioux Falls, D. T., Sec'y Sunday-school work; Rev. Eliza T. Wilkes, Sioux Falls, D. T., Sec'y Post-Office Mission work; Miss E. E. Gordon, Sioux City, Sec'y Lay Leaders' society; W. H. Fleming, Des Moines, Treasurer; Rev. Oscar Clute, Minister-at-large for Iowa, Dakota and Minnesota.

1878.—Indiana Conference of Unitarian and Other Independent Societies.

William H. Rifenburg, Hobart, President; Augustus Wood, Valparaiso, Treasurer; Rev. A. G. Jennings, Secretary, and Minister-at-large for Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky.

1879.—Ohio Conference of Unitarian and Other Liberal Churches.

_____, President; Rev. J. T. Lusk, Marietta, Secretary and Treasurer.

1880.—Missouri River Conference.

James Scammon, Kansas City, President; Miss Sarah A. Brown, Lawrence, Secretary; Mrs. Kersey Coats, Kansas City, Treasurer; Rev. Enoch Powell, Topeka, Missionary.

1882.—Nebraska Unitarian Association.

Thomas L. Kimball, Omaha, President; Rev. Enoch Powell, Topeka, Kan., Secretary; Mrs. E. M. Abbott, Grand Island, Treasurer; Rev. W. E. Copeland, Omaha, Missionary.

Post-Office Mission.

WITHIN THE LIMITS OF THE WESTERN CONFERENCE.

The object of the Post Office Mission is the distribution of liberal religious literature—tracts, papers and books. The American Unitarian Association furnishes the workers with its tracts, free; the Unity Publishing Committee furnishes its tracts at a cheap price. By advertisement and otherwise, each worker aims to develop a little parish of correspondents, who in turn will pass on the material regularly sent to them. The Women's W. U. C. takes the Post-office Mission of the west in its special charge, and for suggestions about methods and material its P. O. M. Central Committee, named above (page 211) may be applied to.

"The P. O. Mission had increased the circulation of our tracts last year five-fold, and this year it has nearly, if not quite, doubled last year's circulation," says the Secretary of the A. U. A.

Our list of "Workers" is doubtless incomplete. UNITY will be glad to learn of mistakes and omissions, in order to print a more complete list in the fall.

WORKERS.

Colorado.

Mrs. H. C. Dillon }
Mrs. A. G. Rhodes } Denver.

Dakota.

Rev. A. A. Roberts Aberdeen
Mrs. H. E. Moody Deadwood
Mrs. E. T. Wilkes Sioux Falls
Mrs. J. H. Morrison Yankton

Illinois.

John Burnham Batavia
Rev. C. Covell Buda
Miss F. C. Hilton, Sec'y W. W. U. C. Chicago, 175 Dearborn street.
Mrs. John Adams Chicago, (Church of the Messiah)
Mrs. W. C. Dow " (Unity Church)
Mrs. L. J. Tilton " (All Souls Church)
Mrs. E. E. Marean " (All Souls Church)
Miss F. Le Baron Elgin
Mrs. M. J. Miller Geneseo
Miss S. S. Carr Geneva
Mrs. P. R. Stowell Metamora
Mrs. J. R. Effinger Normal Park
Mrs. C. J. Richardson Princeton
Miss C. Battey Sheffield

Indiana.

Mrs. Mary R. Wood Hobart
Rev. A. G. Jennings La Porte

Iowa.

Rev. A. M. Judy }
Miss E. M. Gould } Davenport.
Miss C. M. Holmes }
F. W. Bicknell Humboldt
Rev. S. S. Hunting }
Mrs. M. L. Brown } Des Moines
Miss Gue }
Miss E. F. Stowe }
Rev. O. Clute Iowa City
Mrs. C. T. Cole Mount Pleasant

Kansas.

Rev. J. S. Brown }
Miss S. A. Brown } Lawrence.
Mrs. G. M. Wood }
Rev. E. Powell } Topeka

Michigan.

Mrs. C. S. Udell Grand Rapids
Rev. L. R. Daniels Midland
C. Davis Muskegon

Minnesota.

Miss J. E. McCaine Saint Paul

Missouri.

Mrs. E. R. Stevens St. Louis

Nebraska.

Mrs. B. W. Davis Beatrice
Miss T. M. Grant Omaha

Ohio.

Mrs. Fayette Smith Cincinnati (Ridgeway Ave)
Miss Mary H. Gale Cleveland

Wisconsin.

Rev. T. G. Owens Arcadia
Miss Julia Avery Baraboo
Mrs. M. S. Savage Cookville
Miss M. E. French Kenosha
Miss Jessie Spencer Madison

Western Committee on Fellowship of Ministers.

Appointed by the National Unitarian Conference to approve candidates for the Unitarian ministry coming from outside the denomination, and accredit them to the churches; this certificate of approval not being a requisite for admission, but an introduction helpful both to candidates and to the churches. Such candidates, in the west, are requested to apply to one of the following committee:

Rev. John R. Effinger, 175 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.

Rev. John C. Learned, St. Louis, Mo.

Rev. J. T. Sunderland, Ann Arbor, Mich.

(See page 214 below.)

Western Unitarian Association.

OFFICE: 115 Monroe St., Chicago, Ills.

ORGANIZED: June, 1886.

OBJECT: "A more definite co-operation with the American Unitarian Association in its western work."

ANNUAL MEETING at such time and place as the Directors may arrange.

MEMBERSHIP acquired by payment of $1.00, and approval of Board of Directors; and each such member shall pay yearly $1.00 as dues. Life membership, $25.00.

OFFICERS: President, Vice-President, General Secretary, Recording Secretary who shall also be Treasurer,—these chosen annually,—and twenty-seven others who, with them, shall constitute a Board of Directors; these others to be chosen for three years, one-third annually. Directors' meetings, at least twice a year; seven a quorum

Board of Directors.

President.....HON. GEORGE W. McCRARY, Kansas City, Mo

Vice-President.....JOSEPH SHIPPEN, Chicago, Ills

General Secretary

Recording Secretary and Treasurer.....MRS. JONATHAN SLADE, Chicago, Ills

Rev. H. H. Barber.....Meadville, Pa.

Rev. J. T. Bixby.....Yonkers, N. Y.

Rev. Oscar Clute.....Iowa City, Ia.

J. L. Danforth.....Louisville, Ky.

H. C. Dillon.....Denver, Col.

Rev. J. L. Douthit.....Shelbyville, Ill.

G. A. Follansbee.....Chicago, Ills.

Rev. E. I. Galvin.....Chicago, Ills.

Rev. G. E. Gordon.....Milwaukee, Wis.

Miss Ellen M. Gould.....Davenport, Ia.

P. P. Heywood.....Chicago, Ills.

M. B. Hull.....Chicago, Ills.

Rev. Kristofer Janson.....Minneapolis, Minn.

Rev. A. G. Jennings.....LaPorte, Ind

O. E. Learnard.....Lawrence, Kan

George E. Leighton.....St. Louis, Mo

J. E. McKelhan....." "

Rev. T. G. Kilsted.....Chicago, Ills.

C. H. S. Mixer....." "

Rev. John Snyder.....St. Louis, Mo.

Rev. J. T. Sunderland.....Ann Arbor, Mich.

H. T. Thompson.....Chicago, Ills.

A. M. Thomson....." "

Mrs. Lucian Tilton....." "

Rev. John Tunis.....South Scituate, Mass.

Rev. Albert Walkley.....Manistee, Mich.

Executive Committee.

Rev. E. I. Galvin, P. P. Heywood, Joseph Shippen, Rev. J. T. Sunderland, H. T. Thompson.

Unity Publishing Committee.

Organized in 1878, to publish UNITY and other aids to the liberal religious work of the west. Its members are

J. L. Jones.

J. V. Blake,
W. C. Gannett,
F. L. Hosmer,J. C. Learned,
H. M. Simmons,
David Utter.PUBLICATIONS.

(1) UNITY, a weekly paper (see below.)

(2) TWO SERIES OF TRACTS, the "Unity Mission Tracts," and "Unity Short Tracts." Learned, Gannett and Jones, the sub-committee in charge. For subjects and prices of these tracts, see third page of cover.

(3) UNITY HYMNS AND CHORALS. For the Congregation and the Home. 253 Hymns, 66 Hymn Tunes, 23 Chorals and Choral Responses. Edited by W. C. Gannett, J. V. Blake and F. L. Hosmer. In cloth, 35 cents; per dozen, $3.00; per hundred, $25.00.

UNITY HYMNS, CHORALS AND RESPONSIVE READINGS, bound together; cloth, 50 cents; per dozen, $5.00; per hundred, $40.00.

SCRIPTURES OLD AND NEW. Arranged by subjects for Pulpit Readings, etc. Selected by F. L. Hosmer and H. M. Simmons. Interleaved for additions. In paper, 35 cents; boards, 50 cents.

Charles H. Kerr & Co.,

175 DEARBORN ST., CHICAGO, ILLS.

A book-publishing and selling firm, established in connection with the Western Unitarian Head-quarters, and dealing specially in the literature of the liberal religious faith. It is also the publisher of UNITY (see just below). On the last page is a list of its publications. In addition to its own publications it has arrangements with Roberts Brothers, George H. Ellis, and the American Unitarian Association of Boston, and with G. P. Putnam's Sons, of New York, by which many of their publications will be kept in stock.

General orders are solicited by call or by mail.

Unitarian Periodicals, Published in the West.

1. UNITY, a weekly of 12 to 16 pages. Its motto is "Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion." It aims to represent the spirit and hope, the word and work, of western Unitarianism—this being to it but another name for those common elements of Religious Faith and Life which underlie and overlie all churches,—another name for an enthusiasm for truth and righteousness and love and aspiration.

J. LL. JONES, Editor.
Associate Editors.J. Vila Blake,
W. C. Gannett,
F. L. Hosmer,J. C. Learned,
H. M. Simmons,
David Utter.Charles H. Kerr & Co., Publishers, 175 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills.
$1.50 a year.

2. OUR BEST WORDS, a semi-monthly of 8 to 10 pages.

"It stands for Unitarian Christianity, with Jesus Christ as Leader in Morals and Religion."

J. L. DOUTHIT, Editor and Publisher, Shelbyville, Ills., $1.00 a year.

3. THE UNITARIAN, a monthly of 32 pages.

"It stands for earnest, rational, distinctly avowed Christianity, while yet desiring to keep our fellowship as wide as aims of common work and worship will allow."

BROOKE HERFORD and J. T. SUNDERLAND, Editors.
*Editorial Contributors.*Oscar Clute,
Robert Collyer,
John Snyder,George L. Chaney,
H. Price Collier,
Mrs. J. T. Sunderland.

Published at 115 Monroe St., Chicago, Ills. 50 cents a year, in advance.

The Channing Club of Chicago.

ORGANIZED 1881.

Membership open to the members and ministers of the Unitarian congregations of Chicago and vicinity. At the meetings, the members, after dining together, discuss some subject of interest to the churches.

Committee of Managers, E. H. Griggs, M. B. Hull, H. T. Thompson, J. A. Roche, G. W. Dexter; by whom a President for each meeting is chosen. Secretary and Treasurer, J. H. Van Vliessen, 94 Washington street, Room 32, Chicago, Ills.

Chicago Women's Unitarian Association and Loan Library.

This Association, composed of the women of Unitarian sympathies in Chicago and the vicinity, is auxiliary to the Women's Western Unitarian Conference. It was formed in order to strengthen social relations with each other, to study together the meaning, use and growth of Unitarianism, and to become more familiar with Unitarian literature. Its only condition of membership is the annual payment of $1.00 into the treasury. The membership last year was about 200. The meetings, which come once a month except in summer, itinerate from church to church. A social with mid-day lunch begins each meeting; after which a paper and discussion follow.

The Association has established a Loan Library at the Unitarian Headquarters, for the use of members and others, and especially to aid the Post-Office Mission workers. The shelves now contain about 300 books, mainly selected to illustrate the thought, faith, poetry, worship and life of Liberal Religion; and gifts of such books are requested from friends, that the library may grow in value. The catalogue is sent, and books are loaned for 15 days by mail, on application enclosing ten cents for postage. Apply to Miss F. Hilton, Unitarian Headquarters, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ills.

[A somewhat similar Women's Association exists in St. Louis and several other places.]

President, Mrs. S. W. Conger; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. G. A. Follansbee, Mrs. W. C. Dow, Mrs. W. G. Cutler, Mrs. G. F. Shears, Secretary, Mrs. J. R. Effinger; Treasurer, Mrs. J. C. Hilton, 561 Webster Ave., Chicago.

Programme for 1887-8.

"Current Religious Events of the Month,"—a short report at the beginning of each meeting.....Mrs. S. C. L. Jones
"Temperance Work in the Liberal Church".....Mrs. E. A. West
"The Wages of Sin".....Mrs. G. F. Shears
"The Value of Beauty".....Mrs. E. E. Marean
"Contact with Children as a Means of Education".....

Mrs. C. H. S. Mixer

"Recent Controversies in the Roman Catholic Church,".....Mrs. L. Tilton

"Relation of Health to Religion".....Dr. L. G. Bedell
"Dean Stanley and the Broad Church Movement".....

Miss Florence Hilton

Rev. Florence Kollock

Unity Clubs.

Many of the Unitarian churches of the west have long had their social and study side organized under the name of "Unity Club"—the name, or some name similar, covering a larger variety of aims and methods. To stimulate to better work and render that work easier by sharing experience and helpful suggestions, a Central Unity Club Bureau has just come into being in the east, (see page 216 below,) with which it may be well for our western workers to connect themselves. When our western clubs re-organize themselves in the fall, UNITY asks each one to report to this office the name and address of its President and Secretary and a brief outline of its winter's programme. And then we shall hope to publish the list, which, if published now, would be very incomplete.

Hillside Home School.

A SCHOOL FOR CHILDREN OF THE LIBERAL FAITH.

The undersigned propose to open next September (1887) a Home School, in Helena Valley, Iowa Co., Wis., situated on the beautiful Wisconsin River Valley, forty miles west of Madison.

The aim will be to provide home comfort and guardianship with thorough training; to produce, in healthy bodies, healthy minds and self-reliant, reverent character.

A farm of a hundred acres, with its garden, farm-yard and workshop, will give opportunity for manual and domestic training for boys and girls, indoors and outdoors.

The number of family pupils will be limited to twenty.

Terms, $350.00 per year.

Address either of the undersigned at Hillside Home School, Spring Green, Wis.

ELLEN C. LLOYD JONES.
JANE LLOYD JONES.

References:

President W. D. Parker, Normal School.....	River Falls, Wis.
Prof. William F. Allen, State University.....	Madison, Wis.
Prof. J. B. Thayer, Sup't of Public Instruction.....	" "
Rev. Jenkin L. Jones.....	Chicago, Ill.
Rev. H. M. Simmons.....	Minneapolis, Minn.
Rev. John C. Learned.....	St. Louis, Mo.
Rev. John Snyder.....	" "
Rev. Oscar Clute.....	Iowa City, Ia.
Rev. J. H. Crooker.....	Madison, Wis.
C. E. Estabrook, Attorney General.....	" "
Mrs. E. Tupper Wilkes.....	Sioux Falls, Dak.
Rev. Oscar McCullough.....	Indianapolis, Ind.
Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells.....	Boston, Mass.
W. C. Gannett.....	Chicago, Ills.

Forms of Bequest.

No special formula of giving is essential, if the intention is clear; but the name of the corporation is essential, to avoid question as to what body is meant.

The following formulas are recommended:

For money or personal property:

To the Western Unitarian Conference (or the Women's Western Unitarian Conference, or the Western Unitarian Sunday-school Society), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, and having its office at Chicago, I give and bequeath, etc.

For real estate, the same formula, ending with the words, I give and devise, etc.

II.

National Organizations.

National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches.

ORGANIZED in New York, 1865.

MEETING: Every second year in the fall for a four or five days' session, usually at Saratoga, N. Y. Its twelfth session held there Sept. 20-24, 1886.

OBJECT: "To energize and stimulate the denomination to the largest exertions in the cause of Christian faith and work." "A purely advisory body."

MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: "The National Conference shall be composed of such delegates, elected once in two years, not to exceed three from any church, including its minister, who shall officially be one, as any of our churches may accredit to it by a certificate of their appointment." "The American Unitarian Association, the Western Conference, and such other theological, academic or humane organizations in our body as the Conference may see fit to invite, shall be entitled to representation by not more than three delegates each."

OFFICERS: President, six Vice-Presidents, General Secretary, and Treasurer, elected at each meeting; and a Council of Ten, half laymen and half ministers—five members retiring at each meeting.

THE COUNCIL, three months before each meeting, issues a letter of call to the churches and organizations in the fellowship, with a form of certificate for delegates. It invites parish reports, etc., to be sent to the Secretary one month before the meeting; and after the meeting it sends to the churches and organizations a report of the proceedings, and an address containing the Conference recommendations as to work and the money required for the work and such other advice and encouragement as it may deem appropriate.

FELLOWSHIP AND FAITH: The doctrinal position of the Conference is indicated by the following extracts from its Constitution:

PREAMBLE (1865)—Whereas the great opportunities and demands for Christian labor and consecration, at this time, increase our sense of the obligations of all disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ to prove their faith by self-denial, and by the devotion of their lives and possessions to the service of God, and the building up of the kingdom of his Son—Therefore, etc.

ARTICLE IX. (added 1870)—Reaffirming our allegiance to the gospel of Jesus Christ, and desiring to secure the largest unity of the spirit, and the widest practical co-operation, we invite to our fellowship all who wish to be followers of Christ.

ARTICLE X. (added 1882)—While we believe that the Preamble and Articles of our Constitution fairly represent the opinions of the majority of our churches, yet we wish distinctly to put on record our declaration that they are no authoritative test of Unitarianism, and are not intended to exclude from our fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our purposes and practical aims.

OFFICERS.

Hon. Samuel F. Miller, Washington, D. C.....	President.
Hon. John D. Long, Hingham, Mass.....
Hon. George W. McCrary, Kansas City, Mo.
Dorman B. Eaton, New York, N. Y.....
Hon. Daniel L. Shorey, Chicago, Ill.....	Vice-Presidents.
Hon. Horace Davis, San Francisco, Cal.....
Hon. George E. Adams, Chicago, Ill.....
Rev. R. N. Bellows, 109 E. 15th St., New York.....	General Secretary.
William H. Reed, Boston, Mass.....	Treasurer.

COUNCIL.

Rev. James De Normandie, Chairman.....	Boston, Mass.
Mrs. James Freeman Clarke.....	Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Mrs. Mary Hemenway.....	Boston, Mass.
Rev. Jenkin L. Jones.....	Chicago, Ills.
Rev. Minot J. Savage.....	Boston, Mass.
Hon. Leverett Saltonstall.....	Newton, Mass.
Rev. John Snyder.....	St. Louis, Mo.
John Harson Rhoades.....	New York, N. Y.
Thomas J. Morris.....	Baltimore, Md.
Rev. Brooke Herford.....	Boston, Mass.

And the General Secretary, ex officio.

COMMITTEE ON FELLOWSHIP OF MINISTERS.

Regulations prepared in accordance with instructions given by the National Conference, in 1878:—

1. Whenever any person, who has not received instruction in the Divinity School at Cambridge, the Theological School at Meadville, or in any school of theology of the Unitarian faith elsewhere, shall desire to enter the Unitarian ministry, he shall be requested to make application, expressing such desire, to the Chairman of the Committee on Fellowship, or to the Chairman of the sub committee nearest his residence.

2. Upon making such application, the candidate shall present to the Committee satisfactory testimonials of his fitness for the ministry, and, if he shall have been previously connected with any ministerial body or church not of the Unitarian faith, a certificate of dismission from such organization.

3. If the Committee are assured of the fitness of the candidate, they shall give to him a certificate of their approval, and they shall at once inform the Secretary of each Local Conference of their action in the premises.

Rev. Charles C. Everett, D. D., Chairman..... Cambridge, Mass
Rev. Augustus Woodbury, Secretary..... Providence, R. I.

And four sub-committees for Eastern, Middle, Western and Pacific States, respectively.

(For Western Sub-committee, see page 212 above.)

Women's Auxiliary Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches.

ORGANIZED in Saratoga, 1880.

BIENNIAL MEETING: In connection with the National Unitarian Conference.

OBJECT: To interest women in the work of the National Conference and assist it in raising money, and to promote local organizations of women for Christian work.

MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: "This Conference shall be composed of delegates from each organization of women within our fellowship; and all the women attending the National Conference shall be cordially invited to participate in the proceedings of this Auxiliary Conference. From each an annual subscription of $1.00, or a life-membership fee of $25.00, shall be sought, as an earnest of the 'faith that is in us.'" The Conference distributes its funds through the American Unitarian Association, and may name the special object of its contribution.

OFFICERS: President, three Vice-Presidents, Secretary, Treasurer, and a Board of Directors, each of whom shall represent a local Conference. These officers to be chosen at the biennial meeting, and together to constitute an Executive Committee. Five a quorum.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, three months before each National Conference meeting, issues a letter of call to the women of each church and organization in its fellowship; it invites parish reports, etc., from them; it presents a report at the biennial meeting, and also submits a statement of its work and recommendations to the general session of the National Conference.

OFFICERS.

Mrs. Judith W. Andrews, Boston, Mass. President.
 Mrs. Samuel J. Hooper, Boston, Mass. }
 Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows, Boston (Dorchester), Mass. } Vice-Presidents.
 Miss Frances LeBaron, Elgin, Ill. }
 Mrs. George W. Thacher, Boston, Mass. Secretary.
 Miss Flora L. Close, 25 Beacon St., Boston, Mass. Treasurer.

And twenty-five Directors, representing the several State and local Conferences.

(For the Western Directors, see page, 211 above.)

American Unitarian Association.

The mother-association of Unitarians in the United States. A missionary body, composed of life-members and delegates from churches and associations.

ORGANIZED, 1825. INCORPORATED, 1847.

OBJECT, WORK AND INCOME: "To diffuse the knowledge and promote the interests of pure Christianity." "To this end it collects and diffuses religious information. It publishes and distributes books and tracts. It supports missionaries, aids clergymen and young men preparing for the ministry, and helps in building churches. It seeks to produce union, sympathy, and co-operation among the Unitarian churches and people; and for its missionary activities solicits their benefactions, whether by yearly contribution, or by gift of endowment funds to be held in trust."

HEAD-QUARTERS, 25 Beacon St., Boston, in a new Building, dedicated May, 1886. The Building contains the Book-room of the Association and the Unitarian Sunday-school Society, the Reading-room, the Rooms occupied by various Secretaries and Committees, and Channing Hall. The Hall and Committee-rooms are at the service of Unitarians for denominational meetings of all kinds.

LIFE-MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: Life-membership, $50.00. "Any church or missionary association, of at least two years' standing, shall, upon sending a contribution for missionary uses to the Treasurer of the Association for two successive years, be entitled to representation at all business meetings of the Association, by the persons of its minister or president, and two additional lay delegates; provided that such contributions shall be placed in the hands of the officers of the Association on or before May 1, to entitle a church to be represented in the following annual meeting. Delegate members shall have the right to vote at all meetings of the Association."

ANNUAL MEETING, in May, at such time and place as the Board of Directors may appoint.

OFFICERS: "The officers shall be a President, two Vice-Presidents, a Secretary, and one or more Assistant Secretaries, a Treasurer, and eighteen other persons, who, with them, shall constitute a Board of Directors. These officers, fourteen of whom, at least, shall be laymen, shall be chosen by ballot at the Annual Meeting. The President, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries, and Treasurer shall be chosen annually, to serve for one year each, or until their successors are chosen. The other Directors shall be chosen for three years, or until their successors are chosen; and one-third shall be chosen annually."

This Board to meet at least once in three months, eight constituting a quorum; and to have charge of all the business and interests of the Association, the direction of its funds and operations; with power to fill any vacancies that may occur in their number and to choose from their own number an Executive Committee.

PUBLICATIONS: The A. U. A. keeps on sale in its book room, besides many publications of its own, all other Unitarian books, and many new books of liberal religious thought issued by other publishers. A list with prices will be furnished on application.

It publishes between one and two hundred tracts, which are furnished free to any who apply by letter or otherwise.

It offers, as a gift, a selection from its publications, of about thirty volumes, to colleges or public libraries, upon their application and assurance of welcome. It also gives, without cost, a selection of volumes illustrating the Unitarian faith, to Trinitarian ministers settled in New England, who apply for them with the desire candidly to know what Unitarians believe; and Channing's Works, to any minister not owning them, settled over a religious society in the United States or Canada, or any student of a theological school intending to enter the ministry, who makes application.

OFFICERS.

George S. Hale, Boston, Mass. President.
 George W. Curtis, Staten Island, N. Y. }
 George O. Shattuck, Boston, Mass. } Vice-Presidents.
 Rev. Grindall Reynolds, Concord, Mass. Secretary.
 George W. Fox, Boston, Mass. Ass't Secretary.
 Charles H. Burrage, Boston, Mass. Treasurer.

Other Directors.

To May, 1888.

Rev. S. C. Beach, Dedham, Mass.
 A. L. Calder, Providence, R. I.
 J. C. Otis, Worcester, Mass.

Rev. G. A. Thayer, Cincinnati, O.
 Rev. C. W. Wendt, Oakland, Cal.
 Mrs. H. L. Wentworth, Danvers, Mass.

To May, 1889.

T. Gaffield, Boston, Mass.
 Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke, Newton, Mass.
 Rev. E. A. Horton, Boston, Mass.

D. S. Richardson, Lowell, Mass.
 Rev. S. B. Stewart, Lynn, Mass.
 W. L. Whitney, Cambridge, Mass.

To May, 1890.

Rev. J. H. Allen, Cambridge, Mass.
 Rev. G. Batchelor, Wellesley Hills.
 Rev. H. N. Brown, Brookline, Mass.

D. B. Eaton, New York, N. Y.
 W. E. James, Boston, Mass.
 Mrs. K. G. Wells, Boston, Mass.

The Board of Directors is divided into Standing Committees on Finance, Publication, New England States, Middle and Southern States, Western States and Pacific Coast, Foreign Missions, Theological Education, and Executive.

Unitarian Sunday-School Society.

ORGANIZED 1827. INCORPORATED 1835.

OBJECT: "To promote moral and religious education in Sunday-schools."

HEADQUARTERS, Book Room and Publication Office in the A. U. A. Building, 25 Beacon street, Boston.

MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: Life membership $10. Any Unitarian parish or Sunday-school contributing to the funds of the society may appoint three delegate members for one year from the October 1 following the gift.

ANNUAL MEETING, in October. Special Meeting in Boston in Anniversary Week.

INCOME, partly from the sale of its publications, partly from the annual contributions of the churches, whose regular aid it asks as one of their missionary societies.

PUBLICATIONS: Many Sunday-school manuals, a Service Book and Hymnal, and various other helps for the school work, an illustrated Sunday-school paper called Every Other Sunday, and a current series of Lessons, this year on Bible Biographies. A list of the works sent on application.

OFFICERS.

Rev. W. H. Lyon, Boston President.
 Rev. C. F. Dole, Boston (Jamaica Plain) }
 John W. Porter, Boston (Neponset) } Vice-Presidents.
 Rev. H. G. Spaulding, Newton, Mass. Secretary.
 R. C. Humphreys, Boston (Dorchester) Treasurer.

Other Directors.

Rev. H. N. Brown Brookline, Mass.
 Miss E. P. Channing Milton, Mass.
 R. C. Metcalf Winchester, Mass.
 Rev. J. F. Moors Greenfield, Mass.
 J. O. Norris Melrose, Mass.

Rev. M. J. Savage Boston.
 Rev. T. R. Slicer Providence, R. I.
 Mrs. K. G. Wells Boston.
 Rev. G. H. Young Boston.

The Board of Directors is divided into Standing Committees on Publication, Finance, Meetings, Outlook and Work, Missions, Merchandise and Apparatus.

Ladies' Commission on Sunday-School Books.

"Its chief object is the preparation of lists of books suitable for Unitarian Sunday-school libraries. Books received from publishers are carefully examined, and those approved by five readers are placed on the Catalogue of the Commission."

Annual lists have been issued every May since 1866; and a consolidated and revised catalogue made from these lists was printed in 1886. Catalogues can be obtained at the office of the Unitarian Sunday-school Society, 25 Beacon street, Boston.

Miss M. H. Brooks, President; Mrs. F. H. Lee, Secretary; Miss C. G. Soule, Librarian.

Church Building Loan Fund.

ORGANIZED, 1885: By the A. U. A. and National Conference.

OBJECT: To aid Unitarian Societies in the erection of churches.

OFFICERS: The Trustees of the Fund are elected by the Directors of the A. U. A.; but in the transaction of business, the Trustees are an entirely independent board.

All business communications should be addressed to the Secretary, at Brookline, Mass.

RULES.

1. The Officers of this Board shall be a President, a Secretary, a Treasurer and a Standing Committee of three, to receive and report applications for aid, these officers to be chosen annually.

2. The Board shall meet annually in the month of May, during anniversary week, and at other times, according to its own votes or the call of its officers.

3. No money from the fund held by this Board shall be bestowed as a gift, and all loans from the same shall be made on adequate security.

4. No money shall be loaned except by consent of seven of the nine Trustees.

5. No change shall be made in the conditions of any loan or in the terms of its repayment except by unanimous consent of the full Board of Trustees.

6. No money shall be loaned until the act of incorporation of the Society applying for aid, and the plan of the building it proposes to erect, have been submitted to the Trustees and approved by them.

7. Not more than half the whole value of a building and the land on which it stands shall be loaned from this fund; nor shall any loan be made, unless it suffices to clear the property of all other indebtedness.

8. Sums not exceeding $5,000 may be loaned from this fund, with or without interest as shall be determined in each case; but, in every case, provision shall be made for the annual repayment of a certain fixed portion of the sum loaned, as may be agreed upon.

9. In return for every loan, the Trustees shall take the note of the Society, with such personal indorsement or guarantee thereof as they shall deem satisfactory, said note to be secured also by a mortgage on the church property; and in no case shall the Trustees suffer default to be made without proceeding to legal measures for the collection of the debt.

TRUSTEES, (Jan. 1, 1887.)

Hon. G. D. Robinson, Chicopee, Mass.	President.	Henry W. Putnam, Boston, Mass.
Rev. Howard N. Brown, Brookline, Mass.	Secretary.	J. Harsen Rhoades, New York, N. Y.
Charles H. Burrage, Boston, Mass.	Treasurer.	Rev. Jabez T. Sunderland, Chicago, Ill.
Rev. Brooke Herford, Boston, Mass.		Rev. George A. Thayer, Cincinnati, Ohio.
Rev. Grindall Reynolds, Concord, Mass.

Standing Committee.

Rev. Brooke Herford, Rev. Grindall Reynolds, Rev. Howard N. Brown.

Unitarian Church Temperance Society.

ORGANIZED, 1886.

OBJECT: "To enlist our churches in Temperance work, and to assist in forming Temperance societies."

METHODS: "It works upon the broadest principles, encouraging Temperance workers everywhere to unite, whatever special opinions they may hold. It does not regard the Pledge method as essential, but recommends as useful Declarations of membership limited to a definite time, with opportunity for renewal, or such as may be surrendered upon deliberate change of purpose. It regards Total Abstinence as the wisest rule for personal habits and for teaching. It emphasizes personal responsibility, the value of Temperance education, the need of removing the temptations to which men are exposed, and of substituting innocent amusements and useful occupations for the attractions of the saloon. The spirit which it seeks to illustrate is that of the words, 'Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ', and 'Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.'"

BRANCH SOCIETIES: "It is composed of branch societies formed in sympathy with its general purpose either in churches or Sunday-schools. Each branch follows its own plan of organization and work, the office of the Central Society being simply advisory." Each branch may be represented at its biennial meeting by two delegates.

BIENNIAL MEETING, in connection with the National Conference. Special meetings as called.

PUBLICATIONS AND HELPS: The Society has published pamphlets suggesting methods of work, membership cards, etc., and "Temperance Services and Hymns" (price 10 cents). For publications address the Secretary, 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

OFFICERS.

Rev. C. R. Eliot, Boston, (Dorchester)	President.
W. H. Baldwin, Boston	Vice-President.
Rev. J. L. Marsh, Winchester, Mass.	Secretary and Treasurer.

Directors.

Rev. C. F. Dole.	G. M. Rose.
Mrs. W. S. Crosby.	Mrs. P. R. Wright.
Miss M. J. May.	Mrs. C. G. Ames.
Rev. A. G. Jennings.	Rev. J. L. Jones.

Rev. L. Clark.

National Bureau of Unity Clubs.

ORGANIZED, 1887.

OBJECT: "To form a Union of Unity and other clubs for mutual sympathy and assistance in plans and work."

MEMBERS AND DELEGATES: "Any club paying a sum of not less than five dollars a year into the treasury of this Bureau shall become thereby a member upon the acceptance of the Board of Directors; and shall be entitled to a representation of one general delegate and one additional delegate for every twenty-five members."—Two copies of all publications of the Bureau will be sent to all clubs that are members or that desire them.

ANNUAL MEETING, in Boston in Anniversary Week.

OFFICERS.

Rev. Edward E. Hale, Boston, Mass.	President.
Rev. J. L. Jones, Chicago, Ill.
Rev. C. W. Wendt, Oakland, Cal.
Rev. J. W. Day, Newport, R. I.	Vice-Presidents.
Rev. G. M. Bodge, East Boston, Mass.	Recording Secretary.
Rev. A. J. Rich, Fall River, Mass.	Cor. Sec'y for east.
Miss E. E. Gordon, Sioux City, Iowa.	Cor. Sec'y for west.

Other Directors.

Rev. G. M. Cooke,	Rev. E. C. Abbott,
Rev. E. A. Horton,	Rev. S. C. Beane,

Rev. W. C. Gannett,
W. H. Preston,
C. M. Woodward,
Rev. A. M. Judy,

Miss F. M. Howe,
Mrs. E. T. Wilkes,
A. W. Stearns,
Mrs. E. E. Marcan.

III.

Other Organizations.

The Southern Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches.

Organized 1884.

Arthur B. Rose, M. D., Charleston, S. C.	President.
J. R. Hodge, Atlanta, Ga.	Secretary and Treasurer.

The Pacific Coast Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches.

Organized 1885.

Horace Davis, San Francisco, Cal.	President.
Rev. C. W. Wendt, Oakland, Cal.	Secretary.
C. H. Murdock, San Francisco, Cal.	Treasurer.

Fourteen Local Conferences

in New York and the New England States.

Divinity School of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

ADMISSION.—Graduates of some college, or persons who shall give evidence of an education equal to that of college graduates, will be admitted as candidates for the degree of D. B. Persons not having such education may be admitted as special students on giving evidence of a good English training, and passing examination in some of the Greek and Latin classic authors and in the Greek of the New Testament.

Students may attend without extra charge any exercises for which they are fitted in other departments of the University.

EXPENSES.—Instruction, $50.00 per year. Room, $35.00 to $75.00 a year. Board in Cambridge about $4.50 a week. Pecuniary aid is furnished to students who need such help and whose character and scholarship justify it.

For information apply to the Dean of the Faculty, Prof. C. C. Everett, Cambridge, Mass.

Charles W. Eliot, LL.D., President.

Meadville Theological School, Meadville, Penn.

ADMISSION: The School is open to young men and women desiring education for the Christian ministry.

EXPENSES: Tuition and use of books free to all. The necessary expenses for the academic year are from $200 to $250. Students who need aid receive it from beneficiary funds.

For information apply to the President.

Rev. A. A. Livermore, President.

Unitarian Periodicals Published in the East.

THE CHRISTIAN REGISTER.

A weekly of sixteen pages, published at 141 Franklin St., Boston, Mass. Price, $3.00 a year. Rev. S. J. BARROWS, Editor.

The Christian Register aims to be a religious journal, a family journal, a literary journal. Many prominent writers write for it. "Its motto is 'Liberty, Holiness and Love.' It stands for love to God and love to man, for freedom in inquiry, for reason and faith in religion, for the broadest principles of fellowship, for devout worship, for ethical and spiritual truth. Although independent of all ecclesiastical organization, it has always been, and still is, an exponent of American Unitarianism, which it regards as that free and progressive development of historic Christianity which seeks to realize universal ethics and universal religion."

EVERY OTHER SUNDAY.

An illustrated fortnightly, published by the Unitarian Sunday-school Society, 25 Beacon St., Boston, Mass. Price, 40 cents a year. Rev. H. G. SPAULDING, Editor.

THE UNITARIAN REVIEW AND RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE.

A monthly, published at 141 Franklin St., Boston, Mass. Price, $3.00 a year. Single numbers, 30 cents. Rev. J. H. ALLEN, Editor. (Editor's address, 25 Beacon St., Boston.)

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JUNE 18, 1887.

[NUMBER 16.

EDITORIAL.

"SHUT up men's mouths and minds, and all will agree," said Channing. Yes; because one zero is as big as any other.

ONE of the pleasant features of the Minneapolis dedication was the flowers sent for the decoration, by the minister's old parish at Kenosha, Wis. Sometimes, at least, a man's good work do follow him.

RABBI ILIOWIZI, in his address at the Unitarian church at Minneapolis, noticed elsewhere, dwelt on the community of purpose between himself and Brother Simmons; "Loth," he said, "were laboring for the unity of men." The essentials for true Christianity, he claimed, are found in the Hebrew doctrine and belief.

It would be well for citizens of the United States to ponder on the following sayings of Channing:—"A bad sovereign makes an unhappy country. Does this rule change when the people are sovereign?" "No man has a claim to office but on grounds of spiritual distinction;" and, "It is as well that the few, as the many, should rule, if both have the spirit of ruling."

For the benefit of those who will not take time to count, we will say the last issue of UNITY gave in its Year Book department the titles of eighty societies within the limits of the Western Unitarian Conference and the names of 90 ministers, 57 of whom are actually engaged in the ministry, while many of the other 33 frequently lend a hand in public and private ways.

THE English Unitarians are also exercised concerning the opportunities, and consequently their obligations, of a mission to Japan. Why not a combined mission? An English and an American movement towards the rationalizing of the religion of this rising nation would be an international missionary movement that of itself would be a prophecy of greater things. It is time the English and American Unitarians were doing something together, now that they are becoming so well acquainted.

AN English exchange thus speaks of the transplanting of our American post-office mission to London. It calls it "an American notion recently imported, the object of which is to advertise our publications in local papers, and to supply them free to all inquirers. Miss Florence Hill has become the secretary of this mission, and reports that already the advertisements have led to much interesting correspondence." A friend at our elbow says that here in Chicago there is only a "ton" more of it. Let Florence Hill and Florence Hilton work together, and their tract-lines will encircle the globe.

THE annual list of books for Sunday-school libraries, recommended by The Ladies' Commission, is ready for 1887. It contains a few words of advice and information about seventy-seven books issued since their last year's annual list. With this comes also a list of some three hundred and eighty-eight books selected from the annual catalogues, with descriptive notes showing the character of each book and designating the ages of children for whom it is suited. These catalogues are valuable not only to Sunday-schools selecting their libraries, but to parents and others who are choosing reading for young folks. Published by the American Unitarian Association, 25 Beacon st., Boston, Mass.

OUR neighbor, the Universalist, devotes a column-and-a-half editorial to the Western Unitarian Conference, from which we quote the following opening sentences:

"The recent session of the Western Unitarian Conference had, if possible, an interest even greater than usually attaches to the gatherings of that somewhat unique body. None of its meetings can be uninteresting, partly on account of the character and ability of the men and women who compose them; partly on account of the task they always set for themselves of keeping up a religious platform, broad enough for all good people to stand upon."

The editorial closes with these words in approval of the resolution touching fellowship and faith:

"It is especially gratifying to be relieved from the spectacle of a body of intelligent men and women, with very definite beliefs, denying themselves the right to say in any form, however general and non-committal, what those beliefs are. The Western Conference certainly ought to stand the better with all reasoning people for having found its tongue."

AT the annual meeting of the Sunday-school Society, held May 20th, Mrs. Conger in her paper entitled "What Shall Our Unitarian Sunday-schools Study?" pleaded for more direct use of the Bible. She thought that in the present plans for study, which included so many manuals requiring reference books and supplementary reading, we should find that after all it was only about the Bible we had been studying, not in reality the Bible itself. She would have its beautiful passages memorized freely; the importance of its ethical lessons emphasized. "Give the Bible the benefit of rational treatment. Let us be so candid and fair that the children never will consider anything mysterious in one book that is not so in another; that they will realize the fact that legend, or poetry, or history shows its real worth best when judged simply for what it is."

WE quote the following helpful thoughts from Professor Kerr's paper upon Bible class work. "The teacher should keep constantly in view such a quickening of conscience as shall lead its possessor to magnify the golden rule above all the creeds of Christendom. He should hold himself and his class as far as possible to the ethics of the Bible, and by his words and his example guide to right thinking and right living." "The scriptures have been darkened by reading into them endless theories which the original writers probably never dreamed of. The great object to be attained is spiritual insight, which shall enable us to penetrate these disguises and discern the truth. It is as we free ourselves from these preconceived opinions and come to the Bible itself that we derive the highest satisfaction." "We should come to the Bible, not to seek arguments for special pleading in support of a theory or subject matter for destructive criticism, but to find the law of righteousness which pervades its pages; the lessons of wisdom contained in proverb and paradox; the beauty and inspiration which live in parable and psalm, to the end that all these things may be reflected in character and in the conduct of life." He emphasized in closing "the necessity of a genuine religious spirit pervading and animating the instruction, and clearly distinguishing it from the work of merely secular education."

"THE Unitarian Church Temperance Society" has shown itself very much in earnest since it began to be, at the Saratoga meeting of the National Conference last September. It numbers already some thirty "branches," most of them on the Atlantic side of the tree, but one or two dipping into the Pacific. The young Society bravely stepped to the front in the recent Anniversary Week in Boston, and held mass meeting in one of the largest halls in the city, with ex-Governor Long presiding. In another column are caught some echoes from the meeting. It has published two or three little pamphlets about the why and how to work for temperance; and now it issues "Temperance Services and Hymns." Thanks to friends who paid the first cost of plates, this little book is sold for ten cents, holding four services and fifty-one hymns, fifty-one besides the two or three songs with printed music embodied in each service. The services are called, (1) "Self-Control: 'On Honor';" (2) "Self-Sacrifice: 'For their Sake';" (3) "Temperance;" (4) "The City of God," a Festival service. And now, any friend in any church who will pay the $5.00 for the fifty copies or the $10.00 for the hundred copies needed in the Sunday-school, renders it easy once in each three months to impress one phase of the great question strongly on the children's minds. The services can easily be filled out and varied by other exercises, and they are of such nature that nearly every one, whatever his present habit with wine or beer, would heartily approve the lesson taught. Were a few sentences here and there omitted, and the present day trusted as much as the bible day for impressive wordings of the impulse that inspires the movement, the book would be more to our own liking; but as it is, it will be a real helper, and we have long needed such a helper in the schools.

Why should not every one of our Sunday-schools, east and west, join this Temperance Society, its welcome is so broad? "It is composed of such branch societies as may be found in sympathy with its general purpose," it says. "Its office is simply advisory to the branches. Each branch follows its own plans of organization and work." It does not regard the Pledge method as essential, but as a wise way, if limited in time with opportunities for renewal. It does not exact total abstinence, though it recommends it as the wisest rule both for one's own sake and "for their sake." This would seem to mean, for instance, that any Sunday-school, even without special temperance organization and officers,—any Sunday-school that earnestly adopts the temperance purpose and keeps it to the front, if only by the regular use of such services as these,—may become a "branch," and join the all-hands-round of comradeship in the sacred endeavor.

THE latest contribution to Indian studies comes in the shape of a book recently published by the Indian Right Association, and is the result of a tour made by Mr. J. B. Harrison among the different tribes, with the desire of finding out the exact truth concerning them. It is written somewhat in the style of a newspaper correspondent, and, indeed, the sketches were first published as letters in the Boston Herald. The first part of the book consists of descriptive notes on the various reservations, and the second part is made up of reflections and opinions thus suggested to the writer. He repeats what people are slow to understand, that it will never do to judge one reservation or tribe by another. On the whole, the report is anything but encouraging. One sees by such a report as that of the Rosebud Agency in Dakota, how much can be done by wise management toward civilization, even under adverse conditions, and by such a report as that from Omaha, Nebraska, how soon a gain can be lost by sudden ceasing of any control or direction whatever. The character of the land which a tribe occupies has, says Mr. Harrison, far more to do with its industrial and social progress and development than people understand. One of the most serious evils seems to us to lie in the fact that most of the Indians educated in our eastern schools go back to the reservations to find, in consequence of the present system, nothing to do. There is a general prejudice against the young men who have been in eastern schools, both among the Indians and the white employees. "I saw some pathetic cases of returned students who were eager to work, and who felt keenly the degradation of their enforced idleness, but who could obtain no employment. They were tinsmiths, carpenters, harness makers, etc., among a population where there would not be a stroke of work for them from the beginning of the year to the end. An idle man does not 'lift up a tribe.'" It is true always that "life develops from within," and it is a terrible mistake not to utilize to the utmost all these young people. No quotations can give much of an idea of the various points Mr. Harrison touches. The book should be studied. We wish at least that it might induce every one of its readers to send immediately the membership fee of $2 to the Indian Rights Association, No. 1316 Filbert street, Philadelphia.

E. E. M.

WE are glad to make room for the following communications from one whose sympathies are purely cosmopolitan, and would be very glad to know that his words had touched a sympathetic chord in some heart in a way to make kindly feelings portable. Let the feelings towards these brethren who sit upon the ashes of their homes be cashed. There is at the present time no quarter of the globe more competent to understand or more able to succor those who suffer by fire than Chicago.

DEAR UNITY:—I have just heard from London of the destruction of the Unitarian village of Toroczko, in Transylvania, so well described some years ago by a letter from C. H. A. Dall, in the journal of the American Unitarian Association, and by Mr. Robert Morison in the Unitarian Review in 1874, as well as by the Hungarian novelist Maurus Jokai, in his romance, "The people who love but once."

A fire broke out there on the first of May, when there was a great drought and a high wind, and in two hours all the buildings and trees which were in the direction of the wind were in flames. It was impossible to put out the fire or to save the people's property. Four people were killed and eighteen wounded.

The loss is estimated at about $75,000.00, not more than $4500.00 of which are covered by insurance.

The people are very poor, and the heavy strain upon the resources of Hungary made by the destructive floods which are even now devastating the plains along the banks of the Maros and the Theiss, and still more the heavy sacrifices which both Austrians and Hungarians are obliged to bear to protect their national existence among the political dangers by which southeastern Europe is threatened, make it impossible for them to render any effectual aid to their brethren in Toroczko.

Mr. Ierson, the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has also issued an appeal to the English Unitarians through the columns of the Christian Life, and knowing what my countrymen have done for Transylvania, in the past, I doubt not that this appeal will meet with a generous response.

But still it will hardly suffice, and since the heaviest blow inflicted upon Hungarian prosperity in the last few years has come from the competition of your western prairies with the plains of Hungary, formerly the granary of western Europe, I venture to ask you to draw the attention of American Unitarians also to this terrible misfortune that has befallen our poor brethren in Hungary.

Yours truly,

JOHN FRETWELL, 13 Laight St.

New York City, June 9, 1887.

Unitarianism; The Gospel of Unity.

WE can not do our readers better service this week than to slip into our editorial space the following extract from the dedicatory address of H. M. Simmons on the opening of his new church. We are sorry to be compelled to filch it from the columns of a local paper—thus to lose the writer's own touches. He said:

"The new church was called a 'Unitarian' church, and its central idea was sounded in the root of that word, 'Unity.' The best ground for our being is that we preach brotherhood and peace. When a sect in Tiverton was about to build a new church the mayor is said to have forbidden it, saying there were already four churches there; if any men were not satisfied with four ways of going to heaven they would not go at all while he was mayor. There were already far more ways of going to heaven in Minneapolis, and if we were only going to open another way, perhaps the mayor would have been warranted in opposing us. But we are not starting a new way, but only trying to stop the quarrels about the old ways, and to proclaim principles that will unite men.

"Rev. Edward Everett Hale once endeavored to prove from an old historian that the name Unitarian really came from an effort of several sects of the early reformers to unite. But if, as more commonly supposed, it came from the doctrine of the unity of God, still the idea of 'one God through all and in all' includes that of the unity of men as its most practical principle. Human unity has also been made the leading doctrine of our preachers. Channing emphasized it; and Dr. Putnam, so long our prominent preacher in Boston, said what he worked for was 'a sense of the universal unity and brotherhood.' Our denomination has been so willing that men should differ in their religious doctrines, that it has never adopted anything like a creed; and one said if it ever should the creed should be stamped like a railway ticket: 'Good for this day only.' Carlyle said he and Sterling agreed in everything except opinions, and thought that the best companionship; and we think men may differ in religious opinions to any degree, and still 'keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.' 'This church gives as its object 'to form a society whose people, without regard to theological differences, may unite for mutual helpfulness' in intellectual, humane and religious work. When our denominational paper in Chicago, which is named UNITY, announced as its aim to stand for 'the unity of all religions in righteousness and the unity of men with each other,' Professor Swing, in the Alliance, said that if we would 'raise the flag of unity in that sense of brotherhood,' it would be the best flag that could wave over any region. That is the flag we are trying to wave in Minneapolis. Of course other churches are doing the same to greater or less extent. But we carrying this principle in our name ought to make a specialty of it and always intend to." Mr. Simmons then traced the progress of this idea of human unity, and the blessings that had come of it, and the evils that came from forgetting it. Jesus made it the first principle of religion when he gave his highest blessing to peace workers, and pronounced them "sons of God."

The better heathen saw it. Says the Buddhist scripture: "He who is beloved of God honors every form of religious faith;" and a Persian apothegm says: "To him who has risen to the throne of the Highest all religions are alike—Christians, Jews, Gentiles and Moslems, all adore Him in their several ways."

"Everywhere the spirit walks
The garden of the heart and talks
With man as under Eden's trees
In all his varied languages."

"So there is growing in the world an idea of the unity of religion and races, which rebukes the old wars and contentions, and will bring new peace and prosperity to mankind."

"By showing that religion is universal it gives new faith in it too. Religion is rooted in the human soul and will not pass away. It is wide as mankind and counts Christianity but as a chapter in its history. Centuries before the cathedral it built the Parthenon; and thousands of years before Pericles it built the pyramids; and long before them it had erected its altars wherever man dwelt. As Heber Newton says, 'It came when the first man lifted his eyes in wonder, and it came to stay.' It has stayed and strengthened through human progress,—from the savagery which built its rude mounds in Minnesota, to the cities which lift their church spires as symbols of the spirit of man, ever reaching heavenward. Religion has been a leading force in civilization, too. Its temples taught the race architecture, and its work in them founded most of the arts. Its statues started sculpture, and its frescoes perfected painting. Its songs and psalms gave birth to poetry, and its efforts to make them more sublime gave music its highest harmonies. It gave subjects to Æschylus and Euripides, and introduced the modern drama. Nor is religion likely to decline. Progress has not changed the human heart, nor silenced one of the instincts that have inspired the worship of the past. The love which lent to religion its hopes cannot be suppressed. The upward look of man toward the Infinite cannot be stopped. As one says: 'Churches come and go; creeds are formulated and forgotten, but the heart still ponders the mystery of life, and hands are always being lifted to the Eternal.'

"To this eternal religion we dedicate our new church. Not indeed to any special religious name, but to those principles which are common to all religion, and are the best things in Christianity. We dedicate it to justice and love, which are the best earthly names of God and the best way of worshiping Him. We dedicate it to the trust and hope which God has given to all races. May it be the home of virtues as solid and enduring as its own quartzite walls, and of graces as beautiful as its own architecture and decorations. And may all who inhabit it inherit the love and devotion shown by you who have built it with such sacrifice."

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Wind Song.

Upon the lyric limbs
Of yonder spreading tree
The spirit of the wind
Makes tuneful moan to me.

The music arms outheld
To meet the rhythmic skies
Are swaying in a wealth
Of tender melodies—

In melodies whose soul
No mortal tongue can sound—
From heaven flung to earth,
And voiced in their rebound.

EUGENE ASHTON.

Echoes from the Unitarian Festival in Boston, May 26.

PERFECT GOD, PERFECT WORLD.

It is our sacred mission to proclaim that there is in the universe nothing whatever but God; that therefore the surroundings of the human spirit are so perfect that eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man, what touches every man to conceive of, infinite love and truth and wisdom and beauty and power being so close to each person that the instant one smallest vibration of love or hope is felt in the lonely spirit, that moment the Eternal passes the vibration on through all his infinity. This divine ideal we worship, and it is our business to pass the benediction on. Perfect God, perfect spirit surrounding the soul, and, since there is nothing whatever but God to make worlds out of, perfect universe. No chemist, no physicist, has yet been able to detect one single atom that has lost the trillionth part of its potency—not one single imperfect atom—in all the universe that God has made out of his own bosom. In that lamp yonder, if that lamp were in the sun, we should see shining the hydrogen atom, vibrating eight hundred thousand million times a second. That is to say, that the God we worship is able to divide one second very easily into eight hundred thousand million parts; and, in every throb of those parts, his infinite care is present with us. We breathe fifteen times a minute, but that is a great deal too seldom for God's care to touch us. God's care in that light touches us eight hundred thousand million times a second, but that is not fast enough. His presence is continuous, forever with us.

Perfect God, perfect world, and therefore perfect body! That is to say, the body that he lends you and me for temporary manifestation of ourselves in time is perfect. No imperfect atom in any one body! And, therefore, what is the right attitude toward this perfect God and perfect universe? Now, I will tell you the general attitude, you know [assuming a doleful and complaining tone], "Oh, dear, dear, I do not know what life is made for!" Why, it is comic, it is stupid, to the last degree. Do you suppose you ever saw God in that way? Why, of course, the attitude is joy and hope and aggressive courage. Let us build heaven right off. Why not? What hinders? I say I shall meet over yonder, by and by, persons who will come to me and say: "Why, positively, we cannot find heaven anywhere. We are beginning to think it is nowhere." Then I shall say: "Now, my friends, let half a dozen of us get together, do the best deeds we can, think the best thoughts we can, and think them together, send thrills of hope and love into each others' breasts, then God, if he be the God we worship, cannot help making heaven in the only place it is found,—that is, inside us." Perfect God, perfect world, perfect body, and therefore in the end, perfect heaven. That is our inspiration.—S. R. Calthrop.

SACRED HISTORY CONTINUED.

I count it a privilege to live in the same world with those who are striving to enact a continuation of the world's best history, to make their own life a little bit of that sacred history, to make their collective life, as religious communities or churches, a continuation of sacred history, and to make this world's life a continuation and extension of that living stream which, rising from the beginning in the heart of God and flowing through all the ages of humanity, was never, perhaps, in fuller tide than now.

Brothers, the twentieth century is at hand. Here, in our own country, we are living in a time which commits us to a greater service, a broader sacrifice. Only day before yesterday Columbus sailed into these waters. Only yesterday Washington was here. To-morrow the land will echo to the tread of 200,000,000 of people. Now, every year more people are landed on these shores than came to this country during the first 300 years after Columbus discovered America. This is the true colonial period. Not only this, we are at the beginning comparatively of Christian history. What are eighteen centuries in the long calendar of God? As one day! "Christianity," says James Freeman Clarke, "has just begun." So far from leaving Jesus behind, we have hardly got in sight of him. He moves in advance: we move after him.—Charles G. Ames. Extracts from the "Christian Register" report.

Echoes from the Unitarian Church Temperance Meeting.

IN BOSTON MAY 23.

Intemperance to-day is lifting its hydra-head everywhere. It is seen in the household. It sometimes grins at us at the communion table. The Unitarian church, or any other church, is a piece of sentimentalism,—a matter of cologne water and æsthetic tea-parties and sewing-circles,—unless it recognizes this as one of the evils which it has to fight, a foe-man worthy of its steel, as something worthy of its attack, as one of the devils it should overthrow,—one of the menaces to the salvation of the human soul which it should meet. The giant antagonist of the church to-day is the grog-shop. Root out your grog-shop, and your church will pretty easily shut up its charity bureau.—Ex-Governor Long.

A message from far-away Oregon reaches me: "A good motto for a church temperance society would be words used by Mr. Foxley before Cambridge University, England: 'Begin as Jesus began. Expect great movements, and work for them. But do not wait for them. Make little movements. It is from little movements that great movements come.'"—C. R. Eliot.

The sin of drinking rests on the individual. Either a man can help getting drunk or he can not. If he can not, then he is diseased or insane; and he should be treated as such. If he can help it, then he should be held personally responsible, just as a man should be for lying or stealing or committing perjury. To hear some temperance speakers, one would think heaven would be full of reformed drunkards, who would lean over the battlements, and look down into hell, just as full of moderate drinkers who were never drunk in their lives. I do not believe in moderate drinking, but I do believe in holding the man who gets drunk responsible for his own actions.—Minot J. Savage.

Why do you want to let a boy or a girl wait till he shall be twenty-one, twenty-five, or thirty years old, before he is prejudiced against this great evil? Was there not great good sense in that remark of Coleridge, that he had tried to prejudice his children in favor of strawberries and cream when they were four? Why wait till your boys and girls are old enough to form reliable opinions of their own? Why not influence them at the age when they are most susceptible? We go along in a smooth and even way, and take it for granted that God Almighty is going to educate our children. But you will find in thousands of cases that the boy or girl not having been called to consider this subject is absolutely unprepared to reply to arguments when he is thrown into temptation. Why not let the Sunday-school take the training of the children in this business?—Edward Everett Hale.

If you follow this question to its ultimate reach, you will find that the brand of intemperance settles down upon a great many of us who complacently fold our arms and look down upon what we consider the intemperate world beneath us. If we have no patience and little charity with the Irishman who can not go to his shoveling in the morning without his glass of grog, I do not know where we are to go to find our larger patience for the man of business, or the preacher, who can not go to his daily task without his stimulating cigar. If we have no patience and no philosophy to justify the habitual tippler, I do not know where we are going to find anything to justify the woman who says that she is "not good for anything until she gets her cup of tea or coffee." I am not a scientist or physiologist; but I believe that it will be found that these favorites of your dining-room and your smoking-room, the tobacco and the tea-cup and coffee-cup, are all related in this matter, and the roots of intemperance find their way into these indulgences.

We have a new mayor in Chicago, and we are proud of him; and he is going to try to do his duty in this matter. And the friends of morality and temperance are saying, Now John Roche is going to stand by our side, we shall accomplish something. Not much, O Chicagoans, will you accomplish for temperance, though you have a temperance mayor, while all the churches of Chicago are gloomily locked and closed six days of the week, and over 3000 places are lighted, handsomely furnished, hospitably opened all hours of the day and night in the interests of intemperance! If every church would do nothing more than furnish cold water during these hot days, they would do a stroke of temperance business grander than all the temperance talking in ten years.—J. L. Jones.

As to the effects of stimulants, I do not care a fig for what a chemist in his laboratory says; nor do I care an iota what a physician says, if a physician drinks himself, as many of them do. I judge from results. When I see the drinking of tea make a woman throw her baby out of a three-story window or commit similar cruelties, then I will go into such a crusade against tea as you never yet have heard. But when I go up to the Woman's Reformatory, at Sherborn, and ask Mrs. Johnson, who is the marvelous executive head, how many of these women are here for crimes committed when they were drunk, and learn that ninety-seven out of one hundred are there because of strong drink; when I go to the Concord Reformatory, with its eight hundred men, and ask Col. Tufts the same question, and he tells me eight out of ten; when I go to the insane asylums, not only in Massachusetts and in New York, but in Great Britain, and am told that six out of ten patients are there as the result of strong drink; when I go to South Boston, and visit the philanthropic institution built up by that grand servant of God, Dr. Howe, and ask how many of these imbecile children had drunken parents, and am told one hundred and forty-five out of three hundred; when in New York and Chicago, and wherever I go, I hear the same thing,—then I don't care what the laboratory may say of the effects of alcohol. I know by its fruits.—Mrs. Mary A. Livermore. Extracts from the "Christian Register" Report.

THIS saying of Channing—"Nothing but sympathy with society will lead to its cure," reminds us of Doctor Bellows' remark that "the only way to be able to make the world better is to love it as it is."

Music in Sunday-School.

READ BEFORE THE IOWA STATE CONFERENCE, AT HUMBOLDT, AND PUBLISHED BY REQUEST OF THE CONFERENCE.

There is a pretty Greek legend which the poet Collins has related in verse:

"When Music, heavenly maid, was young,
While yet in early Greece she sung,
The Passions, oft, to hear her shell,
Thronged around her magic cell;
Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting,
Possessed beyond the Muse's painting;
By turns they felt the glowing mind
Disturbed, delighted, raised, refined;
Till once, 'tis said, when all were fired,
Filled with fury, rapt, inspired,
From the supporting myrtles round
They snatched her instruments of sound,
And, as they oft had heard apart
Sweet lessons of her forceful art,
Each (for madness ruled the hour)
Would prove his own expressive power."

The poet then tells us in varied verse how Fear, Anger, Despair, Hope, Revenge, Pity, Jealousy, Melancholy, Cheerfulness, Joy, Mirth and Love, each made trial of his skill, finding instrument and tones suited to express himself.

Among the many myths of the ancients, this is one of the prettiest. They knew full well the power of music to express the emotions, and indeed long before "Delos rose and Phœbus sprung," this divine art was known to mankind. Music is as old as speech. As has been said, "it is probably, in its rudest form, the earliest art practised by savage nations." It is interesting to note, in the early history of harmony, that music was the direct outgrowth or, I might better say, direct medium for the expression of man's religious nature. True, the sister fine-arts contributed their share to his development in this direction, but music has ever taken precedence.

There is something in harmonious sounds which rouses and raises us as nothing appealing to the other senses can do—we seem to be lifted into an atmosphere of reverence through its influence. As Martin Luther has so beautifully expressed it, "Music is the art of the prophets—the only art that can calm the agitation of the soul: it is one of the most delightful gifts God has given us."

Beethoven, through whom the god of music has spoken to us, said, "Music is a direct mediator between the spiritual and the sensual life; although the spirit may not be master of that which it creates through music, yet it is blest in this creation, which, like every other creation of art, is mightier than the artist."

'Tis said from the days of Solomon came the luxury of the orchestra, but before Hebrew, and even Egyptian instruments was that most wonderful instrument—the human voice. And it is of the cultivation of this we would more particularly speak.

Music fosters refined sentiments, and we claim there is a strong relation between voice culture and heart culture!

Carlyle said, "The meaning of song goes deep. Who is there that can, in logical words, express the effect music has on us? A kind of inarticulate, unfathomable speech, which leads us to the edge of the infinite, and lets us for moments gaze out into that."

Every child should be taught to sing, even if, as is commonly asserted, some can never learn to execute music, either vocal or instrumental. Leaving the latter out of consideration, I would modify the first part of the statement somewhat. Every child can learn to sing the scale at least, and thus gain better control over his voice. In conversation we are constantly using the notes of the scale,—why not sweeten and modulate our tones by musical practice?

"'Tis not enough the voice be sound and clear,
'Tis modulation that must charm the ear."

This is true both in song and speech.

And it is wonderful how much of our inner selves we reveal through the voice! "The voice all modes of passion can express."

We are told that Plato had a habit of making any man, whom it was his interest to know well, read or talk with him. The quality of the voice, the intonations, the inflections of the reader or speaker, were to the philosopher so many indications, if not certain, at least probable, of his moral character.

A writer of our own time tells us that "Grétry, in his 'Essays on Music,' asserts that he has never been mistaken in the opinion he has formed of individuals who had said nothing more to him than 'Good-day, sir,' or 'Good-morning, my friend.'" The same writer adds, "It is not only of the intention of people that judgment has been formed from listening to the tones of the voice, but it is assumed that their tastes, instincts and inclinations may thus in part be discovered."

If, then, we each possess so wonderful a revealer of our inner selves, how careful we should be to cultivate not only best thoughts but best tones!

And again I repeat, every child should learn to sing. This practice once adopted, the problem is largely solved. Let children be taught in the school, in the home; let them even be taught in the Sunday-school. And here the question naturally arises, what shall we sing? I would reply in the words of another: "In the selection of songs great care should be taken as to the character of the sentiments contained in them." The memory is peculiarly tyrannical in this. The sentiments we sing seem to remain most strongly with us. Then the music should be good. "Children can appreciate, and, if properly instructed, execute good music. Of course they should be gradually led along—not many dirges or chorals on the one hand, and no frivolous trash on the other. Let the sentiment be cheering and refining; hymns and songs of which we never weary, but whose wealth of meaning grows greater with the passing years." The good tunes we have learned should be oft repeated. As Goethe has said, "The effect of good music is not caused by its novelty. On the contrary, it strikes us all the more forcibly the more familiar we are with it." The happy idea suggested and adopted recently of setting new words to old, familiar tunes, is to my mind a good one. Until such time as the new thought shall sing itself more fully, we can all be helped by these and by the beautiful collection made by J. Vila Blake and others, now in use in our Sunday-schools. There are many beautiful tunes in the little book called "The Sunny Side," but the words set to a great number of them are not what we want. Every hymn we use should possess the merit of being true poetry, and the tunes should be adapted to the words—our growing thought must be set to music.

And I would say just here, that every Sunday-school has need of an efficient chorister. This chorister should, if possible, be relieved of class work, and should devote a certain portion of time each Sunday to the singing, and should give a talk on the sentiment and melody of all new pieces. In this way only can the children fully appreciate the singing and be taught to feel what they sing. As a rule, I think we are not careful enough to sing with understanding and clear enunciation. If we feel the meaning of the words we shall try to speak them distinctly, that our listeners may enjoy them with us.

This applies not alone to singing in Sunday-schools. Many church choirs fail in this respect, and are not so frankly advised of their shortcomings as were the singers in the following incident: "One Sunday after the choir at Oberlin college had sung without distinctly pronouncing the words, President Finney in his prayer alluded to the singers as follows: 'O, Lord, we have sung an anthem to thy praise. Thou knowest the words, but we do not. We do pray thee that those who lead us may open their mouths, that we may know what they say, that we may join in thy praise.'"

What we need is more enthusiasm over music. I think we do not sing enough. There seems to be a lack of time for singing in Unitarian Sunday-schools. Sentiments, however well taught, are not sufficient. Song must accompany our growing worship—it must be and must remain an integral part of it, and what better medium for its expression and its promulgation than the sweet voices of children? Infant classes, where room permits, should do more singing than the rest of the school; and it should be careful singing even with these little ones.

“Correct taste in music,” says some one, “flings wide the gate to the highway of all that is beautiful, noble and good.” If this be true, how fitting an aid is music in the liberal work of to-day, whose mission is to accomplish “all that is beautiful, noble and good.” Let us teach children to admire and understand good music. Let us show them the deep relation existing between art and ethics, between “the holiness of beauty and the beauty of holiness.”

The Unitarian Sunday-school songs are still largely a thing of the future. The new faith will continue to seek expression in glowing words and great music. As the best music of the past has been the outgrowth of the religious sentiment, so the broader and deeper faith of to-day will yet develop a higher and more heavenly harmony. The very essence of the new faith is harmony. Its first note was sounded when the morning stars sang together, and its last will not be heard until all the children of God shout for joy over the unity of all souls.

M. VAUPEL CLARK.

For All.

Thou grieveest for the fallen foes
Who follow not thy ways—
Up from thy heart the human goes
To mix in God-like rays.

Oh, happy wonder!—for above
The passion of your deeds,
The sun of heaven shines in love,
And earth's dim hunger feeds.

The spring that utters sweetly thine
A note for all who seek,
Brings from the under-thought divine
Compassion for the weak.

Not in its hate the light doth kiss
The barest need of man—
Nor yet the waters give him bliss
From stream within that ran.

The gentler circle draws him near,
Forgets his sin, and fills
His shadows with a purpose clear
That leads him to the hills.

H. L. T.

Congregationalists and the Bible.

The General Association of the Congregationalist Church of New York state convened in Syracuse May 17, 18, 19. Among the notable clergymen could be seen the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D., Rev. Wm. S. Smart, D.D., Rev. Edward Beecher, D.D., Rev. E. P. Ingersoll, D.D., Rev. A. F. Beard, D.D., and Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D. Rev. Lyman Abbott, in a most thorough and critical review, gave a synopsis of the life and work of Henry Ward Beecher. His friendship for the great but departed preacher colored in some respects his estimate of the man. He was found making statements which taxed the credulity of many listeners, as, “Henry Ward Beecher could will himself asleep and then awake in five minutes.” Yet his tribute was eloquent, breezy, thoughtful, and with some exceptions very truthful.

The annual sermon was delivered by Rev. James S. Ainslie, of Ogdensburg. The preacher took for his text “The love of Christ constraineth us.” The sermon was well written, entertaining and inspiring. One could notice how difficult it was for the average Congregationalist to reconcile the Bible to nature. The speaker apologized constantly to the audience for being unable to get at “the interior disposition of God” in nature, or know whether he is good by the universe which he created. Yet he said, notwithstanding, that “God is a God of grace, as nature intimates.” (The writer questioned the consistency of this remark with the other statement about the “interior disposition of God.”) He went so far as to actually, and many outsiders thought unguardedly, say, that “God has put benevolence in the world.” It was painful to watch the natural and artificial working of his mind, and see how theology forced him to bolster up the Bible at the risk of nature, to defend it at the expense of reason. He compared the universe to a machine made by man, and, as we can not get at the nature or interior disposition of the man who made the machine, as we can not tell whether he is good or bad, so we can not say whether God is good or bad by the universe. The sophistry of such logic is so transparent that one need not bring up evidence to the contrary. The thought of a celebrated New England divine rang in our ears: “If this world is a bad world, then God is a bad God.” Elizabeth Stuart Phelps wrote in The Gates Ajar: “The more I love Roy the more I love him—God.” She would build the ladder to God upon human affection. This idea that there is nothing good in the world except the Bible, no religion except alleged orthodoxy, no God in nature except one of fixed anger and willful imperialism, is gross imposition and absolute ignorance. The Bible is a worthless book if it finds not its anchor in human affection. And all human affection is natural affection—the affection of nature. Such affection gives us an intimation most decidedly of the love of God—a love not without its testimony in the human race. Man sometimes gets the idea that nature is something apart from himself. It is outside of him—away from him. Man is as surely a part of nature as the apple is a part of the tree or hydrogen is a part of water.

When will our dear friends cease battling with phantasies; when will they bring their thought in loving sympathy with life; when will they see that love in man and love in God are one; that truth is inseparable from the will of God; that nature is a surer record of God's disposition to us than all the manifold bibles of the world, and that our bible is only great and good as it is one with the love and wisdom of God, as shown in the world without and within.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

Woman's Activities in Dakota.

READ AT THE W. W. U. CONFERENCE MEETING, IN CHICAGO, MAY 16, 1887, BY MRS. E. T. WILKES, SIOUX FALLS, DAK.

When the official bulletin of the Commissioner of Immigration for the territory of Dakota announces that we have 3905 public schools with 5055 teachers, it means that 4000 women are helping to educate the 103,382 children in these schools.

When it says that $1,000,000 is invested in church property, representing at least 1000 churches, it means that at least 20,000 women are carrying on the activities of those churches.

The 1012 post-offices represent 400 women at work either as post-mistresses or clerks; and the 325 newspapers have over 100 women actively engaged.

If the day is at hand in Dakota when Iowa's ideal shall be realized—a “school-house be found on every hill-top and a church in every valley”—it will be because of her women's activities.

But it is not in these improvements alone that we see the woman's hand. The great number of improved farms in our area, every year increasing at an almost incredible rate, stands for the toil and sacrifice of many women. You cannot drive an hour over Dakota prairies without seeing women behind the plough, driving oxen, at the barrow, stacking hay, or driving reapers, as the season may be. That this wilderness may blossom as a garden, women's lives are willingly sacrificed. As brave have been the offerings on this altar as those made by the boys in blue.

"Do you like this pioneer life?" I asked a sad-eyed woman living on a new farm ten miles from any town, in a house barren of all comforts or beauty.

"Yes, it'll give the boys a better chance, and I don't mind the doing without things, but I do wish I had my old yard back in the east, but it's awful lonesome." And a far-off look in her eyes told a pathetic story.

And when, a year later, I visited the farm and found the mother gone, I knew it was not the privation and hard work that had killed her, so much as that "awful lonesomeness." The "unsatisfying monotony" of their pioneer life kills more women than its hardships.

In comparison with these widespread activities of women, you wish me to report what we are doing with our higher ethics to uplift these best activities—what we, with our inspiring faith, are doing to broaden and cheer these starved souls.

Alas! as yet we have but tiny sparks kindled, the very least heaven set at work.

In the Black Hills Mrs. Judge Moody is making her influence strongly felt in the cause of freedom, fellowship and character in religion. She would be surprised to hear her name mentioned in a report, as she is not working in an official way. But it is no uncommon thing to hear some one from that region speak of a tract coming from her, or to hear people say:

"I never heard of Unitarianism till I met Mrs. Moody."

She is making her liberal faith felt in her own community, and her influence has done much to liberalize one orthodox church.

At Yankton, Mrs. Morrison, a New England Unitarian, ministers to a large circle, lending reading matter, talking of her great hopes, and strongly protesting against the old dogmas.

Many under her influence have been converted to Unitarianism, and now, where so long she stood alone for our faith, there is quite a circle calling earnestly for the Dakota itinerant to cross and help them to organize for work.

At Aberdeen Mrs. A. A. Roberts is living; and you who know her know that means that all the best things in that community have a new impulse. As yet little can be done there for distinctive church work, but any new community is to be congratulated that has a Mr. and Mrs. Roberts to help mould its society.

At Sioux Falls we have the only church in Dakota, "All Souls." It is only a young thing, but a very vigorous child. We have had regular services there since Nov. 5, when Mr. Effinger preached in a law office to a congregation of twenty-five. We are now worshipping in the Advent church, which its owners conveniently use Saturdays and leave for our use Sundays. There are forty families connected with the church, a ladies' circle, a Unity Club and a Sunday-school of forty-four members. Like all young westerners it measures itself by the world. All Dakota comes into its plans for conquest. It hopes for a church-home ere long, from which missionaries are to be sent to all the region beyond, and where innumerable conferences are to be held. And if the example of its young minister's earnestness and hard work is to be followed, it will subdue kingdoms.

Its itinerant, Mrs. Wilkes, is doing missionary work in school-houses and at Canton, where eager congregations come to hear of this new religion. Many who come to fight the old, we hope will stay to pray. Many who come to question will stay to affirm. Many who come to mourn will stay to praise.

We can not separate woman's activities from man's in what has been accomplished in our part of the field. We have not tried there to put asunder in our work what God hath joined together. What has been done has been largely through the inspiration given by Mr. Effinger, Mr. Hunting and Mr. Clute.

What has been done in Sioux Falls, Rock Rapids, and Luverne can be done in nearly every town in Dakota. Four thousand school-houses in Dakota are waiting the liberal preacher's word and the leader's Unity Club and Sunday-school. O sisters, time would fail me to tell of the hearts that need our hopes, the souls that need our inspiration, the lives that need our uplifting word. Let us not fail to carry our message to every hamlet in the land. I hope to see the day when every community will have not only its Methodist class-leader but its Unity circle leader. Our civilization waits for a religion without a "creed," to spiritualize and save it.

"On the errands of angels we plod,
If with hearts of the angels we plan."

Civil and Intercivil and International Sunday-school Conventions.

Everybody is talking about organization. People seem to feel, and wisely, that without government and organization not only our schools and churches but also our great business houses, commercial interests, would be inefficient. Indeed even undertakers have got the notion into their heads that burying the dead is an art, and in order to perfect the art they must preach and uphold organization. We have been entertained in Syracuse by the state Sunday-school Convention. Of course its character is not inclusive but exclusive, and the evangelical church Sunday-schools are the ones mostly interested in the work. It occurred to me while I was watching the progress of the convention, what a grand thing it would be if we, as liberal people, could establish or work up state or intercivil, or broader still, international Sunday-school conventions. Orthodoxy begins well by insinuating its effete doctrines into the pliant minds of the young, and we are too often careless about matters which involve the civilization and education of the children. The foundation of their character rests too often on wrong conceptions of duty, man and God, and the work of reconstruction is tedious because we fail to do what we can among the young. At such conventions there ought to be represented the Universalist and Unitarian Sunday-school workers, and a standard of education should be adopted which would be broad enough to make us non-sectarian and non-partisan. We could there discuss matters of overriding importance. We could propose methods which many schools would find useful in their work. We could approach the question of civilization unhesitatingly and do much for the uplifting and welfare of mankind. I should be glad to hear what the editors of UNITY think of such an enterprise, and I am sure that with work and motive power and material we could do a great thing for the church of the future—which church will be one broad enough to be altogether love for man and God.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Work of a True Church. A paper given before the Illinois Conference of Unitarian churches, Chicago, Oct. 13, 1886, by James H. West. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Paper, 14 pages, 6 cents.

Nothing stands in greater need of revision to-day, we are apt to say, than the methods of the churches. Any expectation that the old methods will successfully continue with old doctrines defunct is a vain one.

But the answer may be made that the methods have changed; that even faster than the decay of the old belief has come in an entirely new way of carrying on the church life. Before the gray old doctrines are decently buried, in comes tripping all the pretty flock of worldly interests and worldly amusements to take possession of the religious administration. The penitential psalms may be still said or sung, the fall and depravity of man and his terrible fate hereafter may be preached or assented to in creeds; but the most solemn forms no longer conflict with the healthy pleasures of using the church for all the social needs of the community. The church gives a concert or play, gives a party, a festival or a fair, gives a sleighride, a steamboat excursion, or a picnic, gives a base-ball game, or a ball—as a benefit, of course.

Now, without criticising these apparent incongruities too severely, we see how even in Unitarian, as well as in Catholic and Evangelical churches, the social and recreative currents of life may sap if not supersede the moral and spiritual growth. The tendency in orthodoxy for a long time has been growing to cover up the sharp theories of incredible belief with the fragrant roses of social attraction. "We have the best sociables in town," said a leading Presbyterian lady the other day. "There were over 400 persons in the church on the last evening." Then every June they expect to make $500 out of their steamboat excursion with games and lemonade. Certainly this is humane and innocent compared with teaching and subscribing to that "infernal confession," as Beecher calls it, to which he once subscribed in his ignorance, and asked God to forgive him for it!

And yet the true church life and the true church work are apart alike from the teaching of dead dogmas or the invention of new amusements. It is not the keeping up and constant expounding of an old dialect; nor is it the multiplication for young or old of even harmless pleasures. So when such an earnest utterance is made on this business, as is contained in the pamphlet before us, it is well worth while, we think, to call attention to it, and increase its circulation.

Mr. West leaves behind him at the start all the conventional objects for which a church is supposed to exist. It is not for the salvation of men, heathen or civilized, from the pains and penalties of a life hereafter. It is not for the worship of an Infinite Unknown. It is not for the church's own spiritual delectation. "The ashes and gall in life, the sorrow and sin in life, we now know as a fact, do not come about because men do not believe in a God, nor because they are careless of a possible future," but because of ignorance of the true upbuilding forces of life; for want of power to see the beauty here and now, and obedience to its blessed laws. "Not God-praise nor man-praise," nor craving for future bliss, is what is wanted, but enthusiasm for humanity. "Here God and man are coupled. It is the old faiths which separate God and man."

"Every church should be 'the Church of Human Help.' If it is not this it is nothing."

To-day mankind "is living in a new universe, so to speak. And its religion should be arranged to conform to this." The "church should stand for truth; the word of the new universe," as revealed by modern thought. The truth being the voice of God, must help men. "The higher ethics bears down on us with the weight of multitudinous worlds, and says: 'We must be true; we only MAY be prosperous.'"

Then the church must teach men how to live—how to live out the word of truth. After countless centuries of fruitless God-praise, still the world's present awful woe exists—a summons to us to come out from fear and credulity into the realm of real light and usefulness.

And yet no "dressing up morality and the brotherhood of man only in Jewish gabardine and frock" will do. Passion and ignorance can only be cured by a sense of the universal. The church must be the rallying point of the moral forces of society. It must be a school of the higher ethics, where worship comes as a consequence of this knowledge and insight.

"Would that there might be one of these societies for ethical culture, and for the stinging of public conscience, in every village; a hundred in every city." "First that which is natural and afterwards that which is spiritual. Religion always until now has begun at the wrong end. But our friends, the ethical workers, pure and simple, are to-day the John the Baptists of a new and better era."

Whatever methods a writer of Mr. West's spirit may assist in formulating, they will be charged with earnestness. At the present moment nothing seems to us so essential to our church life. If we can have genuine earnestness, however variant the points of speculative belief, or the outward administration; if we can have indeed the "Church of Human Help," changing those who belong to it into true men and women, the interests of religion will be safe.

L.

Social Studies. By R. Heber Newton, rector of All Souls Church, New York. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co., $1.00.

We have here a collection of ten papers, by the brilliant and vivacious rector of All Souls (Episcopal) church, New York. But the Rev. Heber Newton is something more than brilliant, he has strong common sense, is what is called level headed, as well as a man whose ability to put things in an interesting and forcible way is unsurpassed anywhere. The subjects of these ten papers are as follows: A Bird's-Eye View of the Labor Question, The Story of Co-operative Production and Co-operative Credit in the United States, The Story of Co-operative Distribution in the United States, Is the State Just to the Workingman? Old-Time Guilds and Modern Commercial Associations, The Prevention of Intemperance, Moral Education in the Public Schools, The Free Kindergarten in Church Work, The Religious Aspect of Socialism, and Communism. Several of these papers have been printed elsewhere, that on Kindergartens, in substance at least, in Barnard's American Journal of Education and in pamphlet form; the essay on Communism in the Unitarian Review, Socialism in the Princeton Review, and others in the North American Review, and other publications. But they are entirely worthy of being gathered into a sheaf, as we have them here, and we wish that they might be widely read.

Elementary Principles of Electro-Therapeutics. For the use of Physicians and Students. Prepared by C. M. Haynes, M. D. Third Edition. The Clark & Longley Company, Chicago.

This book seems to be the property of the McIntosh Galvanic and Faradic Battery Company. Our respect for this firm, who make the best and most ingenious batteries and electrical apparatus of all sorts, produced in Chicago, and as good, it is safe to say, as can be found anywhere, and our conviction that electricity has its place in surgery, and to some extent in therapeutics, move us to treat this book with more respect than it really deserves. For it seems carefully calculated to strengthen, or even exaggerate, the popular impression that electricity is an extremely valuable curative agent.

The Kernel and the Husk. Letters on Spiritual Christianity. By the author of "Philochristus" and "Onesimus." Roberts Brothers, Boston.

The author of this peculiar book, and its somewhat celebrated predecessors, is said to be Prof. E. A. Abbott, of England. His peculiar belief is, that without faith in miracles, or without accepting supernaturalism in any form, one may yet be a minister in the Church of England, and not only hold the form of the creed with mental reservations, but hold it really, and may and should really worship Christ. To make this seem possible, he appears to us to confuse the sense of ordinary language, or to use language to express thoughts that are not quite clear. We all understand that in one sense there is a divinity in humanity, and in a figurative sense this may be worshipful, but to make such considerations the justification of the worship of Jesus of Nazareth, seems, as we have said, confusing.

Bridge Disasters in America. The Causes and the Remedy. By George L. Vose. Lee & Shepard, Boston.

This title is descriptive of a book that surely has a very real mission. "No less than forty bridges fall in the United States every year. No system of public inspection or control at present existing has been able to detect in advance the defects in these structures or prevent the disasters. Hundreds of bridges are to-day standing in this country simply because they never have happened to receive the load which is at any time liable to come upon them. . . . Many now in use upon our railroads are in no way better than those at Ashtabula and Tariffville, and which await only the ripe combination of circumstances to tumble down. There is at present in this country absolutely no law, no control, no inspection which can prevent the building and use of unsafe bridges, and there never will be until the people who make the laws see the need of such control." The author holds that whether the bridge is safe or not is not a matter of opinion, but of inspection and arithmetic, and surely this little book will do much wherever read towards creating a demand for thorough inspection of all bridges on all public highways and railroads.

Theophilus Trent. Old Times in the Oak Openings. By Benjamin F. Taylor. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co., 1887.

The last book by that well-known Western writer, Benjamin F. Taylor, was called by him a novel, but its chief interest lies in its delineations of life in Michigan during the early days. The hero, if he can be called by that name, is a country schoolmaster, who comes west in a canal boat. The village in which he teaches is "a bit of a peninsula fenced off from the world with the bars up," four miles from a stage route. No one in the place had dyspepsia, nor knew the meaning of the word "ennui." Various experiences, more or less startling, are related in a rambling, familiar way without much attempt at sequence or connection. E. E. M.

THE HOME.

Tommy's Dream.

Tommy has told a lie. His mamma said he might take one apple, but he took two large ones, and soon came for another, saying he had been playing and had not yet had any. So he was given another apple, and ate it. The first thing that happened was that he fell very sick and had to be put to bed and take medicine. After a while, when he felt a little better, he fell asleep, and it was then he had his dream. His mamma had learned what a naughty lie he had told, and had talked with him sadly about it; and he had had much sharp pain in his stomach. When he fell asleep, his mamma's talk and the pain mixed in his dream in a very odd way. Tommy dreamed that he had the pain all over again and he felt much worse than before. He tossed about and kicked and cried. His mamma sent for the doctor. "Ah!" said the physician, "what is the matter with the little lad?" Now if Tommy's mother had only told the truth, how well it would have been for Tommy! But she did not. O no. You will see that nothing happened in the dream as it happens when people tell the truth. No; his mamma said, "O, there's nothing the matter with Tom; his bed time has come, that is all." Tommy could hardly believe his ears when he heard his mamma say this. He roared from the bed, "That's not true. I don't go to bed in the middle of the day; and I'm all doubled up with pain." Now the doctor knew well that Tommy was sick, but he had no wish to speak the truth; so he said, "My little man, I see you are feeling very well,"—and went away. "O," said Tommy, "I shall never get well unless some one tells the truth." So he tossed and kicked and cried more than ever. But at last, late in the afternoon—so he dreamed—the pain grew less and he fell asleep and slept all night. He woke early in the morning, feeling quite well, and went out to play in the garden. While he was hunting a splendid yellow and brown butterfly, his mother and father sat down to breakfast. Tommy soon tired of chasing the butterfly, and the odor of coffee and cakes through the open window made him think how hungry he was. He saw Jane, the cook, pulling some radishes in the garden; so he called out to her, "Jane, is breakfast ready?" "No, indeed," said Jane. "Haven't papa and mamma come down yet?" said Tommy. "Not yet," said Jane. Jane knew that they were eating breakfast at that moment, but she did not care to tell the truth. So Tommy went to the barn to see the red bossy with the white star in his forehead. After seeing the bossy and scratching the head and stroking the ears of the pretty creature a long time, Tommy thought it must be breakfast time, and went into the house. But there he found Jane just clearing the table. Breakfast was done. With much grumbling and pouting Tommy had to eat some bread in the pantry, and go late to school. "Teacher," said Tommy at school, "has the geography class recited?" "Yes," said the teacher. "Then I must study the history lesson," said Tommy. "Certainly," said the teacher. But after a little while she called up the class in geography, and Tommy had no lesson because he had been learning the history. "You said the geography had recited," cried Tommy. "It was the history," said the teacher. "But you said geography," said Tommy. "O, it is no matter what I said," the teacher answered. Tommy opened his eyes very wide indeed. "What does every one mean this morning by telling such whoppers?" said Tommy; "I can't get along if no one tells me the truth." I suppose my readers know what "whopper" means; I must tell you the story just as Tommy dreamed it, you know, even if the words are strange. I suppose "whopper" means some kind of a falsehood, probably a very big one. Soon came the recess, and the teacher went out into the play ground with the children to enjoy the fresh air; but while they were playing, Tommy saw smoke coming from a window in the roof of the school-house, and ran to tell the teacher. Sure enough, the school building had caught fire, and soon the flames crept out under the eaves and the roof began to burn briskly. A man who was passing cried to the teacher, "I will send you the fire engine," and ran swiftly down the street. When he reached the engine house, he found people getting out the engine, because they had heard a cry of fire. "Where is the fire?" said one, "Some one said it was the school-house." "No," said the man, "It is farmer Murray's barn; I have just come from there." He knew very well the school-house was burning, but he did not care to tell the truth. So the engine went off to the farmer's place, and the school was burned down. Ah! How hot and bright the flames were! With this thought Tommy woke up, to find the sun of the summer morning shining warm and bright on his eyes. "What a strange dream!" said he, when he was wide awake. But very soon he grew quite sober, thinking of his dream. Tommy began to look at a lie as never he had before in his life. He began to see that nothing in the world can go on unless people tell the truth; that if all people should tell only lies, everything would be in confusion, no one would know what to do, where to go, what to say, one thing after another would be ruined and nothing would be mended, because no one would tell truly how to mend it or what tools to use or where they were to be found, or any other true thing. What a world that would be! What a dreadful place! Soon it would be no place at all; all the people would be starved. No food could be raised, nothing at all could be done, because no one could trust another's word, and whoever did follow what he was told, would go wrong and do harm instead of good. What a mean thing, then, a falsehood is!—because the power to tell a lie comes from the fact that other people tell the truth, and no one could live long enough to tell many falsehoods if every one deceived every one all the time. Therefore a lie is not only very bad in itself, but a very mean badness, because it skulks under other people's truthfulness. It is like a base fellow living in another's house, eating his food, and yet plotting against him and doing him harm with the very strength which the food gives. J. V. B.

My Flowers.

All in the early morning hours
I walked through blooming garden bowers,
Where purple pinks and pansies grew,
And roses sparkled in the dew.
They were so lovely in my sight,
I plucked the red ones and the white,
And with full hands I wandered down
Until I reached the busy town.
Then round me, like a swarm of bees,
Came ragged children, crying "Please!
Oh, please give me a flower!"—And so
I had to let my treasures go.
I gave them every one away;
But somehow all the long, warm day,
Those flowers seemed just as sweet and bright
As if they still were in my sight.

—MARY E. BRADLEY, in St. Nicholas for April.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, - - - J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, - - - H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, - - - DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Chicago Women's Unitarian Association held its May meeting on Thursday, the 26th, at Unity church.

Mrs. S. W. Conger, the leader, had for her topic "Alice and Phoebe Cary" as poets of the liberal faith, which was well treated, and the selections from their poems included many favorites.

Mrs. Plummer spoke of the beauty and worth of their poems for children, and read selections from them. "One Sweetly Solemn Thought" was sung by Miss Howe, and was an interesting feature of the programme.

Election of officers for the coming year was engaged in, with the following result:

President, Mrs. S. W. Conger; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. Geo. A. Follansbee, Mrs. W. C. Dow, Mrs. W. G. Cutler, Mrs. G. F. Shears. Treasurer, Mrs. John C. Hilton; Secretary, Mrs. John R. Effinger.

Minneapolis.—At last the Unitarian church is completed, dedicated and occupied. This happy consummation took place June 5th. A thousand witnessed the impressive dedication, and it is estimated that 200 or 300 were turned away. Rev. Mr. Dobbryn and Doctor Tuttle of the neighboring Universalist churches, the Unitarian neighbors, Rev. S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul, and Kristofer Janson, of Minneapolis, and Rabbi Iliowiz, of the Reformed Hebrew church, took part in the exercises. Letters and telegrams of congratulations were received from the secretaries of the A. U. A. and W. U. C., from Robert Collyer, Gannett, Jones and others. The leading address was made by the pastor. The people joined with him in an impressive responsive service, from both of which we will make extracts for our columns. At present we must content ourselves by giving the following description of the building, which we condense from a local paper.

The First Unitarian church, regarded as one of the handsomest and most complete temples of worship in the northwest, is situated at the corner of Eighth street and Mary place.

The church has been built under the direction of Messrs. O. C. Merriman, S. C. Gale, R. E. Grimshaw and Mary E. Hale, as a building committee, with Mr. Oliver Erickson, superintendent of construction. The ground measurement is 50x115 feet. The material used is what is known as "Broken Ashler," or Indian red Luverne jasper. The design of the church is a combination of Queen Anne and Italian. In the interior arrangement the high basement or first story contains, besides kitchen, toilet rooms, boiler rooms and other apartments, a music hall, 31x84 feet, with a stage at one end. On the second floor is the main auditorium, 47x65 feet, with two galleries; elegant parlors, pastor's study, library and class rooms. The galleries are but little above the main floor, and do not extend over it. The ceiling is flat and paneled with hard wood. The interior finish is of birch. The doors and windows are hung with curtains. The parlors have easy chairs, fire-places and other attractive features. The pulpit is located on one side instead of at the end, and the 600 seats are arranged in amphitheatrical form, parlors and reception rooms looking into the auditorium. The heating is by steam. The gas fixtures are of antique brass. In one corner is a fire-place and in the niche above this will stand a bust of Emerson. The decorations are of a modest character, but highly ornamental. Rich olive tints prevail. The halls and side rooms are decorated in harmony. Of the features of the church, one of the most prominent is the main entrance. This is from the old Italian, having a double arch with massive pillars of polished St. Cloud granite. The pastor's study in the southwest corner on the gallery floor, is the most charming room in the church. It has a fireplace, an oriel window, and one end is completely taken up with a bookcase. The furnishing is cosy and attractive. In the opposite corner on this floor is the Unity or Young People's Club room, with a tiled fire-place. The auditorium has five chandeliers, with smaller lights wherever needed. The organ is a very fine instrument, and was presented to the church by Mr. S. C. Gale. In the reception room is a small but especially handsome window, much of it being of settings of gems. The cost of the church was estimated at $35,000 to $40,000, but with all finishing touches will probably reach nearly $50,000. The site has much increased in value since purchased, so that the whole property is worth $70,000.

Denver. Here in Denver, during your Conference week, some of us longed every day to be in Chicago and hear the words we must now content ourselves to read. The reports already received but heighten the regret over forced absence, and make us inwardly resolve to go next year if alive.

Last week we had something of a conference ourselves, which may prove to have more than local interest. Dean Hart had criticised and denounced Canon Freemantle's "Theology under its changed conditions" (an article with which all your readers should be familiar), and our minister, Mr. Van Ness, having been requested to preach upon the same theme, did so to the satisfaction of all progressive minds. This sermon was published, and it evoked from the Dean a letter, which for its tone has been largely apologized for among his own people. He dared Mr. Van Ness to reply to Dean Burgon's criticism, and seemed to fully believe it an impossible thing to do and not give up all that science, free thought, and the study of comparative religion have taught. Mr. Van Ness replied last Sunday, and the church could not hold all who came to hear the easy, scholarly, and gentlemanly way in which the subject was handled. Undoubtedly some ideas have been awakened which will result in a better understanding of where the world of thought stands to-day.

Each day of the week intervening between the two sermons, brought out letters upon the subject, some wise and some otherwise; but the Dean's last letter is quite lacking in the bravado with which his "preliminary canter" (as he termed it) was full, and is largely occupied in telling what a lively life his orthodox father lived. He asserts his belief with Dean Burgon that there can be no progress in theology. Think of that, ye advanced Unitarians, and be grateful that he closes by beseech-ing the Lord to bring into the way of truth all such as have erred and are deceived. He evidently does not

"Prize the doubt,
Low kinds exist without."

But we must

"Welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Learn, nor account the pang."

Who of you are coming out to assist in dedicating our now nearly finished church? A warm welcome awaits all.

E. H. H.

Philadelphia.—The managers of the Free Library Association, which was instituted in January, 1886, in connection with the First Unitarian church, have just issued a report which indicates the satisfactory work so far accomplished and gives as their conclusion from past experience the impression that similar work is widely needed, whether done in connection with their own or other religious or secular institutions. As hundreds of men, women and children have shared consciously and gratefully in the opportunities furnished, it can easily be understood that the books and social pleasures have touched good soil.

The plan is kept finely within the bounds of unsectarianism marked out for it. Though most or many of those assisted seem to be Catholics, and though one of our priests has uttered some protest to such of them as resort within Unitarian precincts for what they can, as asserted, get from the kindness of their own church, it appears that the archbishop, in response to the wise explanation of Dr. Furness, has encouraged rather than repulsed the formation of the questioned and similar associations. Under the wise tutelage of Miss Hinckley and Mr. Bond and their few co-workers, there would seem to be little danger that this effort could develop in any direction but that of good.

—I understand that some one officially connected with a Baptist church in Camden has circulated a printed protest in criticism of Unitarianism in general, and of the Camden movement in particular, as tempting young people from their allegiance to the instituted orthodoxies. If I can get hold of this precious document I may be forced to quote from it briefly for UNITY's edification.

—The window to be put in the First church in memory of Mrs. Doctor Furness is a loyal tribute from her children. It will unite simplicity with beauty, and take its place among the tenderer symbolisms with which we can all share our years.

H. L. T.

Gilmanton, Wis.—The Unitarian society at the close of service on Sunday, May 29, voted to give their minister leave of absence for the Sunday included in the programme of the Wisconsin Conference, and, forthwith, he set out to improve the privilege. He had an afternoon appointment six miles on the road, after filling which he proceeded to Independence, a town twelve miles farther on the road, where he had an engagement to deliver two lectures. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings he tried to tell the people of that town how the earth and its inhabitants were made. Thursday he proceeded to Baraboo, where his heart was gladdened by meeting his fellow laborers whom he had not seen for many months. It is not necessary to say anything about the Conference, except that it was a very rich feast, as it will probably be reported by some one "having authority."

—The Gilmanton society is prospering, and the Gilmanton minister has commenced work at Independence with some prospect of good being done. He also contemplates carrying our gospel into some of the neighboring towns.

—Rev. T. G. Owen holds the fort at Arcadia, and Rev. Mr. Heddæus is looking over the field at Fountain City and Waumander, with the view of being established at the former place, and dividing his time between the two places.

NATHANIEL THE HERMIT.

Yellow Springs, O.—Thirtieth Annual Commencement of Antioch College, 1887.

June 16, 8 p.m.—Elocutionary Entertainment.

June 17, 8 p.m.—Musical Entertainment.

June 18, 8 p.m.—Anniversary of the Union Society.

June 19, 3 p.m.—Baccalaureate Sermon by Pres. D. A. Long, D. D., LL.D.

June 20, 10 a.m.—Diploma Meeting of the Union Society.

June 20, 3 p.m.—Anniversary of the Athenæum.

June 20, 8 p.m.—Anniversary of the Star Society.

June 21, 10 a.m.—Lecture before the Literary Societies by Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., of Chicago. Subject, "Social Forces."

June 21, 3 p.m.—Lecture before the students by Rev. J. L. Jones, of Chicago. Subject, "Browning."

June 21, 6 p.m.—Alumni Banquet.

June 21, 8 p.m.—Lecture by Rev. M. J. Miller, '59, of Geneseo, Ill., before the Alumni.

June 22, 8 a.m.—Meeting of the Trustees.

June 22, 10 a.m.—Commencement Exercises.

June 22, 12 m.—Commencement Dinner.

June 22, 4 p.m.—Meeting of the Alumni.

June 22, 8 p.m.—President's Reception.

Baraboo.—The 37th session of the Wisconsin Unitarian Conference was held at this place on the 2nd and 3rd insts. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. C. F. Dole, of Boston, his subject being "Our Propaganda." Friday forenoon was spent in picnicking on the shores of the ever delightful "Devil's Lake." In the afternoon there were essays by Revs. Owen, of Arcadia, and Forbush, of Milwaukee. Rev. David Utter, of Chicago, preached in the evening. Saturday morning Mrs. Savage reported on the Post-office Mission, Professor Mason read a paper on the Religious Possibilities of Agnosticism. In the afternoon, Professor Keyes, of Janesville, discussed the importance of Physical Education. In the evening, M. M. Bostwick, of Janesville, and D. E. Spencer, of Madison, both of them young men, read papers on Unitarianism, and H. M. Lewis and H. H. Giles, of Madison, made addresses. Sunday there was preaching by Earl of Gilmanston, and Crocker of Madison. During the session resolutions were passed thanking the Woman's Auxillary for their aid in building Arcadia parsonage, encouraging the Post-office Mission workers, promising aid to the Winona movement, and inviting the co-operation of the Minnesota churches, until they organize a State Conference of their own.

Englewood.—June 12 was children's day. Miss Kollock's church was beautifully decorated with flowers, and filled to its utmost capacity. After songs and recitations, a dozen children were dedicated by parents and minister. Six young people were tenderly received into the church by the rite of baptism. The spontaneity and sincerity of the whole service was deeply affecting. The well-filled ranks of the Sunday-school and the interested faces of the congregation were even more beautiful than the flowers as a testimonial of the enthusiasm which is felt by her people for Miss Kollock's work.

Hinsdale.—It was June 12, and children's day here. Unity church was a bower of beauty. William C. Gannett was the preacher. At the close of the impressive service, they brought their little children to him and he dedicated them in a simple baptismal service which touched the hearts of all present. Long will live the day in the memory of the interested congregation which filled the house.

Camden, New Jersey.—Sidney H. Morse, whose Radical was one of those inestimable blessings which the liberal world is never likely to forget, has been staying here under duty to an ideal of Walt Whitman which he projects putting into a statue. Mr. Morse came here from Washington, where he had received some sittings from the President. One Sunday evening he spoke for Mr. Haskell, in Unity church, on Self-Government as understood spiritually, politically, industrially.

Boston Notes.—Last Sunday James Freeman Clarke attended the special service at his church for communion and baptism. Rev. Charles G. Ames officiated at communion. Mr. Clarke baptised four children and welcomed one more member into his church by his simple rite of confirmation. The pastor's voice is feeble, and indicates the severity of his late relapse of three months' duration.

—Anniversary week! Who says that its value or its enthusiasm has abated? Let him lie down and sleep as bed-fellow to the man who writes that the world is going sadly worse. Good news and fresh zeal have been contributed to our churches by evangelists from the north, the south, the east, and the west. Other denominations have opened their book of welcome, and now glow afresh with gathered heat from distant missionaries and other laborers. The venerable peace society is renewing its youth. Only we miss the lightning of the old Antislavery society, which formerly obtruded its red-hot truths in season and out of season. In its place the tardy temperance movements of the Episcopal and Unitarian denominations are purifying our atmosphere, and ushering in a brighter morrow.

—Your Brother Jones helped us appreciate the needs and opportunities of the west. Brother Chaney's and Allen's southern hopes were represented by proxy. England's struggles and successes were told by Brother Peris and other.

—This is first our series of anniversary meetings in the new Unitarian building. So fast do present facts become history that we already drop the adjective new in speaking of our denominational home. The effort has been made to give it religious as well as business uses, and so envelop it in a warm color of affection rather than a glaring hue of pride.

DR. PRICE'S CREAM BAKING POWDER MOST PERFECT MADE

The United States Government

Places Dr. Price's at the head of the entire list.

(See NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH BULLETIN—Supplement No. 6, page 33, Washington D. C.)

The Canadian Government

Places Dr. Price's at the head of the entire list.

(See report to the COMMISSIONER OF INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT, Ottawa (seat of government, Canada, April 3rd, 1883.)

It is the purest and strongest. Free from Ammonia, free from Lime, free from Alum, and is recommended for general family use by the Heads of the Great Universities and Public Food Analysts.

Persons doubting the truthfulness of this can write any of the Chemists named:
 Prof. R. OGDEN DOREMUS, M. D., L. L. D., Bellevue Medical College, New York.
 Prof. H. C. WHITE, State Chemist, University Georgia, Athens, Ga.
 Prof. R. C. KEDZIE, Late President State Board of Health, Lansing, Mich.
 Prof. H. M. SCHEFFER, Analytical Chemist, St. Louis, Mo.
 Prof. CHARLES E. DWIGHT, Analytical Chemist, Wheeling, W. Va.
 Prof. JAMES F. BABCOCK, State Assayer, Boston, Mass.
 Dr. ELIAS H. BARTLEY, B. S., Chemist to the Dep't of Health, Brooklyn, N. Y.
 Prof. CURTIS C. HOWARD, M. Sc., Starling Medical College, Columbus, Ohio.
 Prof. M. DELFONTAINE, Analytical Chemist, Chicago, Ill.
 Prof. R. S. G. PATON, Late Chemist Health Department, Chicago, Ill.
 Prof. JOHN M. ORDWAY, Mass. Institute of Technology, Boston.
 Prof. R. A. WITTHAUS, A. M., M. D., University of Buffalo, N. Y.
 Prof. A. H. SABIN, State Chemist, Burlington, Vt.
 Prof. JOHN BOHLANDER, Jr., A. M., M. D., Prof. Chemistry and Toxicology, College Medicine and Surgery, Cincinnati, O.
 Profs. AUSTEN & WILBER, Profs. Chemistry, Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J.
 Prof. GEORGE E. BARKER, Prof. Chemistry University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa.
 Prof. PETER COLLIER, Chief Chemist for the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.
 Profs. HEYS & RICE, Profs. Chemistry, Ontario School Pharmacy, Toronto, Canada.
 Dr. JAMES ALBRECHT, Chemist at the United States Mint, New Orleans, La.
 Prof. EDGAR EVERHART, Prof. Chemistry, University of Texas, Austin, Texas.
 Prof. E. W. HILGARD, Prof. Chemistry, University California, Berkeley, Cal.

KEEP YOUR OLD DICTIONARIES

EVERY OWNER OF A

Webster's or Worcester's Unabridged Dictionary

SHOULD AT ONCE PROCURE A COPY OF

THE SUPPLEMENTAL DICTIONARY.

IT CONTAINS FULLY THIRTY-FIVE THOUSAND WORDS, PHRASES, AND NEW DEFINITIONS TO OLD WORDS, AND OVER FOUR HUNDRED NEW ILLUSTRATIONS.

EDITED AND COMPILED BY

Rt. Rev. SAMUEL FALLOWS, A.M., D.D.

TEN GOOD REASONS

why every Owner of a Webster or a Worcester should have a copy of the SUPPLEMENTAL DICTIONARY.

1. Because of the incompleteness of Webster's and Worcester's dictionaries in the number of words treated.
2. Because no intelligent person can afford to be without the 35,000 words and definitions in all departments of knowledge when they can be obtained for the moderate price asked for the SUPPLEMENTAL.
3. Because, in connection with an old or late edition of Webster or Worcester, you have a combination of words, definitions, and phrases not obtainable in any other way at ten times the cost.
4. Because the English language is constantly growing, and a SUPPLEMENT to the present unabridged dictionaries is the only way you can obtain the innumerable words that are being coined to meet the demands of the different arts and sciences, not to mention the words from the French and German which are being anglicized, and which must find a place in every English dictionary.
5. Because no dictionary yet published contains all the words and phrases used by the English-speaking people, or is free from imperfections. Webster and Worcester are standard in the United States, and are as free from imperfections as any English dictionary. With either of these dictionaries and the SUPPLEMENTAL you are as well equipped as though you had the best of the so-called cyclopaedic dictionaries.
6. Because the SUPPLEMENTAL DICTIONARY, though compiled largely from English dictionaries of very recent date, has been carefully edited and made to conform to the American spelling and pronunciation as laid down by Webster, and is therefore of more value to Americans than any dictionary they can purchase.

7. Because with the SUPPLEMENTS that will be issued every few years, giving all the new words and meanings which come into general use, at a mere nominal price, the SUPPLEMENTAL will be kept in advance of all unabridged dictionaries that are revised not oftener than fifteen or twenty years.

8. Because every word, phrase, or new definition which may appear hereafter in the different dictionaries now in course of completion, and which is not in your old or SUPPLEMENTAL dictionaries, will be given in the series of supplements mentioned above, while every word, definition, or phrase which we have in the SUPPLEMENTAL, not found in these dictionaries, can be had only by purchasing the SUPPLEMENTAL.

9. Because every owner of the SUPPLEMENTAL is personally interested in making the series of Supplements of incalculable value by sending to the publishers every word or phrase which he may come across in his varied readings, which cannot be found in his old or SUPPLEMENTAL dictionary.

10. Because if you are a teacher, minister, lawyer, doctor, student, or business man, you need it; if the head of a family, you especially need it for your children, even though you never look into it yourself. In fact, it is indispensable to every owner of an unabridged dictionary, as it contains the very words that are most referred to—those of recent origin.

SEND FOR DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULAR CONTAINING ENDORSEMENTS FROM

JULIUS H. SEELYE, A.M., D.D., LL.D., President of Amherst College.
E. D. ROBINSON, A.M., D.D., LL.D., President Brown University.
PROF. W. T. HARRIS, A.M., LL.D., Concord School of Philosophy.
J. C. GREENOUGH, President Mass. State Normal School, Westfield.
HON. GEORGE HOWLAND, Superintendent of Schools, Chicago, after three months of careful examination.
THOMAS W. BICKNELL, LL.D., Pres't Chautauqua Teachers' Reading Union; late Editor New Eng. Journal of Education.
A. P. STONE, Superintendent of Schools, Springfield, Mass.
ALBERT G. LANE, Superintendent of Schools, Cook Co., Ill.

REV. A. E. WINSHIP, Editor New Eng. Journal of Education.
NORMAN BRIDGE, M.D., Professor of Pathology and Adjunct Professor of the Principles and Practice of Medicine of Rush Medical College, Chicago, and Ex-Pres't Board of Education.
REV. HENRY COLMAN, Pastor Methodist Episcopal Church, Lake Geneva, Wis.
RANSOM DEXTER, A.M., M.D., LL.D., for twelve years Professor of Zoology, Comparative and Human Anatomy and Physiology in the University of Chicago; Author of "Kingdoms of Nature," etc., etc.
REV. CHARLES R. BLISS, Secretary New West Education Commission, Chicago.
A. MUEHSAM, Esq., New York.
THE BEACON, Boston, Mass.

Library Sheep, $3.75; Half Morocco, $4.50.

THE CLARK & LONGLEY COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,
308-316 Dearborn Street, CHICAGO.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JUNE 25, 1887.

[NUMBER 17.]

EDITORIAL.

IN the death of Hannah E. Stevenson, the venerable friend and fellow-worker of Theodore Parker, the world has lost a soul endowed with a great capacity for friendship and helpfulness. We hope in due time to speak in these columns a more deliberate word of appreciation and gratitude. Meanwhile we mourn with many a spirit released from body; a noble life nobly rounded out.

THE latest Unitarian papers from London are full of their Anniversaries, which seem to have been characterized by as much heartiness, helpfulness and forward-looking cheer as the recently held on this side of the water at Chicago and Boston. Our American fellow-worker, Rev. J. W. Chadwick, was there to enter into the English joys. At the "Soiree" he made a speech on Unitarian affairs in America, so eloquent that the Inquirer refrained from printing extracts, because "next week it is to be printed in full."

THE Secretary will tell next week the story of the Illinois Conference held at Buda. But there is no hope that any of us can get into type the serenity, heartiness and beauty of that occasion. The west, let it be known, has at least one patriarch, who for years has labored in one place and for one people, and now as a matter of course his word is a blessing, his smile a benediction. He preaches when silent and works when his hands are idle. His slow, modest but sure success ought to shame his younger brethren out of their hasty honors and easy triumphs, the celebrity that is a sensation to-day and a depression to-morrow.

FROM one of the dailies we learn that in a city where women have been placed on the school board the janitors complain that they abuse their power by "nosing" about the basements, ferreting out unwholesome odors and demanding a general purification of premises. As might have been expected! Woman has so long wielded the broom and scrub-brush that she will inevitably carry them into office with her. As has been so often prognosticated she will be the death of our present political system if allowed equal political rights and privileges. Only think of going into a justice office denuded of its halo of smoke and its spatterwork floor! Or into a police court all washed and shorn of impious expletives! How can the car of progress be stayed in its onward march?

THE season for vacation draws on apace. The months in which Nature is most busy, if indeed there are any degrees in her ceaseless activities, are being set aside more and more for rest and recreation, by those who can take them. School-houses will soon be locked, children will have long play days, teachers will unwind the tension keys and sink into inactivity, the lawyer will try to neglect his brief, the business man his trade, and sleep rather than sermons will be the end and aim of the minister. This is well, it is true economy. In all this the rush will be for water. A lake, a bay, a river, the ocean beach, or at least a bubbling spring, is a vacation necessity. Let it be remembered, however, that water has other uses than boating, bathing and fishing, and that the most successful fishing is that done without rod or line, leaving the fish in his beauty and his joy. Emerson saw the universe orb'd in a dew-drop; life is reflected ever in water, there is in it that which ought to awake the poet in every soul. Water in a crystal vase, water in which the laughing babe splashes, water in the old oaken bucket or in the quiet river, water in the yeasty foam of old ocean, or in the humble blessedness of the rain, is always beautiful, always spiritual; its symbolism is always of heaven. Cleared of its superstition and its formalism, baptism, water baptism, is one of the most beautiful, persistent and universal symbols of religion. May then the rain ever lead us to think more lovingly and naturally of that well of water that springeth into everlasting life; drinking from this well of truth and love allays forever the thirst of the passion that is selfish and the power that is cruel.

THE New Theology Herald brings us the programme of the Lakeside School of New Theology from August 5th to August 21st. The opening sermon, Friday, August 5th, is by the editor of the New Theology Herald, Rev. J. G. Townsend. On Saturday there is to be a paper by our Doctor Thomas; Prof. Carey, of Meadville, will address the school on Monday, August 8th, and Rev. E. L. Rexford, Rev. Thomas Hill, D. D., and Rev. A. A. Miner, lecture and preach later in the course. A very attractive programme, and with the attractions of Chautauqua Lake added, surely the summer school should be successful as well as profitable.

WEDNESDAY evening of last week was given by the Congregationalists, at their Home Missionary Convention at Saratoga, to the discussion of city evangelization, and a very full report of the discussion is given in this week's Christian Union. It seems that a committee was appointed at the meeting of a year ago to take this matter into consideration and present a report and provide for the thorough discussion of the subject at this meeting. From the report of the committee it appears that in no one of the great cities of our country has the increase of churches and of church membership at all kept pace with the increase of population. The committee recommend no new methods, but simply greater zeal in providing churches for churchless wards, gospel services, Sunday-schools, tenement house visitations, etc. Following the report came addresses from the Rev. Josiah Strong, D. D., upon The Great City a Great Peril; by Rev. Lyman Abbot, D. D., upon The Great City a Great Opportunity; Rev. J. G. Johnson, D. D., considered the problem of Smaller Towns; Rev. J. H. Seeley, D. D., gave some final suggestions as to method. All of which is well worth reading, since the increase of city life is one of the marked features of the age in which we live, and the decline of interest in churches one of the marked features of city life. But is it not time that some new thought be put into this matter, some new methods proposed? It is a common belief, among the multitude of the unchurched, that the whole difficulty is in the way the churches are conducted, that they might be attractive to all if the people who managed them only wished to make them so. Is this a popular error, or is the church an outworn piece of machinery so far as cities are concerned?

No question in regard to Shakespeare is more complicated, or more fascinating in its many uncertainties, than, "Have we any true portrait of William Shakespeare of Stratford?" The face commonly represented as a picture of Shakespeare is the so-called Chandos portrait, which has no authority reaching farther back than Malone, 1793, who announced that this picture was painted in Shakespeare's life-time. How he knew, or why he thought this to be true, has not transpired. The picture with most authority is the Droeshout engraving, which appeared with the first folio edition of the plays in 1662, accompanied by the famous lines of Ben Jonson testifying as to its correctness as a likeness. But this probably was made seven years after Shakespeare's death, and if the engraver had anything to copy from except his memory, we feel the greater regret, because the picture is so little worthy of Shakespeare. Indeed, it would be hard to imagine anything more expressionless and wooden than this cut. And yet perhaps we have something even worse in the bust in the Stratford church which, although it represents a noble cranium, gives us a face in which we can take no possible interest. This is said to have been cut by Gerard Johnson, an Amsterdam tomb maker, but who first said this nobody knows. In 1849 came the discovery of the "Becker Death Mask," a plaster cast found in a junk shop in Mayence, and said to have been marked with the date of Shakespeare's death. There is no other link, except this date, connecting it with Shakespeare. We cannot follow the intricacies of the copyings and multiplications of these, and a few other "originals," nor the various theories concerning the portraits. But it seems almost wicked for the author of the little book, "Was Shakespeare Shapleigh?" to make confusion so much more confounded by inventing connecting links and wonderful discoveries in garrets and pawn shops, to connect a good many of these portraits with one William Shapleigh, wholly fictitious so far as known to this writer.

Sunday Circles.

A CHURCH WITHOUT A MINISTER.

It is time for another step forward in our mission work. The Post-Office Mission is well established now. It is not too much to hope that within ten years the post-office secretary will become as common a church-officer among us as the minister or janitor; that every live church will have a corner of the field assigned it, its chosen paper in which to advertise the offer of the tracts, its winter advertisements promptly in, its tracts and letters circulating, and the $25 or $50 to keep the mission going heartily given by the church to whom this mail-bag mission is its Africa and China. And now to start the next thing. It is the Sunday Circle, the Lay Meeting, the Church in a Parlor, the gathering of the six, the twenty, the forty neighbors, who feel unfed at the usual church-tables, and who therefore seldom go to them,—the gathering of these and their children to greet one another of a Sunday morning, to hear a sermon read, to sing some hymns and read together words of prayer and uplift.

"This, every week?" Yes, every week, or, if wiser, every second week,—but regularly; a meeting to look forward to, and invite a friend to, and to come to with best clothes on and children at the side, and to take some personal part in besides the listening.

"And this without a minister?" Yes, without a minister. Can six or even twenty neighbors keep a minister in bread and brains? Without a minister. The liberal faith must get rid of the idea that a church involves a minister in the sense in which a baby involves a father and a mother. It is the relic of the priest idea. It is intellectual and spiritual laziness to dream that the idea is true. We make much of our congregationalism, and are afraid of anything that may infringe on our right to think as we please,—but we take our rights out in the thinking; the Episcopalians are more congregational than we in worship, the Methodists more congregational than we in teaching activities. In few churches the laity practically do so little as in our own, and really leave so much to the minister both to regulate and do. Few are really so autocratic or patriarchal in government. Without a minister: the new church in which the unchurched liberals of the country will some day begin again to cluster will be the church without a minister, the church which will cost much less effort of their pockets and more effort of their minds. Their pockets want rest, and their minds want more work on Sundays. It is good to have a good pastor: when the circle is large, he is needed. But in many places the circle is not large, and in most places the circle does not exist except potentially in some earnest heart as center, some earnest heart that begins to wonder how it can draw around itself, and visibly, that possible circumference. Given a simple service and songs in which all join, given a girl at the melodeon or piano, given a noble sermon printed, given a good reader, now one and now another, and given that in the reader which makes the listeners feel it natural he should read noble things aloud,—given this, and all this regularly, and the habit of coming together for this clad in one's best mood and coat and with the children,—given this, and we have a large part of a good pastor. There is many a town and many a country cross-roads where that reader lives,—often three or four of him and five or six of her lives,—never thinking of himself or herself as the quarter or the sixth part of a pastor; never thinking of it because it is so taken for granted that a "church" involves a "minister"—and both a church-begging and a church-debt for the building. Only let those four-fourths and those sixth-sixths find each other out and put themselves together, and in three months, if they choose to, they can have a church. It will be a little one, which is all they need; one, gathering in a parlor or a school-house, and therefore a cheap one costing in money but a trifle, which is all they can afford; but one which it will take themselves to make, and which therefore will be a real church, and may be a very live church in its outgo of influence.

There are two tools which such a liberal church will probably need at the start. One is a service-book containing a hundred hymns set to a few familiar tunes, with some responsive services and prayers. The other is a weekly sermon—a sermon sure to be on hand each week, and sure each time to interest the ten or fifty hearers, and make them sure to come next Sunday morning for another; and this means careful selection such as the readers at the cross-roads very likely cannot give. A song and service-book, which perhaps may answer the need, is partly ready in our "Unity Mission Tracts." No. 11, called "Songs of Faith, Hope, Charity," contains fifty of our best loved hymns with eleven printed tunes, and No. 28, called "Love to God and Love to Man," contains about fifty more songs of our faith adapted mostly to the popular revival tunes. A third tract yet to be made is to hold responsive services for reading and singing, and when this is ready, the three can probably be furnished in one cover for fifteen or twenty cents. As to the supply of sermons, cannot some Committee of our Western Conference or Women's Conference select a series of thirty or forty—each one a sure success in interest and inspiration—and have them ready in pamphlet or book form for next winter's use, and advertise in early fall the terms and system of supply?

"What would such a Sunday Circle cost?" The circle has thirty members, we will say, and in each pair of hands is the service book at twenty cents—$6.00; and for forty Sundays, $4.00 more should cover all expenses of the sermon-pamphlets and the postage on borrowed books. The best parlor for the purpose is the one where the welcome is the heartiest and everybody is most apt to feel at home; or if no parlor is convenient, the school-house comes free. There is some one in the thirty able, and only too glad that she is able, to be at the parlor-organ every Sunday, rain or shine. There are eight more who agree together that they will open their mouths and sing, and they prepare themselves accordingly—and the result is that pretty nearly all the rest join in. There are three willing to take turns at the reading, and they prepare themselves for that part so as to do it at their best; but practically one does it so much better than the others that it is gradually left to her, while the other two are apt to lead in the fifteen minutes' talk which follows the sermon, and which sometimes proves more helpful than the sermon; three more presently start a little Sunday-school for the children. Nobody charges for any of these things, so the church, including the plant in service-books, would cost but $10 that first year, except for one reason,—it knows that no church is a church which lives for and by itself, so $10 more are sent to the Western Conference, and as a church they help in good works in the town with $30 more. Total cost of this people's church for the year, then, $50.

The contribution sent to the Western Conference entitles them to delegates, who come back from the meeting in such a glow that when the State Conference holds its summer meeting, one-fifth part of the congregation set off together to attend it, hoping for the same good time there; and they bring back a promise from the State missionary that he will visit them that fall. As the second winter goes by, their circle enlarges a little, and once they hire a hall and pay the traveling expenses of a minister who preaches to a congregation of two hundred; and then they begin to wonder if next winter they ought not to give the town three such Sundays, and whether, possibly, in time ahead, they could pay their part and have a circuit pastor regularly once a month. All the while the Sunday circle in the parlor meets, more and more the members feel that the meetings count for real good in their lives, and the town is beginning to feel in little ways the influence of a liberal church in its midst.

The above is only in its minor details a dream. Not long ago we were in a small town, near Chicago, where much more than all this has been realized by "a church without a minister."

If we have the figures right, the liberal church in Hobart, Ind., is seventeen or eighteen years old; only three months of this time has it ever had a minister living in the town. Once a month, for some years past, it has had a visit from a helpful minister near by. Another Sunday of the month, the people themselves take charge of the service. But every Sunday, summer or winter, something meets. The congregation is the largest, we believe, in town. So is the Sunday-school. And this work has gone steadily on till the town is leavened through and through by the influence spreading from that liberal church—a church without a minister; and more than leavened—shaped and characterized by it. The people of the church talk of their "religious privileges,"—they "would not live in a town without a Unitarian church." The secret mainly lies in those unfailing meetings and in the heart and character of two or three citizens who made them to be unfailing.

It is the next thing to be done in missionary ways,—to develop the Sunday Circle, the Lay Church. The Post-Office Mission leads naturally to it. Let the workers in that Mission aim at this result, and reckon their year's success not merely by the number of tracts sent out and correspondents written to, but rather by the two or the three little churches they have started without ministers. Those would be "mission parishes" worth counting. The Iowa Conference, last year, took the lead in this direction by organizing a "Society of Lay Leaders;" and this last week the Illinois Conference passed the following resolution, which we trust will pass from word into deed, next fall:

Resolved, That the Illinois Conference believes that the next missionary step forward should be the development of the Unity Sunday Circle, the little church cradled in a home parlor before even the hall is reached; believes that this, the next missionary agency to be organized, may become a worthy second to the P. O. Mission.

Resolved, Therefore, that the Conference requests the W. U. C. and the W. W. U. C. to take the matter into their special consideration as a thing to push this year; and that a committee to consist of Mr. Covell and two others whom he may select be appointed by the Illinois Conference to carry out the above suggestion as far as possible.

Worship.

The word worship is compounded of two Saxon words, weorþan, to be worth or worthy; and scipe, state or condition, whence our English termination "ship", as in hardship, statesmanship, etc. Worship is, then, weorþ-scipe, a state or condition of worthiness.

A state of worthiness! What could be a better expression? It asserts a state of worthiness to be the essence of worship. In the desires we must seek for worthiness; in the hidden tendency, taste, longing, and trust of the heart. It is right, as it is necessary, that all the multiform desires of our nature should have their place and due regard; and because there are some higher and some lower, there is a chance for un-worthiness, as well as worthiness, of character. A man is judged by what he wants most, what he deems most valuable, what he most puts trust in and lives for. He is worthy who pants less for breath in the efforts of his coarse daily labor than for deeper life and spiritual being; who would not weigh the golden gain of his work against the value of truth and an unspotted honesty; who places his trust in no compromises and equivocations but in simple right; who believes that right is the best policy, and not that the best policy is right; and who, having asked himself the momentous question, "What ought I to live for?" answers that he ought to live for spiritual growth, and really lives for it, and rears his head as much as he can out of earth into heaven, though he may be plunged twelve weary hours of every hard-worked day in cares and labors to procure a scanty subsistence.

This then is that worthiness which is worship, an interior condition, a state of earnestness for the good, of trust in the immutable and true, of longing for grace and strength and inward well-being. So far have our Saxon fathers led us on the way to the understanding of worship. But observation supplies another element, this, namely, that worship is always exercised towards personality. Combine now these elements that we may define worship clearly to the mind. Worship is a state of worthiness in ourselves, and it is an exercise or affection of the soul towards personal Being; uniting these I define as follows: Worship is the soul's homage, veneration, adoration, towards One who is perfectly those things which the soul pronounces most valuable, and for which it lives; to which being, therefore, the soul's desire and living for those things, is a state of worthiness.

And now observe how this view of worship tests the worshiper; with what solemn consequences it affects him. Suppose a selfish, ungenerous, greedy, and untruthful soul, and that soul bowing in prayer to God. What is its true attitude? What is its act? It is an attitude, an act of entreaty; a petition, perhaps, that its greed may be satisfied, and its untruths covered up; this entreaty is commonly called prayer. But how is it with regard to worship? Ah! there is no worship in the act—I mean worship of God. If there were in the universe such a being as the old theologians called Satan, a malicious, selfish, cruel, revengeful, gold-loving, crafty spirit, then selfish or revengeful or gold-loving prayer would be a state of worthiness as towards him; and would not the words utter really a worship of him, though addressed to God. To pray is to ask for what we worship; if we ask for spiritual good, we worship the spiritual Good, that is, God, and our worship is the sure pledge of his answering inspiration; if we ask for outward advantages, we worship some other who does not even exist to answer us. Remember Fichte's words, "We cannot win blessedness, but we may cast away our wretchedness [that is, we may turn from trust in these outward things and from worship of strange gods, and love with our whole soul spirit and good and worship God] and thereupon blessedness will forthwith of itself supply the vacant place. Blessedness is unwavering repose in the One and Eternal; wretchedness is vagrancy amid the manifold and transitory; and therefore the condition of becoming blessed is the return of our love from the many to the One."

J. V. B.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Who Knows?

Do you recall our talk that day?
We sat in the dusky gloom
Of the summer-scented room;
The air was pierced by the thrush's call,
And the light wind's play
Threw the woodbine's shadow along the wall.—
The talk we had,
Half jesting, half sad,
On many a deep and impossible theme,
Of soul and substance, Plato's dream,
The things that are and the things that seem?

Knowledge ungained by sense that fancy lures.
 Sudden—was it miracle or chance?—
 Some careless word of yours,
 And that backward toss of the head,
 That forbids denial in advance,
 Proved that I knew it all before.
 A moment and the vision fled;
 But the words you spoke, the look you wore,
 The woodbine's shadow on the wall,
 And the thrush's mellow call,
 I had somewhere heard and seen it all;
 Though when or how I could not say,
 Since, as you said, we met but yesterday.
 Well, now, suppose
 We were to meet on the other shore,
 Just strangers, perhaps, and nothing more,
 Who knows?
 And our talk should turn on the same old theme
 Of soul and substance, Plato's dream,
 The things that are and the things that seem;
 That there in the spirit-land—
 For once in a way
 Give fancy full sway—
 In the house not made with hand,
 Shadows light
 Of the woodbine's sprite
 Faintly flickered along the wall;
 And you were to say the self-same thing,
 With the same impatient, backward fling
 Of the head—should I not say
 As I did that day,
 All this I have surely heard before;
 Somewhere met, and known you, sir, of yore;
 Have seen, and heard, and known it all
 In some far-off time beyond recall,
 To prove which—listen that thrush's call—
 Then would you smiling answer me Nay,
 And repeat that we met but yesterday?

CELIA P. WOOLEY.

Prohibition: Its Domain.

Here is a man who drinks to excess—who robs his family of the necessities of life that he may yield to his insatiable appetite—who disturbs the peace—who makes himself an annoyance in the community. Is he morally responsible for his action? and what can prohibition do for him?

Let me suggest an answer to this question by asking another. Does his conduct bring upon him any inevitable consequences, any just judgment, so beyond escape that it is manifestly from God? Then has he taken a wrong road, back which he can never be carried, but must climb, with bitter pain and unflinching courage. Prohibition might bar his path and say: "Thou shall go no farther in the direction of strong drink!" But a thousand temptations would still lie open to him which he could escape only by his own choice. God meant him to choose for himself between good and evil, and the puny hand of man can never build the will of another into his character. No law save the Divine has any province here, and the least attempt to punish a drunkard as long as his evil deeds affect his own soul only, is an intrusion between the Creator and His creature. But the moment this creature oversteps the line, and infringes upon the rights of society, of humanity at large, he is answerable to that sense of justice which is constantly being developed in mankind. Human law can properly reach him, and is not the right of his family to eat bread before he drinks whiskey, the right of an orderly citizen to work and worship undisturbed, the right of a lady to walk the street safely, clearly enough defined to justify prohibition in his case?

In the face of the multiplicity of such cases, and the enormity of the evils growing out of them, has society no right to insist that the generations of the future shall come into the world with this awful animal appetite diminished and not increased? Has it no right to say to the liquor dealer, "All honorable avenues of support are open to you; but no dollar acquired by pandering to the baser nature of man, which tends toward the destruction of the human race, shall ever reach your pocket?" The inordinate love of money itself, the desire for wealth at no matter what cost to the world, is a sin against the community scarcely second to the drink habit. And whenever the sin of an individual against his own soul has developed into a sin against the community, it has entered the domain of prohibition, and may be justly dealt with according to its importance. The largest freedom of each individual, as well as the surest process of the human race lies in this very fact. For prohibition to the one means liberty to many, and the diverse prohibitions of many make the common liberty of all.

MINNIE STEBBINS SAVAGE.

Satisfied.

When hope grows dim and shadows fall,
 And light seems all denied,
 I turn unto the One in All,
 Rest and am satisfied.

On rugged ways and storm-swept heights,
 My spirit must abide,
 But sees, through all, love's beacon lights—
 Trusts and is satisfied.

And through the clearing mists I hear,
 Far up the mountain side,
 The call, in accents sweet and clear,
 Come and be satisfied.

Above the cloud-rapped mountain top,
 God's love light still abide;
 Before that shrine my spirit stops,
 Glad, happy, satisfied.

The shadows far beneath me lie,
 The storm-clouds roll aside,
 And in the deep sunlighted sky,
 My soul is satisfied.

When angel hands shall lift the veil,
 Disclosing life's full tide,
 Its glory then the stars shall hail,
 Wait and be satisfied.

LOUISE M. DUNNING.

Dedication of the Minneapolis Unitarian Church June 5, 1887.*

Minister: Let us dedicate this House which we have built, to the divine and undying sentiment of the soul, that has raised temples in every age and land, and is the source of all the religions of mankind.

People: We dedicate this as another Temple to the universal and ever-enduring Religion, whose manifold ways make but one worship.

Choir: All nations of men whom Thou hast made,
 Shall raise their worship to Thee, O Lord.

Minister: Let it be consecrated to the worship of the Infinite One, whose "greatness is unsearchable" and beyond highest name or thought, but who dwells in all men and counts all as his children.

People: To the "One God and Father of all, over all and through all and in all," we dedicate this House.

Choir: He is not far from every one of us,
 For in him we live and have our being.

* We print these extracts from the "Order of Exercises," as one more sign that the liberal faith is blooming into beauty. The thought-basis of the society is indicated by the following lines from its constitution, printed on the first page of the programme: "Our object,—To form a society where people without regard to theological differences may unite for mutual helpfulness, intellectual, moral and religious culture and humane work."

Minister: Let religion here be unfettered by forms, since "God is a Spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in Spirit and in Truth."

People: Not to the letter that killeth, but to the Spirit that giveth life we dedicate this House,—to the freest and fullest thought, and to the sincere service of Truth.

Choir: The Lord will be with thee, fear not;
Serve him in sincerity and truth.

Minister: Let all who gather here learn that God's great earthly name is Justice, and that his truest worship is to remove wrongs and relieve the oppressed.

People: To the holy religion of human Justice, which seeks first to "let the oppressed go free and break every yoke," we dedicate these walls.

Choir: Defend the afflicted and fatherless;
Deliver the poor and the needy.

Minister: Let all learn that His deeper name is Love,—that "every one who loveth is begotten of God," and every one "who dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him."

People: To human Love, which "is the fulfilling of the law," and which makes every one who shares it another "Son of God" and truer "temple of God," we dedicate this House.

Choir: If we love one another, God dwelleth in us,
And his love is perfected within us.

Minister: Let this Love bring its peace and unity to all within these walls, and its charity toward all without. Let it inspire prayer and praise and sermon, and be the chief sacrament. By its baptism let children be consecrated and kept pure; by its communion let all hearts be enlarged and sanctified; by its tenderness let marriage be made holier and homes more heavenly; and from its divine promise let death learn that Love is everlasting.

People: To peace and unity among all; to warmer hearts and happier homes; to truer life on earth and trust in life eternal, we dedicate this Temple.

Choir: Trust ye in the Lord, the Eternal;
He will preserve thy soul forevermore.

All: Father, sanctify this place, that it may be to us and to our children's children the House of God and Gate of Heaven.

All join in singing:

(TUNE: Balerna.)

O! Thou whose own vast temple stands,
Built over earth and sea;
Accept the walls that human hands
Have raised to worship Thee.

Lord, from thine inmost being send,
Within these courts to bide,
That peace whose blessing without end
Shall shine on every side.

May all the souls that worship here,
In weakness, age and youth,
Both they who mourn, and they who fear,
Be strengthened by thy truth.

May faith grow firm, and love grow warm,
And pure devotion rise,
While round these hallowed walls the storm
Of earth-born passion dies.—Adapted.

Minister: Peace be within these walls! The Eternal Love enfold and fill and keep us and all who meet here after us, henceforth forevermore! Amen.

Question.

If love seeks thee and finds thee not—
If light in thy way loses thee—
Where on earth's fields hath God a spot,
Or on the bosom of the sea?

H. L. T.

Unitarians and Poetry.

Why do Unitarians, and especially Unitarian ministers, run so much to poetry? I am afraid the answer may smack of denominational conceit. But we will even take the risk for the sake of truth. It is because Unitarians are so much in sympathy with nature. Nature is one great book of poems. There are the epics of her seas, the odes of her rivers, the pastorals of her fields and flocks, the love-sonnets of her thousand creatures of instinct, or of reason, and the deep metaphysical plaints or ecstasies which rise out of the depths of man's heart toward God. Yes, the earth and the sky are full of beauty. And Baumgarten defined the beautiful by the significant word, aisthanomai, "I feel." And true poetry is the language of feeling, or of imagination, or of both. Usually both. What a mistake is the common idea that Unitarians have an unfeeling religion. Some Unitarians, like some others, are without feeling, without the sentimental, without imagination. But it is not of the nature of their religion to be so. The exact contrary is true. If I may so speak, God is a great poet—is the Homer of all the little singers of earth. May I say that Unitarians get very near to God; and that they, accordingly, sing. What a sweet and rich piece of sentiment is Parker's prayer to God as a Mother! Emerson's wide sweeping idea of the Deity is an epic in itself. How tender and touching is Channing's Fatherhood of God. What a natural, quiet, bubbling spring of poesy—coming from away down in the heart—is Gannett's "How Pray?" The final religion will be natural. And nature, as I've said, is poetic at every turn. As one becomes truly religious, he becomes poetical—as much as his nature will permit. Of course there are many human turnips, and some Unitarian turnips—that haven't blood enough to nourish poetic idea. But when the world shall be full of God's simple, pure, sweet, natural religion, it shall flourish poets in every household—genuine poets, though not great, perhaps. A few years ago nearly every lady of any leisure was trying to paint. I look upon this as a grand, common impulse toward nature. And it was strictly a poetic impulse. And it was full of refining and liberalizing influence. It blent little societies into a larger and finer harmony. It inspired much spiritual thought and joy. Nor has the impulse yet consumed its strength; nor will it. Such things are of nature and God. They do not die, but silently grow. So should Unitarian societies and ministers encourage the tendency to poesy, whether expressed in word or color; the tendency toward nature, the bright impulse toward God.

W. W. FELLOWS.

The Iron Bed of Procrustes.

The age of fable has bequeathed us a very suggestive bit of mythology in the story of Procrustes. Upon an iron bedstead which this notorious highwayman possessed, all the victims which fell into his hands were stretched. If they were too long for the bed their legs were cut off. If too short they were stretched. Bed and victim must be made to fit at any cost.

This myth suggests an analogy in the mental history of man. Established opinion has ever been tramping up and down the highway of thought and has stretched upon the Procrustean bed of torture the advanced thinkers of every age.

In the past men of independent thought were burned, poisoned, hung, drowned, buried alive, smothered, crucified—for attempting to enlarge or purify the world's knowledge and life. None of these things are done now. The man of ideas is merely figuratively stretched on the Procrustean bed of dogmatism. Instead of chopping off his legs his character is impugned, his heart declared hardened, his sanity impeached. Instead of stretching the thinker's limbs his ideas are tortured and twisted and bent until their original form and power is destroyed.

Time was in Christian history when the church willingly sacrificed life in the holy effort to make earth's noblest men fit the iron bed of dogma! Mother church found the good monk Luther, an eccentric child. She tried to put him to bed and to sleep, but he refused to be silenced by such numbing lullaby. The success of Luther's protest encouraged the human spirit. Since his time the rise and progress of rationalism and the disintegration of dogmatic theology has been a movement of steadily increasing breadth and momentum.

Organized Christianity is now ashamed of its iron bed. But no amount of sanctimonious whitewash or pious paint can efface the stains and spots upon it. Liberal and humane men in all denominations wish to put the hateful thing in the theological attic. But mark the irony of fate. Science and the purified religious consciousness of humanity insist in bringing that iron bed (the plan of which was revealed from heaven) into the clearlight of day.

It is not proposed to stretch persons upon this bedstead. The intelligence of the age proposes to put it to a new and more noble use. Henceforth it shall be called the Bed of Truth, and all ideas which will not fit it must be modified until they do. If any man chooses to tie to theories that cannot rest peacefully upon this humanized Procrustean bed he may be permitted to do so. There is no law to prevent one from believing in any amount of superstition—except the law of right thinking,—and if one will ignore that law there is little to be said. (There are asylums for such.) People may lie down on their bed of dogmatism in fancied security, but the coverings that prevent contact with the iron framework of truth are being rapidly worn out, and at no distant day contact with reality will startle the human mind into a self-conscious appreciation of the fact that it has been bound for centuries upon the Procrustean bed of delusion.

FRANK L. PHALEN.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Was Shakespeare Shapleigh? A Correspondence in Two Entanglements. The whole edited by Mr. Justin Winsor, librarian of Harvard College. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

The first half of this little book appeared in the Atlantic Monthly for May; the second entanglement, which is as much worse than the first as the first is worse than nothing, appears here for the first, and we wish we could say for the last, time. To say that all creation has been ransacked for improbable events and discoveries to make the entanglement in regard to Shakespearean portraits worse, is speaking mildly. And yet, from a literary point of view, the work is excellently done. There is an air of reality about it (and some other characteristics also), that remind one strongly of Hale's "Man Without a Country." Let all who are not well up in Shakespearean matters, and who have not steady memories in the way of discriminating fact and fable, carefully avoid this book, and when any one springs the question, "Was Shakespeare Shapleigh?" let the listener shake his head with a wise, cautious smile and say, "I think the boy lied."

Faith on the Earth and other Sermons. By John W. Chadwick. Boston: George H. Ellis. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. $1.

All Mr. Chadwick's sermons are of a high order. They bear evidence of wide reading and real thinking. There is nothing somnolent about them; though it is plain that they are not suited to the average congregation. The average congregation, unless we are mistaken, would find itself too severely taxed to follow them—except possibly on occasion. The average congregation would probably prefer something nearer the plane of Talmage or Moody. It is complimentary, then, to the intellectual power of the Second Unitarian Society in Brooklyn, that for over twenty years it has heard and fed upon the strong meat of such discourses.

But they are not wanting in moral power, and they are rich in fine touches of poetic beauty, as we should expect. Whoever reads them may glean, besides the fruits of careful study and quick observation, sallies of "daring faith," felicitous sentences, a subtle humor, tender tributes, and a sure hope for the future.

Perhaps we can render no better service here than to call attention to their titles: I. Faith on Earth; II. The Great Discoverer; III. Ethical Culture (this was replied to by Dr. Adler); IV. Gnostics and Agnostics; V. The Rational Time-view; VI. Progressive Orthodoxy; (this is one of the most timely where none are out of date); VII. Revivals of Religion; VIII. Positive and Negative Theology. (These constitute the eleventh series. The twelfth series follows). I. The Divine Sufficiency. (This is the very striking and able sermon preached at the opening session of the National Conference of Unitarians at Saratoga, Sept. 20, 1886.) II. The Earthquake God; III. Things that Remain; IV. The Child in the Midst; V. The Holy Spirit; VI. The Spirit of Truth; VII. The Good New Times; VIII. Henry Ward Beecher.

Faith and Righteousness. A Memorial of Sumner Ellis, D. D., with an outline of his Life and Ministry, by Rev. C. R. Moor. Boston: Universalist Publishing House. 825 pp., 12mo., gilt.

This volume will be welcomed by the many friends of Doctor Ellis, late pastor of St. Paul's Universalist church, of Chicago. There have been few nobler men than Doctor Ellis. He was sweet-spirited, generous, scholarly, and in every way manly. The volume before us contains a well written sketch of his life, and some of his best sermons. The latter show the man: They are thoughtful, fair and elegant. Doctor Ellis's style is uniformly easy and finished, and each sermon presents its subject with a completeness not often found in discourses of the same length. The topics are well chosen, and all together present in an interesting way many of the living questions of the day. Among the subjects discussed are, "The Christ consciousness," "The Fallacy of Disbelief," "Faith Confirmed by Prayer," and "Current Tendencies in Thought and Life."

The Golden City. True Catholicism. The Bible or the Creed. By B. F. Barrett. Swedenborg Publishing Co., Philadelphia.

The average New Churchman seems to find it more difficult to understand, than others, why all men do not see the truth as he sees it. In the writings of Swedenborg and those of many of his disciples, there is much that is beautiful, true and good, many interpretations of the ancient Scriptures that as far excel the literal truth they were intended to convey as sunlight exceeds starlight. But the trouble with most of us is, that all these beautiful interpretations seem to us to proceed upon a method that is absolutely false. To us it seems the only right and honest way to find in a writing just what the writer meant to put there, and nothing more. If other beautiful and true things are suggested, say them for ourselves, but do not deceive ourselves by supposing that these imaginings of our own were providentially meant as infallible truth for us.

Talks about Law. A Popular Statement of What our Law is and how it is Administered. By Edmund P. Dole. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

Just the book some of us have been looking for for years, explaining all about courts, pleadings, lawyers, evidence, where our law comes from, the beginning of a lawsuit, law terms, and so forth, in a perfectly clear and popular manner. Whether the book is accurate in all respects, some better judge may say, but it answers hundreds of questions that remain unanswered in the common mind many years. Why would it not be an excellent plan to have such a book made part of a high school course? Surely it would be as valuable as arithmetic or physiology.

Philosophical Realism, by William J. Gill, Author of "Evolution and Progress," and "Analytical Processes." Boston: W. H. Bradley. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 85 cents.

This is an intelligent presentation of idealism. All that is known is the ego, and the ego is larger than the "internal." It extends to all that it thinks about. The external world is real, but is a manifestation of thought. The work is the-oretic, and makes a strained and needless application of its principles to "Christian Science." Some of the discussions are very strong and clear. The book discusses many problems of interest to the general reader, since the relations and applications of idealism are endless. It treats of pantheism, transcendentalism, design, atomism and many scientific questions, and aims to weave its explanation of all into a comprehensive system.

THE HOME.

Disciplining Another's Baby.

Dick is a "dyed in the wool" patriot, having been knit out of the reddest, the whitest and the bluest of yarn. Of course time and use have subdued the red, given tone to the white and modified the blue, still Dick is always ready to "show his colors"—a most reliable sort of fellow.

Santa Claus, his brother, looks very like many pictures you have seen of the famous individual after whom he is named—the same jolly face, the same roly-poly body and fat hands; he is always dressed in the same gay clothes, blue pants, green coat, black boots with red tops and yellow necktie. He, too, is remarkable for his reliability, devotion and soft, easy manner, makes a comfortable pillow, a good cushion, will cover a hole in a basket or act as a screen for a venturesome mouse caught out in daylight.

They both belong to the sweetest, busiest little daffy-down-dilly of a three years old boy you ever saw, who goes dancing about the house, the garden, the lawn, like the little sunbeam he is, with his heart full of love and tenderness and his head full of immature, uncultivated wisdom, which is sometimes almost as dangerous to peace and comfort as unripe fruit from the orchard. He does a deal of thinking in his way, some of it very wise and some of it very other-wise. No man "on 'Change'" is busier than he, few brains work more steadily, few feet take more steps during the waking hours, few persons go to bed more reluctantly, or rise in the morning with more alacrity, than our little hero. There are no idle moments with him. What his hands find to do he does with all his might, and as soon as one task is fairly finished he is at the next. No "waiting for a job." He finds constant employment. His one misfortune is that his well meant endeavors are not always appreciated, but he rarely wastes time in brooding over his trials and the ingratitude which often awaits genius and generosity. He really hasn't time to worry over his worries, and so they just vanish into thin air like so many soap-bubbles. But when grief does overtake him he makes a business of it, for he never half does anything; still he doesn't hold on to it, hug, nor court it, and gets away from it with all possible speed; indeed, so successful is he in this respect that often joy follows grief so closely that laughter chases away tears like an April shower before the spring sun. There is no end of lessons of wisdom to be learned from this little teacher. He is a regular professor in the family. Of course his two children, Dick and Santa Claus are model dollies, and he is very devoted to them, takes them out airing daily if his multifarious duties permit, though sometimes the pressure of work so absorbs him that he forgets to bring them in; however, this discipline has inured them to all sorts of weather, and they don't mind a night in the dew, frost or rain, in fact will endure a snow storm with perfect equanimity and come out of it—Santa Claus as smilingly and Dick as patriotically as they went into it. If they fall from a chamber window they are picked up quite unhurt, a tumble down stairs and no damage done. You can pick them out of the slop jar, wring them out, and to the eyes of the "Prof." they are, if possible, more attractive than ever when taken down dry from their hospital over the kitchen stove. In fact there never were two more perfect children's children than Santa Claus and Dick; they are indeed "a joy forever," giving no anxiety, no heart aches, nor trouble of any kind. With such an admirably disciplined family it is quite incomprehensible to the professor the anxiety and care his sisters bestow on their Parisian children, who are tenderly washed, hands, face and feet, but no royal bath tub business about, and when taken out airing are carefully returned to their nicely cushioned chairs or snugly tucked in their little cribs. All this is detrimental to their growth and maturity, for as soon as they lie down their eyes close, while Santa Claus and Dick are always open-eyed and live amid the bustle of active life, and learn to conform to circumstances.

One morning as the professor, with Santa Claus, Dick, his little knife and a number of other treasures stowed away in his doll carriage, was going out with his friend Alice and her family, he spied his sister Pansy's beautiful bisque doll reposing on its little bed. At once his heart was touched by its loneliness and want of proper exposure, companionship and discipline, and he determined to give her an airing too; so he stowed the fair Elaine, who had hitherto known only the gentlest of handling, the smoothest of silk and softest of fur, in among his treasures between Santa Claus and Dick. All went well for a time as they trundled the carriages up and down the walk, but after a time the professor wanted his knife from the bottom of the carriage, tossing Santa Claus and then Dick out on the walk, as was his wont, where they lay quietly—Santa Claus all smiles, Dick all patriotism as usual—then Elaine, who no sooner struck the pavement than she flew into an infinite number of little pieces. The professor was never more amazed in his life. For a few minutes he could only stand and stare, then gathering up the pieces he started to the house with a growing indignation at Elaine's conduct. What could possess her to behave so was beyond his comprehension. Carrying the pieces to his mother he exclaimed with no small vexation in his voice,

"Des see what s'e did! Bokted hersef all to pieces!!"

"But it was you who broke her, my dear."

"No, I din not, s'e bokted hersef. I din not do it," said the professor, decidedly.

"Mamma, I shouldn't wonder if Alice did it. You know he never denies anything he has really done," interposed his usual apologist.

"No, Alice din not do it. Alice din not touch her. S'e des din it hersef," stoutly maintained the professor, and rushing off he brought in Santa Claus, Dick and the carriage; throwing out the dolls he exclaimed,

"Nats 'e way. I froed out Santa C'aus and he 'haved hesef. I froed out Dick an' he 'haved hesef, nen I froed out Elaine an' se' des bokted hersef all up. I nezer, nezer saw sut' a naughty dolly, nezer!!"

"But," said mamma, "when you threw Elaine down you broke her, my dear."

"No, I din not bokit her, s'e bokit hersef. I froed her down so," throwing down the smiling Santa Claus, "and he don't bokit;" then throwing down the patriotic Dick to still further demonstrate the fact, "'an he don't bokit, but s'e dest bokted all up, taus s'e was naughty," solemnly reiterated the "Prof." Now, mamma found that there was no more use of wasting words on this little man than Wordsworth did on his little maid, one of seven. He demonstrated over and over that good dolls could be thrown down with impunity. He had always thrown Santa Claus and Dick down anywhere, and they were good dolls and came up all right. He only threw Elaine down once and she "bokted hersef all up 'cause s'e was so naughty." That was all there was about it.

Oh, mothers! how many of us are much wiser than the little professor? We try the same treatment on a whole brood of children irrespective of native differences, and are as surprised as he at the result. We give advice freely where we had better have held our peace. We criticise where we should have reverently inquired. We use our moral and spiritual pruning knives where we should have used props. We endeavor to inure the child to hardship where we should have protected, and if by some fortunate combination of circumstances we are apparently successful, how we hug our theories and point with pride to the result of our method, and lose patience with the lack of wisdom that dares not follow our course. Let us learn with Rousseau that "the training of children is an occupation where we must know how to lose time in order to gain it."

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, . . . J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, . . . H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, . . . DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—A meeting of the Directors of the W. W. U. C. was held Thursday, June 2d, at the Unitarian headquarters, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago. Mrs. West in the chair, and all the local directors present, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Dow, Mrs. Warren, Mrs. Marean, Mrs. Hilton, Mrs. Brown, Miss Roberts, Miss Hilton. The reports of secretary and treasurer were read and accepted. It was heartily agreed that the leading and special work of the Conference should be as heretofore the Post-office Mission work, for which over five hundred dollars ($500) was spent last year. But this is not enough. In order adequately to meet the demands for tracts and denominational literature, more money is needed.

In what new channels should the energies of the Conference be directed?

After various suggestions and discussions it was decided that a beginning at least might be made to help in the following three causes: That of temperance; home missionary work as represented by Mr. Bond's industrial and mission school in the Crow Creek Indian Reservation, Montana, and foreign missionary work, the need for which has been brought to our knowledge by the Hindu Pundita Ramabai, now pleading so earnestly in this country for help to establish schools for intellectual and industrial training among the women of India. To reach those ends it was moved by Mrs. Marean that Mrs. West appoint chairmen of three committees to represent the three interests indicated, each chairman to fill out her committee from such members of the Conference as she may choose, or who may avow an interest in any of the three lines of work. This motion was seconded and passed.

Mrs. West appointed: Mrs. Jones, chairman of committee on temperance.

Mrs. Marean: chairman of foreign missionary work.

Mrs. Dow, chairman of home missionary work.

Mrs. Dow offered to correspond at once with Mr. Bond and see what help was needed most.

Cheering and suggestive letters were read from Mrs. Richardson, Princeton, and Miss Le Baron, of Elgin. From Mrs. Learned, St. Louis; Mrs. Savage, Cooksville, Wis.; Miss Gould, Davenport, Iowa; Miss Gale, Cleveland, Ohio, greetings were also received, but by accident did not reach the secretary in time for the meeting. It was proposed that subscriptions to our periodicals be increased, and a motion made that any person who should be willing to forward the Register or UNITY send his or her name to the secretary. It was voted that the secretary order one hundred tracts of Mr. Sunderland's, "What do Unitarians Believe," as needed in the P. O. mission work, and that she be permitted to use her judgment in the future in purchasing such tracts as seem necessary. It was voted that the secretary be sent to the State Conference at Buda, June 16th. The meeting then adjourned.

FLORENCE HILTON, Sec'y.

Philadelphia.—Sidney H. Morse recently spoke informally about Emerson before a section meeting of the Ethical Culture Society. He has completed a fine bust of Emerson, which was exhibited on the occasion.

—The Spring Garden Society will have no evening meetings during the summer. The Germantown and First societies will, no doubt, stop their meetings altogether.

—The final assembling this season of the Unity Ethical Association in Camden will be devoted to Emerson. With an essay and readings, it is believed the occasion will be happy in its effects.

—Morse's figure of Whitman is about completed in the sketch. It is a very satisfactory thing, and there seems to be a general feeling that it should be thrown up large into a public memorial.

—Dr. Furness will spend his summer in some New Jersey retreat, probably with his son, Horace Howard.

—Clifford will be in New England during July and August.

—Weston is to summer in the Adirondacks.

—The report of the Seybert Commission, which has been investigating Spiritualism, and is made up of a number of scientific and literary experts, is decidedly dampening to those who may have hoped for favorable results. The studies will still go on in accordance with Mr. Seybert's bequest. It proceeds under the supervision of the university.

—The Ethical Culture Society has had an ending of its school season till fall. There will be none but section meetings of the society through the summer.

—Mr. Clifford's spoken tribute to Hannah Stevenson was one of those nobly poetic and humanizing memorials which shame the best things we can put into stone and bronze. H. L. T.

Boston Notes.—The closing exercises of our public and private industrial schools give great satisfaction to all who are watching our changing city charities. "Not alms, but opportunity for self-help," is to-day the approved motto in philanthropy. Annually our Normal Kindergarten graduates twelve well-equipped teachers, and all of them are directly needed in the growing demand in New England and elsewhere for kindergartens.

—So much summer correspondence and maturing of plans are projected by our church organizations that much good work for next autumn and winter seems to "cast its shadow before." Not the least advantage gained by the numerous conferences and class meetings of the past winter is the courage to stand up more confidently to new church work.

—Summer visitors to our city from the west and the south will be cordially welcomed at our A. U. A. building, and to the use of all its conveniences and appliances. Some courteous officers or ministers, or other ladies and gentlemen, are always in attendance to receive or to give interesting information.

—The ministers' circulating library attached to the book room is a decided success.

Last Sunday's Happenings.—Mr. Milsted preached his last sermon before vacation and started immediately for Europe. Miss Murdock preached for Mr. Hosmer at Cleveland, Mr. Hosmer preaching at Meadville. Mr. Jones spoke in the evening at Kenosha. This is the last of a series of four sermons recently given in this church by Messrs Simmons, Gannett and Jones. This parish is not too dead to contain a good many warm hearts, active brains and ready hands. Mr. Blake and Mr. West exchanged. Mr. Effinger preached in Buda; Mr. Gannett at Hobart, Indiana. Pastor and people of All Souls church rejoiced in welcoming back from the east Mrs. E. T. Wilkes. She occupied the platform with the pastor, took part in the services and made a telling address at the close of the sermon.

Kansas City.—The fact that a number of our older societies did not send delegates to Chicago does not suggest to some of us out here as ominous a failure of the Western Conference as seems to disturb the vision of some. Kansas City will serve as an example. Within a week after the Cincinnati meeting a few of our good but frightened ones called a meeting to take action regretting the harm they supposed had been done at Cincinnati. Twelve persons were present. Two were not members, and two others spoke and voted against allowing our peace to be disturbed by any action in the matter; this left eight to vote for the agitators. We are about 100 strong, and shall be found with the Conference if permitted.

Yours in Unity,

S. D. BOWKER.

Meadville.—We go to press before receiving any particulars of the Anniversary of the Meadville Theological School. But the programme shows hymns by Emma Endicott Marean, Mr. Mott, one of the graduating class, and Mrs. E. L. Douthit. Prayer was offered by Rev. William L. Chaffin, and the following essays were given by the graduating class: "Enthusiasm in the Ministry," by Henry Harrison Brown, Saratoga, N. Y.; "The Church and the Children," by Albert Wilgus, Dayton, Ind.; "English Unitarian Leaders," by Frederick Blount Mott, Leicester, Eng. Miss Murdock also read a paper and received the degree of B. D.

Tuskegee, Alabama.—The Southern letter published by the Normal School for colored teachers at this place for June contains an account of the anniversary exercises. Among the industrial exhibits were a cart, a wagon, the products of a saw-mill, home-grown honey, and a boys' hall in process of erection, the bricks for which have been made and are being laid by the students. Over 3,000 people were present at the anniversary exercises. Seventeen students graduated. This is work in which our readers ought to be interested.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

TREASURER'S REPORT OF THE WOMEN'S WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

MAY 17, 1887, TO DATE.

By cash in hand, May 17.....	$ 3.32
" Society at Buda, Ills.....	5.00
" Unity Church, St. Louis, Mo.....	8.00
" Mrs. Wm. C. Dow, Chicago, Ills.....	5.00
" Miss Helen Gale, Oak Park, Ills.....	1.00
" Miss M. A. French, Kenosha, Wis.....
Post-office Mission.....	5.00

$25.32

Annual memberships.....

$74.00

$99.32

PAYMENTS.

To Unity Mission and Short Tracts. $	3.60
Rent and Expenses.....	18.00
Secretary's salary.....	16.66
Postage for Secretary.....	3.00
Stationery and Postage for Treasurer.....	2.00

$43.26

ANNUAL MEMBERSHIPS RECEIVED FROM MARCH 3 TO MAY 17.

Mrs. J. W. C. Morrison, Yankton, Dakota; Mrs. W. H. Metcalf, Mrs. D. Fisher, Mrs. W. H. Bradley, Mrs. L. Vance, Mrs. G. D. Norris, Mrs. C. M. Wells, Mrs. Edward Illaley, Mrs. Proeschel, Mrs. C. J. Dyer, Milwaukee, Wis.; Miss Grace T. Howe, Miss M. E. French, Kenosha, Wis.; Mrs. Geo. N. Holden, Manly Junction, Iowa; Mrs. C. C. Jones, Miss Mary E. Hale, Miss M. C. LeDuc, Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. E. M. Latimer, Mrs. Clement

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JULY 2, 1887.

[NUMBER 18.]

EDITORIAL.

"NATURE is loved by what is best in us."

"ACCUSE not nature; she hath done her part.
Do thou but thine."

"HE who knows a flower well knows God and his Universe."

"SOME plants the sunshine ask, and some the shade."

"THERE'S never a leaf nor a flower too mean
To be some happy creature's palace."

"GO THOU to thy learned task,
I stay with the flowers of spring;
Do thou of the ages ask
What me the hours will bring."

"THERE was never mystery
But 'tis figured in the flowers;
Was never secret history
But birds tell it in the bowers."

"SPAKE full well, in language quaint and olden,
One who dwelleth on the castled Rhine,
When he called the flowers, so blue and golden,
Stars, that in earth's firmament do shine."

"BRING flowers to the shrine where we kneel in prayer,
They are nature's offerings, their place is there!
They speak of hopes to the fainting heart,
With a voice of promise they come and part,
They sleep in dust through the wintry hours,
They break forth in glory,—bring flowers, bright flowers."

"FLOWER in the crannied wall,
I pluck you out of the crannies;—
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower—but if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know what God and man is."

A PREACHER once said, "What a pity flowers can utter no sound! A singing rose, a whispering violet, a murmuring honeysuckle,—oh, what a rare and exquisite miracle would these be!" But no, we would not have it so, but as God has made the flowers. And though they have no speech nor language, and their voice is not heard, yet their sound is gone forth through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world.

MY NASTURTIIUMS.

QUAINT blossoms with the old fantastic name,
By jester christened at some ancient feast:
How royally to-day among the least
Considered herbs, it flings its spice and flame!
How careless wears a velvet of the same
Unfathomed red, which ceased when TITAN ceased
To paint it in the robes of doge and priest!
Oh long lost, loyal red which never came
Again to painter's palette—on my sight
It flashes at this moment, trained and poured
Through my nasturtiums in the morning light,
Like great-souled kings to kingdoms full restored,

They stand alone and draw them to their hight,
And shower me from their stintless golden hoard.

—H. H.

THE WHITE CLOVER.

THERE is a little perfumed flower,
It well might grace the loveliest bower,
Yet poet never deigned to sing
Of such an humble, rustic thing;
Nor is it strange, for it can show
Scarce one tint of Iris' Bow.
Nature perchance, in careless hour,
With pencil dry might paint the flower;
Yet instant blushed her fault to see,
So gave a double fragrantcy,
Rich recompense for aught denied.
Who would not its homely garb abide
If gentlest soul were breathing there
Blessings through all its little sphere.
Sweet flower, the lesson thou hast taught
Shall check each proud, ambitious thought,
Teach me internal worth to prize,
Though found in lowliest, rudest guise.

WE head our editorial column this week with the above quotations, the overflow of one Sunday's Service of Beauty. They are some of the mottoes that accompanied the floral class offerings of a Sunday-school on Flower Sunday. They carry to the reader, as they did to the congregation, their own suggestions, and the editor must suppress the impulse to preach upon the fertile texts, as did the preacher. Suffice it at this time to call attention to the rapid growth of the religious sensibilities in our churches, as indicated by the large increase in the use of flowers and the attendant recognition of beauty as a help to and element in the divine life. One need not be very old to recall the time when flowers at church would shock the proprieties. One of the heretical innovations of Theodore Parker was the vase of flowers that was always on his pulpit. There are many, doubtless, who will claim the honor of having originated "Flower Sunday" and "Children's Day" in the church. While we are so near the roots of this new "Holiday," in the calendar of the church, that is based on the universal experience of humanity and the ever present sanctities of nature, can we not fix its beginning? Who will contribute any facts to our columns, concerning the rise of "Flower Sunday" in the American churches? Correspondence solicited.

THE "National Library," published by Cassell & Co., brings some of the best old English classics into the dime list of cheap reading. There seems to be no excuse left for the reading of trashy pages because the classic ones are not at hand.

BIRRELL, in his essay on Emerson, in the new "Obiter Dicta," says, "Emerson bathes the universe in his thought. Nothing less than the whole ever contented Emerson; his was no parochial spirit." Perhaps this quality, more than any other, makes Emerson the voice of the highest religious spirit of the age. The present hunger of the heart is for the whole, not a part. We have had enough of religious analysis to do a little in the synthesis line now. Not the sectarian but the Unitarian is the one that has the most to offer to the world to-day

THE second volume of "Obiter Dicta" sustains the delight of the former one. This book may well be taken as the exception that proves the good rule quoted by the author, "When a new book is published, read an old one."

THE Young Crusader tells a story of a small boy in a Boston office who, when challenged, declared that there was one thing that he could do which the four grown up men in the office could not, viz.: "Keep from swearing."

THE genial face of Charles G. Ames, of Philadelphia, beamed upon us on Tuesday morning. Mr. Ames is en route for St. Paul, where the Ames clan gathers for the summer. We wish it might happen oftener—his coming this way. We like to feel the magnetic presence of our beloved Philadelphian.

ROBERT COLLYER occupied his old pulpit last Sunday, and spoke on "The New Theology." He closed up with the following bit of breezy courage and forward-looking prophesy: "Keep your glasses clean and mind your light, you young men and women. Keep your light burning strong and clear, as the fathers tried to do in their day, and many of the mothers, too, often more diligently than the fathers. Mind the light, you fathers and mothers, of the open day. Make it stronger and clearer, if you can, and when the orders come to put in new burners, put them in. Don't imagine that what is good and bright enough for us will be good and bright enough in the time to come. And do not fear, dear friends, that this advancing and ever widening faith in God's eternal love, and that his blending of faith with reason, can fail of its holy purpose."

OUR sympathies are always with pacific methods. We believe in patient magnanimity towards the brethren who, in the war of the Rebellion, did such great evil. It was a trying ordeal through which they passed. Their soldiers fought with a valor worthy of a better cause. Many of them were unwitting victims of their inheritance and environment. We believe that the new south is going to be a loyal south, and we would like to reduce the friction and pain to the minimum. But President Cleveland's suggestion to return the rebel flags was a concession to the feelings of individuals that insulted principle. Alas! for the nation that forgets its annals, or reads small its heroic records. Alas! for the new south, if the nation is not to conserve for the benefit of its children the full records of that cause in which their fathers fought so valiantly on the wrong side. We have a right to be lessoned by the latter facts as well as by the former. The following lines, clipped from the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, from the pen of one of our contributors, express sentiments which must be considered if a fair conclusion is to be reached in the matter:

SEND BACK THE FLAGS.

Send back the battle flags—merely
A handful of tattered old rags,
Dusty and draggled and brown-stained.
Surely, we'll send back the flags!
That was a farce that you played us.
Men of the Blue and the Gray:
Rise from your graves, buried heroes—
This is the end of the play.

The brown stains were heart's blood; the tatters
Were torn by the shells booming by;
But honor's a sentiment only,
The patriot died for a lie.
So send back the flags that we captured
At a cost of a million of lives;
Send back the slave to his bondage,
To the lash, and the hounds, and the gyves.

Send back the battle flags. Only—
A trifle you'll send us instead?
Just the lives of our fathers and brothers,
The tears that we wept for the dead.
Let us make a clean sweep of all rubbish!
See, here are the chains and the staves,
The pistol that murdered our Lincoln,
The thought of the far "nameless graves."

Send back the scars of the veterans,
The maimed and the halt and the blind;
Send back the widows and orphans—
All—leave no traces behind.
Send all the memories that haunt us,
Of slaughter and prison and pen;
Wipe out the past of a nation—
We'll send back the battle-flags then.

ALICE WILLIAMS BROTHERTON.

Antioch College.

To the lovers of free thought, practical education and human equality, Antioch College is, or ought to be, a shrine. Here, thirty-one years ago, in the heart of what was then literally a wilderness, Horace Mann laid the foundations of a college, based upon the unprecedented heresies, at that time, of co-education of the sexes and of the races. He was a pioneer in the new education that sought to teach things rather than words, to make men and women rather than scholars, to put morality at the basis of the intellectual as well as the religious life. American annals are full of thrilling tales of pioneer hardships and heroic martyrdoms; none of them are more thrilling and suggestive than the story of Horace Mann's heroism and martyrdom.

The subsequent years of Antioch College are closely connected with much that is the best in Unitarian history. . . . Here Doctors Hill and Hosmer presided. Here Badger, George L. Cary, William F. Allen, Fay, Lucretia Crocker and many others whose names are familiar, have taught.

Very many of our Unitarian ministers are children of Antioch. In the palmy days of the Lyceum Emerson, Wendell Phillips, George William Curtis, Beecher, as well as the leading lights of the Unitarian ministry, have been heard in its chapel.

Since then Antioch has seen dark days, and at one time it seemed as though its doors must be permanently closed, but the planting had been too genuine, and the seed too vital for such a fate. Antioch is again looking up. The catalogue shows an attendance of 239 pupils with a slight preponderance of boys. This is an increase of fifty pupils over last year. The trustees were able to pay three thousand dollars ($3000.00) towards salaries, and five hundred ($500.00) towards the repair of buildings. This sum, together with the tuitions and aid received from the Christian Educational Society, under the thrifty administration of President Long, enabled the institution to pay all bills with a slight balance to its credit. The funds of the college are in good shape, and the trustees were enabled to make a like appropriation for next year. Of the non-resident trustees the following members were present,—Messrs. Hosea, Champion, and Thayer, of Cincinnati; Professor Bell, of Indianapolis; Hon. J. Warren Keifer, of Springfield; Hon. John Little, of Xenia; Professor Derby, of Columbus; Hosmer of Cleveland, and Jones, of Chicago. Tuesday, the 21st was lecture day. In the forenoon Doctor Thomas, of Chicago, lectured on "Social Forces," before the literary societies. In the afternoon Jones, of Chicago, spoke on "Browning," before the students. In the evening Rev. M. J. Miller, of Geneseo, Ill., gave the address before the alumni association. It was an address full of fresh thought; in it the courage of the new science blended with the earnestness and the reverence of the religion that is always old and always new. After the lecture there was an alumni supper and some more speeches. Each time the chapel was filled. Next morning the spacious campus swarmed with happy, healthy people. All the roads leading into the beautiful village of Yellow Springs guided long processions of farmers' wagons, carriages and buggies to the commencement exercises that took place at ten o'clock. Four graduates received the degree of B. A., two of them ladies. Ella M. Coan, the daughter of one of the leading ministers of the "Christian Fellowship," whose death last year deprived Antioch of a faithful friend and trustee, took for her theme the "Liberal Element." She showed a grasp of thought and maturity of judgment seldom found in graduating papers. We can not forbear making room for her closing paragraph.

The liberal movement is ethical and social, and not speculative. It so reaches up into all heights and down into all depths of being that it belongs to all men who are brought face to face with the hard questions of life. Its science must be the strong, willing handmaid of the ethical nature of man, the guide to a higher civilization of cultured souls to whom the conflict is none the less real, but waged in the pure white light of the upper skies. The men who are to be its prophets must be more than mere polite scholars and literary gentlemen. They must be men whose training has enlarged their whole nature; men of faith, who are tall enough to look over the boundaries of the present and see the armies of the future marching and counter-marching in the newly descending heavens. They may be born in cabins, may preach in the wilderness or be burned at the stake, but if by them some new truth is said into the ears of the eager people, then by them comes a larger liberty into the world. They will live upon the earth as long as truth remains among men. The liberal element is ever in the minority, but it contains its own justification. It is inherent in its very nature. It cannot but win with its faith in human possibilities and "sweet reasonableness." This is its ground of advance, and thus it prepares the way of the Lord.

The other lady, Eulalie D. Guthrie, of Mitchell, Dakota, is both a child and grandchild of the college. Both her father and mother were graduates of the school before her. Her theme was "The Obedient Spirit," and like the other paper was characterized by a deep courageous religiousness. Leslie A. Cranston, of Gibson, Ill., discoursed on "Personal Rights," and Frank Southard, of Raymond, Ohio, on "Political Cobwebs," in a manner that made them worthy classmates of the young ladies, which is saying much for them. After the exercises there was a big dinner in the dining-room in the Woman's building, with speeches, reminiscences, etc.

The trustees elected Rev. M. J. Miller, of Geneseo, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of E. W. Clark, of Germantown, Penn., and Rev. E. A. Devore, of West Milton, Ohio, vice Rev. A. W. Coan, deceased.

Let none of the old friends of Antioch despair for this child of their affection. The spirit of Horace Mann is marching on. Antioch College is no longer a missionary exotic, a New England slip, transplanted to western soil but poorly adapted to it; but it is a native growth, rooted in its own locality to which it ministers. For the present the details of the management rest with the "Christian" denomination, so called, but it is not on that account doing any the less for liberal thought and for progressive ideas. During the year lectures upon such men as Bryant, Matthew Arnold, Gladstone and Savonarola have been heard. The latest books on timely subjects find their way into the library, so far as means permit. The college is now under the fostering care of a denomination about three times as large as the Unitarians, and working out their religious problems on lines very similar to those that mark the Unitarian movement. They are trying to live up to the ideal of a creedless church, where character, not dogma, is to be the test of religion. Their ministers frequently and readily pass from one pulpit to the other. The resident minister at Yellow Springs, Rev. E. A. Coil, is soon to assume charge of the Unitarian church at Westboro, Mass.

Let our readers remember Antioch. Send books to its library, papers to its reading room, funds to the treasury, and students to its halls. Let those who are looking for an economic school, in a small town, delightfully located, think of Antioch. The estimate annual expenses, including tuition, board, lights, fuel, room rent, books and washing, is estimated from $127.00 to $145.00.

"WHATEVER lifts man above immediate existence, the wants and impulse of the present moment, and gives him self-control, is called ethical. . . . The ethical points toward immortality as its presupposition. Death comes through the inadequacy of the individual organism to adjust itself to the environment; the conditions are too general, and the individual gets lost in the changes that come to it. Were the individual capable of adapting himself to all changes, there could be no death; the individual would be perfectly universal."—William T. Harris.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Flower Souls.

All laden is the vale
With sounds of fragrant notes,
The flowers sing a hymn
From all their tinted throats.

With guileless voice they sing—
Their souls are in their eyes;
They praise all beauty's King
With fragrant melodies.

The flowers I can but think
Are deathless in their beauty;
Their lives seem so complete—
So void of undone duty.

EUGENE ASHTON.

The Illinois Conference and a Birthday Party.

We left Chicago, a party of seven. At Hinsdale we were reinforced by one, at Princeton by twelve, and at the Rock Island crossing by two, arriving in Buda twenty-two strong. Friendly hands were waiting to greet us, and we were soon resting in our respective homes. The evening hour brought us together in the little church, a full house, and W. C. Gannett in the pulpit. We listened to a sermon upon the theme—"We see as we are." We see with our souls and not with our physical eyes. The divinity without us is only revealed to divinity within. It was a sermon to make us all thoughtful lest having eyes we see not, and ears we hear not.

On Friday morning the conference was called to order, Kersey H. Fell, of Bloomington, in the chair. The reports of secretary and treasurer were read and referred to business committee. The Woman's conference was well represented by its secretary, Miss Florence Hilton. Mrs. M. J. Miller, of Geneseo, spoke for the post-office mission. Her correspondence, of which she gave us copious extracts, proved most interesting and instructive. From one advertisement in a single issue of the Western Plowman she received 130 responses, and from these a permanent list of thirty correspondents. A general talk on the subject followed, in which Mrs. Marean, Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Hosmer, of St. Louis, Mrs. Fisher and others participated. Prof. T. Metcalf and Prof. Geo. P. Brown, delegates from Bloomington, put in an appearance and took part in the discussion.

The noon hour found us in the midst of an interesting discussion on "The advantages of long Pastorates," opened by J. V. Blake.

In the afternoon Judson Fisher gave a vigorous sermon on "What Unitarianism stands for."

The business committee reported as follows:

Your business committee, to whom was referred the report of the secretary and treasurer and other matters pertaining to the business of the conference, would respectfully report that they find the conference indebted to our retiring secretary to the extent of about $550, the exact sum not being determinable, owing to the absence of the treasurer. This indebtedness arises chiefly from the withdrawal of the co-operation of the American Unitarian Association, and until such co-operation is again tendered us by this association, we would report that it is inexpedient to undertake and employ the full services of a secretary, but we earnestly recommend that strenuous efforts be made to hold the ground already secured, and that we hopefully push forward our work on the lines already established. We would further recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the thanks of the conference are due, and are hereby tendered to our retiring secretary, Rev. John R. Effinger, for his four years' laborious work in our cause. With high zeal and noble prudence he has laid the foundations of a working conference, which we hope will continue to appeal for support with growing success to our churches.

Resolved, That we extend hearty congratulations to the pastor and parish at Buda, on this the happy celebration of the 70th birthday of the former, and the 32nd anniversary of their church life under his pastorate. We thank them for this object lesson in patient work and persistent co-operation.

Resolved, That we recommend the election and employment of Rev. Chester Covell, as secretary to the conference, at the minimum salary of $400.00 (four hundred dollars), to be augmented by as much more as the work and subscriptions may warrant.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the work of the National Unitarian Temperance Society and the National Bureau of Unity Clubs, and that we earnestly urge the co-operation of our parishes with the same.

All of which were adopted and the committee discharged.

"The Aim of Sunday-school Work" was presented by Mrs. E. T. Leonard, in her usual clear and interesting manner. J. R. Effinger opened discussion on "The Support of the Local Church," which called out from others some practical suggestions of value to us Unitarians. Let there be method—wise, manly, womanly, and let every youngest member of the parish feel some responsibility for carrying it out. The evening sermon by J. L. Jones on "Religion from the Near End," was followed by a collection, which showed an immediate generous application of the fine thought of the earnest discourse. Delegates and friends were present from Chicago, Bloomington, Quincy, Princeton, Geneseo, Galesburg, Hinsdale, Kewanee, Sheffield, Mineral, and also from Iowa and Nebraska. The Conference was eminently earnest, practical and inspiring. The side-talks, the hearty greetings, the strolls, the longest way around to the meeting-house, the music of the birds, the lovely stretches of green fields and woods which invited the eye in every direction, and the night under the wonderful stars made the occasion precious.

Saturday, brought the seventieth birthday of our beloved friend and host, Chester Covell. A telegram had called Jones home in the night, and the morning train bore away Gallett and others, after the tender and beautiful service of song and prayer led by Blake, and a paper on the "Significance of the Pulpit," by M. J. Miller, of Geneseo, with touching allusion to his long time neighbor and brother of the Buda pulpit.

Those of us who were left behind found ourselves on holy ground. The memories and associations of more than half a century gathered like an aureole around the gray head of brother Covell. Loving words were spoken in just recognition of the sincere, steady, manly life of the good Buda pastor. Not a man of us in Illinois who had not been the stronger for knowing that he stood there year in and year out, immovable in his loyalty to truth and righteousness. We knew that whatever troubled the waters of our denominational life, we should always find him standing firm for peace and freedom and the broadest thing.

Our company was swollen by the spiritual presence of many who were absent in the body. Letters came from various points in Illinois, from California, Arizona, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, Iowa, Michigan, New York, New Jersey and Utah. These letters came out of loving, grateful hearts, throbbing warm with interest in the man and his work; one from Mary T. H. Willard—mother of Frances Willard—now eighty-two, in her home at Evanston. Across sixty-five years she recalls Chester's father and mother who lived neighbors to her father and mother. She was Chester's school teacher for three terms. She says, "you never gave me any trouble that I can recall. I think there was no insubordination in your nature against rightly constituted authority." Not having seen him for many years she quotes the word of a friend who had met him, "you seemed like a man who had met the world and mastered it."

Samuel Fowler, an old boyhood mate, from the home ground in New York state, forty years parted from him, writes an ardent love-letter. He puts Chester next his wife in his affections, "the one I could always hitch to." The children of the Buda parish, now widely scattered, write back in grateful remembrance of the church and what it means to-day in their individual lives.

Friends of thirty years ago in Illinois, when the Buda pastor was locating land in Bureau county, when he was farmer, school-teacher, school director, county superintendent, inspirer and promoter of public improvement and of every good thing in his neighborhood,—these friends were present—some in person, some by letter, in prose or in verse celebrating the birthday. Mr. C. P. Mason, one of the church family, gave an interesting account of the coming of the minister into that locality thirty-five years ago on a land-looking expedition, and of his first preaching in the log school-house, near the site of the present village. Mr. Peter Longenecker, who heard the first sermon, was present and spoke with deep feeling.

There was a poem by Mr. J. D. Rowley, and address by Dr. John Richards of the parish. There were addresses by J. V. Blake and J. R. Effinger, of Chicago; C. E. Switzer, of Galesburg; C. K. Ladd, of Kewanee, and S. L. Pervier, of Sheffield. Thirty-one letters and one poem written for the occasion were read by Mrs. Laura C. Ford.

Following these was a letter from Mrs. H. H. Covell, the pastor's wife. It was the word of a true and deeply religious woman and worthy the occasion. I give it entire.

DEAR FRIENDS:—This anniversary should not be one-sided in its words of recognition and appreciation. In our circular of invitation two land-marks are made of the years—70 and 32. Seventy years have come to your pastor as they come to other men; thirty-two are embraced in the relation of pastor and people. It is an occasion in which two parties equally share. There could be no words of cheer for the pulpit to-day had there been no responsive pew. This thought with others presses upon me, till I cannot forbear giving them utterance.

More than half of my life I have lived with you,—and you have been to me my family. Your children have been my children. The sentiment of tender, true friendship between us has reached a maturity that can be trusted. I am sure of it. I am settled upon it. It is so much a part of my life—I go on in its abiding presence as I do in the blessing of the sunshine, apparently unconscious. The tenderness that comes with reminiscence broods over us to-day, and for once in my life I could easily confess my love for the living and my grief for the dead. But the hopes and needs of the future are too vivid to allow a monopoly of sentiment.

This should be a season of renewal in all spiritual things—a quickening of our love for the faith we profess, and our sense of the sacredness of its stewardship; a re-baptizing into the spirit of high resolve, else its real aim is lost.

I know your pastor did not invite you here to listen only to words of personal appreciation and congratulation, however dear. He needed no reassurance of your tender regard. All along this has come to him in full measure, and he responded. And here may be the mutual weakness to overcome.

In our long family relation we have come near crystallizing around the idea of friendship.

A pastorate of years is a beautiful picture, but its termination involves serious problems. The relation is not easily dissolved. An adjustment to the new circumstances is unnatural.

There has been something like a wrench.

We have gone on in one way till we scarcely know how to make a turn. Only as we place the value of an idea higher than an individual or a personality can we pass the crisis safely. The friend is the bible. He represents our cause till, at last, he and our cause are synonymous—we have no cause separate from him.

Loyalty in friendship is precious beyond expression, but the fruit of this relation between pastor and people should be a loyalty other than that of friendship.

This church was organized and has grown in answer to another want. Your fathers planted their homes on these prairies. Next to them, as natural as growth in body or mind, came the desire for church home. Had there been no individuality in the character of this desire, aside from the idea of worship in its general sense, there might have been no demand for this special church. Ideas shape our choice in matters of worship and religion, as in all other departments of life. It was the persistence of ideas that laid this foundation—that would not allow your fathers to accept other foundations. This is your inheritance—the imperativeness of ideas in religion. It is a plea for this inheritance that I make to-day,—that you lose not the sight of it in the more readily-grown love of friend for friend.

Your children are to be considered even as your fathers cared for you.

In your hands their simple prairie beginnings have grown to the beautiful country homes round about our little village—its pride and strength. This spiritual home of their planting—is it less important? And whose is it? And to whom shall it descend—and how? You who have so vigilantly guarded from degeneracy all material things, need but quickening, that resolve and effort keep their accustomed hold, and more—grow with the growth of years. To go back, or to stand still, is a crime against two parties—yourself and your children. With you there is no question as to the church home most necessary for you. With them it is not so clear. They readily see the difference between ourselves and our neighbors—the reason is not so apparent.

Dear fellow-workers, we should be able to give a reason for the faith that is within us—aye, more—teach by our example that we have a faith.

I have in my mind one instance in our spiritual commonwealth which always presses itself upon me as a command: "Go thou and do likewise."

The pastor gathers the children and young people of his flock for regular instruction in the meetings of their religion. The name he takes for his work is an old one, but in the Divine light of discovery, which is like the coming of the Lord in these later days, this pastor's prophetic instinct finds the perennial fitness in the name; and so his class is called a Confirmation Class. As I said, this is some of the work we ought to do for the young who belong to us. It should not be dogmatizing, but in the spirit of freedom, righteousness, and love we should seek to establish them in a faith beyond the reach of cavilling;—a religion so natural it could not be resisted;—so moral and saving its Divine beneficence could not be questioned.

Friends, this is not a chimera. The faith and the religion are ours theoretically. They only wait illustration and unfolding in our lives—our lives and words.

Irreverence and indifference are most difficult to eradicate when once rooted. A religion so consistent as ours, so full of all blessed benignity, can never be responsible for these dreaded evils.

If they come we sow the seed with our own hands, from a crop grown in our own hearts, for which we alone are responsible. Irreverence and indifference! To guard from these is our problem. We have attained our religious freedom; we have grown almost callous in its enjoyment, and what legacy are we thinking about for this next generation? The question haunts me. We have spoiled all relish for a more conservative way. Without consistent zeal and earnestness we practically deny all that we claim. The quick instinct of youth readily discerns if we be alive or flagging in our interest.

The work of the past will not answer for the present. The house the fathers built will not stand intact, and sufficient for two or three generations. Growth means a constant replenishing.

We must pass along the word of life committed to our keeping.

This is the watchman's cry, forever sounding in my ear; and this day I said I will lay bare my burden to my friends.

Yours in all sincerity,

H. H. COVELL.

Mr. Covell rose and, with tears in his voice, disclaimed much that had been said of him. "Still," said he, "the substance of what you say of us ought to be true—no more of me than of any man. Men ought to be noble. The capacities of their nature point to high excellence as their aim and destiny. . . . A poor, lean, unproductive, uneventful life seems out of place on this planet. . . . Opportunities are such and of such infinite variety that every kind and quality of capacity is sure to find ample ministry. Boundless love and infinite wisdom could not devise better conditions for human growth. Men ought to be true, and good, and loving and forgiving. They ought to be helpers of each other. They ought to be sincere, upright, honest, tender. They ought to be noble. Ought, do I say? This grand word, born in the beginning, traveling down through the centuries, moving the heart and touching the lip of every child of man, is yet inadequate to give full expression in the case. Nobility is not only the duty, but the right and natural inheritance of men.

"Were men as open-eyed religiously, as jealous of their rights ethically and religiously as in finance, society, government, then would there be such vigorous declaration and maintenance of their rights to manhood as this world has not yet witnessed. And we are coming to this. The world waits for it. The signs are here already. Behold them in the ever-increasing study of the long-neglected book of God—Nature. Behold them in the growing reverence paid to the laws of God as they apply to our whole complex being. Behold them in those humane institutions all over the land that give bread to the hungry, raiment to the naked, eyes to the blind, ears to the deaf, feet to the lame, health to the sick, reason to the demented. Behold them in those movements whose object is enlightenment, sobriety, social purity, religious freedom, culture for the masses of the people. Behold them in this gathering, in the transactions of this hour.

"You came not here from your homes and labors and comforts at the expense of time and money simply to see me turn the corner of three score years and ten. Not for me and mine are these glad looking faces here to-day; but for a cause, and that cause is no more, no less than fullness of life in man, the securing of the rights that fall to our humanity by the gift of God, the right to nobleness, to godliness, to virtue, to high excellence, the right to be and become all that the forces of our nature promise. . . . In this third of a century nearly which I have spent with you I have witnessed great changes in society, in the theories and methods of doing in all branches of life and in the religious thought of the world. And while I, living in the midst of this illuminating time, have found occasion to change my attitude toward many things and theories, yet in reference to the great purpose of life, the opening of the mind and heart to the divinity within and without us, I am the same as when first I opened my mouth among you in 1853, the same yesterday, to-day and forever. Near a half century ago I chose the church as the sphere of my action, and with all its faults and crimes and superstitions I would do it again if I had it to do over. The true church has its basis in the indestructible needs of the human soul, and its true mission is to reveal truth and duty and beauty and light and love to the world.

"And now as I look back on these years, I cannot be blind to some victories that have been won, some good that has been done, some souls that have been helped. I confess to a satisfaction in the recollection of every good accomplishment. I will not disguise the joy I have felt in signs of growing intelligence, of fuller appreciation of the best thought, of aspirations for the better life; and in all evidence of self-denial for the good of others. Nor will I disguise the pain I have felt in witnessing any downward step that may have been taken, any departures from principle, any indifference to the sublime questions of life and religion. Like a father, I have taken the honor of the family in my keeping. When joy came to it, it came to me. When sorrow came to it, it came to me. And while my wife and I have taken the weight and measure of every member of our household over and over again, while we have been keenly alive to faults and shortcomings, it gives me pleasure to say that little of disgrace has ever come, scarcely a note of discord during this third of a century. A private family with no more jars, no more friction, with as much brotherly feeling and kind regard as has been manifest in our church relation might justly challenge our admiration. That we have stood for what we ought and been truly loyal to our light; that we have finished the work given us to do, cannot be said—we have rather just begun it. The path may seem long behind us and the end near before us; but as we travel on new and more inviting fields come to view. We have but touched the uses, the beauties, the duties of the near end of some things; but that touch is the prophecy and promise of greater things. Oh, ye children of light, ye lovers of truth, be loyal to the light already given and more shall come to you. Obey the truth revealed and her treasures shall open upon you.

"Dear parishioners, we have traveled together a long way, and if there shall be a little less of personal nearness in coming years we know it is for the best. Spirit nearness remains. Let us behave ourselves in the future as in the past, in such manner as to retain the confidence, the friendship and affection of each other."

Thus spoke the pastor in resigning his official relation to the church of Buda. His personal relation will never cease, and, in a sense, he will always be pastor of the Buda church.

Mr. Covell was elected secretary of the state conference in place of J. R. Effinger resigned.

Mr. Jones said, in nominating Mr. Covell, that the business committee had selected him as the youngest man in the conference. His freshness of thought and ripe experience will make his services invaluable to our missionary interests.

According to programme the closing words had been spoken and the birthday jubilee was at end. But wait a bit. A certain important side of the church life had not been heard from. Its time was coming. At noon on Sunday the unsuspecting pastor took his place at the head of his Sunday-school. After brief preliminary exercises he was invited to face such music as he had never faced before. First a teacher on behalf of the teachers, and then class after class approached him with baskets of flowers and loving words until they had him banked in with blossoms and fairly choked with emotion.

At last he found his voice and in trembling tones expressed his surprise and delight at these manifestations of affection. The venerable pastor, surrounded by the fresh young faces of his children, the smiles, the tears, the flowers, the broken words of kindness and love—it was a picture long to be remembered by those who witnessed it and a delightful illustration of “the advantages of a long pastorate.” J. R. E.

Report of the Secretary of the Illinois Unitarian Conference.

BUDA, ILLINOIS, June 18, 1887.

Since October 1, 1886, with two-fifths of his time at your service, your secretary has traveled 6462 miles, and visited nine places—five established churches, three mission stations, one wholly new field—and has planted one new self-supporting church. The churches visited were found to be in a flourishing condition.

All Souls church, Chicago, is a bee-hive, making honey in all weather, and storing it up in lives of young and old.

Geneseo settled down to a steady business of character-building some seventeen years ago, and the same two master-builders who took charge there are still on deck, doing loving and faithful service; and the current year began with unusual signs of prosperity.

Geneva, where Conant began to preach forty-six years ago, is renewing its youth under its young minister, whose ordination took place in this church three years ago. It is raising more money and doing more work than for many a day.

Quincy, another of our elder parishes, was, when visited, without a minister, but with marked indications of a vigorous laity intent upon putting themselves into good working order when the new minister should put in an appearance. Charles F. Bradley, of Sandwich, Mass., has been called to the pulpit.

Moline, next to the youngest church in this conference, gave a hearty greeting to your secretary, and besides gave him new hope for the interest committed to hands so willing and hearts so warm as theirs. The socials, the kitchen-garden, the Sunday-school were being carefully cared for.

Hinsdale was visited on the 27th day of March. At the close of the service it was resolved to continue weekly meetings. In fourteen days' time the organization of Unity church was effected, and there has been no break in the succession of services from the beginning. A Sunday-school has been organized, the teachers have organized themselves into a study-class which meets once a week, and there is every indication of a live, vigorous church. The question of a permanent minister is being seriously considered.

The mission stations at Mattoon, Tremont and Warren have been visited regularly each month excepting Tremont, where services—suspended through the winter months—have been resumed with much interest. They have just made an arrangement with Rev. H. A. Westall, of Bloomington, by which they are to have preaching every Sunday afternoon. Mattoon is showing increased interest and confidence. Mr. H. D. Stevens, of Indianapolis, who is just finding his way into our ministry, has supplied them acceptably several times, and the hope has been expressed that some arrangement may be made, by which to secure him as their minister.

Warren has sustained monthly services uninterruptedly through the year. At each visit I am impressed by the great interest the people have in our message. The movement is vigorous and enthusiastic, and promises to endure. Nora, near by, gives an audience two hundred strong, when we drive down after preaching twice in Warren and hold a third service. The adjacent country, I am told, has many liberal-minded farmers.

Galena, twenty miles away, is the most important point of all. I made a rather hurried visit to the place in mid-winter, found a few zealous friends and left them with a conditional understanding that a public meeting should be held the next month, but the arrangements were not completed. If we had the means to plant a man at Warren, I should expect him soon to be preaching regularly at Galena on the west, and at Nora on the south—and if he were just the man for the place, he would gather considerable support from the country around.

I have been assisted from time to time by Messrs. Gannett, Galvin, Gillette, Stevens, Miss Graves and Mrs. Effinger. With their help I have been able to keep up the supply at our three missionary out-posts, spend five Sundays with our established churches, and a number of Sundays in inaugurating a new society at Hinsdale.

The question of ways and means has hampered us as usual, or rather more than usual. At the annual session of this conference in October last, it was unanimously resolved that we extend cordial thanks to the American Unitarian Association for its past support, and that we solicit its co-operation in the future as in the past. This request was promptly forwarded to Boston. In January we learned that our request was denied. The failure of the A. U. A. to respond as heretofore to our call for help struck off at once half of the resources of the conference. The field work has paid expenses and something over, but the remuneration for service rendered has been small.

A committee was appointed at the October Conference to co-operate with your Secretary in making arrangements for a series of ten Saturday evening lectures and ten Sunday morning sermons, to be given during the winter at the university town of Champaign. In this matter the help of the American Unitarian Association was solicited, but not secured.

Your secretary had correspondence on the subject with Prof. S. A. Forbes, of the State University, who is a member of our committee, and the chairman, Mr. Jones, corresponded with Secretary Reynolds, but without satisfactory results. And yet another resolution I desire to recall to your minds. I allude to the appointment of a committee of three—Mrs. J. Ll. Jones, Rev. T. H. Eddowes, and Rev. Chester Covell—to prepare a brief history of the first fifty years of Unitarianism in Illinois, and to publish it in pamphlet form in connection with the semi-centennial address of Mr. Learned, delivered before the October Conference. I do not know what progress this committee has made in its work, but I do know that its report is looked forward to with much interest as a permanent contribution to the history of the Unitarian movement in the west. To the chairman of that committee—Mrs. Jones—we are already indebted for valuable historical papers on the Western Conference, and our debt will be still larger when the Unitarian History of Illinois is laid before us.

The engagement of my whole time by the Western Conference puts upon me the necessity of surrendering into your hands the responsible trust which you imposed upon me as your secretary.

From the central office I shall still stand ready to further your plans of work as far as in me lies consistently with other duties; and I shall ever feel grateful for the kindness, the generous confidence and interest which I have received both from the ministry and laity of this conference.

JOHN R. EFFINGER, Secretary.

Treasurer's Report of the Illinois Unitarian Conference from October 1, 1886, to June 15, 1887.

RECEIPTS.

Chicago—Third Church.....	$60 00
“ All Souls Church.....	30 00
Geneseo.....	20 00
Princeton.....	15 00
Tremont.....	10 00
Quincy.....	20 21
Individuals.....	39 00
From the field above expenses.....	85 69

$279 90

EXPENDITURES.

Printing reports and programmes.....	$ 28 00
Paid to Mr. Effinger.....	251 90

$279 90

MARIETTA A. DOW, Treasurer.

Satisfied.

[Owing to some important errors in the proof-reading of this poem in our last issue we are glad to reprint it, knowing that it will bear re-reading.—EDITOR.]

When hope grows dim and shadows fall,
And light seems all denied,
I turn unto the One in All,
Rest, and am satisfied.

On rugged ways and storm-swept heights,
My spirit may abide,
But sees, through all, love's beacon lights—
Trusts, and is satisfied.

And through the clearing mists I hear,
Far up the mountain side,
The call in accents sweet and clear,
Come, and be satisfied.

Above the cloud-capped mountain top,
God's love-lights still abide;
Before that shrine my spirit stops,
Glad, happy, satisfied.

The shadows far beneath me lie,
The storm-clouds roll aside,
And in the deep, sunlighted sky,
My soul is satisfied.

When angel hands shall lift the veil,
Disclosing life's full tide,
Its glory then the stars shall pale;
Wait, and be satisfied.

LOUISE M. DUNNING.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The New Birth; with a chapter on Mind Cure. By L. P. Mercer.
Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 50 cents.

This little volume, with its clear print of 127 pages, is a very pretty specimen of book-making. The title, moreover, is suggestive. And when we say it is written from the Swedenborgian standpoint, and well written too, we have already recommended it to the attention of a class of earnest and cultivated readers.

Perhaps not a very large class. For "The New Church" of Swedenborg, like the church of the Unitarians, has a limited constituency. The two churches are small, however, for different reasons. Let us by a convenient contrast compare them. Let us compare this book, which may be said to condense within it the "Four Leading Doctrines" of Swedenborg, with Gannett's "Year of Miracle," or West's "Uplifts of Heart and Will," which happen to be before me, and are very significant expressions of the Unitarian faith. For the life and position of any church may be discerned in the literature of that church.

The Unitarian church is small because in its treatment of religious themes and in its utterances of worship, it takes too little for granted, and always did, of all the great assemblage of beliefs once held or handed down from the past. It has dropped by the way and lost forever out of its liturgy and its homily, page after page of biblical and theological expressions, which in a former age seemed the only medium of the truth of God. To many therefore the language of Unitarianism seems bare and negative. That fidelity to truth which leads the Unitarian to employ those words and those only, which express his meaning rationally and clearly, forces from the traditionalist and sentimentalist the cry, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."

But the Swedenborgian (and the remark pertains to the author before us) takes too much for granted. The style of this book seems every way smooth and dignified and excellent. But whoever without preparatory and habitual training essays to read it, will find himself dealing with a dialect strange and elusive. No novice can use or understand it. It is a language apart from the ordinary life of man. It is no longer heard on the streets, in court of justice, in congress, or in the schools. It is little heard in homes, except at morning devotions. It rises into mysticism—quietism. Some have adopted it and found great truth and comfort in it. And many of its positions seem so rational and just that one is disposed to give great credit and acceptance to the system. But on the whole, one needs to have been brought up in it or to have been forced to study it as a refuge from a bad theology in order to do it justice. It is religion standing on its head.

"The New Birth," as treated by "The New Church," is freely described by the old phraseology, but with new meanings. Science and philosophy come to illustrate and expand the words of ancient scripture. Genesis is true. "This story of man's fall is the only thing that can enable us to see our true position, and prepare us for regeneration by the grace of God." (p. 19). "Without the written word and the disposition to accept it, learn it, and obey it as God's word, this work could never be accomplished." (p. 22).

"The Holy Spirit is the proceeding spirit and life of Jesus as the human nature, and consequent form, which the divine essence assumed and glorified on the earth. . . . The humanity of Christ could not become the medium of the power of the Highest, except as it was wholly conformed to the divine essence as its soul. . . . The Holy Spirit is not an impersonal influence which pervades humanity, nor a blind unconscious force that is one with nature. It is the proceeding life, and thus the personal sphere of Jesus Christ." (pp. 38-9).

Of worship, Mr. Mercer says: "It is the very essence of all religion." "In all such acts [acknowledgement, prayer, confession, adoration, &c.,] it is necessary that we should realize the Lord Jesus Christ as a personal, visible, approachable God, with whom we may be united in love and faith." (p. 58). "And he is to be addressed in the second person singular." "This fiction of a prayerful and devout spirit, without prayerful and devout acts . . . tends really to divorce religion from life." (p. 61). "Practical righteousness without acts of prayer, without acts of self-examination and repentance, without interior study and thought, is a thing impossible." "Love cannot exist without its indicating signs, the externals of worship." (p. 65).

Precisely wherein we agree with such statements, or disagree, it is not easy for us to say, until we define alike the data of religious thought, or stand upon the same plane of vision. Sometimes the verbal differences which seem most radical and irreconcilable grow rather out of the accidents of our life, out of circumstances, association, education, rather than from any real divergence upon the great verities of sentiment and life.

The Appeal to Life. By Theodore T. Munger, author of "The Freedom of Faith." Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, 16mo., pp. 339. $1.50.

As one familiar with Mr. Munger's earlier writings would infer, upon reading its title, the object of this book is to set forth the truths it treats in the light of common human experience. The inductive method, which is a favorite method with this preacher, is here used in the presentation of ten discourses, to which are added four bearing upon the consistency of the adoption of the principle of evolution by Christians. The matter is candid, thoughtful (much of it) and suggestive.

E. R. C.

A Day in Ancient Rome, Being a revision of Lohr's "Aus Dem Alten Rom." By Edgar S. Shumway, Professor of the Latin Language and Literature, Rutgers College. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co.

The title page informs us that this is the fortieth thousand of this little book of 96 pages; and no wonder, for it is a very engaging little work. It leads us from place to place in a pleasing walk about Rome as it was in the ancient Latin days. It is full of fine illustrations comprising plans of various portions of the city, well executed portraits of the old writers and emperors, fine prints of the arches and other ruins as they now are in modern Rome, and large and good pictures of portions of the ancient city restored. Some legends and stories are incorporated in the text. It is a beautiful little book.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, - - - J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, - - - H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, - - - DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Channing Club.—This organization last week atoned for a somewhat torpid year by the brilliant reception it gave to Robert Collyer, who is first, last and always in the hearts of the Unitarians of Chicago. Something over two hundred ladies and gentlemen sat down to supper at the Tremont House. In due time Mayor Roche called the company to their higher enjoyment. After a feeling speech, in which he alluded to the impulse he received, when a young man, listening to Robert Collyer's preaching twenty years ago, he withdrew to attend to other duties and called D. L. Shorey to the chair, after which Robert Collyer, with the old time combination of pith and pathos, wit and wisdom, told the story of his Chicago ministry, in a way that warmed the company to heartiest fellowship and loving enthusiasm. So much as our space permits we will print in another issue. Speeches followed from various persons present, and the meeting closed by the transaction of necessary business and the election of officers for the next year as follows: Executive Committee, Hon. John A. Roche, D. L. Shorey, P. P. Heywood, Geo. W. Dexter and E. H. Griggs; Secretary and Treasurer, L. K. Waldron.

Chicago.—At its recent picnic, the members of the Church of the Messiah surprised Pastor Utter with a vacation draft of two hundred and fifty dollars. Mr. Utter has been burglarized two or three times since his arrival in Chicago, so the draft was inclosed in a neat bank called "Security." The Third church picnicked in Jackson park last week and closed their church for the season last Sunday. The Church of the Messiah will be closed after next Sunday. All Souls church celebrated its annual floral service last Sunday, at which four children were christened. A pleasant episode was the reception of a floral offering from the Sunday-school of the Third Unitarian church. Next Sunday they will hold a patriotic service, Mr. Blake and Rabbi Hirsch joining with the pastor. The church will be kept open throughout the vacation, Mr. Jones occupying the pulpit July 10th and 17th, after which the pulpit will be supplied by lay members.

—A pleasant reception was tendered to Robert Collyer by the ladies of Unity Church, last Monday evening. Many representatives of the four Unitarian churches, and from the great liberal church outside of the Unitarian churches, were present to greet the man whom Chicago ever delights to honor.

Boston Notes.—Rev. James F. Clarke has gone with his family to his seaside home, and already feels a benefit from his change of residence. —The National Bureau of Unity Clubs has aranged for a meeting of delegates July 27th, during the "Grove Meeting," at Weirs, N. H. Also for a similar meeting at Lakeview, Framington, Mass., for Aug. 17. A circular with full information, together with a copy of the constitution and a list of department committees, will soon be sent to every Unitarian minister, and to the head of every Unity Club.

—The officers of the Meadville School begin to appear at our A. U. A. building. They seem satisfied with the work of last year, and hopeful of the future work to be expected from them.

—An interesting new departure has been taken in the Orthodox church in Berkeley street. Depending upon the income from a charitable fund, they have determined to open their doors for a "People's Church," with a Sunday work of good sermon, music of a high class, courteous ushers and comfortable sittings, and on week-days popular amusements, children's festivals, semi-literary and semi-scientific conferences, and various industrial departments.

Warren, Ill.—The new State Secretary, Rev. Chester Covell, preaches at this place on Sunday, July 3.

Meadville Theological School.—The anniversary exercises of the Meadville Theological school took place on Thursday, June 16. On Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday there were examinations in the different studies pursued through the year. The annual sermon before the school was given by Rev. J. G. Townsend, of Jamestown, N. Y., in the Unitarian church, on Wednesday evening. Mr. Hosmer, of Cleveland, took part in the service. The pulpit and front of the church were tastefully decorated with masses of wild flowers and ferns. The sermon, from the text "Man shall not live by bread alone," emphasized the spiritual side of life, and presented religion as inherent in man and as natural as smiles and tears. It was charming in its "sweet reasonableness" and its simplicity. Doctor Townsend speaks without notes, has a poetic rather than argumentative style, appeals to the deeper sentiments of the soul as one who believes in them, and thus awakens responses. Following the service in the church a pleasant reception was held in the adjacent parlors, the special feature of which was the surprise which has been prepared for Professor Cary. And happily it was a complete surprise. This commencement rounded the full quarter-century of this loved and honored teacher's connection with the school as professor of New Testament literature. The modest scholar suddenly found himself the object of all eyes, while Mr. Mott, of the graduating class, in the name of the students who have come under Professor Cary's instructions through these twenty-five years, voiced the grateful remembrance of them all in presenting to him an elegant mantel clock. Brief addresses followed from several graduates present and from students now in the school. Among the former were Mr. Chaffin, of North Easton, Mass., Mr. Hamlet, of Brookfield, Mass., Miss Murdock, of Humboldt, Ia., and Professor Barber, now connected with the school. Secretary Reynolds spoke and Doctor Livermore added his pleasant and appreciative word. Letters were read from various graduates and other friends. An event worthy to be celebrated, all felt—this quarter-century of devoted and noble service; and the only regret was that all the students who have gone out from his instruction could not have gathered around their teacher on this festival occasion.

On Thursday morning the graduating exercises took place in the church. Mr. Chaffin offered prayer. There were three original hymns upon the programme, by Mrs. Emma E. Marean, Mr. Mott, of the graduating class, and Mrs. E. L. Douthit. We give them for the interest of those who will not see the programme:

Eternal Life, whose love divine

Enfolds us each and all,

We know no other truth than thine,

We heed no other call.

Oh, may we serve in thought and deed

Thy kingdom yet to be,

Till Truth and Righteousness and Love
Shall lead all souls to thee.

Hold our hands! thou mighty Father,
Keep our faces turned to thee;
In the work we take upon us
Friend and guide and helper be.

Hold our hands! all-holy Spirit,
Let us in thy strength be strong,
Healing all the human blindness
That has done thy goodness wrong.

Hold our hands! O, God Eternal,
May we as thy prophets be,
In thy perfect wisdom trusting,
Stand for all we know of thee.

Go ye forth, the Lord is calling
Laborers unto his fields,
Where the harvest white is falling
'Neath the blade the spirit wields.

Is your heart within you sinking
At the weary work undone?
Does your soul despair of drinking
Of the glory Christ has won?

What though high the sun is burning?
What though hard the cross ye bear!
Press ye onward! never turning
Till the pearly gates appear.

The essays, all marked by a practical aim and earnest spirit, were as follows: Enthusiasm in the Ministry, by Mr. Henry H. Brown, of Saratoga, N. Y.; The Church and the Children, by Mr. Albert Wilgus, of Dayton, Ind.; English Unitarian Leaders, by Mr. Frederick B. Mott, of Leicester, England. Besides the above, Miss Helen G. Putnam, of Dedham, Mass., who has been a special student in the school the past year, goes out into the field. All four enter at once upon active work. Miss Putnam will join our little band of women preachers in the northwest; Mr. Mott is to preach the next few Sundays in some vacant pulpits in Massachusetts; Mr. Brown will spend the summer in missionary work in Maine, where he had experience last summer and is wanted again; and Mr. Wilgus will begin a movement in Lafayette, Ind. The good wishes of professors and fellow-students go with them, and the good wishes of those already at work will greet them. At the giving of the diplomas to the graduating class the degree of B. D. was conferred upon Miss Marion Murdock, of the class of '85, upon having passed the requisite examinations. There have been thirty-one students, regular and special, in the school the past year. H.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

ALL SOULS CHURCH.—A national service will be held in this church next Sunday morning beginning at 11 a. m. Rev. J. Vila-Blake and Rabbi Hirsch, and their respective congregations, are expected to join with the church and pastor. Sunday-school at 9:30 a. m. A new course of lessons on the life and times of Channing is just beginning, and all interested in the subject are invited to enter the school. Teachers' meeting, Friday evening at 7:30.

Something New

and most important. Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, can furnish you work that you can do at great profit and live at home, wherever you are located. Either sex; all ages. Asa P. Rand, Westboro, Mass., writes us that he made $300 profit in a single day. Every worker can make from $5 to $25 and upwards per day. All is new. Capital not required; you are started free. Full particulars free. Send your address at once.

When on your vacation, if you think of spending a week, or even less time in Boston, and want comfortable quarters, convenient location and moderate charges, no house in the city is so well prepared to give you all these as the United States Hotel; located within five minutes walk of all the Western and Southern depots and steamboat landings, as well as the great retail establishments and places of amusement and interest.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JULY 9, 1887.

[NUMBER 19.]

EDITORIAL.

WE do not wish men to act as if nothing were known and nothing valuable had been done; but that would be less an evil than to suppose all is known and nothing to be done.

THE fear of death is really for many people nothing more than the fear of losing their bodies; as for their souls they have lost those long since. They cannot bear to think of a cessation of their physical senses and pleasures, though their minds and affections have scarcely ever been objects of regard and cultivation.

WHOEVER pronounces the word "Evolution" as the rational symbol of his religious philosophy or faith, thereby links himself with all the past. The believer in "development" has in his hand no instrument wherewith to sever himself from any historic good. He stands on the shoulders of all time. All effects are thus bound to all causes.

WE often hear of the number of Unitarians to be found in orthodox churches;—not those who have been made such by orthodox preaching, but more particularly those who have been fitted for those fellowships by Unitarian preaching. Neither "ethical" nor "Christian" Unitarians appear to be covetous of the chief honor in this business. Each seems to be quite willing to give the credit to the other party. And yet it would look reasonable that the transition would be easiest between those who stood nearest together, would it not? Take Phillips Brooks's church in Boston, for example, which is said to have many Unitarians in it. Are they more likely to have gone there from Theodore Parker's old society, or Mr. Savage's, or from the First church and King's chapel? It would be easy to make a similar comparison in other cities.

ST. LOUIS has been trying the Sunday closing law. The strain is likely to be a severe one. It is hoped by the license and beer-garden advocates that the "test-cases" now before the courts will result in a decision of the unconstitutionality of the law, which was originally passed in 1857. The press gives little encouragement of enforcement. The German papers treat it as a part of the puritanism of the churches, and speak bitterly of the selfishness of the clergy of the "Evangelical Alliance," who manage to shut up all places of resort for the poor and over-worked, then close their churches for the heated term and go off on fine salaries to enjoy vacation pleasures, by sea and land. Mr. Snyder preached on the folly of making Sabbatarianism the ground for this form of legislation, with an appeal to the public to broaden and multiply all rational means of Sunday amusement and recreation. If a great city leaves its crowded masses to be furnished with entertainment on Sundays by private enterprise, it is very likely to take that form out of which the most money can be made.

ST. JEROME, that great scholar and gossip among the Latin fathers, was much given to dreams and visions. He liked the smooth style of Cicero. He disliked the uncouth idiom of the Scriptures. Once, however, in the spirit, he was summoned before the Judge of the Universe. "Who art thou?" asked a voice. "I am a Christian," replied Jerome. "Thou liest," thundered back the great Judge, "thou art naught but a Ciceronian." Thereupon he betook himself to the Sacred Writings "Thou knowest, O Lord," he prayed, "that whenever I have and study secular writings I deny Thee."

But the change did not temper his spirit. He became the most reckless partisan of the western church.

The Thoughtful Unchurched.

Nearly thirty years ago, at a religious anniversary in the city of New York, Rev. Doctor Osgood, still loyal to the Unitarian name, prophesied the church to be. In his vision he saw a building of God. Into it a great company entered: the High Church of Pope Hildebrand, the Low Church of John Calvin, and the No-Church of Ralph Waldo Emerson—all united in the Broad Church of a Divine Humanity.

Emerson was his typical man of the unchurched. "But this No-Church (he said) is to be respected." There are elements outside of all forms of Christianity indispensable to a rounded faith; and the church of the future must "take the 'No-Church' into its keeping."

Emerson then was the favorite type of a man unchurched—denying himself the luxury of a religion. But now we see there are many types. Besides transcendentalists there are scientists, statesmen, reformers, authors, ethical culturists—how many names under these heads rise to our thought! What university does not number such among its ablest professors? What community can not name such among its influential citizens?

Doubtless the first question of the Unitarian, or of any church, concerns the life lived within itself. Religion above all things begins at home, and with the individual. The first law of an effective altruism is self-fidelity. Has the personal character been disciplined and renewed?

"This above all,—to thy own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

Even the second duty of the church, in importance, is perhaps that which it owes to the thoughtless unchurched: to the weak and ignorant and bad. But because we have felt that, as a church, we had some special fitness for appealing to the intelligent and strong, the question is inevitably asked which involves our relations to the thoughtful unchurched.

"All, as many as we are (said Renan to an English audience), we are sons of martyrs." Yes; and these men standing outside of religious fellowships are the sons of martyrs! Get at their history and you shall find that somewhere back a heart was pierced for an honest doubt; a life was hurt or blasted for opinion's sake. Not a few stand there as martyrs in their own right, wearing names of pitiless odium placed there by the sects. The church of God ordained to teach religion and virtue has cumbered itself with cabalism and tradition; it has made thinking with honesty a peril, and existence a burden; until good men and true welcomed excommunication as a relief and joy.

But why trouble ourselves about these? Because we can not help it. Because we are a Unitarian church. Because so recently we ourselves were cast out standing for freedom and for reason, and still remember the epithets that were lavished upon us. Nor has the Christian world even yet forgotten or forgiven us for our religious crimes. So we feel ourselves near these exiles of faith, better fitted than others to enter into their thought, to do them justice. Our mission is to unbelievers. Moreover we think we see how religion stabs itself, dooms itself to eternal incompleteness, while it seeks to organize without their presence or their aid. We ought to be able to make them feel that they need us, but we need them.

"There are many of our best men (said Max Müller in Westminster Abbey), men of the greatest power and influence in literature, science, art, politics, aye, even in the church itself, who are no longer Christian in the old sense of the word. Some imagine that they have ceased to be Christians altogether, because they feel that they can not believe as much as others profess to believe. We can not afford to lose these men; nor shall we lose them if we learn to be satisfied with what satisfied Christ and the apostles, with what satisfied many a hard-working missionary."

Christianity has been identified with civilization, yet what do we see? A church calling itself Christian, freely offering salvation and fraternal sympathy to a negro of the plantation, or to an Indian of the reserve, yet hesitating to make a fellowship here or a hope hereafter broad enough to include men like Emerson and Darwin, or women like Harriet Martineau and George Eliot!

Can we do anything to correct this false perspective of the creeds? Or have we only some milder martyrdom kept in store for those who will not speak our phrases or think our thoughts? If any duty rests upon us in this matter more than upon others, it is to be just to men who, by the free use of reason, have been forced out of religious associations. We have much yet to learn from the representatives of non-conformity and infidelity. Mostly they have been driven into their antagonism by inadequate ideas of God, by a Christianity repulsive to intelligence, by a worship destitute of dignity and sincerity.

We have heard it said in our time that "no man is an atheist who believes in a single attribute of God." So, no man is an infidel who believes in a single virtue. Church member or not, and before that was possible, he was a child of God; and any virtue practiced is a form of enthusiasm; is a letter in the language of worship; is the germ which holds in it the potency of an elaborate ritual. We have not to create a sentiment, but to organize and develop a sentiment which already exists. It is on this ground that the Unitarian church historically stands. The first and simplest form of spiritual consciousness, the soul's native and inalienable conviction, leads up and on until life opens upon all human and cosmic and divine relations. If some cry out to you to put a roof over men's heads, reply, "But we cannot build a house from roof down; we must build from foundation up," or have but a castle in the air.

When Luther made his simple catechism for the least instructed in the Christian faith, he wished also to frame a form of worship so broad that even the heathen and Turks might join in it. And Frederick Denison Maurice, saturated with Christian feeling, would not have the co-operative societies of England carry the word "Christian" in their organization, well knowing, as he said, that "there were many reasons besides disbelieving" which made men unwilling to use it. "I have felt (he wrote) that a Working College, if it is to do anything, must be in direct hostility to the Secularists; that is to say, must assert that as its foundation principle which they are denying. But to do this effectually it must also be in direct hostility to the Religionists; that is to say, it must assert the principle that God is to be sought and honored in every pursuit, not merely in something technically called religious."

What, then, is our thought of a Broad Church? It is the most "complete expression," "the most effective organization of the moral order." It is a co-operative society of righteous endeavor. It is a school of the motives, a college of the sentiments, and a field of action. There we are to learn the relations of man to man, of man to the universe, in order to feel and live them. All are welcome. And we do not foreclose thought in that institution by pledging any learner to conclusions not reached by his own powers. We lead him on and up as far as we can, to the best and highest we know. We would approach all men, whether within or without, with self-evidencing testimony, with charity, with truthfulness, with impartiality. We would teach them to discern the deep significance of every responsible act; to invest their daily words and deeds with faithfulness; with conscience, which is "the creative principle of religion;" with a spirit which permits no isolation of human lives or callings; but with divine sympathy links least with largest, finite with infinite.

J. C. L.

Morality of Newspapers.

D. R. Goudie, of this city, has written a strong editorial in his good paper, The Best of Everything, for June 25th. After quoting from a daily newspaper an article in praise of a recent act of the Illinois legislature against selling tobacco to minors, Mr. Goudie remarks:

"The above article meets our entire approval, and we sincerely trust that the act referred to will be 'vigorously enforced.' We also want to draw the attention of our readers to the somewhat singular circumstance that while the editor was inserting his editorial 'Against Selling Tobacco to Minors,' the advertising department of his paper was putting in a two-column advertisement in favor of a new brand of five-cent cigars. In other words, while the editor was showing up the evils arising from the use of tobacco by the children, and laying the lash on the backs of 'the petty hucksters,' 'the miserable people who carry on this traffic utterly indifferent to the injury they are doing, and the vicious and criminal habits they are inculcating, so long as they gather in the nickles,' his 'wicked partner,' the business manager, is raking in—not nickles—but hundreds of dollars for doing precisely the same work as the 'petty hucksters,' only he is doing it in a wholesale manner.

We have reprinted from the same paper admirable articles denouncing the drinking habits of the people, and showing up in the most telling language the wretchedness, misery and crime that comes from indulgence in strong drink, and a few days thereafter we have seen an entire page of the paper given up to an audacious and lying advertisement of a new brand of bad whisky with a nice name. Who can measure the injury that may have been inflicted on individuals and society by that and subsequent advertisements of the same kind? The advertiser certainly did not pay hundreds of dollars for his "ad." without the belief that he was going to make many new customers. If he did make customers what follows? Drunkards, misery, wretchedness, poverty and death.

The editor sits in his sanctum and preaches temperance, or even prohibition. He thunders out his anathemas on the liquor dealer, and deploras the evils of the drink habit, while the business manager rakes in the dollars by spreading before the people the lying advertisements by which the suffering and the unwary are lured to a drunkard's doom. The editor does the work of the moralist and teacher for the subscription price of the paper, and the advertisement department does the work of the devil for the sake of the shekels. Verily it is a strange combination.

One of the most necessary reforms of this age and country is a reform in the method of conducting our newspapers. As it is now the editor uses his columns for the denunciation of all kinds of rascality, boodlesism, etc., and the business manager charges so much per line for advertisements, the only and obvious purpose of which is to swindle the unsuspecting greenhorns out of their money.

"Who will help us to teach the newspapers consistency? Who will give us a hand for a raid on our great dailies? Echo answers, who? This paper wants advertising and wants it bad, yet we have no hesitation in saying that there is no liquor dealer, no gambler, no 'business chance' shark, etc., rich enough to buy one inch of space in its columns. Not because our paper is a temperance organ—for it is not. Not because we are under any obligation to any sect or party—for we are not—but simply because we consider it the duty of a paper to be consistent with itself. If it preaches temperance, honesty and fair-dealing in its editorial columns, it should be careful that its advertising space does not counteract and destroy the value of its teaching."

These are good ringing words. They have a tone of a bell calling the people to soberness and truth. If we know Mr. Goudie aright, his paper will set a good example. The advertising pages of our huge dailies and weeklies are traps, snares, and black pits of fraud and shame which perplex the innocent, entice the weak, lead on the erring, and defile the whole country. And all for the dollar! If only some papers offended in this odious matter they could be cut off from the household and family table, and left where they belong with other unwholesome and unrespectable things. But as all err in this detestable way, sound-hearted and sound-minded people either must forego the news altogether, or take it into their families mingled with this shameless traffic. But shame on the editors who do it, say we! And the greater shame the more their position makes them inaccessible to reproach or penalty, and hence lays on them, if they had the conscience to feel it, the more serious responsibility.

J. V. B.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Whirlpools.

One strange, weird night,
When heaved the ocean's boundless breast
All silvered with the full moon's light,
I could not rest.

Our ship sailed fast ;
The gleaming waters of the sea,
Toward our right, whirled, circling past
In majesty.

Drawn round and round
In still, smooth, swift, resistless flow,
The current like a thread was wound,
And sucked below.

White hands upraised,
And pale, beseeching faces set
Toward the zenith—these, amazed,
My vision met.

I could not reach ;
In vain the faces turned to me ;
But when my last gaze yielded each
Unto the sea

There lay, beneath,
The safe, strong arms of God's great love ;
And so I saw the billows wreathed,
And smiled above.

Thanks for your care !
What fine proportions match these walls
To yonder frescoed ceiling there !
This scene appals !

Here ebbs and flows
A strong high tide of human life,
And to my ear the uproar grows
Tumultuous strife.

The garment's hem,
The borders of the room are calm ;
The power of mind lifts out of them
Half like a psalm.

One finger feels
The centering pulses of the world,
When swift the bulletin reveals
How, hurled and whirled,

The hot blood leaps
From point to higher point "On Change,"
And fresh life round the maelstrom creeps
In closer range.

This is the pit !
The circling whirlpool, drawing down
All venturing mortals into it
To burn, not drown.

For vice is fire
With awful anguish at its core ;
Are its red depths a funeral pyre,
And nothing more ?

Can I be mad ?
Or do these fiends forefingers hold
Toward each victim, making glad,
And shouting "Sold !"

No lost soul cries
"Save, save me !" Each is wrapt intent
Upon a hidden golden prize
Till life is spent.

Perhaps I dream,
But if the scene is such as this,
These human souls, down-circling, seem
In some abyss

Beyond compare
With cool, deep billows of the sea ;
—And yet the love of God is there,
Which comforts me.

Now let us go !
I have the picture in my heart,
And, seeing it, shall ever know
Thy kindly part.

MINNIE STEBBINS SAVAGE.

Matthew Arnold as a Pleader for the Things of the Spirit.

Like Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Arnold has written a great deal on government, and like Mr. Ruskin he pleads always for an ideal state, an ideal truth, ideal justice, ideal manners, and an ideal religion. He is the farthest removed from your utilitarian.

But one is tempted to compare Mr. Arnold's views on democracy with those of some other famous defenders of it, to see how he stands by the side of those who are actually in the drift of the democratic spirit. Arnold is for equality, but he is still an aristocratic Englishman desiring equality on the terms, and only on the terms, of a fine culture. He does not propose to bend for a moment to the Philistine, to say nothing about the Populace.

Walt Whitman's democrat is one who can read Homer and Goethe, and then don a flannel shirt and go out among the crowd of workmen and take a real interest in their pursuits, not meeting them in a lofty condescension, but on equal terms. I must confess that Whitman's democrat has a deep attraction to me, the more so because he seems in harmony with that divine law that is vivifying, spiritualizing, up-lifting the human race. Does not the Christian philosophy say: "It behooved him to be made in all points like unto his brethren?" The spirit of the New Testament is, "I am among you as a servant." Caring for inferior things, for the weak, the ignorant, the outcast, for those who can not care for themselves, that is the nature of the All-Good. Going down to the very bottom of life to help up the lowest, that is the lesson of Christianity. When culture, and riches, and power estrange us from our kind, they have unmanned us, they have wrenched us from our vocation.

One must, however, hold to this view concerning Mr. Arnold's teaching on Democracy: the sum of it is correct, its dominating spirit is fused with a salutary wisdom.

There is this danger in America: Every one tends more and more to become no larger than his occupation—a mechanic is just a mechanic, a farmer is just a farmer, each one's mental vision comprehends no more than just the little firmament of his own daily cares. He becomes indifferent to ideas. His life is eked out in a dull routine, and from indifference to ideas he drifts into hardness, into insusceptibility to ideas. This secularizing tendency does exist among us in a frightful degree. And it comes from our insistent failure to see and emphasize the true end of life. Our democracy is not an un-mixed blessing. Attend one of our "ruffianly nominations," where rankness, tobacco, whisky and profanity are as obtrusive as volubility and cheap philosophy, and you can not go away with much pride in our boasted franchise. We are constantly in danger, too, of putting mere quantity above quality. A government is a spiritual compact, and railroads, and machine shops and fine business houses—large material results—are not positive proof that we are advancing beyond all others in humaneness. Our thanksgiving sermon is generally a large throated boast about the number of bushels of wheat and pounds of pork we have produced. I went, not long since into a large town—a brag town of 30,000 inhabitants, whose material thrift is something phenomenal—to get a book ; but how out of all proportion was the little bookstore I visited to the surrounding vast store-houses and machine shops, and railroads! Just a few inferior books on the shelves and nobody buying those.

Now, Mr. Arnold comes to us and says, it is not so important that we have farmers and engineers and architects, as that we have men, and that it is not so important what one has as what one is. He justly condemns the wide-jawed greed for material gain which leads to indifference to the only absolute good, and he insists that governments must produce men and women. This places him among first-rate teachers. No first-rate mind will ever teach that one is first a mechanic—a handle of the state or social machine—but that he is first a man. He does not exist for his body, but his body for him. By the perversity of some ill-starred god we are fast making the soul the servant of the body in this railroading, all-for-trade country of ours. The natural man calls loudly for his due, and the modest, shrinking, spiritual man must sit meekly by while the lordly worldlings have their carouse. Matthew Arnold is the prophet of a better day. He possesses in a large degree what most men lack, a clear discernment of the chief good of life. He returns to it again and again with the insistence of Socrates, or one of the old Hebrew prophets. "And the philosophers and the prophets, whom I at any rate am disposed to believe, and who say that moral causes govern the standing and the falling of states, will tell us that the failure to mind whatsoever things are elevated must impair with an inexorable fatality the life of a nation, just as the failure to mind whatsoever things are just, or whatsoever things are amiable, or whatsoever things are pure, will impair it; and that if the failure to mind whatsoever things are elevated should be real in your American democracy, and should grow into a disease, and take a firm hold on you, then the life of even these great United States must inevitably suffer and be impaired more and more, until it perish." (Discourse on Numbers.)

That for which Mr. Arnold stands, his highest and constant strain, is the sentiment of the ideal life. His pleading is for a renewed human society which shall find enjoyment in the things of the mind, in truth, righteousness and beauty. It is the old plea of Isaiah, Plato and Paul, which has been urged with so much charm of persuasion by Emerson and Ruskin.

Mr. Arnold's method is the one he attributes to the New Testament, it is the method of inwardness. It is not new but it is fine and rare. We may say of Arnold what Mr. Scherer says of Amiel: "His malady is sublime and the expression of it wonderful." We do not, it is true, find in Arnold the passionate longing to possess God which Arnold found in Obermann, and we find in Amiel. Arnold's spiritual yearnings are fine, they have been sublimated in the school of life and fused into one undefinable ecstasy of passion—the passion for perfection. There are points of resemblance between Amiel and Arnold. They have the same critical keenness, the same hungering for the things of the spirit, the same deftness of literary touch, the same distrust of conservative theological systems, the same method of referring all things to the spirit; but the Frenchman is the profounder, perhaps; his philosophy is deeper; and he is master of a pathos which Arnold lacks. But Arnold is more connected, more complete, and more consistent throughout in his philosophy.

Here, then, is Arnold's chief service to us: he brings brightness with him; he puts light into our eyes (as Joubert said of Plato), so that we can see the true and good when they are presented to us; and shall we not say that this illumination is more needed and more to be cherished and sought after than any grouping of mere bloodless, spiritless facts? He begets in us the habit of referring all things not to conventional standards—that is the habit of every commonplace thinker—but to eternal verity. He is an earnest apostle of things as they ought to be, as contradistinguished from things as they are. He insists that what we need is not more railroads and larger market reports, but more light. He is the greatest pleader of this century for culture, he has put a new life into the word; but the culture for which he pleads is vastly more than what your Philistine comprehends in that word. It is the expansion of life on all sides toward perfection; it is to grow stronger, sweeter, purer, in the hidden man; to put far from oneself all seeming and to be bent on being. It would be easy to give a large number of extracts from Mr. Arnold's works which would clearly set forth this ruling spirit in them, but a small number must suffice now.

Of Heine he says: "To this intellectual deliverance there was the addition of something else wanting, and that something else was something immense; the old-fashioned, laborious, eternally needful moral deliverance."

Of Joubert he says:

"For certainly it is natural that the love of light, which is already, in some measure, the possession of light, should irradiate and beautify the whole life of him who has it."

Again:

"The pursuit of perfection, then, is the pursuit of sweetness and light. He who works for sweetness and light, works to make reason and the will of God prevail. He who works for machinery, he who works for hatred, works only for confusion. Culture looks beyond machinery, culture hates hatred, culture has one great passion, the passion for sweetness and light. It has one even greater!—the passion for making them prevail. It is not satisfied till we all come to a perfect man; it knows that the sweetness and light of the few must be imperfect until the raw and unkindled masses of humanity are touched with sweetness and light."

Mr. Arnold has the Greek serenity and self-poise, his usual mood is quiet and subdued. His feelings are those of the thoroughly cultivated man in whom that wise temperance which is bred of thoughtfulness is in the mastery. At his best, his thought, whether in prose or poetry, is beautiful with a beauty which is everlasting; and it is radiant betimes with a light which is surely divine.

G. D. BLACK.

About Ourselves.

FROM A PAPER READ BY ROBERT COLLYER BEFORE THE CHANNING CLUB OF CHICAGO, JUNE 24, 1887.

There are some here this evening who may remember that time I can never forget. The hard, horny hand, only two weeks away from the hammer and the anvil when you clasped it in yours, and the face you saw not quite clean yet from the grime of the forge. And my tongue, when you asked me to preach in the old church on Washington street, had still the strong Yorkshire burr in it, and that almost unpardonable sim to a well-trained ear. I noticed it last summer in full force when an old friend on the other side of the water came to see me, and talking of another man who had come to grief observed: "Mr. Callyer, there was a 'hi' on him, the 'hi' of providence." In the old times, when they told a lot of poor creatures to say "shibboleth," and they could only say "sibboleth," they slew them at the fords of the Jordan, so I was bewildered over that fatal letter, and could not get it right either way, to save my life. Nor did I know what to say to you beyond what I had said in my old mother church only a month before as a Methodist in very bad standing, who had been turned adrift because he would not believe in the eternal torments on which the old church set such a store, or in the total depravity of his own children—for that was where the trouble began on that question; or that men and women he deemed among the noblest he had ever known would be lost, because they did not believe in the trinity. A man, in a word, with plenty of reasons just then for what he could not believe, but very few for what he could.

It all comes back to me now when my hair has grown white in the service—the good and happy service of all these years; that sweet and noble welcome you gave me in despite of the heavy discount I must have drawn on your expectations, and your patience and loving kindness with the rude, rough anvil block in the old mother church first, and then in my ever dear Unity. You may have forgotten it. I never can; and can only say, when it all comes back to me, if I forget you and yours may my right hand forget its cunning. We hear now and then of self-made men, and, stumbling into the pulpit as I did, from nowhere in particular, and with no training, those who do not know my secret might call me a self-made minister. It is not true. I am, under God, what you made me, the old Unitarians in this city first, and then the great, masterful, warm-hearted city. I was a stranger, and you took me in; naked, and you clothed me with loving kindness; and I sit in my home far away from you now, and it all comes back to me fresh as the blossoms came back this spring. When the white man struck these prairies, and finding the natives, said: "Who are you, anyhow?" they answered: "We are Illinois"—that is, we are men. It was about all I could say when I came among you, and I was not so sure of that even, with that brand of heresy on my brow that was still smarting from the burns. But you said: "It is all right; there is your work among the poor and in the pulpit, and we are right here to help you in the one and hear you in the other." And you were my tutors, if I ever learned how to preach, and were what Paul would call my helpers in the Lord. So, in speaking about ourselves, I have had no option but to dwell on this memory, first of all for my own sake, and then for another reason and a better.

It may fall out that the new generation which is taking charge of our good cause in this city will stumble on some rude, rough block that has been cast out as worthless or as a stumbling block indeed and rock of offense, and you will perhaps wonder whether it is worth your while to take it in and see what can be made of it after all. Now, God forbid that I should boast, but if ever you should hear these old veterans say that there was some worth in the twenty years and more of my ministry in this town, mind what I tell you to-night: It was their courage and patience and loyalty—the fathers and mothers—that made me what I was. The reason lies with those gray heads and ever warm hearts, and others to match them, that are now lying still in Rosehill and in Grace-land; and—if I may use a term I rather like to use,—“don't you forget it.” Give such an one, if you find him, the good welcome they gave me, and be sure that the better half of what he may be and do, if he is worth his salt, lies with you. I wonder still how they did stand it and bear with me and hold up my hands and heart. But so it was, and so it will be again, no doubt, if the new generation is true to its trust as the old was. Another memory stirs in me as I think of those good old times. It came to pass thirty years ago this summer, in this month, and it may be in this very week, that the old hive swarmed. It was not a strong hive, but the time had come for swarming, and so it had to be done. And the new swarm clustered on the north side and waited for a hive of its own, and got one, and got into it in the winter of 1859—Christmas day, of all days in the year—and it was the coldest hive any swarm ever tried to endure.

And then you know the story. We had two churches, if I may drop my metaphor, and I was called to the ministry of the second church. This is all about ourselves and among ourselves, and so I may venture to say again that it grew clear in no long time that the daughter was not quite of the same temper and disposition as the mother; and I might even go so far as to say the dynamic words radical and conservative, and use these as the terms of a certain difference and distinction. Now, when you strike these lines in religion there is still apt to be trouble, but in those times we were a little more sensitive about them even than we are now. The minister of the new church was called to take the pulpit, or platform rather, of Theodore Parker, in Boston; called twice, indeed, but had the good sense to say no twice. But you will see how such a call would help settle the question as to which side he must belong, and the church that held on to him, as I think, by its heart-strings. But the truth was this: that to save his soul the minister could not have told you what he was, and he is still very much of that mind. I fear or hope—I do not know which—that he said what came first and let it go for what it was worth; but there was no system about it and no training; only this one purpose and plan: to be true to his own soul. So the purpose and plan must have leaned to radicalism if it was so, while that of the mother church leaned toward conservatism, especially in the good and loyal hearts of men like Jonathan Burr and of many good women, who wanted it all down in black and white, just as Channing said it. And I mention it only for this reason. You may be sure, as it crowds my heart with proud and tender memories again, that the old mother church, true as the daylight to her own spirit and purpose, was true as the daylight to her daughter, and said what a great minister said of his son when he found out what a radical he was: "I don't believe in his beliefs, but I do believe in him." So the old brave mother Messiah said of her daughter Unity, she was not going back on her well-born child. They were going to stand shoulder to shoulder, even if eyes front was not to be learnt, and one did look to the right and the other to the left.

And so the day never came in all those twenty years when the two churches were not one in the spirit and purpose to stand fast in the liberty wherein Christ had made them free, and to keep free of entanglement in the yoke of bondage. Radicalism and conservatism, if the distinction must be drawn, were only as the double beat of the one heart, or as the forces that hold the stars on their steadfast way. It comes back to me now in tender memories touched with tears, how we never saw the day, so far as the two churches were concerned, when their ministers were not just as welcome in the one pulpit as the other; when in our little festivals on both sides of the river we were not only all welcome, but all expected. And what good times we did have at those festivals, to be sure; and how "poor as a church mouse" did lose its meaning! So the second thing I love to remember "about ourselves," the two churches first, and then the three and then the four, is that we never grew weak and poor, or sour and bitter, or even distant, as we say, because we could not quite agree. It was a good, honest give and take; we were of one heart when we were not quite of one opinion, of the same household of faith, while we loved each our own rooms with their windows to the rising or the setting sun, or the north or the south, and none of us were so sure we were right as we were sure we were all right so long as we stood true to the words of the Master—"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another."

Then another memory stirs me and takes a wider sweep and grows very sweet and good as I plod on toward sunset and my rest. It is told of old Mr. Lenox, that when Doctor Dewey had newly come to New York, and Lenox, who was a good Presbyterian, met him in a company, and, inquiring who he was, was told he was the new minister of the Unitarian church of the Messiah, the old gentleman sighed and said, then may God have mercy on his soul! Now I have good reason for believing that, all those years ago, there was such an element of sincere and painful bigotry in this city; but I do not think it outlived the years I remember, and I am sure there was left in it no man to whom two and two would make four who would say, touching any good and sincere Unitarian, "Well, may God have mercy on his soul!" And for this there was a good and sound reason. Channing had said many years before our time, "I value Unitarianism only as a charter of freedom wherewith to seek the truth from God and his Christ, and to meet the wants of the soul as it seeks that truth." And then he said: "I want to stand under the broad sky to look for the truth, and welcome it from whatever quarter it may come," and, once more, that he wanted to be one with all those who were seekers of the truth wherever he might find them, and would not now that he had broken away from the bondage of one sect go into bondage with another—no, not even with the Unitarians if this should be their purpose.

Moral Heroism.

Life is single, with an eye
One with the humor of every sky;
Only the timorous stand with dread
Where the near gods have bid them tread.
Out of the rainbow pluck the stern,
And from the tempest all its harm.
We may be saved by many ways,
But never where the coward stays.

H. L. T.

Conversation.

There is a very wonderful and beautiful promise in the fiftieth Psalm that needs frequent repetition in these days: "To him that ordereth his conversation aright will I shew the salvation of God."

It is very much to be true in our conversation. Upon the reading of this remark, your first exclamation will be, "Why, I am true!" But think it over, see if you always say exactly what you mean, if you say anything; or if you sometimes let a wrong expression of your opinion go forth in your silence. Politeness demands much from us, and we sometimes are so anxious to give all she demands that we are not absolutely truthful. It is very hard to be disagreeable, and so easy to be gracefully pleasing, and seemingly kind, or to think it is not just our business to say an unpleasantly true or wholesome thing. Sometimes it is not our business—we need not go up and down the world soliciting unpleasant conversation; but if we are conversing, let us do it in an honest way. I heard some one say the other day, when speaking of a man who was singularly intelligent, well read, and clear in his opinions, which were always his own, and grew out of much thought and sifting, "Well, he is smart enough to dare to be honest." There is a good deal more in this remark than we are quite willing to believe, and it will bear thinking about.

Further, it is much to be kind in our conversation. We can say what we do say in a polite way, a gentle or a strong way, a sympathetic or a reproving way, as the need may be. Nothing which is untrue or cowardly can be kind. Very often a person goes on thinking in a wrong way upon a subject about which he holds decided, and decidedly expressed, opinions, because no one of the many persons he has conversed with has had the courage or the kindness to show him he was all wrong. We are very apt to color the expression of our opinions by the general tone of the company of conversationalists in which we may be. Perhaps we do this unconsciously; and yet, it is not a true thing nor a kind thing to do even while it seems polite.

"Politeness is to do and say
The kindest thing in the kindest way."

It is much to have our conversation clean. Do not start and think I am making an unnecessary remark to intelligent, cultivated people. Alas, nothing that can be said about conversation is more sadly needed than this. Everywhere we meet "smuttiness." Not alone in the bar-room, the smoking car, the corner lounging place and the low assembling places of our land, but in the homes, among our boys and girls, among their mothers and fathers, their grown brothers and sisters. There is so much funniness, sometimes, in a slightly smutty story that it travels on and on along a line of people whom you would suppose would never repeat it. This thought of perfect cleanness in our conversation bears, too, its need of careful thinking over in order that we may guard our lips.

Be ready to say the strong word. The ability to do this in all needy places seems a gift with some persons; but, if you will watch and ask, you will find that it is not an easy, natural thing to do, but is the outcome of goodness, thought, earnestness, unselfishness and a desire to help in the progress of the world.

"Turning the conversation" is, perhaps, one form of this. If you see that a conversation grows unkindly personal, or dwells upon a subject that is unpleasant or painful to some one present, or is not good for the boy or girl who is listening, or is not profitable in any way, put in your strong turning word. You may do more good than you know. Words are powerful things. If you keep your own, and those of as many others as you can influence, kind, true, clean and strong, your mission cannot be called a small one.

Carleton says:

"Careful with fire," is good advice we know,
"Careful with words" is ten times doubly so.
Thoughts unexpressed may sometimes fall back dead;
But God himself can't kill them when they're said."

Last of all, we touch upon the promised reward to him who ordereth his conversation aright. "To him will I shew the salvation of God." Very ample is it—full of peace and satisfaction. One beautiful phase of it is that we do not have to wait to the end of our lives to see it. If we keep our conversation always ordered aright, we shall see the salvation of God all along our way. Life will be rich and beautiful; returns that seem all out of proportion to our efforts will flow in upon us; we shall feel that we are a help, a comfort, a power in the world, and the right thought that must lie back of the right word will make us grow in grace and strength.

JUNIATA STAFFORD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Temperance in the Church.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—Your lively columns induce me to give you a passing notice of progressive work at Luverne, Minnesota. The Unitarian banner is afloat, and the standard bearer and body-guards are at their posts, while the regiment is ready for marching or for fatigue service. (I was forgetting army phrases till President Cleveland gave the order to return the rebel flags!)

Last Sunday was "Flower Sunday," the first such in the life of the society. The result was very satisfactory and we hope very useful. In the first place there was the Banner, exhibited at the Western Conference meetings recently held in Chicago, which appeared in public here for the first time. The Sunday-school answered the following questions:

1. What are the great words on the banner about God?

Ans. The Fatherhood of God.

2. What are the great words about man?

Ans. The Brotherhood of man.

3. What are the words by which we fellowship all who work with us?

Ans. Truth, righteousness and love.

4. What do W. U. C. mean?

Ans. Western Unitarian Conference. (Then we looked on the other side of the banner.)

5. What is the name of this society?

Ans. Unity Congregational society of Luverne, Minnesota.

6. What is the object of this society?

Ans. To promote True Christianity as the Religion of Righteousness, Freedom and Fellowship.

We used the "Service of Beauty," to which we had added the singing and responses on the 123rd page of "Sunny Side." The twelve recitations of the masters and misses made an instructive entertainment to the parents and friends of the Sunday-school. With the "Service of Beauty" it seemed a fit time to introduce some moral instruction lest the "Beauty God hath given might win us from the work ordained of Heaven." So I took the opportunity to explain to the people, who crowded the hall in which we worship, the object of the "Unitarian Church Temperance Society," also reading the Constitution. The congregation seemed to be deeply interested in the plan and the general method. I had resolved to see if the Sunday-school would freely take a pledge while "among the lilies" and surrounded with flowers. So they were all asked if they would willingly take a pledge not to use intoxicating liquor or tobacco for the next twelve months. They all voted yes. Then came the subject of profane swearing. The thing was explained and attention called to the aptness of children, in anger, to say what they hear their elders say, and we should be very careful not to ask a pledge which any are liable to break. When we were ready the pledge was presented as follows:

THE TRUE HELPERS' PLEDGE.

"I do faithfully promise that I will not drink any alcoholic liquors nor use any tobacco during the next twelve months, nor will I intentionally use any profane language." The exhortation to be faithful and add to their number during the year, with the blessing on them as thus entering the church by the temperance gate, seemed to impress the parents quite as much as it did the children. The children all took the pledge standing; when they were seated I turned to the congregation. I did have to admit to them that I could not ask them to follow the example of the children! I felt that we stood on delicate ground, but, as a teacher, I declared the whole truth about the effect of tobacco on the body and on the mind. I think some wives there were sad that things are as they are, and daily the fathers of those boys smoke in their presence. I think the children gave the most eloquent sermon ever given in that hall—as action is more eloquent than words. But it was the time to see if all that congregation would voluntarily subscribe to the following declaration and obligation. I was desirous of doing this, because directly opposite on the other side of the street are three saloons licensed at $500.00, and to be licensed after the first of July, probably, for $1000.00 annually.

DECLARATION AND OBLIGATION.

“The purpose of this society shall be to work for the cause of Temperance in whatever ways may seem to it wise and right; to study the social problems of poverty, crime and disease in their relations to intoxicating drinks, and to diffuse whatever knowledge may be gained; to discuss methods of temperance reform; to devise, and, so far as possible, to execute plans for reform when it is practicable to do so.

“We recognize our duty to be watchful of our influence over others, and discourage, in all ways that commend themselves to our judgment and conscience, the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage.”

After a sufficient explanation I asked all in the congregation who heartily approved of this declaration and obligation, if they would be pleased to signify it by rising. Greatly to my delight nearly every adult person in the house arose. Was it not grand to pledge duty in the midst of beauty? It was a delightful hour for children and parents.

We are only five hundred miles west of Chicago, and the sun to-day does not shine on a more beautiful country than this valley of the Rock river in southwestern Minnesota and northern Iowa. Remember that the first Unitarian sermon ever preached here was in the month of November last. We are looking forward for a church edifice, and hope the abundant crop of this year will give the necessary means to build it.

A man from Mankato, Minn., came up, and said he was a Methodist, but we had the most pleasing service he ever witnessed. He wanted something to carry away, and he took the resolutions and statement of doctrines which were passed at the last session of the Western Conference.

May I not ask some of my brother ministers if it is not well to bring together into the closest union the useful and the good?

The services closed by the “communion of the Flowers,” everybody in the house taking of the emblems of “Divinity” in the beauty of a small bouquet, which is a “broken sight” of the All-Beauty.

S. S. H.

THE STUDY TABLE.

A Nameless Nobleman. By Jane G. Austin. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

Ticknor & Co. publish a series of novels for summer reading which is deservedly successful. The series for this year consists of thirteen volumes, one appearing each week through the months of May, June and July, and includes some of the most successful novels of the past few years. “A Nameless Nobleman” is one of the best of these; it is the story of a French nobleman who left the roses of Provence and the gayeties of the French court under Louis Quatorze for New England life among the Puritans in Plymouth. The reputation of the book is already assured—this is the seventeenth edition—but it will gain new friends in this form. Other books in this series are “Guenn, The Story of Margaret Kent,” and Howe’s “Story of a Country Town.” With good paper, good print and heavy paper covers, they yet sell for fifty cents a volume.

E. E. M.

THE HOME.

Two Pets.

Is there any especial thing in your church, UNITY children, which you love more than anything else, and which you like to look at every time you go there? Perhaps you have never thought of it in this way, but every child could find some spot or some thing to especially care for and enjoy,—a window, a bit of carving, a pew belonging to himself or some one else, or a picture. I am not going to tell you what I love best in my church, but I am going to tell you of two things I saw last summer in England, which are the pride and joy of a little country church many centuries old. The church stands on a little hill rising from Sedge moor, where many battles have been fought. One of these things is a stone figure of a Crusader, representing some knight who had been to the “Holy Land,” to do what he thought a brave and good deed,—to fight and kill those who had possession of the tomb where Jesus is supposed to have been buried. This old stone figure, with its legs crossed,—showing that the person in whose memory it had been made had really been in the “Holy Land,”—had for centuries stood in the little churchyard, among the old tombs and graves, but of late it has been taken into the church to preserve it, as it is the only Crusader they have! It is much worn by many suns and many rains and winds, and by heat and cold, and dampness. One or both feet are broken, and the armor which nowadays it is clothed in is lichen and moss, of many colored greens and grays! One of the hands laid across the chest is worn away, so that only the shadow of it, as it were, remains. But the most pitiful thing is the poor face, worn nearly smooth by the rain and wind, which for centuries have swept across it! The head is of a queer shape, long and narrow, with deep holes where the eyes once were; there is scarcely a trace of nose or mouth, but on cheek and chin two or three round holes, where water has, by constant dropping perhaps, worn away the stone,—and the helmet is of moss.

This is one of the pets of the little church;—this unknown hero, tenderly cared for by loving hands.

The other is a font! You all know who King Alfred was,—if you do not, ask your father or mother to tell you! And now I have only time to say that after one of his many battles with the Danes, on this very spot, he made peace with Guthrum, the leader, or petty king it may be, on condition that the latter would be baptized! So he sent to London for the Archbishop of Canterbury, and for the sake of peace, perhaps, this Dane was baptized. This very font they say, and I believe it, was used on that occasion. The christening took place in the open air at the foot of the little hill where the church stands; and I dare say the hill-side was covered with warriors all anxious to witness the solemn ceremony. For hundreds of years it stood, and perhaps was often used, at the foot of the hill where the great christening occurred, for it was found not so very long ago buried deep down in the earth. And because of the rough, rude shape, and the legends of the spot, it was taken up from the earth, christened “King Alfred’s Font,” and received into the church. Now it stands just by the entrance, where all the little babies are baptized, and through this ceremony, it is believed, they enter into the church family.

We people out west have a little personal interest in this font, aside from the story I have just told you. A few years ago a young man, a son of the pastor of the little old church, came to America for his health, and went to Colorado. He grew worse and died among strangers; but every one very kind to him, and his pretty sister told me, with tears in her eyes, that she loved all Americans for that reason.

In a town in Colorado, in the little Episcopal church, there is a small stone model of this very font, sent by the parents of the young Englishman, in loving memory of him, to the American strangers who were so kind to their son. S. B. B.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Boston Notes.—At the closing meeting for the summer of Rev. James Freeman Clarke's society, a letter from him was read. He hopes to return to his pulpit with renewed strength in October.

—In our city the union services of our churches will be held during the summer in our First church in the center of the city and in the New South church at the south end. Our city ministers will preach almost every Sunday in some chapel in the mountains or by the seashore. A few will do missionary work in the west.

—The salvation army of our city continues to preach in a small hall. No persecution and not much notice is excited by their public or private parades.

—Rev. Mr. Hale's church building will be occupied as a Hebrew synagogue in September next. Doctor Hale will probably occupy a hall until he finds a new church home.

—July fourth has passed with usual pomp and circumstance and fire-crackers. More noisy than usual. "Country Week" excursions for poor children begin now. Ministers of all denominations who will remain in town during July and August are registering their names at the Young Men's Christian Union as ready to serve distressed and bereaved families. The great hegira of families with their school children has begun. This season our seashore facilities are more limited than for some years past, because heretofore all kinds of such facilities have not paid a dividend. A good deal of missionary work is to be done in small parishes in New England this summer.

Humboldt, Iowa.—Our parish, though located in a most quiet and unassuming little town, loyally points with pride to her minister, as we think justly on many grounds, but we now have one new reason upon which we base our claim for a distinction not enjoyed by any other society, either liberal or orthodox, in the world. Our honored and beloved Rev. Marion Murdock has returned to us this week from the Meadville commencement with a diploma showing that she has received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, and she is the only woman in the world upon whom this degree has been conferred. However, we do not harbor any feeling of selfishness in the matter, and trust others of our most worthy reverend women will follow her example, and that numerous sister parishes may soon lay like claim to honors for their pastors.

Philadelphia.—The Anti-Poverty Society in this city enjoys a flourishing existence, and has Sunday evening meetings that are regarded with great interest.

—An extensive plan for the evangelization of the city is afoot for the fall. A house-to-house visitation is proposed.

—Unity church, Camden, is the only liberal meeting-place in this vicinity that is now open, and it is probable there will be a continuation of its work right through the hot weather.

—The Woodstown experiment toward Unitarian organization is in the hands of enthusiastic workers. If the Camden people establish their paper in the fall, as is altogether likely, these smaller circles are certain to realize a help from its leverage, as accomplished by the more general circulation of worthy liberal literature.

—Mr. Haskell gives a fine account of the work that Mr. Gilbert is likely to accomplish at Vineland.

H. L. T.

Cincinnati.—Mr. Thayer has begun the publication of a new series of sermons on Reasonable Religion. No. 1 is entitled "Work and Salvation," No. 2, "The New Bible."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

ALL SOULS CHURCH.—Corner Oakwood boulevard and Langley avenue. Pastor, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, residence 3939 Langley avenue. Sunday, July 10, Mr. Jones will preach at 11 A. M. Sunday-school at 9:30. Teachers' meetings suspended until September. The church and Sunday-school will be kept open throughout the summer, Mr. Jones occupying the pulpit July 10 and 17, after which the services will be conducted by members of the society.

A Profitable Investment

can be made in a postal card, if it is used to send your address on to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, who can furnish you work that you can do and live at home, wherever you are located; few there are who can not earn over $5 per day, and some have made over $50. Capital not required; you are started free. Either sex; all ages. All particulars free.

Cheap Information. The United States Hotel Company, of Boston, publish the most elegant set of maps of the city proper and harbor, together with the most complete history of the city and suburbs, (beautifully illustrated), ever sent out as an advertisement. Ten cents in stamps pays the postage. Order it.

Scott's Emulsion of Pure

Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites.

For Children and Pulmonary Troubles.

Dr. W. S. Hoy, Point Pleasant, W. Va., says: "I have made a thorough test with Scott's Emulsion in Pulmonary Troubles and General Debility, and have been astonished at the good results; for children with Rickets or Marasmus it is unequalled."

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL FOR YOUNG

WOMEN, Greenfield, Mass. Beautiful and healthful location. Thorough English and classical education. Science, Art, Music. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

BY LEWIS G. JONES.

320 pages. 8vo. Cloth. Gilt top. Price $1.50

"No fairer statement has been made of the grounds on which the anti-supernaturalist Humanitarian bases his opinion of Jesus and of the origin of Christianity. * * * Its theology and christology are of the most radical Unitarian kind; but the temper and the spirit of the book are so refined, so earnest, and so fair to all opponents, that it must impress those who are compelled to disagree with its most prominent conclusions as a model of polite and generous controversial writing."—Brooklyn Union.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., Publishers,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

"Unity Mission Tracts."

Designed to answer the question, What is Unitarianism? and to illustrate the Liberal Faith, Worship and Life.

UNITY Office, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.
Each 5 Cents. Ten Copies, or Ten Selected, for 25 Cents

1. Natural Religion. By J. V. Blake. The Faiths of Reason.
2. The Religion of Jesus. By H. M. Simmons. A quaint appeal from Christianity to Christ.
3. Unitarianism as Shown in Western Church Covenants, etc. Short answers to "What is Unitarianism?"
4. About Prayer. By several writers. (1) "Shall we pray?" (2) "What does Prayer do for us?" (3) "How Pray?" (4) Poems.
5. Unitarianism: its Story and its Principles. By J. C. Learned. (1) Its Story from Bible times through the Trinity-growing centuries and the Reformation, up to to-day. (2) The Principles involved in this long struggle for Reason in Religion.
6. The Growth of Faith. By H. M. Simmons. Of Faith (1) as the feeling of Trust; (2) as a system of Beliefs.
7. Emerson's "Divinity School Address." No better entrance into Emerson than through this ever-fresh Address.
8. Jesus. By J. L. Jones. (1) The secret of his power. (2) How he "saves." (3) His relation to Christianity and to other teachers.
9. Missionary Work in Unitarian Churches. By J. T. Sunderland. A tiny hand-book of practical suggestions.
10. Songs of Faith, Hope, Charity. Set to Old Tunes. Fifty-one of our best-loved hymns and eleven familiar tunes. A five-cent hymn-book for young churches, etc. (No discount on this.)
11. The One Religion. By C. C. Everett. (1) One Religion, many Theologies. (2) What this one Faith is. At the end, Poems.
12. Responsive Services for Reading and Singing. In preparation. A five-cent service-book for young churches, etc.
13. The Quiet Moment. In preparation. A "Daily Strength" book.
14. God. 16. Miracles. 17. The Bible. Each by several writers.
15. Channing. 19. Parker. 20. Emerson (in preparation). 21. Martineau. Our Four Great Masters. Sketch of the life and "Gospel passages" from works of each.
22. Is a Scientific Basis for Religion Possible? By M. J. Savage. Yes. (1) What is Science? (2) What is Religion? (3) Where are we now? Reviews eleven of man's permanent beliefs.
23. The Sympathy of Religions. By T. W. Higginson. No belief, no ritual, no ethics the monopoly of any one religion.
24. The Bible Regained. By J. C. Learned. Lost, first, through Catholic concealment, and then by Protestant idolatry; now being regained, no longer as the Book of God, but of Man.
25. The Co-Education of Husband and Wife. By Mrs. S. C. L. Jones. (1) The Wooing. (2) The Wedding. (3) Home-Making and Child-Rearing.
26. The Religious Education of Children. By Mrs. S. C. L. Jones. In Preparation.
27. What is it to be a Christian? By Jenkin Lloyd Jones.
28. Love to God and Love to Man. Forty-seven songs, most of which are adapted to "Revival" tunes. No discount on this.
29. The Death of Jesus. By W. M. Salter, of the Ethical Culture Society.

"Unity Short Tracts."

Published from the Office of UNITY, 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

Post-paid, 1 Cent each; 30 to 60 Cents a Hundred.

1. Unitarian Affirmations. (60 cts. a hundred.)
2. A Blessing on the Day. By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts. a hundred.)
3. A Book-Shelf of the Liberal Faith. (30 cts. a hundred.) Twenty-four books described, with prices.
4. The Art of Married Life. By George S. Merriam. (60 cts.)
5. Jesus. By S. J. Barrows. (30 cts.)
6. The Faiths of Evolution. By William J. Potter. (60 cts.)
7. A Negative and Doubting Gospel. By A. Walkley. (30 cts.)
8. Channing, the Man and his Message. By W. C. G. (60 cts.)
9. The Hell of Evolution. By John R. Effinger. (60 cts.)
10. Unitarianism in a Nut-Shell. (30 cts.)
11. Channing, and the Unitarian Movement in America. By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts.)
12. The Manliness of Christ. By J. L. Jones. (30 cts.)
13. Blessed be Drudgery! By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts.)
14. Deathlessness. By J. L. J. and W. C. G. (60 cts.)
15. A Tract Directory. Prepared for the use of Post-Office Mission Workers. (60 cts.)
16. How we Got the Temperance Society in the Church. By W. C. Gannett. (60 cts.)
17. The Things Most Commonly Believed To-day among us. The declaration of fellowship and faith adopted by delegates at the Western Unitarian Conference in Chicago, 1887. (30 cts.)

POZZONI'S
MEDICATED
COMPLEXION
Powder.
Imparts a brilliant transparency to the skin. Removes all pimples, freckles and discolorations. For sale by all first-class druggists, or mailed for 50 cts. In stamps by J. A. POZZONI, St. Louis, Mo.

CHICAGO FEMALE COLLEGE
Morgan Park (near Chicago). Boarding School for Girls and Young Ladies. For catalogue address G. THAYER, LL. D., Morgan Park, Ill., or 77 Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JULY 16, 1887.

[NUMBER 20.]

EDITORIAL.

"Pray tell me where is Christianity?"
Transpose the letters: It's in Charity."

CHIMING with the article on Race Consciousness, to be found in another column, comes many a word to-day in public print and private letter. Thus, for instance, in a letter to a friend from a New England woman: "I feel that our interest and love for each other individually draws its deepest inspiration from this great Human bond. In fact, I can conceive of no real friendship outside of it. The intensity of this feeling is really the measure of our friendship." On the preceding page she wrote: "How this question of Human Rights is forcing its way to our very lintels and doorposts; and moreover it has come to stay, and, like Garrison, 'will be heard.' All the world is in mortal throes, and we ignore it longer at our peril."

DARE to fail, but don't dare not to try! If the cause is a good one, our failure is not failure for the cause, but inevitable aid to it; for the good in many others responds to our endeavor succeeding or failing, and our failure may point the way for the next trier to succeed. Be willing to contribute our failure then, if that is what awaits us, to the cause, taking comfort in the thought that we have made our bravest, largest and an indispensable contribution to the final good, and that in only a selfish sense is it failure,—looking to the end in view it is real part of the success. But this grand sort of failure is only for those who strive hard. To come short in the trying—where three-fourths of all our so-called failures lie—is a different matter. A different word belongs to it. "Failure" is a word of honor—akin to "forlorn hope." It is faith in God to dare to "fail."

"WE were once personally invited by that most implacable of logicians, Orestes A. Brownson, to grant him the premise of our own existence, on strength of which he professed he would make a Roman Catholic of us; but, not fancying the prospect, we declined the risk." And hence we have Joseph Henry Allen still with and of us to write the article on "Our Western Opportunity" in the July Unitarian Review, from which we quote the words. We are very glad that he was so discreet.

DOCTOR MCGLYNN believes in every doctrine of his Church and in the supremacy of the Pope on every spiritual matter,—but on land-questions, No! When it comes to that, he must "oppose and defy the unjust encroachments of the insatiate lust of the Roman machine for power, rather than submit to such encroachments." "If a man goes against his conscience in obedience to the Pope, he sins. And should a high Roman tribunal summon a man before it for teaching the truth which he knows to exist, and should it condemn his doctrines without giving them a trial and command him to retract them, it is his duty before God to refuse to do so. And should they command him to retract under penalty of imprisonment or martyrdom, it is his duty to resist and to be burnt alive at the stake rather than commit the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost of declaring what his conscience believes to be false." Noble words! And three hundred years ago the speaker would have had a chance to turn them into noble deed, and wither in the dungeon or to burn,—and to have had his monument erected in 1887 in Rome for that deed, like a Galileo or a Bruno. But we suspect that Doctor McGlynn will either eat these brave words of his, or else will see, and seeing say, that his "land-question" involves the deepest things of the "Spirit," and that the "anti-poverty" which is to marshal in the kingdom of Heaven on Earth belongs to the inmost concerns of God,—and then what will he do for Pope? Or what with him? Will the American citizen excommunicate the Pope?

THE case of Prof. E. C. Smith, of Andover, seems to us to involve, first and last, three strains, if not three breaches, of the laws of ethics. It seems unethical to bind a "creed" upon a theological school, as the school's founders did. But given a "creed" like Andover's, it seems unethical for a professor, accepting office under it, to teach that "the Bible is not the only perfect rule of faith and practice, but is fallible and untrustworthy even in some of its religious teachings,"—thus the Board of Visitors report his word,—to say nothing of the question of probation after death. And given this heresy in Professor Smyth, it seems unethical for the Visitors to make him the solitary scape-goat in the matter and let the associates indicted with him off on a technicality. It seems unethical all round. And yet we doubt not that in all three cases the men concerned believed they were obeying the high right.

THE Women of the W. C. T. U. are going to add one more department to their good work, this time to help the workers themselves,—a department of replenishing, to save them from the rut of a reform and the hard mercy of a single noble end. The officers, and chiefly Mrs. E. W. Andrew, their editor of publications, will submit to the next annual meeting a Course of Reading, the hope being that the local Unions will take it up Chautauqua-fashion. It is in part Mrs. Livermore's suggestion: "Four years ago," she says, "I arranged an afternoon lecture course for our Union at Melrose, simply to stimulate them mentally. It has done that. Debates follow every lecture, books treating upon the topic of the lecture are suggested, and the membership has increased to over three hundred, and more temperance work is done than ever before." And as a beginning, to whet the appetite for what is soon to follow, a special edition of Frances Power Cobbe's "Duties of Women" has just been issued by the W. C. T. U., as Number One in their "Library for Local Unions,"—Miss Willard claiming, "This is the proudest and happiest day of my literary life because I am writing an introduction to the 'White Ribboners' Edition," of the priceless book. Thanks to the splendid organization already existing, in three years' time we shall probably hear of three thousand study-circles added, at almost one stroke, to the Chautauqua and Unity Club bands of the country. It makes the spirit leap within to think of the good that will come of them, with Miss Cobbe's book to lead the way.

It is Teachers' Week in Chicago. The daily papers have been telling the country that the National Educational Association is in convention here. But we—we know it! Apart from the sayings and the doings, to get even the seeing of the ten or fifteen thousand earnest, self-reliant faces, is worth a journey to the city. These are the faces into which 600,000 smaller faces look each day for character as well as for geography and grammar. The speakers of the opening evening seemed to give that fact for key-note to the great.

Convention. Mayor Roche put it thus: "The problem which I trust you are here to solve is, How shall we reach and lift up to a higher intellectual and moral plane the mass of the people, and thus fit them to become better men and women, better neighbors, and better citizens? How can we make the curriculum of studies best adapted to the wants of the great multitude whose theoretical education begins and ends with the common school?" And the orator of this first session, taking again for subject this very "Problem of To-day," said that, as Palestine and Greece and Rome in their day had made each its special contribution to the forming of the race, so must we to-day make special contribution: "May we not say, therefore, that the great problem of these latter decades of the nineteenth century is the educational problem. This is a critical period of the human race. Mankind are tried to-day by their very prosperity as they have never been tried before, and the great question with us is whether we can endure the unwonted strain. How many nations have succumbed to a degree of prosperity far less than ours! How many nations have been crushed by far lighter loads of the good things of life than that which is laid upon us! I put, then, the work of the schoolmaster in its highest form as pre-eminently the work of those decades in which we are living. By this I mean not the process by which we make the schools subserve our outward interests, but the process by which we make the schools and all else subserve the inner wants of the man. The development of character—that is the problem of to-day; so to mold, and to strengthen, and to ennoble the men and women of this and coming generations, that they shall not be enervated by luxury or enfeebled by indulgence—this is the burden that is laid upon us."

Of the fifteen thousand teachers, if that be the true count, it looks as if one thousand men were lost among fourteen thousand women. How comes it, then,—can any one give good reason for it?—that of the thirty-seven appointed writers and debaters named on the programme of the "general" meetings, only two are ladies? And of the thirty-six officers, only five are ladies, and these five all in the honorable, but also honorary, office of Vice-President? In the "departments," the women's proportion is enlarged,—there are six of them among the twenty-eight officers, and fifteen among the sixty-two appointed writers and speakers. Of these fifteen, eleven are assigned to subjects connected with elementary schools and kindergartens, music and art. Can it be that the brains and the skill and the knowledge and the power to treat well the themes of education, are really apportioned thus in Nature? or rather, that the old tradition of man's mastery has much to do with the matter?

In these days it would be a poor Convention that could not somehow include and celebrate an anniversary. One session of the Teachers' Week is devoted to considering "the Educational Influence and Results of the Ordinance of 1787,"—that Ordinance being a hundred years old on July 13. And well the teachers might pause amid their talk of better methods for the future to think back to that great organizing act which secured for the five unborn States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, the condensed results of civilization. The Ordinance not only established the free public school; it excluded slavery, gave liberty of worship, assured the writ of habeas corpus and the trial by jury, protected private property, enforced contracts, abolished primogeniture, forbade cruel punishments, made the rivers common highways,—and (alas, the failure here!) required justice towards the Indian. The fruitage of all history, the survival of the fittest in the various lines of man's ideals and endeavors, the beatitudes of right and justice spelt slowly out by centuries of tragedy and struggle, the summarized results of human civilization up to the day when the Fathers in 1787 planned for the nation yet to be—that is what the Ordinance was; that is what the teachers paused to consider. And when, in the fall, the hundredth anniversary of the Constitution comes, every man and woman of us that has power to think and thank and worship, should, in home and church, with children and with town's-people, do what the teachers did—pause and think back to the great organizing Law which embodied for the nation a hundred years ago the best of all that earth had previously dreamed and wrought.

Prayer Without Pronoun.

"Uplifts of Heart and Will" is the name of a very earnest book,* religious, worshipful. It is a book of prayers without the "Our Father" or the "Thou." The writer calls them "religious meditations or aspirations," "upward-lookings," but they are in reality prayers and were originally used as such in public religious services. In the usual forms of prayer both the address and the petition trouble him. The address, he thinks, suggests an ulterior deity, and the petition "begging." "It is never in 'petitional address' at all that the soul enters into truly exalted calm, or meets its highest incentive to purposeful activity. No true, manly, self-reliant spirit is ever uplifted—is ever anything but abused—by begging! But Prayer, real Prayer, the upward-looking of the soul towards the Moral Ideal, together with a forceful urging of the will to the attainment in the life of all nobility and wholeness,—this, with the growing years, will come to mean more and more for man. It will never pass away. Ever the order and beauty and bounty of the natural world call on man for recognition and acceptance, that he may pattern his own life thereby; and the sphere of exalting sentiment flames within his own inner being, urging him ceaselessly to purity, to truth and to world-helpfulness." Believing that there must be others like himself who are troubled by the usual forms of prayer, but who feel the essential prayer within them craving utterance, this minister has prepared his little book of thirty-seven "aspirations, addressed to reverent, loving, aspiring men and women." He evidently hopes that families will use it for "morning upward-looking," and that congregations will use it in concert or as a responsive service.

And, because there are others like himself, we are thankful he has made the book. It may serve the need of some who turn away from names implying "personality" in nature,—turn away with their sense of truth and reverence shocked as by belittling of the infinite; and it may tempt others, whom these forms of his will hardly satisfy, to let their own feeling seek out happier utterance still, instead of lapsing into silence. And the book has much also for those who are not troubled by the usual forms of prayer. It is full of a happy sense of Nature's beauty and bounty. It bows in awe before the all-surrounding mystery; and for this mystery it has many names: "In the over-shadowing presence of the world-power we bow!" "Breathed upon and blest by the unseen, unknown, unfathomed Spirit of All:" "The eternal power which is our life and our strength, in which we live and move and have our being:" The power divine and infinite which is our life, the spirit-energy of the worlds, the mystery of eternal being which we call "God." (The book is by no means chary in its use of this last name among the many others.) It trusts; and what it trusts in is the "Heart of good," the "source of love," the "sure mercies of the eternal developing power," the "helpful, uplifting forces of the world about us," "the Heart of Things which must be peace and strength and fullness and everything that is satisfying, if we could only search it out and know it as it is." It is one unceasing aspiration towards "the Moral Ideal," the "Blessed Best," and this aspiration always seeks to press from words into resolve and loyal, helpful deed. And not a prayer in it which does not strengthen one's hand-clasp with men and women, and those especially who sorrow ("May they be heroic grievers, and we compassionate comforters!"), or voice the longing to be in some way a "world-helper," and so to do our part while here. If this sense of the "God," this trust in the Good, this aspiration for the Right, this longing to be Helpful, are not the cardinal elements of "prayer," what are such elements? Either these elements make "theism," or "theism" is not necessary to worship.

* UPLIFTS OF HEART AND WILL: a Series of Religious Meditations or Aspirations. By James H. West. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 1887. Price 50 cents.

'To our own judgment they make theism; but the other alternative is open,—for will any one deny that this is "worship?" We take it that the man who cares to formulate and print such prayers, devoid of pronouns as they are, must be a deeper worshiper than most of us. The book convicts both those who scoff at "prayer" and those who scoff at this as "prayer," of a mistake. To bear witness against both classes and against all who in things of the spirit over-emphasize the name and form, is part of its mission.

Why then does it fail to satisfy us as a book of prayer? First, because here is the usual monotone that besets the worship of nearly every one. Few have a nature or experience so large that the prayer-rivers in the soul flow many ways to find the Ocean. With most of us the life-wants carve deep and deeper some two or three channels for such thoughts and words. And again, it disappoints because the poetry fails,—and prayer must be poetry; that is, if it be not all a free escape and vanishing into the infinite, then escapes and vanishes must come the oftener in single words and phrases that open out in far horizons. But the little book lacks these, and it is not that other.

And that, for us, is its main trouble,—it is not a free escape into the infinite. The very quality that will make it serve, we hope, the need of some, must dwarf its good for others,—it lacks the daring "anthropomorphism" by which the heart in every sentence of prayer is wont to realize the presence of the infinite. In many and many a place in these pages we have a sense of a watched phrase, a measured word, a cautious preliminary survey of the thought, with repression of the feeling. That in us which makes us smile before things beautiful and not know we smile,—that which makes us lay the hand upon the friend in earnest talk and fasten eye on eye, thinking not of either hand or eye,—that which makes us lift the child and kiss it, not thinking kiss and scarce remembering it,—that which makes us throw our arms about a mother's neck,—all that is too much absent from this book; and that we want in "prayer." The awe should come in, too; it can not but come in, and come to stay; it shades the tone, it slows the word, it hushes in the manner,—but need it cast about for words or thoughts? It betakes itself instinctively to simple, familiar, neering words, those of the heart,—not to the careful and distancing words of the mind. There is nothing so familiar to the finite as the infinite. And prayer in its best mood is a reverent abandon of oneself to this fact of the awing and delighting nearness of the infinite. In that mood the most natural pronoun is the one that is the most life-full and most direct. "It" seems less full, less true, far less exact, than "He," and "He" and "His" more artificial than the "Thou" and "Thine." In truth, the actual experience, as we realize it, seems to crowd us towards the first person: one sometimes begins to understand in prayer, or to remember after prayer, the experience, "I and the Father are one." But the sense and habit of finite personality is too strong upon us, the sense and habit of affection too, and the mind drops down into the separating and the loving "Thou."

All this is the heart's instinctive prompting, but it seems to be the mind's deliberate avowal also; for at the last the mind says "Thou," as it does at first; though between the first and last there often comes a period of doubt and dumbness. The mind's ascent of the thought of God seems to lead it from a lower to a higher anthropomorphism, across a natural growth of dim denial. First, the upland pastures; then wide, dark belts of forest-tangle; then, again, the open on the upper heights. In the lower stage "God" is to us really as another man, an ulterior anthropoid deity. That thought we outgrow and leave, and travel through much wilderness of "nature" and "impersonality," still upward, till we emerge and find ourselves again in the thought of "personality,"—but now understanding (1) that Nature, being One throughout; must be as "personal" as self, because it is the source of self, and (2) that Man, because the highest known in Nature, must be best symbol of the One-in-All. Best symbol, now: this truth is very poetry. Symbol: that One-in-All is not—another man! So the mind returns to "He" and "Thou." Instead of longer saying "all-developing energy," it says freely

"God." Instead of "children of the universe" or "of the on-working elements," it says simply "child of God." Instead of saying "Heart of Good," it says rejoicingly "our Father." Thus at the last says mind once more, as well as heart. But perhaps mind seldom reaches the freedom of this higher understanding save by entering and sturdily pushing through that dark belt of "impersonality."

And for us the book of prayer or book of hymns that does not recognize all this, but is still groping in what seems to us the middle wilderness, lacks so much in vision of the mind and freedom of the heart, that, spite of its most real elements of worship, it fails to satisfy. And yet for many reasons one can be glad and thankful such a book is written. As the advertisements in another column show, these "Uplifts" earn their name and make a book of spiritual help. W. C. G.

The Bureau of Unity Clubs.

THE National Bureau of Unity Clubs starts out bravely. The directors have arranged for a Unity Club day at the Unitarian grove meeting at Weirs, N. H., July 26, and for another meeting at Lakeside, N. Y., August 10, during the Chautauquan Assembly at that place. A new circular just received indicates the lines of help in which the Bureau hopes to aid the associate clubs. (1) It hopes to collect and report information as to best methods of club work and study; (2) To be a central office of reference where arrangements can be made with speakers, readers, lecturers, singers and dramatic companies; (3) To investigate through committees and report on special subjects of club interest,—and suggestions to this end are requested; (4) To advise about club libraries, and eventually to furnish them more cheaply than the open market prices; (5) And, in general, to assist, upon request, in any social, literary, philanthropic or other religious work which any club may undertake. It also hopes to publish a regular Organ or Bulletin of Communication in reference to all these matters. As a beginning of its service it has requested the following persons to act as "correspondents" for the next year on the subjects indicated. "If in the arrangements of your club meetings, you think that the advice of any such correspondent will be of any value to you, have the goodness to address a letter to him and you will receive such information as it is in his power to give."

Poetry, Rev. George W. Cooke, W. Dedham, Mass.

Fine Arts, Miss Ellen D. Hale, 5 Park Street, Boston.

Fiction, Mrs. C. P. Woolley, 876 W. Jackson St., Chicago.

History, W. F. Allen, Wisconsin University, Madison.

Biography, Prof. J. K. Hosmer, St. Louis, Mo.

Science, Rev. S. R. Calthrop, Syracuse, N. Y.

Charity, Mrs. M. C. Whitman, Lawrence Avenue, Dorchester, Mass.

Social and Political Science, Rev. C. F. Dole, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

Religious History and Thought, J. C. Learned, St. Louis.

Music, Rev. J. Vila Blake, Chicago, Ill.

Dramatics and Lectures, East, Rev. E. C. Abbott, Lawrence, Mass.; West, Mr. F. K. Gillette, 175 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Amusements, Rev. G. M. Bodge, East Boston; Rev. E. R. Butler, Boston; Mr. W. H. Preston, Somerville.

Organization and Method, Mrs. Emma E. Marean, 3619 Ellis Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

It will take a year or two to get such large plans as these into good working order. If each correspondent could find time this summer to prepare, and the Bureau find money by September to print two or three pages of practical suggestions in regard to his or her own subjects,—plotting easy programmes and naming the three or four most helpful books to fit each one,—it would be a real aid. Such a leaflet, or rather a ten-cent pamphlet, already exists for the last subject on the list. (See advertisement on last page.) It is clear that the Bureau will be pushed to its best effort if a large number of clubs unite in calling for its aid. We hope our western clubs will each and all this fall spare the $5.00 for annual membership, and thus not only get the good, but help make the good, of this young church-and-home helper.

Hannah Elizabeth Stevenson.

BY THREE FRIENDS OF HERS.

WE dedicate this number of UNITY largely to the memory of one who, had she lived until to-day (July 16), would call it birthday, and begin her eighty first year on the earth. Not many persons at the west knew of her; therefore the more we wish our little western paper to tell about Hannah Stevenson, its friend and ours. And the reader's friend perhaps, although unknown; for whoever owes any conscious impulse of upward thought or life to Theodore Parker and his writings owes part of that impulse to the woman who was a brightness, steadfast as a shadow, at his side through all the years when he was Boston's greatest pulpit-voice of righteousness. Three "boys" to her join in this birthday tribute of grateful reverence; and if their words hold repetition, it is because in all she used to wake the Parker memory, and on all to make the same impression of strong cheer and happy fellowship with things good and loving. And here is another message which shall serve as text to what they say. It is from Samuel Longfellow: "I never met her without getting added cheerfulness, courage and hope. She was a determined optimist, I think. Not that she did not see the evil that is in the world, but she had an absolute and unshaken confidence in the supremacy and victory of good. In her theology she was a firm believer in the immediateness of the Divine Presence. I remember her speaking of this as the characteristic and central doctrine of what she held as the true theology. Her warm heart overflowed in sympathy with men and women and children. She must have brought sunshine to many a darkened house; and the little ones must have delighted in her company."

You ask me for the words that I said on the twelfth of June in my Germantown pulpit about Miss Stevenson. If I give them to you for UNITY as they were spoken, it must be remembered that I had no thought of their being printed for a wider audience than that which was before me. I wished to tell something of her noble life to those who have not even known her name; and the very lack of that knowledge in those who listened made the speaking come all the closer to intimate personal relations. But whatever might be allowed for the fervor of private affection, I am sure that any just estimate of her, made up from the witness of loving friends, and of the shining track her life has left, would fully justify the warmest tributes they could pay to her memory.

I was preaching that Sunday on "The Real Miracle." Having tried to show that the real miracle is not the working of anything against law, or without it, but of everything by law, I concluded the sermon as follows:

The liberal world in religion has become accustomed to this view of the history of "miracles," and of the real marvels of existence. But, for the great mass of "Christendom," how needful still is the noble psalm that burst in reverence and joy from the mouth and from the soul of Theodore Parker:—

"Not only to Hebrew Moses, but to all human kind, God speaks in every burning bush; and the rising of nature's song wakes new morning in the soul of man. This perpetual renewal of vegetation; this annual wonder of blossoming—what a religious revelation it offers to us! . . . Every flowering bush burns with God, and is not consumed. With neither trick nor miracle he changes water into wine on all the vine-clad hills of Italy, France and Spain, and fills not five thousand men, but five thousand times two hundred thousand—a thousand million men—every day; and on the broken bread of this meal supports the multitudinous armies of beast, bird, fish, insect, reptile. . . . Compared to this wonder of law, the miracles of the Old Testament or New are no fact, but poor poetry. They are like ghosts among a market-full of busy men and women."

* * * * *

And to-day, friends, I wish to pay one word of tribute to a fellow-worker of Theodore Parker who died on Sunday morning last "at sunrise." How holy to me seemed the hour as I rose to-day with the sun, and thought of the passing of her spirit so, "in the calm dew and freshness of the morn!" For, though she was eighty years of age, yet to the last, even in weakness and pain which might have made the noonday as the night, it was always sunrise in her soul. A new dawn was rayed out in every look and word and act of hers, a blessing upon all about her.

Her very name may be scarcely known to any of you—Hannah Elizabeth Stevenson, of Boston. Though her life was single, yet she gave new strength and joy to the marriage-bond between many a husband and wife, and help to such as could by no means make that bond a bond of peace. And though she had not in her own life the privilege of motherhood, still many are the children of her heart to-day who rise up and call her blessed. Among these it came to me, just as I began the work of my life, to be received. From that day to this she has been indeed to me what I have always called her, Alma Mater, for my most liberal education was the blessing of her friendship—as it has been, no doubt, with many more. But she was more than a benign mother. She was Benignity itself. I missed the sad privilege of being at the funeral. But it is comforting to know that Samuel Longfellow was there, and breathed the uplifting word of prayer and of gratitude, while another read the fitting sentences for one whose life was upright and lovely, and whose end was peace.

When Theodore Parker was in his first pulpit, in the little West Roxbury meeting-house, she, with her sister, was wont to walk the whole way—seven miles, I think—from Boston and back, to hear him preach. In Boston, when he went there to his pulpit-throne, she lived in his family, endeared alike to him and to his wife until their dying day. She was help and inspiration to him in all his brave work. If not technically a scholar, she yet had what the best gifted women possess beyond most men, an original power of perception and of sympathy—intuition, it used to be called, and may be still—which is like the scholar's instinct and enthusiasm, often outrunning these. Then came the loving service and admiring devotion of a woman's heart to one who was filled with spirit and power and faculty and courage and self-consecration needful for perhaps the noblest work ever done by preacher on this continent. His senior by two or three years, and already well taught—at one time, she was, I think, a pupil of R. W. Emerson, whose friendship she enjoyed until his death—she divined even earlier than Parker himself the new and higher leadings of religious thought and life, whereof he became a first and every way foremost prophet in this land. In this sense she may be called the teacher of Parker, himself a teacher of teachers in the highest things. She was helper in his work, support in trial, fearless comrade in the warfare against slavery, bigotry and persecution, with him enduring hardship as a good soldier of truth and of loving duty to God and man. Fellow-laborer in health, comforter in sickness and sorrow, watcher at his bedside when in Florence he breathed his last, she shared and sustained alike his inmost and his outward life. To the help of this noble woman we owe perhaps more than the world can ever know of the great work that Parker did, of the large human good he wrought. In the lives of Parker by John Weiss and O. B. Frothingham are to be caught pleasant glimpses of their relations with each other, but little therein is seen of how they really wrought together. How fittingly by its editor is that best portrait-book of Parker's many-volumed mind and heart, the "Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man," dedicated with loving admiration to her, with ample acknowledgment of her partnership in his life and work, and revering recognition of her daily illustration of the principles he taught and himself in so much exemplified. Even so was she dedicated in all the fidelity of a great and noble nature to the task given him in such large measure to perform. This in my hand is his sermon-case. Reverence is the only word that speaks my feeling as I touch it. His name is printed on it. Her hands made it for him. How well-worn it is! No doubt it carried many a mighty lin which has had to do with the history of this country in the last generation, and is even yet working, both here and in many other lands, for the political, the moral and spiritual regeneration of mankind.

Not only with Mr. and Mrs. Parker and their friends, but with scores and scores besides of the benefactors of her time, was this woman an earnest, wise, devoted, though never a publicly conspicuous worker. As Assistant Secretary for some years of the Free Religious Association, she was the companion still in her old age of those in that body who were among the leaders of the van in religious progress and the advancement of life everywhere. At the same time she served with Unitarians in things of special interest to them, but which had a larger than denominational importance, and she co-operated with men and women of all religious or other faiths in every good work. During the war she went out to nurse the soldiers, sick or wounded, in field and hospital. I now and then hear our poet-neighbor, Walt Whitman, speak warmly of her service there, whereof he had personal knowledge. And it seems as though her whole life had been given just to that. In the irrepressible conflict of human existence it was her joy to strengthen the weak, to encourage the faint, to heal the broken in heart and bind up their wounds, to comfort those that mourn. She hath done what she could, and how much it is! For one who has but a mite to give, a mite is large measure. But not a mite, rather a munificence, was her gift to the world. Freely she received, still more freely she gave, in moral above all material values. None could more modestly and sincerely ask, as did she, for the simple epitaph, "Helper." But little she knew, how in her own case, that one word should tell of all that quiet heroism and constant reaching to the noblest aims can do in a true woman's life!

"Kneeling where a woman lies,
Spent in willing sacrifice,
I strew lilies on the grave
Of the bravest of the brave."

And so I say that life is the real miracle. It is the life of Jesus, and it is the life of Parker, his loving disciple, and it is the life of this good woman, companion in the spirit of them both—though she wore no religious badge, and called her faith by no man's, no creed's, no church's name—it is the life of these and of all their like that shows in this world the wondrous power and goodness of God.

And love is miracle of miracles, wonder of wonders, both in what it is and in what evermore it does. We are finite workers of this miracle, if we will, as God is its infinite worker. Love has its sad things as well as its glad things. It has its bitter tragedies, no less than its sweet triumphs. But always it is the wonder-worker of life. Yea, it giveth life forevermore.

* * * * *

So much I told my people of her. And since that Sunday morning it has come to me to add, in response to your request, this word.

Those who best know her would think it scarcely possible to speak with praise too glowing or unqualified of Miss Stevenson's personal traits, or of her capacity for loving, helpful, various friendship. To be so answering to the wants of different persons, under the most diverse circumstances, so efficient, I had almost said sufficient for all needs, so loyal in every relation, was to suggest an infiniteness of nature which made her seem more in her single self than whole multitudes even of excellent people bound by the ordinary limits of humanity.

It is difficult to think of a fault in her, unless it were a fault not the defect but the emphasis of some good quality. I used to be nearest hurt with her when, to my own, and, as I supposed, also to her satisfaction, having got somebody's merit down to zero, I saw her put to left of that a unit to show how much it could count in such company. It was seldom that she could not in that manner preserve a person from the little detractions which steal so much away.

If not, as I said, technically a scholar, she was scholar in a sense far better for the ethical and social, as well as for the intellectual, purposes of life. For the best of philosophy, of literature, of the spirit and achievement of science and art, and the meaning in all the wide discussion, and likewise in the narrower contentions of thought and of practical endeavor in her own time—all this possessed her as mental and moral result, ready for application to human wants. Her resources of intellectual strength, clear perception, sound judgment and discrimination—the qualities and properties of the head—were not less than those of the heart, her steadfast affection, sympathy, tenderness. She saw at once another's need, and would let nothing go undone that might help to satisfy it. She was persistent to prove in public that Lincoln's great phrase at Gettysburg—"government of the people, by the people, for the people"—was really of Parker's making. But she was equally untiring in any case of securing the right thing to the humblest, poorest person who had once gained the consent of her care.

She was as ready in the helps of wit, humor, the child-like play of mirth, as she was in the sober gifts of mind and heart. Her laughter—though it often hid the face of pain, and veiled the flood of tears—relieved many a scene of dullness or of gloom for which no other cure was found. Quicker reply in fun was seldom heard. One day when I was with her, leaving the Boston Athenæum, she met Charles Sumner going in. After a little talk together, they moved their opposite ways; but quickly Mr. Sumner turned and called after her: "Well, Hannah! What good thing are you doing now?" The swift compliment, and rather heavy, fell upon her with some danger of embarrassment. But how cleverly she shifted the confusion back to him, as instantly she answered: "Oh,—talking about you!" The big Newfoundland-dog-like Senator was glad to hasten for shelter within the portals of art. It was, I think, just after his relief from the censure passed upon him by the legislature of his state, for his resolution to erase the battle-names from the flags of the restored country. He no doubt appreciated the loyalty of such talkers about him as she.

She had usually the most distinct and just estimates of people, great or small. And her own gifts were ever ready for all persons and occasions. I have heard her hold her own well in high converse by the country wayside, on a quiet summer morning, with Samuel Johnson—"Stupendous Samuel," she used to call him,—and directly seen her as much to the purpose engaged, in sport or in serious mood, with the plain farmer in barn or field, or with his wife among her milk-pans or her garden greens.

Such a lover of nature, as well as of men and women—and she was a delightful playmate with all children! She knew all things in the country, no less than in the town, and seemed known and welcomed of them. The walk was more than a walk; the drive lifted the common roads up to some grander and more joyous sphere, when her spirit guided the companionship. One little town, North Andover, Mass., a place of all rural beauties and delights, of all quaintnesses and curiosities, and "queer people," too, fully typical of the New England country life, spite of the "modern improvements"—this place knew her love, and returned it. One day the sisters went there, and with much entreaty got a kindly couple, but shy,—how endeared were they to become!—to "take them for a fortnight," on approval, as it were, to board. The fortnight stretched all through the summer. The winter connection was not broken. The fortnight reached on through well-nigh twenty summers, until at last this June has had to spend its own days without those twin-lovers there! In that dear old town are houses with rooms that never more will be lighted just as they have been by those spirits twain whose love flamed ever in one gentle glow.

It is hard not to show some things from Miss Stevenson's letters. Such letters! not often matched for words or thought, and never, within my knowing, for friendship's measureless outpourings. Yet always the wise head guides the rushing heart. Real literature, too, some passages might be. But as feeling is led by thought, so all her written thinking is transfused with the life-blood of the heart, with such a "moral flow" as seems to make all humanity its bed, and every little waif a pebble nestling or a flower nodding by the love-washed shore.

It brought back one's heart from despair of all good in existence, only to come and look in her eyes and hear her voice. Perfect faith, perfect peace seemed born of her perfect love. She was such a warder-off of real harms, and driver away of fancied ills, the black dogs of the fearful or the morbid mind! Blessing every day there was for many through that expulsion of evil which came to be in the very thought of her and in the sense that she was near. Once, when a "devastator of the day," some keen-scented agent or other, upon whom more vigorous applications had been wasted as easily as hints, who already had afflicted me, made threat of repeating his destruction of a Saturday morning, she, overhearing his purpose, called from the upper window to her good host below: "Mr. B., is that a decided case of small-pox at the parsonage?" "What!" exclaimed the devastator, "Small-pox at the parsonage? Good morning!" and off he went rapidly in the other direction. And so she made many disturbing or destroying agents take another road when she saw them on their way to hearts and homes. Where many a pain was coming, she filled the place with joy. For the sake of others she could bear all things. She could do good to one or to a hundred. She knew how to moderate the different climates of individuals inharmoniously brought together, and get an equable zone wherein good fruit of all might grow. And the solitary she could set in families of newly-roused natures fed and fructified through the mediating ministry of her all-hospitable soul. Herself of the best New England stock, she added to that best. And the grafts of her unselfish life upon less perfect growths have improved the products of the Fruit-bearer, the Earth.

* * * * *

I have before me a recent photograph of two seated in a room, among household gods endeared for their sake to many who dwell not under that roof, but know its hospitality. Sitting there, like spirits of love and tranquil faith, they make me think of ancient homage paid to the Mothers as divinities. And could all the heart-children come to this room, as to a shrine of affection, what blessings would be poured out, until the house could not receive them!

A few weeks pass, and the eye that looks on this picture sees the two sisters sitting together still; but the saddened mind becomes aware that shadow is more lasting than substance in mortal form. For the one has been taken, and the other is left—of these twain who are one soul, and seemed almost one flesh.

And yet, as they were lovely and pleasant in their lives, so, to fond hearts that look upon this picture now, or see them still with the inward eye, in death they are not divided.

JOHN H. CLIFFORD.

GERMANTOWN, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

I first met Hannah E. Stevenson in my college days at Cambridge, somewhere in the neighborhood of 1853 or '54, when I went into Boston one evening to attend one of Theodore Parker's receptions. It was the first time, too, I ever spoke to Theodore Parker, though I had frequently heard him speak in public, and was introduced to him as "a young man from Harvard college who heard him whenever I could." My chief remembrances of the evening are, Mr. Parker's welcoming shake of the hand and smiling eyes, as he said some pleasant words about his gratification at finding a friend among the Harvard students, the college at that time not showing much affection for him—this, and Miss Stevenson's genial efforts, supplementing Mrs. Parker's quiet domestic dignity, to make the guests feel at home. I remember her as interesting herself specially in the young people and strangers like myself, who were present, and breaking the ice for them in a most friendly way in the presence of such notabilities as Wendell Phillips, Doctor Howe, and others of Boston's great group of advanced thinkers and philanthropists at that time. Yes, one other thing concerning that reception sticks closely in my memory. I was presented to some elderly ladies who were seated on a sofa discussing the nature of the Soul. A chair was placed for me in front of them, and it was, I suppose, a compliment to my intelligence that they continued the discussion and asked my opinion on the question. But, though I had passed the sophomore year, and was still a young man, I was not much more ready to venture an opinion on the nature of the Soul than I am now. I stammered, however, some sentences, which I do not think could have thrown much light upon the subject, for the ladies afterward kept the discussion mainly to themselves, and I became a helpless listener. I think it was Miss Stevenson who extricated me from the dilemma by taking me to a group of more mundane talkers.

A number of years later the Civil War had come. Theodore Parker was buried in Italy; but "his soul was marching on" in America. And then I heard of Miss Stevenson carrying her warm sympathies, her instinctive tact, her womanly help, into work for the soldiers in hospital and at home, and leaving cheer and courage wherever she went. Still later, as Secretary of the Boston Freedmen's Aid Society, she became, to a large extent, the animating spirit of that most judiciously managed and successful philanthropy. Then it was that I began to meet her again, in connection with that work, and also when I was occasionally asked to speak on Sunday to the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, which, though it had lost its great leader, was still trying bravely in a smaller hall to continue its existence.

But it was not till 1867, when the Free Religious Association was formed, that I came into near intercourse with Miss Stevenson. She was one of the comparatively few women who attended the preliminary meeting at Dr. Bartol's in February of that year, and she was again present at the first public meeting in the following May at Horticultural Hall, and of the organization there effected was made one of the Directors. She took her place as naturally in this new movement as previously in the work for the soldiers and the freedmen. They were all logical steps in the developing expression of her religious thought,—that thought which, as a young woman, she had begun eagerly to imbibe from Theodore Parker's teachings, and which never grew old: it only ripened with the passing years and continued to bring forth fruit even in old age. In 1869 Miss Stevenson was elected Assistant Secretary of the Free Religious Association, and she held that office, by which she also remained ex officio a member of the Executive Board, for fourteen years. As I was Secretary of the Association during this time, I know personally, as none other can, how faithful, encouraging and judicious was all her work in this capacity. In the meantime, too, The Index was transferred to the Association, and she was elected one of the seven incorporated Trustees, to whose hands the publication of the paper was committed. This office she held to the time of her death.

Miss Stevenson, therefore, has been a part of the Free Religious Association during the entire twenty years of its existence. The service she gave it was not such as brought her conspicuously before the public eye, but it was none the less valuable service. In the counsels of committees the power of her personality always made itself felt. In a rare degree she combined zeal with judgment; a quick instinct of the right with intellectual acumen and the advantages of a wide experience and culture. She formed her decisions with intuitive rapidity, yet was able to give good reasons for them, and they generally proved to be correct. She had the gift of seeing at once the central point of a question, and was so clear and persuasive in stating it that others were easily led to follow the course which she advised. Though holding her purposes firmly, she was not opinionative nor combative, but always helpful. The Free Religious Association, perhaps, has had no member who individually did better work in propagating its views and principles. She drew young people around her by natural attraction, won their confidence, and knew just when and how to sow the seeds of liberal thought for which her quick eye saw their minds were ready. She circulated more of the publications of the Association, I think, than any other member of the committee in individual capacity. Yet she never thrust them in the face of the unwilling and unprepared, but seemed to know by instinctive sympathy just where and what to send.

By invitation of Miss Stevenson, the meetings of the Index

Trustees, as also the meetings of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, during the years when she was Assistant Secretary, were held at the joint residence of herself and a widowed sister. This long-continued hospitality, so cordially given by the two sisters, was itself a benefaction gratefully appreciated; and resolutions to this effect, and also designed to express a sense of the valuable service rendered by Miss Stevenson to the cause of Free Religion, were adopted by the Index Trustees at their last meeting, and were subsequently indorsed by the Executive Committee of the Association and sent to the surviving sister. These sisters, though not entirely agreeing in their religious views and relations, yet, united in a close bond of mutual respect and love, fully shared each other's joy in doing good.

In this brief notice I have confined myself so exclusively to my official connection with Miss Stevenson, that what I have written seems wholly inadequate to express my sense of the rare bountifulness and beauty of her large womanly nature. For no one could come to know her in any form of work without seeing that she was a Lady Bountiful, carrying blessing in whatever path she moved. She had unusual mental gifts, but her heart was still larger, and lavished its affections in a ceaseless and luxuriant outflow. Thus she drew within her charmed circle little children, young men and young women, the physically suffering and desitute, and those hungry for thought, the sick soldier, the benighted freedman, all ages and all conditions of human life; while she herself never seemed to grow old, though she lived to the verge of eighty years. Her letters overflowed with expressions of personal interest, often couched in most picturesque form. I rarely received even a brief business note from her which did not contain some tender inquiry or message, in phrase all her own, for those I loved and whom she had taken into her heart. Among the things for which I value the Free Religious Association personally for myself is that it enabled me to know this gifted woman and to count her my friend.

WM. J. POTTER.

Sometimes she was "Miss Stevenson," sometimes "Aunt Hannah," or oftener, in speaking of her to each other, "dear Aunt Hannah;" but simple "Hannah Stevenson" was, after all, the name that fitted best in thought the sweet and noble woman friend who has just missed her eighty-first birthday on the earth. She seemed a bright contemporary of all the young things in one's mind and heart,—not old enough to be the "aunt," too real for other prefix. And then there are persons whom one always likes to think of by the first name, it honors so one's self. Therefore, "Hannah Stevenson."

Another reverend name stands just behind hers in the thought of many of us, and that is Theodore Parker's. To belong, as she did, to the "first families" of Boston meant, fifty years ago, to be cramped by the standards of a culture high in certain aspects, but narrow and provincial; and to then welcome Parker meant to be a fugitive from this circle—a fugitive looked at severely as an estray, except as love on both sides kept the family ties perfect in their strength. In her case, it always kept them so. She must have been influenced by the emancipating Transcendentalism of the day, and yet have craved something more stalwart and practical than it directly offered. She was nearing thirty-four and Parker was nearing thirty-one, when he preached in 1841 the sermon on "The Transient and the Permanent in Christianity" that made him first infamous, then famous. It linked him at the moment in the city talk and city papers with Voltaire and Paine as "infidel" and "scorner" and "blasphemer." The night she read the sermon, it thrilled her with its high fidelity and that deep reverence which it took most Boston Unitarians years to recognize as such. She wrote to him about it—I think, first some verses, sent without her name.

Will she not forgive me if I draw them from their hiding-place at the end of Mr. Parker's own copy of his sermon, lying now before me? They are simple lines but prophetic, and others will like to see this first greeting of the two friends.

With lowly heart and lofty aim
Speed on thy pilgrim way,
Unmoved if breath of vulgar fame
Reville or laud to-day.

Still on—though slander's varied forms
May hiss and howl around:
The heavenly harmony within
Can deaden all that sound.

On—though the sunlight of friends' smile
To chilling aspects turn:
For in the darkened, lonely wild
Stars myriad o'er thee burn.

And cheerful strike thy harp the while,
E'en mid the pains and needs
Of one who seeks the Holy Land
As the Good Spirit leads.

For souls athirst are drinking in
Thy clear tones with delight.
Heaven bless thee for thy uttered word!
Heaven guide thy footsteps right!

July 10, 1841.

H. E. S.

The friendship with Mr. and Mrs. Parker, thus begun, grew very close. By and by, sickness in the Parker family brought her into the home to do what a friend there could; and her mind-help and heart-help proved so large that, when, in January, 1847, the village pastor moved to Boston to become the preacher to the multitude, and the hard names grew still harder, even to "liar," "scoundrel," "the wolf in the sheep's clothing,"—then both his work and his heart needed Hannah Stevenson. Thenceforth she was part of his home.

How much she was already to him is hinted in a letter written just before this moving, in answer to her remonstrance against certain anti-slavery language which he had made so strong it sounded coarse. He answered slowly, but decidedly, "I am glad I said it, glad I said it just so;" and then: "I like your letter much. The wounds of a friend I will bear thankfully, and keep forever the blessed scars thereof. Do so always. I don't want to wait for my foes to tell me my faults. You have an insight, a depth of vision, and a delicacy of soul far greater than I have ever met before, and can help me more than any other one." Those who knew her well in later years can easily believe that Parker never in his estimate uncrowned her of those words. She was a sister to his mind, making, with Mrs. Parker, a home audience for all the best that he could think and say,—one with whom he could talk his way toward clear truth before its public utterance; one sure to appreciate,—sure, too, to frankly criticise. To a close woman-friend the earnest in a man is apt to sparkle into fun, the fun is always deepening into earnest; and so it was between these two. It was she to whom are written those letters printed in the "Life," beginning "Dear old Ladye," "Dear poor old Ladye,"—letters in which book-talk, his latest reading, politics, reforms, and purest nonsense, all bubble out together; and we can see his laughing face bending above the letter as he writes. She could say from knowledge whom Parker meant or did not mean by this or that pillory passage in the sermons. And she it is to whom we owe many of the little personal anecdotes and home touches in Frothingham's "Life of Parker," and which she afterward gathered together hers if in the sketch she wrote to preface Putnam's edition of the "Discourse of Religion."

All that friendship lay on the farther side of the war years; for the date on the gray stone in the Florence burying-ground is May 10, 1860. But we,—we always thought of her still as Theodore Parker's friend, a womanly translation of his life that made him more than any "Life" we read a presence. Not by any means that she became his mere memorial, as friends of the noble sometimes do. It was her very independence, the sweet force of her own self, that made it seem so natural she should have been to Parker what she was. Her love of him still held room for criticism; but she watched, with full assurance of their coming, the signs of growing justice toward him, and felt "heartiest satisfaction" when, at last, the American Unitarian Association published the volume of his works two years ago. Speaking then of "the right of Parker to be considered a representative Unitarian," she wrote: "It has long been clear that, in England and among the younger men here, that was his recognized position, but the old animus of the American Unitarian Association seemed to gloom over it still, and chill all kind feeling toward the man and his work. This step, however, commits it to his companionship; and we can forget its tardiness in its apparent spontaneity now. I really think there will be a sort of light-heartedness in the ranks with the feeling that an act of justice has been done. I feel like congratulating the denomination on this Emancipation Act."

She never grew "conservative" with years, perhaps because she could never have been aggressively radical with youth. Her sympathy kept constant to the freshening thought in our religious movement, and still she judged the men and movement. To a question where Parker, with his ardent theism, would have found himself in the recent "issue in the west," she answered last July: "Do you hesitate to believe that Parker would still have been in the forefront for freedom, if among the combatants? With the ameliorating influence of age, I think he would have been as gentle and self-restrained as others are now—God bless them!—in the battle they have not sought to wage. The brave, assured tone of UNITY each week stirs my heart, and I cannot resist the feeling that great results are to follow this movement." On the eve of the recent Conference came her greeting, for the very first time not in her own quaint handwriting: "Too weak to read or write, but brimful of hope for the result of the Conference of 17th-19th instant. Lovingly, H. E. S." The answer, telling the result, was sent early to reach her in time; and she "kept it by her till she knew no more."

I knew her best as one sitting in that simple parlor on the Boston hill, more and more sure to be "in" as years went by and foot or hand or throat was bound by pain; the other sister, always sitting with her, completing the quiet picture and the cordial welcome. "Lovingly, H. E. S." Always that. What dear letters of love she wrote! Had she kept this eightieth birthday on the earth, and kept it according to her wont in these latter years, we know one thing she would have done. This is from her birthday letter five years back:

July 16, 1882, NORTH ANDOVER.

Dear —, On this loveliest of midsummer mornings, in the dewy freshness of the day, the sky all blue, the air balm, the earth all green and leafy, the fields fragrant with new mowing; the red-breasts encouraging their little fledglings with promises of "cherry, cherry, cherry!"; the mysterious little summoner calling "Bob White" in notes so distinct that you expect the summoned individual to reply, "Here I am," the family of squirrels that live in the near wood-pile and forage about the fences and doors, their lives a perpetual wink, —in the midst of all this homely rural delight, I sit in the open door, and consecrate the day by reading yet again my Lesson for the Day; and, while my heart throbs with joy for "the love of God to the hillsides and the good news revealed in wild flowers," I remember with deeper joy what friends make my inner life fragrant and musical. And so, on this day, the seventy-fifth anniversary of my plain, common, inconspicuous, but happy life, I write to those I love.

Is that "seventy-five," or is it the happy heart and happy eyes of twenty? How happy-sweet her voice always was! You heard it as pleasant sound behind any words she spoke. Her face was one where goodness had made plainness beautiful. She seemed of no age,—any more than love or goodness has an age. And therefore death makes little difference in our thought of her and in the blessing of the thought. But it gives leave now to say the things we only felt before.

W. C. GANNETT.

(In part from the Christian Register.)

"The pilgrim they laid in a chamber
Whose window opened toward the sun-rising.
The name of the chamber was Peace.
There he lay till break of day, and then
He rose and sang."

—Bunyan.

Preachers Who Fire Over Peoples' Heads.

Sometimes a criticism intended in reproach becomes a compliment. What is meant, when we are told that some of our preachers aim too high? What are we to conclude, when it is charged to them that they occupy too lofty a signal-post or attempt too much with the baby-brains of their auditors? We have material for several inferences. Let us be just by assuming the higher truth. What, forsooth, does the preacher mean by his vaulting ambition? No doubt a tribute to the best that is in man. He grants the severe direction of his thought, but insists upon the ability of men to equal and follow it. He appeals to their future as against their past. He asks them to choose between their yesterday's weakness and their to-morrow's strength. Over whose head does this shot whistle? I ask my friend who complains. Ah! 'tis not his, but another's! All around the circle they tell me their charge, but they do not bring in their victim. What value has an appeal that is not on the upward note? Why should we wish our thought easy? How dare we say truth is ever too high for us? Bless us! wise men are not so common that we should wish to escape the dangers of their glory. It is no compliment to your intelligence to suppose that you are hungry for commonplaces, and that you resent wisdom as an offering of injustice. The cheap, the mean, the brass, the echo, the traditional, is plentiful enough in the churches. One can easily be fed that way into rapid theological gluttony. But you who think at all are worthy of thinking well. It is especially true of liberal churches that they deserve something more than a shallow freedom.

I have in mind one spokesman for truth, speaker in an eastern church, whose discourses, Sunday after Sunday, are full of a spiritual beauty, and a lofty, wonderful independence, which are the love of all who can measure the style of the man. Yet divers presumed thinkers have approached me with questions as to the purity of the method pursued by this philosopher. Is he not a wanderer from the plain facts of life? Does he not deal in big abstract realities (they allow me that!) of which those who hear him can little conceive? Why should he not come down? May it not be a sort of philosophic pride which reserves him thus on his isolated height? And then he dares to question the ordinary manner of discourse, which fixes argument and illustration in logical proportions! Well—let us weigh all that, indeed, and more, as we have often enough done, and remain steadfast, as we will find ourselves, in our admiration. For here is a spokesman for truth who never moves one hair's-breadth from the simple course of his ideal. He believes men are to be measured by high things rather than low. He conceives that his listeners form a spiritual democracy, with many visions essentially so equal that they may become one. He would no more think of questioning their duty to hear than his to say, and as to this he is quite at peace. Shall we catch this music as it comes, or step from its path unworthy of the sympathy it invites? Two things are necessary if he is to be entirely understood—an independence not less than his, and a sweetness that mingles all things in an atmosphere of love. How can you see if not by first being free? And freedom means generosity, sweetness, to be free of paltry aims, to avoid illusive ease, to accept all that is implied in the possession of reason and affection. This man, of whom one and another substitute a question for a tribute, is no more to be turned from his ample dreams than the world is physical from their courses. To admit for an instant that he could suffer such a temptation is ruinous. At once he would be doubting his faith and doubting his friends.

Besides, he may say he has spoken and been heard! What theory so strong as to stand against the first breath of appreciation? And the first soul moved higher by the tenderness of his thought bears with it the assurance of the final recognition of the duldest. I have seen this in my eastern teacher and found in it the refutation of all criticism. One does not shrink, then, from the danger of a too marked ascension, but rather from the tendency to coddle people, to give them simply what they come to hear, to shatter faith in the capacity of the race to see and suffer for the grander truths. Must we ever show men the specific direction for their daily deeds?

Is it not more important to help them to self-help than to make them slaves to the mass or to our untrusting commonplaces? No fact that one mind can see can be entirely incommunicable to another. The direct shot is from truth in one brain to truth in another. The stricter the purity, the surer the destiny. And purity means height. Thus my dear friend, and any other like unto him, stands acquitted—cleared by his two-sided faith, the one in his ideal, the other in man's power of growth.

H. L. T.

Race Consciousness.

Every heartfelt word I read or hear about human brotherhood, or race fellowship, sends me back, in thought at least, to the pages of Henry James, who wrote so earnestly on that subject. It was his great theme, the doctrine of "Society, the Redeemed Form of Man," as he named his last book. This, he taught, is the real Incarnation (typified by the personal Christ), the Divine Natural Humanity, the God-Man; our race-consciousness or social consciousness being our real life; while our personal consciousness, or feeling of self-hood (our proprium, according to Swedenborg), is our everlasting bane, except as we make it a mere stepping-stone to a higher life of spontaneous worship of God in the service of our fellow-men.

The great marriage that Mr. James wrote so much about implies the union of each with all, or the harmonizing of public and private interests. He says: "Our natural evolution, or our race destiny, is to put on Divine form and order; and this form and order undeniably consist in each man seeking supremely the good of the whole and in all men seeking supremely the good of each." He says: "I find it unspeakably blessed to believe that there is a Divine-natural destiny slowly but surely working out, which no spiritual wickedness in high places, nor any personal stupidity and egotism on our part can seriously compromise."

The purpose of God in creation is, he teaches, "to form a heaven out of the human race, and make history infallibly conduce to that supreme end, in becoming ever more and more a grand school of discipline for humanity, in which men, taught by a profound experience of the evils of self-love and love of the world, may at last become naturally or spontaneously roused to react against these evils, and freely incline instead to the promotion and culture of a race-sentiment in humanity, which has no practical admixture of evil and falsity in it to betray and defeat their devotion."

Only one more quotation, and that shall be from a private letter written by Mr. James in 1875:

"But what I feel myself most inclined to desire is that we may all of us, each in his degree, have so pungent an experience of the evil and honor wrapped up in our existing civilization, as to make us revolt from it as a Divine finality in the earth, and open our ears consequently to the truth of human solidarity which is alone able to end the dire enchantment we are under. I don't believe that anyone can positively promote human destiny more than another; but we can all of us promote it negatively, by standing in our ranks and bearing patiently what outward oppression is incident to our position, while inwardly loathing it as a Divine obligation; and he will promote it most who, feeling most this inward rebellion, yet most abounds in the requisite outward patience. This is a sort of living prayer that escapes Mr. Tyndall's criticism, and fills one with peace at times proof against all disturbance. In fact, the role of faith in human affairs was never so urgent and active—it seems to me—as now; and I feel sure, for my part, that it is really moving the world onward to its destined rest more than all the intellectual, or rather scientific and religious, activity of the time. The splendor of faith as a factor in human progress is that it is invisible, or unsuspected, and so provokes no friction by which its force is wasted, but goes directly to the heart and hand of God from which it comes."

F. E. R.

The Cosmic Tortoise.

Eureka! Eureka!

Our elders were right,
Their long buried wisdom
Again sees the light.

But just as you'd startle,
Should hoary-haired Eld,
On shelf of museum
At Bulak beheld,

To life re-awaken,
Step loftily down,
And homage to Ram'ses
Demand with a frown,—

So shrinketh, half-frighted,
E'en Progress herself,
When mummied Truth rises
From Fable's dim shelf.

But Science, keen-sighted
And wise to the core,
Sees grandest of truths in
This pearl of myth-lore.

Our planet is resting
On pachyderm strength,
And that on the tortoise
Outstretcheth its length;

The reptile on Vishnu
His weight doth repose,
And gods need no foothold,
As everyone knows.

Form changes, Truth never:
Our Vishnu is Force,
Persistent in matter
As tortoise in course;

And losing nought ever,
Though changing in name,
Continues like Proteus
Forever the same.

Our law Evolution
The Cosmos sustains,
With swing elephantine
Its rhythm maintains.

Thus ancient and modern
In harmony meet,
And round the truth, spheroid,
To fullness complete;

While planet and atom,
In star-beam and sod,
Keep step to the music
Orchestral of God!

Mrs. J. W. F.

Sex in Sin.

Remorse is written on her face,—
But watch them draw their skirts aside,
And note that scornful look they cast
On one who fain would stem sin's tide.

And watch them now,—for here he comes
Who lured that fallen one to sin;
They greet him with their sweetest smile,
Ope wide their doors and bid him in.

The sin in her, whom we call weak,
Through life remains a damning blot;
But 'tis in him, whom we call strong,
An "indiscretion" soon forgot.

WINDSOR, Nova Scotia.

Digitized by Google AVONIAN.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Aztecs: Their History, Manners and Customs. From the French of Lucien Biart. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $2.00.

Travelers who visit Mexico to-day tell us wonderful stories of its beauty and fertility in places. Scholarly or thoughtful persons, finding, in the midst of all this, vestiges of an ancient and wonderful civilization which met the astonished eyes of the Spanish conquerors, will naturally desire to learn something of that period. Special students in this subject have brought a vast amount of knowledge within the grasp of the general reader. Seldom is the information given with such clearness, freedom from exaggeration and from tiresome statistics, as we find in the above mentioned work on the ancient Mexicans. The author says he prepared the volume with a view to interest and instruct the reader who is unfamiliar with these primitive people. In this he has assuredly been most successful. He presents us with a very interesting and satisfactory volume, which will meet the demand of the general reader for historical information.

After a brief description of the country, its first inhabitants, its different tribes, we follow the various wanderings of the special tribe of Aztecs who finally overcome others and settle on the Lake Tezcoco, founding there in 1325 the city of Mexico. A comprehensive and orderly account is given of the religious worship and priestly ceremonies of these people, of the government and its attendant divisions, of princely royalty on the one hand and servitude on the other; ceremonies connected with birth, marriage and death; education and parental counsel; justice as administered by supreme and severe laws; military institutions and customs of war; agriculture and markets, including a description of the wonderful floating gardens which were invented by the Aztecs and cultivated with great success. Trades, arts, costumes, food, amusements and sports; all these are written of understandingly and with admirable succinctness.

Although we find much to deplore in the sickening accounts of human sacrifice and barbarity, we also see many laws in force among the Aztecs showing a zeal for morality. Stealing of all kinds was severely condemned, guardians who rendered false accounts were hanged. Drunkenness was a capital crime. A person who became intoxicated, if he belonged to the nobility, was strangled and his body thrown into a lake or river; if a plebeian, he lost his liberty, but it was only on the second offence that he was punished with death. A law-giver, having been asked why he was more severe toward a noble than toward a plebeian, answered: "It is because the crime of the first is more serious, since he ought to show a good example." The same king ordered that historians who recorded facts incorrectly in their paintings should be punished with death. Truth and industry were regarded as virtues of supreme importance. If children were detected in a lie, their tongues were pricked with agave thorns. The young were brought up with a profound respect for their parents; and the documents quoted, "being exhortations of a father to his son, and those of a mother to her daughter," are codes of counsel suitable for all times.

Memorials of the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, B. A. Edited by his son, Philip Henry Wicksteed. London: Williams & Norgate. 1886.

The portrait of an honored Unitarian minister of England, who died two years ago,—drawn by his son, himself an honored Unitarian minister, Martineau's successor in a London parish. A triplach portrait, showing the man in a life-sketch, in his letters, and in a dozen sermons. He belonged to the scholar-generation of Martineau and Thom and J. J. Tayler, less gifted than these dear friends of his, but standing with them before the little public of his Church a fourth. A man among his fellows to balance views, avoid extremes, see the common sense of the thing, expound the intermediate ground,—but to outsiders a sturdy, knock-down defender of the faith called Unitarian, for this was common sense, and he thought that "the great thing to do with a truth was to tell it." A man living for unselfish ends, and in all his work "doing nothing badly, if thought and care could secure its being done well." "I think my chief and only power," he says, "is the putting to their full use the faculties I have. If it be so, I have reason to be grateful and contented. My two talents are made four; how can I murmur that of five which I never had I cannot make ten? In his home "a lover to the day of his death," and to his children "a sort of incarnation of the moral and religious life in its awful but not in its forbidding aspects;" and "he never forgot or was forgotten by a friend."—Nothing rare in all this, yet how much it means when seventy-five years of thought and work and love can be summed up so.

But this life had its pathos in a haunting shadow,—apparently the shadow of a father's temperament cast across his own. The hard-working minister of Liverpool and Leeds broke down at only forty four. "The weight and responsibility of such an office have always to me crushed out the joy of it." The work was given up, and the city pastor, hiding himself in a valley of Wales, turned farmer. It was a lovely spot, but as he drained the stiff clay meadows the meadows drained his pockets, and again he had to write it "Failure." But again only a surface-failure; for there the boys and girls grew up and there he regained health. At sixty three, returning to the old work, he became a sort of Minister-at-Large for England! Up and down the land he went preaching Unitarianism,—the lecture invitations pouring in till the old man was well past seventy. So that the sun-set years were among his busiest and happiest and most consciously successful. And sun-set years must be a blessed time to take one's consciousness of service.

W. C. G.

A Half Century in Salem. By M. C. D. Silsbee. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

Salem town in Massachusetts has always been especially fortunate in finding chroniclers of its distinctive sights and customs, who could relate from personal knowledge and interest or from direct tradition. Mrs. Silsbee, who writes of "A Half Century in Salem," does so with every right of one at home in its inner social circles. She gives us more or less "harmless gossip," using names freely, but with kindly intent. She tells us the true story of those Salem gibraltars, which helped to make the town famous, and remembers the election cake, which seems to be becoming almost a lost art in New England,—or is it that cake doesn't taste as once it did? She is one whose great grandchildren boast, as she says, of a grandmother eight or nine times removed, who was hung for a witch on Witch Hill. The book is interesting, even to one not a Salemite.

E. E. M.

Magazine of American History, illustrated. Edited by Mrs. Martha J. Lamb, 748 Broadway, N. Y.

This magazine for July, comes with its usual typographical beauty and good table of contents. The short description of the famous Pickett charge at Gettysburg is very stirring. There is an article on manuscript sources of American history, and one on the United States mail service. The leading article is on "Henry Laurens in the London Tower," an interesting and dignified incident of our Revolution.

Shakespeareana. Philadelphia: Leonard Scott Publication Society. For June and July.

Devoted as usual to many special attractions of its great subject. A publication to be prized by Shakespeare lovers. The leading article for June is "On the Likeness between Bobadil and Falstaff;" for July, "The Taming of a Shrew, and the Taming of the Shrew." In the June number a note is given from a letter by George Eliot, in which the great novelist says: "Shakespeare's great tragedies thrill me, let them be acted as they may." We like that. We would not envy the mind or heart of a person who could find nothing to say of a poor performance of Shakespeare but that the play was murdered. We should think it as much murdered by the stupidity of the spectator as by the poor actor.

THE HOME.

"Ifs" for Mothers and Fathers.

You will do well by your children,
 If you treat them as "children" without much thought of what they will "turn out" to be;
 If you take pains to give them a happy childhood;
 If you manage them by a few clear rules and never threaten;
 If you train their wills instead of breaking them;
 If you encourage them to talk at meal times;
 If you see that each of them can do something to entertain company;
 If you give each of them a share in any good work that you do;
 If you give them freedom to strike out new ways of employing and enjoying themselves.

F. E. M.

"And Dod will Say——."

Two little cousins, each a four-year-old, were talking about heaven. One of them asked: "How will we get into Dod's heaven? Will we open a door in the clouds?" "Why, I know," was the response. "We will do up to heaven and knock bam-bam-bam, and Dod will turn the handle and open the door; and we will walk in, and Dod will say, 'Why, how! ou tum to heaven, too?' And I will say: 'Es, Dod. Don't ou know every night in my wayers I say, Take me to heaven?' And Dod will say, 'Tourse I does, my baby—tourse I does.'" And the little voice took a tender tone that showed how truly she felt our Father's fatherhood.—Babyhood.

"Amen."

"Is God twins?" asked a three-year-old of his mother, when he found he should close his evening prayer with "Amen" instead of "A man." The baby was more profound than he knew, as babies frequently are. Perhaps that is the way the children would like it best, but we older ones put it differently by saying, "Our Father and Mother in Heaven." We have a very definite thought when we say this; the baby had a definite question. These "Pleasant-ries" in the Christian Register, where this was told, have a cruel way of stopping just at the interesting climax! We wish we knew how the mother answered that query.

A German Legend.

When God the Lord had made the whole wide world, and saw that it was all good, he sent all the animals to Adam, that he should give to each its name; but all the flowers he placed before himself, and went from one to another, telling each its name so that they all knew what they were to be called.

But one little flower had looked up so happily with its blue eyes at the blessed God, opening its golden heart to him, it forgot itself, and so did not know its name. It was very much ashamed, and bowed its blossoms and buds, saying, "Ah, dear Lord, be not angry with me; I could not help gazing at thee, till I forgot everything, even my name thou gavest me; wilt thou tell it to me again, and I will not again forget." Then God looked kindly at the little flower at his feet; "I am not angry with you; that you forgot yourself is no sin, only 'Forget-me-not.'" And with that he went away, for the dear Lord could not stay long by a little flower—earth and heaven wait upon him.—Selected.

"To think, to feel, to do
 Only the holy Right,
 To yield no step in the awful race,
 No blow in the fearful fight."

A Rock that Makes Children Better.

It is nothing but a rock, that once lay on the beach of one of the coves of Cape Cod Bay. One day in 1620 some Englishmen came rowing along the beach, wanting a good place to land, and they saw the rock, and said, "That will be a good place to step ashore,—steer the boat for that rock." And the Pilgrim Fathers, as we call them,—for they were the men in the boat,—landed at the rock. At least, this is the story that has come down to us from that day. And so the rock has grown almost sacred to the nation,—almost a Holy Rock. It is no longer on the beach, but up in the town under a canopy with a fence around it, so that neither the waves can wash it nor people chip it away. And men and women and children come from far and near to see it.

The other day the children of the Unity Sunday-school in Worcester went down to Plymouth to see it. It was their Sunday-school picnic. Senator Hoar, one of the Massachusetts senators, invited them: he thought it might make them better men and women by and by, if they should see that rock. They went to Burial Hill, and by the other burial place where the dead Pilgrims were laid in that first winter when half of the little company died; and to Pilgrim Hall, where the Mayflower relics are kept; and to the great statue of Faith, which the nation has built in memory of the forefathers. But the old rock was the best of all. The iron gates were opened and the children gathered round it, and there Senator Hoar talked to them. And this is what he said,—we find it in a Worcester paper sent by some friend:

"I do not think there is any need of speaking here. There can be no eloquence like that of the rock itself. There is no child here so small as not to know its story. There is no person here so old as not to be stirred in its presence. The children know why we have brought them here. They know what their fathers did and what has come of it. They came across the ocean, leaving behind home and wealth and luxury, and landed on this coast in midwinter, when the woods all round them were filled with wild beasts and savages; they encountered sickness and cold and suffering; more than half of them died before spring; and yet, when the ship went home to England, not one of them went back. It was because of that that we now have a country.

"There were other colonies at other places. But it was the men who came here who brought with them freedom and justice and law. But for them and the principles they brought with them, the nation upon this continent would not have been this nation. There would have been a nation where the rule of many by one would still have been the law. There would have been a nation where slavery prevailed—where women would be whipped, and little children would be sold at auction, and it would be a crime to teach men to read the Bible, and the limbs of the men and women who do the work would be the property of other people and not their own. But it is because these men and women brought over here the principles of justice and freedom and law, because they were ready to give up everything for them, to live for them and to die for them, and because they taught their children to live for them and die for them, that now we have a country where these principles prevail from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf.

"This is why we have brought you children here. We want you to see the spot where your fathers set their feet, and to remember who they were and what they did. We want you to know that freedom and justice can not be kept unless you are ready to do the same thing; unless the boys when they grow up are ready to leave everything else for them, and, if need be, to die for them; and unless the girls will give their brothers and sons and husbands for them. You may not fully realize all this now, though I think you understand it pretty well. But as you grow older you will know it better, and you will remember, as long as you live, the day you came here, and what you have seen and heard."

W. C. G.

"On bravely through the sunshine and the shower,
 Time hath his work to do, and we have ours."

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, ... J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, . . . H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, ... DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label or every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Where are the Ministers?—Most of them are off in search of rest. Crothers, of St. Paul, is summering with his old friends at Brattleboro, Vt. Simmons finds the new church at Minneapolis working so well that he can not stop. Learned, of St. Louis, passed through Chicago the other day, on his way to Dublin, N. H. Snyder and his family are rusticated in western Massachusetts. We are sorry to hear that Bro. Waite, of Janesville, Wis., is compelled to suspend his successful labors on account of illness. Miss Murdock and Miss Safford are to spend a month at Ham-filton, Ill. Missionary Clute is in the east. Utter, of the First church, Chicago, is bicycling in southern Ohio. Milsted, of Unity church, Chicago, is in Europe. Mr. Blake, of the Third church, will spend his summer in and around the city. The associate editors of UNITY are taking their turns in relieving the senior editor, and for five or six weeks he will be off the tripod. UNITY will be glad to note the wanderings of other workers, if the necessary information be conveyed to the office.

Unitarian Grove Meeting at Weirs, N. H., July 26-31.—The approaching tenth annual meeting promises to be the best yet. The committee extend hearty invitation to all people, good Unitarian-wise or otherwise. Tuesday begins it—a "Unity Club Bureau" day—with papers on science, art (by Ellen Hale and Darius Cobb), and poetry (by J. L. Jones and G. W. Cooke). Wednesday offers addresses and a lake excursion. Thursday, a temperance meeting, a woman's meeting (Mrs. J. W. Howe and others), a "Unity of the Spirit" meeting, with addresses from seven denominations, and a lecture on "Hamlet," by J. K. Applebee. Friday, a sermon and Laymen's meetings, with "Honorable" and "Judges" promised. Saturday, more of sermon, more of address (by Professor Booker T. Washington) on "Education in the South," more of the lake, and more conference meeting. Sunday, sermons by Minot J. Savage and Brooke Herford. Monday, August 1, an excursion to Mount Washington,—it's top!

Weirs is in the midst of the mountain and lake region, and it will be impossible not to have a good time with nature, as well as a good time with each other. Prices at hotels and private houses vary from $1 to $2 a day, and from $5 to $10 a week; or cottages can be had for self-boardings. To secure a room apply to "The Unitarian Grove Meeting Committee, Weirs, N. H." For other details write to the Secretary, James B. Morrison, Lancaster, N. H.

The Free Religious Association.—At the recent annual meeting, the President, Wm. J. Potter, suggested a reconstruction of the Association,—its division into four working sections, each having its own organization, but all to be included in one general body. The Executive Committee now issue a circular, submitting the plan to the consideration of friends, and the President (to be addressed at New Bedford, Mass.) invites correspondence and suggestions on the subject. The four sections proposed are:

(1.) SECTION OF SOCIOLOGY.—For the thoughtful study of all problems pertaining to the social elevation of mankind, and for inciting and organizing practical measures to promote such progress.

(2.) SECTION OF RELIGIOUS AND ETHICAL PHILOSOPHY.—Designed to bring together scattered thinkers and scholars on these subjects, and to encourage original research therein, according to the scientific method.

(3.) SECTION OF NATURAL SCIENCE IN ITS RELATION TO RELIGION AND ETHICS.—For intellectual workers occupying a distinct and wide domain, but so closely allied to those of the second section that the two at first, perhaps, might best be classed together.

(4.) SECTION OF THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO THE STATE.—For resisting encroachments on liberty of conscience in religion, and for removing barriers to such liberty which may still exist in statute-books, contrary to the fundamental theory of civil government in this country.

The English Unitarian Anniversaries were lively this year. Two important suggestions made there bear on problems of our own. The British Unitarian Association now grants its aid, the $150 to $300, year after year, directly to the struggling church, the church electing its own minister: in place of this system, which often fails to lift the church and make it self-supporting, the Rev. H. S. Solly urged the employment by the Association of men specially qualified for up-building work, whom it should send as its missionaries to these needy churches for two or three years,—the congregation, on its part, to accept this agent as its minister and pay to the Association whatever it raised on salary account, the aim being to increase this payment till it became an adequate salary, when the congregation would become independent and again appoint its own pastor. An increased prestige and continuity for the work, larger subscriptions to support it, and, on the missionary's part, the stimulus of a "career,"—were the advantages claimed for the plan. Special visitations for short periods by "half a dozen high-class ministers" employed as missionaries, were also urged.

The other suggestion came up in the Sunday-school Society's meeting, to which, by the way, our English cousins pay far more attention than we do here. What should we say to a 9 o'clock breakfast at a central hall, nearly the entire floor covered with tables and the tables crowded,—and this on a rainy London morning, with the people coming London distances by train and omnibus? That is the way they do the thing in England. After the breakfast came the reports and talks, and then Rev. Joseph Wood read a paper proposing a Sunday-school Training College. "Let us suppose that during the long vacation of Manchester New College, [their theological school,] when the class-rooms are silent and the professors' chairs are vacant, a score of teachers from different parts of the country could be persuaded to come into residence for a fortnight's instruction and training in Sunday-school teaching and management. Let us suppose a fortnight's or a month's association of these teachers in a kind of collegiate life. Let us suppose that during the fortnight there should be given, by the best qualified men to be found, four sets of lectures of twelve each—one set on school management and organization; one on the principles and methods of kindergarten, as applied to infant classes in Sunday-schools; one on how to teach the Bible to children; and one on child nature, the order of growth in a child's faculties, and the kindred topics of what may be called simple and practical psychology. And suppose that alongside with these lectures on the theory and art of teaching, practical acquaintance is made with the best methods by visits to some of our best schools, Board schools and others. Do you not think those teachers would derive immense benefit from such a course of training, even within the limits of a single fortnight? Do you think it possible for such a gathering to take place once a year and not be productive of large results in our schools?" The discussion showed that these "supposes" seemed to some of the others impracticable, but that, instead of the central training college, normal classes could perhaps be organized in the large cities with a traveling lectureship.

A third most interesting and urgent plea came from a Japanese, the Marquis Tokugawa, —a plea with the Association to establish in Japan, and that without delay, a Unitarian Mission. In the decay of the native faith the land, he said, was ready for a religion of reason and character, which Unitarians better than the other Churches could propagate.

Our John W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, was present at these anniversary meetings, adding much, we hear by English letters, to the snap and brightness of them. He gave a noble sermon to the ministers on "The Revelation of God," (printed in the Unitarian Review for June), and his soirée speech is reported at full length in the papers. It was a glowing, hopeful picture of the Unitarian outlook in America, the very opposite of the wall that another Brooklyn messenger gave forth to the same audience on the same theme three or four years ago. Mr. Chadwick spoke, apparently, before word of our last Conference had reached him, but in frankest sympathy with the general position of the Western Conference. He writes that the interest in the question that has been before us all the year is scarcely less there than here, and that the ministers there as here seem to have been well pamphleted by our critics.

"Elderly People's Sunday."—Many of us now keep "Children's Sunday," at Hudson, Mass., "the pastor recently preached the annual sermon to those who have reached the age of seventy," and, in a word to the Christian Register, he advocates "Elderly People's Sunday, as a tender tribute of gratitude to those for whom the most that we can do is much too little." It is not many western parishes that could gather "from fourteen to twenty-seven of these special listeners," nor many western villages where, through the newspaper "forty aged people could regard the sermon as their own." "A graceful part of the service is the singing by a choir of children." It surely is a tender thought, a lovely deed of reverence. And yet, do the aged people usually like thus to be classed by themselves,—or rather, just the other way, to feel that not even reverence separates them from the young singers and workers of the day?

The Christian Register.—Our big sister has another gift to enable her to see more of the world, and the world to see more of her, in missionary ways. $500, $1,000 and now another $1,000, in all $2,500, have been given her within a few weeks, the income of which is to send the Register abroad with a free gospel. May the fund double and triple, and then repeat the process! No paper more deserves and more rewards such mission-trust.

Buda, Ill.—The perverse types in UNITY, July 2, in reporting Mrs. Covell's letter, read at the anniversary of her husband's seventieth birthday, made her say "the friend is the Bible," instead of "the friend is tangible;" also,

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JULY 23, 1887.

[NUMBER 21.]

EDITORIAL.

THE New Theology Herald for July appears in the shape of a neat monthly, a form much better adapted to its missionary work than the previous semi-monthly. It is rich with suggestive material. One of the editors, in an article, tries to discover the common ground under the "freethinker" and the Liberal theologian. The article closes with the following timely wisdom:—

"The tide of thought is changing. Iconoclasm has had its best day. The destroyer is laying down his hammer, and the builder is coming with his square and plumb-line. When the first flush of antagonism toward discovered error has been superseded by a vital enthusiasm for the larger, nobler truth, the freethinker may become a zealous worker on the growing temple of the broader faith. The hammer of his logic will then be used to shape instead of to smite, and walls will rise instead of crumble as he works. Hasten the day when the theologian will be free to think, and the Freethinker free to perceive and teach a rational, scientific theology."

THE Fewish Messenger, for July 15th, publishes in full Rabbi Iliowizi's address at the dedication of the Unitarian church, Minneapolis. It is a comparative study of the "Priest, Prophet and Sage." The address throughout is characterized by scholarship, liberality and piety. We make room for a single paragraph from what is worth printing entire:

"The wise Hillel said, 'What is hateful to thyself do unto none,' is the quintessence of religion. Here is the golden rule, the test of man, race and creed. Show me a church wherein no prayer for the human family is offered, and I will show you a sepulchral pyramid of priestcraft, a monument of Baal, the home of the devil. As the clouds of ignorance and barbarism are dispersing, priestcraft finds no atmosphere to live in. There is no room for a priest and a prophet in the same hemisphere. But the sage and the prophet, like the heart and the mind, do supplement one another. The sage takes up the task where the prophet has dropped it. He is building temples of love, charity, and the worship of the only God. May the Lord help us to share in the work, the triumphs and the glories of the sage, this being the end of our life in this period of the world's history."

NOTWITHSTANDING the intense heat of the last week, the teachers' association, spoken of in our last, held steadily to its work. In the many-sided programme the Manual Training numbers represented the enthusiastic meetings. Technical education and practical training had the floor. The winning argument was, that it developed mind, it told for character. This is a prophecy that the time is coming when the moral education section of the National Teachers' Association will lay first claim upon the enthusiasm of its members. . . . The next time this great body meets in Chicago, perhaps in 1897, there will be practical plans discussed for the systematic and direct training of the conscience in all departments of the public schools, as there was this year for the training of the hand. Moral Science, which is now largely left to the labored work of the senior year in college, will begin with the kindergarten. The golden rule is capable of being exemplified and amplified wherever and whenever the multiplication table and its amplification is possible.

CHURCH dedication at its truest is the church-use. The more elaborate and costly the building, the more elaborate and thorough should be the use made of it. A month before the first Unitarian society in Philadelphia dedicated their fine new church, the people organized a "Free Library Association" for workmen and boys in the vestry. In the handsome room papers and magazines, bright readable books and quiet games are open to all comers, and in the coffee-room attachment five cents give the coffee and the biscuits.

"Members" pay fifteen cents a month, which includes the coffee without extra charge. The directors take turn in couples in being at the post each evening. One evening a week music. Open seven evenings a week. Average attendance about 50; largest attendance, 227; cost per year about $650, mainly met by subscriptions. All summer long an ice-water fountain at the church-door offers its cup to the public. The annual report closes with the words: "Reading-rooms and coffee-rooms are no new method of temperance work; but here is offered, besides, a new and noble use for rich and costly houses of worship. With such buildings already erected, more rooms and buildings for this purpose need not be hired. The churches of a large city do not perhaps outnumber its liquor saloons; but turned into reading-rooms and coffee rooms, made attractive on week days as well as Sundays, they are numerous enough to offer strong barriers against such evil influences."

At the last meeting of the board of directors of the American Unitarian Association, the suggestion of the Western Conference to form a missionary board, consisting of the secretaries of the A. U. A., the W. U. C., and the several State Conferences in the west, was declined, and the Rev. T. L. Eliot, of Portland, Oregon, was appointed as the western agent of the association, his labors to begin the first of September. Just what the functions of this new office are to be, and what his relations to our western organizations and western workers, does not yet appear. The American Unitarian Association is already represented in the western field by Rev. Messrs. O. Clute, A. G. Jennings, Enoch Powell, J. H. Crooker, J. T. Sunderland, C. G. Howland, J. L. Douthit, A. J. Beavis and C. W. Wendte. These men are supported, in whole or in part, from the treasury of the Association. If these men are to be marshalled under the generalship of Mr. Eliot they will form a most effective missionary corps, admirably adapted for work either of advance or of defense. The selection of Mr. Eliot is a most sagacious one, representing as he does in his very name, as well as in his person, a wise conservatism that will re-assure the most timid, east and west, while at the same time he is so zealous, noble and efficient as to command the respect and largely the co-operation of the radical. He is a man whose word can never fail of bearing the fruit of the Spirit and whose work can never come amiss.

Still, we can but regard this appointment, coming as it does, as a mistake, which sooner or later the A. U. A. will see to be such and will regret. It is a mistake because, for the second time, our eastern association has refused the friendly overtures for co-operation of an organization which, by virtue of age, the work it has done, the territory it occupies, as well as its constituency, it cannot afford to ignore; because, again, by making this appointment in this way it undertakes the missionary interests of the Mississippi valley with the minimum relations to the resident workers; because, lastly, while claiming to represent the Unitarianism of the United States, geographically speaking, it has by this vote deliberately indicated an executive distrust of a considerable fraction of American Unitarianism, theologically speaking; for the refusal to accept the co-operation of the Western Conference is unquestionably based chiefly upon theological considerations. In many ways these directors have told us, "We do not distrust your motives, ability, spirit or right to the Unitarian name," but now, by this vote, they say, "We do not propose to co-operate with your kind of Unitarianism."

We think this a mistake, because the non-doctrinal basis of the Western Conference represents a Unitarianism that has come to stay, that has to-day a larger representation in the east than in the west. It represents the kind of Unitarianism which alone can be propagated in most new fields east or west, Unitarianism for which the college as well as the theologic dogmatist is preparing a future place.

Right heartily we welcome our Brother Eliot to a difficult and unenviable task. If he enters upon his work in a broad, hospitable spirit, anxious to relate himself to whatever vital forces there may be already at work within the Western Conference,—a spirit and attitude that will enable him to work with our churches, not against them, he will bring about by the kind methods of evolution a better understanding all around, and will secure the desired co-operation between the A. U. A., and the Western organizations. But with all his sweetness and gentleness, if he undertakes to emphasize the feeling which lay back of his election, and to continue the work which his predecessor began,—that of counteracting rather than augmenting the influences and activities of the western churches,—if his missionary work is to be within rather than with our churches, then Brother Eliot will meet with friction and failure. Thus openly we express our disappointment in this refusal of the A. U. A. to accept the open hand of the Western Conference. It is with equal openness and heartiness that we welcome our brother to an important and a promising field. So far as he will accept it, we pledge him our earnest co-operation. We will welcome him to our councils and our pulpits, and if he comes to Chicago for headquarters, to all cordial comradeship,—not forgetting to sympathize with Portland, aye, with the entire Pacific coast, over the great loss to them which such a removal will be.

IDEALISM is the largest expression of human love. It is a circle drawn full about the race. Without it we are isolated beings. Its influence is sped direct to the heart. Over vales and mountains, higher than the impending clouds or the warm sunset, deeper than worlds or oceans of waters and space, it holds the solution of all difficulties, and the union of all to-days for a morrow of transcendent harmony. It is the poetry of the human soul; it outlasts all shocks of systems, and rides unharmed over the fears of departing faith to a destiny significant with the revelations of a nobler spiritual man. The ideal might be written of in another word—spontaneity. It is most real, yet ever untouched, unheralded, undefined. Though men scorn it from their byways, or laugh good-naturedly at its pleading, no weight of misunderstanding can destroy its efficient power. What it did for Jesus, Brown, Emerson, that may it do for any man. Who shall name it? Better for it to blossom unsolicited in the rose, and freely sail upon the seas, than come into the dead atmosphere of our imprisoning creeds. We hold to it as an influence. We desire no mere goal-definiteness in any of its gifts. Whenever we think purely, act heroically, it is there. We reach for it, and it is gone. Can we explain the rose or grasp the secret of the seas? But we are one with the mystery of both, and they neither magnify nor belittle us, but simply reveal to us our best selves.

T.

In another column, under the caption of "Why not Be Noble?" we print one of several protests which have come to us concerning our editorial word upon the proposition of President Cleveland to return the Confederate flags. Mr. Lyche always writes vigorously, and oftentimes, as in this case, vehemently. Such writings frequently, as in this case, fail to do justice or even to understand the position criticised. Waiving the consideration that these flags are not at the disposal of the President any more than any other property of the United States, we reiterate that our protest was made in the interest of peace and a fraternity that is national. Love is not generated by mutilating history or desecrating the landmarks that indicate the progress of the race. Why should the patriotic children of Georgia in coming generations be haunted ever with the emblems of their fathers' humiliation hanging in their state house, while the children of Wisconsin find in their state house only the emblems of a national glory?

Our critic little understands the feelings of the soldiers on either side when he characterizes the struggle as a great "quarrel," and talks of "Northern triumph" and "Southern shame." We think he but poorly apprehends the present condition of humanity or the true import of the great, sad war, when he speaks of a "thing of the past, the question settled, the cause secured." Human freedom is ever in jeopardy. Race distinctions, class prejudices, governmental arrogances still enslave, buy and sell human rights. Time depersonalizes feeling, but will not deface or ignore the price humanity has paid for what freedom it now enjoys. The present writer knows what it is to share his rations and to enjoy spiritual companionship with a soldier from across the line under the flag of truce that enabled contending armies to amicably join in the awful but sacred sacrament of burying their dead. He yields to no one in his desire and readiness to shake hands and forgive, not by forgetting, but by translating, transfiguring the gory paths that led to peace. The "gray" as well as the "blue" has common interests in those things that have shaped for freedom and right. Must the monuments of Gettysburg be demolished in order that the heroes of Pennsylvania and Virginia may shake hands upon the field which humanity will not forget, as they did on the 3d instant? Must the cross become a forbidden symbol and Calvary a tabooed word in order that the Jew and Christian may join fraternal hands and kneel before a common altar? Will we send the relics that are gathered in the Old South Church of Boston to a junk shop in order to advance the international fellowship between England and America? This is not the way the higher life is evolved. Patriotism is the road to cosmopolitanism. Love of country is the surest way to secure love of humanity. It was not malignity against southern soldiers but enthusiasm for human freedom that led us to plead for the preservation of the national consciousness as opposed to state consciousness. South and north, let our children first remember that they are citizens of the United States and then citizens of Georgia or Wisconsin. We yield to no one in our love for the new, our pity for the old, our faith in the future south. In the name of those who died wearing the "gray," as well as those who wore the "blue," we deny that on either side does the epithet "brutal passion" belong. In ways they knew not of together they wrought out the higher destiny of a country whose work for freedom is but just begun. As a warning to tyrants, and as an encouragement to truth seekers and freedom lovers, let all the annals of the past be concurred. In love, south and north will study these annals together. Thus will they best emulate the heroism and avoid the mistakes of their forefathers.

The Summer Holiday.

More and more the summer holiday is establishing itself as a custom in our busy American life. It is no longer the peculiar privilege of the professions, so-called, but happily has made its way in some measure into all occupations and pursuits. Its value is becoming recognized on the ground of economy, aside from considerations of mere pleasure. There is good return in the investment. With every year what pilgrimages are made to the shrines of mountain and sea, to earlier country homes and places of familiar association,—more efficacious to body and mind than the journeys of holy palmers of old, and not less religious if in quest of that renewal, without and within, which shall make life's daily duties shine the more when one returns to take them up again. "Two months in the summer—who wouldn't like to be a minister?" said a man to the writer; but when answered that the field was an open one and qualified laborers never long standing idle in the market-place, he seemed not eager to act upon the suggestion! And yet those persons are to be felicitated, as for the most part ministers, teachers, clerks in various kinds of business, and increasingly such workers as are on fixed salaries and have not sole responsibility and care but only subordinate or associated—such are to be felicitated on this feature of their lot, that at a definite point in the calendar there comes in the respite, the break from the harness for awhile; that it is not so much a question whether one will take a holiday or can afford the time, as something that is settled for him by sensible custom. Otherwise there might be fewer vacations, not to say lower grade of service throughout the year. For there is perhaps no time in any business or employment when one feels that he can just as well go as stay, when no loss is involved with the gain, or when one voluntarily leaves his accustomed care without some sacrifice in one direction or another. One often hears the man immersed in business cares say: "I wish I could take a week or ten days off, and I know that it would do me good; but I can't get away; I can't leave my business." One might answer, "Yes, you can get away; you can leave your business; because if you were obliged by reason of sickness or other cause you would do so as matter of course,—a week or a month, or even longer. What you really mean is that you cannot leave your business and at the same time feel that everything will go on just as if you were by. You can not leave without some sacrifice, and this it seems to you wiser not to make." And there are positions, and there are times in all positions of care and responsibility, when one seems riveted to his burden or his burden riveted to him, and when the sacrifice involved is altogether too much to make except under absolute necessity. At the same time we are to bear in mind that the pressure of routine upon us has both its nerving and its deadening side; that what with some effort we can do at any time, or about as easily at one time as at another, we are apt to let go by without doing at all; as one meets people living their lives long within shadow of the mountain who have never looked from its top, or within a few miles of the cataract who have never seen its plunge.

But when these longer breaks are really beyond reach, there are frequent brief respites possible in every lot if one wisely lays out his time,—respites from the routine which every calling comes more or less to be; respites nor for mere idleness but for diversion of thought, for renewal of the spirit, for the keeping of oneself above one's employment, so to speak, and not as a mere appendage to it. Whatever does this touches life with healing and helping power. A single day in the quiet woods and by country way-sides, away from the routine of common cares, is a tonic to body and mind. It takes the thought from wonted channels and freshens the whole life. Nature draws us out of ourselves and takes us up into the peace of her own calm, unhasting and unresting life.

Invaluable to our busy lives are these outings that take us at intervals amid new scenes and contacts, be it for the briefer or longer time. It does us all good to get outside our work now and then, to look upon it from changed standpoint and in larger perspective. Then the solid advantages, the real blessings and compensations of our daily routine,—the deeper satisfactions inwoven with our lot,—stand out in bolder relief while the annoyances that fret and chafe the spirit are seen to be trivial in the comparison, scars here and there on the great mountain-range of our life and lost in the larger view. Those little annoyances, from which no life that is of much account is free,—how they get magnified to our near vision and swell into burdens hard to bear! "Insect miseries" Emerson calls them in one of his poems, and aptly so both for their pettiness and their smart; as an insect's bite, not serious, is for the moment more painful than a heavier hurt. We have all seen people go into a passion over a house-fly and strike out right and left, who would bear themselves bravely in a larger contest. It is for the most part the little annoyances, but oft repeated, that fret and chafe until they seem supreme and reduce one's lot to what has been expressively called the "horrid grind." It is all very well to say to such an one, "Oh, these are trivial things; don't mind them." But the jaded and worn nerves do mind them, and mind them against reason. There is no cure for this soreness, which is half of body and half of mind, like escape into temporary freedom from care, a turning from the wheel of labor, a new leverage under which one lifts and readjusts his daily life, and comes back to it with newness of heart as well as newness of strength. Mountain or shore, solitude or society, contact with new scenes or the old and familiar places,— whichever one finds most invigoration in is for him best. Temperaments differ, and no medicine is alike good for all constitutions. But that outing is a good investment that gives one back to his labor reinforced in all ways to meet its opportunities and demands.

F. L. H.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Joan of Arc.

BEFORE A PAINTING BY LA PAGE.

I.

O wondrous girl! in humblest peasant guise,
With naked feet and hands embrowned by toil,
Thy soul, unspotted by the great world's soil,
Obedient springs, with solemn, wordless cries,
To meet the summons from the regnant skies.
Thy gentle breast heaves with no base recoil
At thought of danger; vain the tempter's foil
To balk the purpose in those awful eyes.
How the magnificence of ages pales
Before the grandeur of the hour supreme
When soul th' inexorable perceives, nor quails!
How through its reverent submission gleam
The victories whose triumph never fails,—
Whose truth o'ertops th' loftiest poet-dream!

II.

Call that a baseless dream? Great lives deny
Th' interpretation shallow and profane!
The soul hath power inherent to attain
The heights whose solitary glories lie
Forever hidden to the common eye.
That life a failure? 'Then indeed 'twere vain
To set our striving to a nobler strain;
Amid earth's discords would its music die.
Know the world's dreamers never yet have failed!
Like stars that fling a sudden lustre round,
And by impervious clouds are quickly veiled,
Their swift light fades within the narrow bound
Our senses on the spirit have entailed;
But where its radiance falls is hallowed ground.

SARAH E. BURTON.

Boston Art Museum.

Dr. McGlynn and an Alleged New Protestantism.

Puck is busy caricaturing the George-McGlynn movement in politics and political economy and attempting, in its usual forcible way, to show by illustration the crisis into which such philosophy as the nationalization of the land would inevitably precipitate us. Still there are two sides to the question, and there is more than the usual amount of bigotry on the side of opposition. I have been wonderfully refreshed by rereading the favorable notices and booming criticism which "Progress and Poverty" received some years ago from the New York press, and then pondering the editorial odium which the same press unsparingly heaped upon Henry George, because, like all sensible men, he sought to make his theory practical.

I had occasion to meet Doctor McGlynn some weeks ago and we had a pleasant conversation together in a prominent hotel. He talked fearlessly and with a wisdom which brought comfort to all doubters of his sincerity. He looks you in the eye and ravishes you with his eloquence, earnestness, scholarship, genius. Henry George could have no better advocate. He admitted his obstinacy to the mother church,—especially to the Pope as a dictator of American rights or the authority over American citizenship. "I will not," he said, "go to Rome. Rather and first, will I see the Pope Americanized, made cosmopolitan enough to get out of his exclusiveness and imperialism and be one with us all." There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Catholic church. The average churchman is attached to Doctor McGlynn although he dare not express his opinions. It was rumored that when Doctor McGlynn gave his address in this city on "The Cross of the New Crusade," that the Catholics were compelled by loyal priests to remain away from the hall in which he was to lecture. This contemptible and underhand way of creating loyalty to Rome and antagonism to the excommunicated priest is making friends all over America for the Doctor. I am able to make two observations:

1. Doctor McGlynn is the wedge which is splitting the Catholic church. Those who follow him will never remain loyal Catholics in the orthodox use of that word. They may react and center about the liberalism which, in religion, is making God, nature and man one in law, or they may institute a new Protestantism which will weaken the authority of the Pope and drive him either into our great cities or back into the forests where live the savages whose only law is will, passion and appetite. This will further have much to do in undermining the foundation of our Mediæval Protestantism, which asserts itself in the religion of the present orthodox church, and driving men toward the realization of the philosophy of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

2. His efforts may mark a new era in municipal government, in political civilization. The land may never be nationalized, Henry George's theories may never be realized, but a better time will come to the down-trodden masses by insinuating a moral principle into politics and making law express as much for the poor as for the rich. The Republican and Democratic parties have no special issues. They fight over presidential nominees and elections, but their mission is almost an ignis fatuus. They may be compared to the two Sunday-school boys who thus catechized each other: "Where are you, Tom, in your catechism?" "I am still at Original Sin," said Tom. "Where are you, pray?" "O," said Will, "I am past Redemption." The cry is uttered for redress. The appeal is made for equality in the deep and well expressed meaning of the word—not in material wealth—but in rights. And the time must come, if there is a God, when His will shall be done in earth as it is in Heaven.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

Why Not Be Noble?

A virtue he had which I should learn to imitate. He never spoke of what was disagreeable and past.—THOMAS CARLYLE, on his father.

I am sorry to see UNITY raise its voice (even in rather a screeching manner) against a noble, human act, against a spirit that is right and beautiful; sorry to see it flatter prejudices and sentiments we surely should strive to rid the world from. They need not strengthening.

I refer to its article on the battle flags, and the violent poem accompanying it.

This idea, which UNITY combats, seems to be the noblest thing that has come forth from Washington in many a day. Surely it were a noble deed, to be justly proud of, could the American nation (or rather that part of it which actually fought and won) return all signs of Northern triumph and Southern shame, to signify that the quarrel was not only forgiven, but desired to be forgotten. It were not perhaps "natural," but surely noble.

It is sad enough for those who have learnt to love different nationalities to find one treasuring and glorying before all the world in the signs of another's loss, error, humiliation and shame; but sadder, surely, when such is the case with different sections, portions of one nation. Why act the boy who is ever and forever glorying in the "whipping" he gave another boy? Were it not noble in that boy to try to forget his triumph and the other's humiliation, satisfied in the results? But what would we think of a man, who to every stranger would show, with exultation, "the proof of how he once humiliated his own brother?"

Do we not always as individuals strive to practice and teach absolute forgetfulness of everything in the past, that brought us triumph through another's loss or humiliation, lest it remain to us both a haunting ghost making good and frank relations in the present and future impossible?

But why teach a nation to do what in the individual we think mean and wrong. Does a wrong grow into a right by being the work of many,—of a nation or part of a nation?

We know this idea is new, almost startling; that to "the natural man" it is hard thus completely to forgive by forgetting, that strong natural sentiments and passions run in the other direction; but why should UNITY strengthen those more brutal passions? why not have spoken for peace, good-will and forgetfulness of the things that are behind, for the sake of what is and may be?

The world has hardly ever seen nations act so nobly, so "sentimentally," though I believe the Roman nation did so, or at least believed in doing so. But why could not the American nation have set the world this healthy, beautiful and Christian example? Too low and difficult, demanding too much self-denial—was it? Natural enough, but a great pity!

But UNITY has surely taken the losing side this time. Many things prophesy that even in Europe the day may be near when the people in sign of peace, good-will and universal brotherhood will destroy the mutually humiliating and distancing "triumphs" with which their capitals are now decorated. The custom of embellishing our national homes with the scalps of enemies, under any form civilization may have given it, will have to go at last. Brothers will not forever remember and glory in the loss and shame of brothers.

UNITY has placed itself in a majority which rapidly will dwindle into a minority. The better feeling, the better sentiment has been born; pelt and stone it as you will, triumph it must,—in spite of UNITY.

Yet one can well understand the black anger that comes over those who once risked their all for the triumph which these battle flags commemorate.

We, the rest of ~~us~~ have little right to speak here. They must do whatever is done. "Is then the war a thing to be ashamed of?" they indignantly ask. No, of all wars it is perhaps the noblest. Glory in it; remember the men who died in it or lived through it.

It was a noble, noble thing; but it were nobler still could you, now that the thing you fought for is gained, most nobly gained, now that what the war accomplished can never be undone, could you say to those who fought: "The principle we fought for is won and safe; we fought for it; we had no enmity towards you; let us be friends; forget it all,—come, here are the flags we took from you in those hot days; bravely you defended them; bravely you know we fought for them—here they are; take them; thus we tear from our heart every enmity; if our children must know that we fought one another, let them also know how we forgave and forgot. There are your flags! What memories they have for you and us! There they are; take them away, and give us your hands."

No, we must not blame human nature that it shrinks from this,—at first. Soon it will not shrink from it.

H. TAMBS LYCHE.

Amiel and Browning.

AN EXTRACT FROM A PRIVATE LETTER.

"Mrs.—brought me Amiel's journal. It gives one a curious sensation to read it immediately after reading John Fiske's "Cosmic Philosophy" and Browning's poems, or "Browning's Women," as I have done. It is as if the focus of my eyesight had suddenly changed.

Amiel's aspiration is to find happiness in rest, in the infinite, the absolute—to live now in the eternities, that trials may be seen in their proper proportions—to live according to the great universal laws that make duty, whether in great or small things, inflexible.

In Evolution there is of course no such thing as rest, but growth. It deals with the finite. The infinite already perfect cannot grow, though its manifestations may become clearer through evolution. I have been trying to reconcile myself to accept both.

Browning's people battle with their trials instead of spreading their wings and rising above them spiritually; they go into combat, and are supposed to gain their strength in that way. In the first philosophy there can be no such thing as a tragedy in a life. There can be no real misery in a life where you have sought happiness only in the spirit, and lived according to law to the best of your ability and light. Robert Browning and George Eliot acknowledge the force of circumstances, while Amiel, this new and very old style of philosopher, ignores them. Amiel suggests a thousand problems, but solves or follows out none, and is sometimes a little exasperating on that account. He lacks oxygen. A. A. G.

The Stars Respond to Joy.

The smile of man is sweet—
 Yea, when the sun above
 May kiss the hungering earth,
 Life takes its coursers fleet,
 And far, in hours of love,
 Wins Truth to larger birth.

This teacher tells of years
 Made gifts of thought and deed :
 Men rise to joy, and see
 New days through this day's tears :
 Laugh ! laugh ! and you may feed
 All wonders ere they flee !

Talk not of sin, but seek
 The air of Beauty, won
 To scenes of day and night :
 A thought you need not speak,
 A deed yet best undone,
 Fills the whole world with light.

What to me are your wrongs ?
 What to you are my crimes ?
 The gayety of Truth
 Fills life with ceaseless throngs
 Of merrydaying rhymes
 Cast in undying youth.

H. L. T.

A Prophet of Fifty Years Ago.

"There is another class of persons who are devoted to the removal of the abuses that prevail in modern society. They witness the oppressions that are done under the sun, and they cannot keep silence. They have faith that God governs man ; they believe in a better future than the past. Their daily prayer is for the coming of the kingdom of righteousness, truth and love ; they look forward to a more pure, more lovely, more divine state of society than was ever realized on earth. With these views, I rejoice to say, I strongly and entirely sympathize."

Thus wrote a noble man, and an earnest, devoted Unitarian minister nearly fifty years ago. Were he now living, I know how deeply he would sympathize with the stand taken by our Western Unitarian Conference. He used the self-same words as we have chosen for our basis of fellowship.

Again the same writer, feeling the restrictions under which he was placed by the narrow usages and formulated beliefs of the majority of the Unitarian body at that day, frankly says :

"For my own part I have long been persuaded that we should offer a more spiritual worship, enjoy a more sincere communion with each other, and find our Sabbath services far more attractive and fruitful, were all such restrictions removed, even if we came together as the disciples did, in a large upper room, in a fisher's boat, or by the shore of the sea. The minister should take his stand where he can freely speak out all that is in his soul. He would be joined by those who find he addresses a powerful and living word to their hearts, who are helped by him in their endeavors after a just and truthful life, and are drawn by a spiritual affinity with the message he declares, and who are too desirous that the truth of God should prevail to think of its external, temporary effects. Such an assembly would constitute the true church of the first-born. It would consist of those who are united by no other tie than faith in divine things ; by the desire to cultivate the holiest principles of our nature—reverence, justice and love ; to ascertain and follow the laws of Providence in the constitution of the inner spirit and of the outward world ; and to convert the jarring elements of earth into materials for a pure, serene and joyful life.

"The basis of worship in such a church would be feeling, not speculation ; the platform would be broad enough to welcome every seeking spirit in whatever stage of progress it might be ; all should be encouraged, none excluded ; especially they who are yet feeling after God, if haply they may find Him, should be taken by the hand, not driven from the fold. This would leave the investigation of truth entirely free. The sincerest convictions could be uttered without dread or misgiving. We should meet, not as having attained, but as learners ; of course every ray of light would be sought, not shunned ; we should let the dead past bury its dead ; we should look on life and truth with young eyes ; and thus seeking to be little children, we should enter the kingdom of God, and we should know where we were by the divine peace and joy with which our hearts would overflow. In such a church there could be no cold or formal preaching. The instruction would be the overflowing of an individual soul. The topics of discourse would be taken from the experience of life ; they would embrace the widest range of thought, and the more exciting and soul-stirring the better. The infinite Bible of the universe would be the text-book, and whatever the soul feels or forebodes, the commentary."

I am deeply impressed with the belief that this same pure, devoted, earnest spirit, which wrought so mightily in George Ripley fifty years ago, is with us to-day in our struggles after a better faith, a purer love and a more consecrated life. Possessing this faith, aspiring to this love, living this life, we shall surely conquer.

J. S. B.

THE STUDY TABLE.

A Century of Electricity. By T. C. Medenhall. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

This is a book of 225 pages with a double column index of three pages. The preface says : "The author has endeavored to sketch the growth of the science of electricity, and its principal applications. The book is not a history of the science, nor is it a scientific treatise ; but the author trusts that, as far as it goes, it is not far wrong in either its history or its science. The use of technical language has been avoided as far as possible ; and the effort has been to enable the intelligent reader, unfamiliar with the nomenclature of the science, to understand the more important phases of its development, and to give him such a knowledge of the fundamental principles as will enable him to comprehend the meaning of what he sees in electrical devices, with which he almost daily comes in contact." In the last chapter the author cautions us against expecting another century of such extraordinary progress in electrical discovery as the last ; yet still much remains to be done, and he says, "In every house, in cities and towns, there must be a supply of electricity to be drawn upon, as water at present. Then, in addition to its use as a source of light, much of the labor of the household will be performed by means of small electric motors. The economical storage of this form of energy must soon be accomplished, and this will greatly enlarge the field of its usefulness. The successful transfer of the energy of falling waters through metallic conductors to distant points, is one of the results which can and will be reached. Seeing-by electricity has been much talked of ; some schemes for its accomplishment have been suggested, and the operation is one which cannot be classed with the impossible. These and many other things will doubtless come in time, along with other useful applications of the electric current not now thought of." The book is in eleven chapters. The first treats of the subject from the beginning to the end of the eighteenth century. Then follow chapters on Galvani, Volta, Oersted, Faraday, the telegraph, multiplex telegraphy and submarine cables, the electric motor, the telephone, and other subjects. The book has useful illustrations to help the verbal descriptions. Concerning electricity as a motor the author says: "The motor is now in a stage of development somewhat similar to that of the electric light ten years ago, and there is reason to believe that it will yet overtake its more brilliant forerunner."

The Christian Platonists of Alexandria. Eight lectures preached before the University of Oxford in the year 1886. By Charles Bigg, D.D. New York: Macmillan & Co. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

That this book is the Bampton Lectures is prima facie evidence of a book solid both in aim and worth. There are eight chapters, of course, as the Bampton foundation provides always for eight lectures. The first lecture is devoted to Philo; the second and third to Clement; the fourth, fifth and sixth to Origen; the seventh to the Reformed Paganism, including such topics as "The Pythagoreans," "The Life of Apollonius," "The Trinitarian Platonists," "The Unitarian Platonists," "Celsus." The eighth is a summary, taking up again Clement and Origen, and treating especially "Paulinism" and "Quietism." The author sums up the general merits of the Alexandrines, from which we quote: "As we turn the pages of the Alexandrines, it is, to use a well-worn simile, as if we were walking through the streets of some long-buried city. Only with effort, only imperfectly, can we recall the vanished life. . . . It has been urged that they are too intellectual and cramp the play of the emotions. This is true, and it is a fault, but on the other hand they are not effeminate. Their tone is bracing and salutary. Their use of Scripture is often wild and fantastic, but it has no faults of the Middle Ages; it is free, unprejudiced, reasonable in endeavor, if not always in result. . . . Almost alone they strove to reconcile the revelation of God in Jesus with the older revelation of God in Nature. What could be done at that time they did, and their principles are of permanent value. . . . Last and highest among their merits we must place their preaching of the Fatherhood of God." The book is well made, being printed in good, large type, well leaded. The text is bountifully supplied with learned critical notes at the bottom of the pages.

The Volcano Under the City. By a Volunteer Special. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert.

This is a volume of 320 pages with an appendix of some fifteen pages more. We have read it through with intense interest. It is an attempt to give a history of the draft riots of New York in 1863. The thread of the narrative is sometimes a little broken and tangled, requiring a tention in reading, but this proceeds perhaps in part from the nature of the material from which the writer had to construct his story, and the difficulty of drawing out a consecutive narrative from the more or less imperfect mass of telegrams and similar records which make up the police history of the memorable and tragical four days of the riot. Nevertheless the narrative is graphic, exciting, as it cannot help being, and the author has done well to weave in the telegrams so constantly, thus making, to a considerable extent, the records tell their own story. This is done in a manner showing perfectly and painfully the rapid succession of events and the tense excitement of the hour. The chapters bear such titles as "Burned Alive;" "Down with Property;" "Sacking an Orphan Asylum;" "Tuesday's Hard Fight;" "Street to Street, House to House;" "Through a Dark Night;" "The Fighting on Wednesday;" "Wednesday Night's Grapple." A map of the city is added. The book withal is a sober book; we mean that no thoughtful person will put it down without sober reflections and serious questions in his mind. He will conclude that the book is well named "The Volcano Under the City," and many subsequent facts will occur to him which strengthen this conclusion—facts that tax the utmost grain of good citizenship, and need in dealing with them the best qualities both of heart and of head.

The Rigveda, the Oldest Literature of the Indians. By Adolph Kaegi. Authorized translation with additions to the notes, by R. Arrowsmith, Ph. D. Boston: Ginn & Co.

The translator of this work, after speaking of his endeavor to bring down the subject to date, since the second German edition of the work in 1880, says very modestly, "The references have been verified as far as practicable, and it is believed that a reasonable degree of accuracy has been attained." The author, Dr. Kaegi, says in his preface to the second edition that the work is founded throughout on personal investigations of the sources and personal examination of the investigations of others. The work fills 200 pages. Messrs. Ginn & Co. have given it excellent dress by large, handsome type, on heavy paper, as the subject deserves. There is an introduction treating of Vedic literature and interpretation, and of the Vedic people and its civilization, covering twenty pages. Then follows the main treatise in seventy pages, treating of the Rigveda, the language and form of the hymns, its general contents, religious poetry, religious thought, and the Vedic belief, a division especially devoted to the divinities of the Veda, and, finally, the secular poetry, such as a wedding hymn, funeral hymn, historical and humorous compositions, etc. Then follow eighty-seven pages of critical and bibliographical notes. Then sixteen pages of an Index of Matters, Names and Words; and finally two pages of Bible passages referred to either in the treatise or in the notes. The treatise is full of metrical translations of Vedic hymns, and the author calls attention to the fact that in the section on the Vedic belief and divinities he has confined himself so closely to the original that almost the whole of the text is made up of the words of the Vedic poets.

Evolution and Christianity. By J. C. F. Grumbine. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 50 cents.

This is a beautiful specimen of the book-maker's art—a volume of 75 pages, neat and dainty in form, clearly printed on good paper, agreeable to the eye and convenient for the hand. The leading chapters are entitled Evolution, Christianity, Evolution and Christianity Compared. The author maintains that the old ideas of creation and the primal perfection of men are no longer tenable in the face of all that science and research have brought to light, and that it is the law of evolution only that will rightly explain all the phenomena of the world. Christianity, instead of being a supernatural irruption of divine forces, is itself included in this law, is the direct outgrowth and flowering out of causes which began antecedent to it.

In this onward movement the fundamental doctrines of religion, the ideas of God and righteousness and immortality, are undisturbed. The book is marred by frequent infelicities of expression, and at times by an apparent lack of clearness in the author's thought, but its main purpose is in line with the growing consensus of opinion among scholarly and thoughtful minds.

J. R. E.

Job and Solomon, or the Wisdom of the Old Testament. By Rev. T. K. Cheyne, M. A., D.D. New York: Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House.

The value of this book needs not be enforced for those who observe the author's name. Cheyne edits also "Hosea and Micah" in the useful "Cambridge Bible for Schools." This volume treats of Job, Proverbs, the wisdom of the Son of Sirach and Ecclesiastes. There are some 800 pages in all. The treatment is both critical and poetical; that is to say, the books are treated both from critical and philological points of view, and also with reference to literary beauty and meaning. The table of contents is full and carefully divided. After the treatment of each book, there is a brief bibliography of the subject entitled "Aids to the Student." The appendix of sixteen pages has a table of contents of its own. A valuable book for students, or indeed for all careful readers and lovers of the great Hebrew literature.

A Branch of May. Poems by Lizette Woodworth Reese. Baltimore, Md.: Cushings & Bailey.

This book of forty-two 12mo pages contains in its thirty-two pieces more poetry than is usually found in larger volumes from famous poets, although it is the author's first book. The pieces are mainly descriptive, even the love songs, which are many, being largely so. In both descriptive and lyrical power Miss Reese shows rank with genius. Doubtless the opening and closing poems are, on the whole, the most striking in a collection notable for striking features. The former is as follows:

BETRAYED.

She is false, O Death, she is fair!
Let me hide my head on thy knee;
Blind mine eyes, dull mine ears, O Death!
She hath broke my heart for me!

Give me a perfect dream;
Find me a rare, dim place;
But let not her voice come nigh,
And keep out her face, her face!

Practical Cheironomy. By Ed. Heron-Allen. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London. A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.

Anything about the hand will attract interest and perhaps wonder; for certainly the human hand is one of the greatest wonders of the earth. This little work of 125 pages is divided into four parts, treating in part I—Hand Superstitions and Customs. Part II—The Physiology of the Hand. Part III—On the Shapes of Hands. Part IV—Cheiromancy, or Palmistry. There are thirteen plates, showing different kinds of hands, with their significance as to character. Readers must judge for themselves of the value of the palmistry in the book; but all will agree that it is curious and interesting.

Suggestive Lessons in Language and Reading. For Primary Schools. By Anna B. Badlam. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co., Publishers.

Primary teachers in need of suggestive aids in the work of training the powers of observation and expression in little children will hail this manual with delight. It is excellent. It is divided into lessons in language, lessons in reading, and an appendix containing miscellaneous exercises in oral language, which are very suggestive. The author says that in arranging the lessons she has indicated merely the points that are to serve as guides to the teacher for the development of the subject matter of each lesson, in the belief that formal rules should have no place in the work with the little children. The book gives an insight into the child's needs and how they are to be met. J. J.

THE HOME.

About Manliness.

I think I never knew a boy who was not ambitious to be manly. But I have known many boys make strange mistakes as to what manliness is—and men too, for that matter; both boys and men often think that to be manly one must be bold in manner, talk loudly, and sometimes rudely. By and by, when you grow older, you will know that years make not men, real men, in anything but bodies. And a man who is a man in body, but so silly as to think roughness and rudeness show strength, is not half so pleasing an object as a boy, who, being a boy in body, is so far a man as to be gentle, polite and respectful. You all want to be big, no doubt; I can look back to the time when I was small, and I remember there was a certain boy,—a giant of majestic force I thought him then,—who had attained the age of eighteen years. Ah! how I wished to grow like him! Those trowsers of incredible length, that jacket buttoned up plainly and tightly to the neck with fine buttons, that surprising stature, seemed the height of my wildest dreams. But when I became eighteen years old I learned that what in truth I had admired was not the long legs and arms, the jacket and the buttons, but the freedom, dignity, force, intelligence, courage, and other good virtues with which those legs measured off the ground and those arms kept quiet time to the walk. I found that I had admired the heart that beat under the jacket and buttons; for, as I learned in later years, my childish hero was a down-right good boy, manly, large, and very polite. That is the sort of "old boy" it is worth while to be, an "old boy" who has not copied silly or weak men, but strong men who showed their force in their quiet gentleness. Look quietly and carefully at the men about you. Let not any loud boasting mislead and befool you. It is much better to be a fine specimen of a boy than a bad specimen of a man. Make up your minds well what manly qualities are, and then stand as high as you can without heels, and look down with a boy's scorn on a creature who is a man in body but never out-grew his apron in mind. Think not rudeness is manly. Mistake not coarseness, roughness, unfeelingness, harshness, for strength. Believe not a hard face shows force of mind. Deem not a strut or swagger to be dignity or power. Admire not an imperious manner to servants or clerks or porters, nor mistake it for highmindedness. Take not quarrelsomeness for courage, nor think fierceness brave. Shakespeare says there are many cowards who try to pass for brave men by wearing "on their chins the beards of Hercules or frowning Mars," but "whose hearts are all as false as stairs of sand." Believe that the manly way is courtesy, kindness, gentleness, good manners. Then the older you grow, the more you will make a fine "old boy," which is the best kind of a good man. J. V. B.

Contentment.

The everlasting cry for more
From hungry lives to Heaven
Has locked and sealed contentment's door
With surety seven fold seven.

Our having ever grasping breeds,
Contentment lies immured
In just supply for present needs
With future unsecured.

EUGENE ASHTON.

Give.

See the rivers flowing
Downward toward the sea,
Pouring all their treasures
Bountiful and free!
Yet, to help their giving,
Hidden springs arise;
Or, if need be, showers
Feed them from the skies.

Watch the princely flowers
Their rich fragrance spread;
Load the air with perfumes,
From their beauty shed;
Yet their lavish spending
Leaves them not in dearth,
With fresh life replenished
From their mother earth.

Give thy heart's best treasures;
From fair Nature learn;
Give thy love and ask not,
Wait not a return.
And the more thou spendest
From thy little store
With a double bounty,
God will give thee more.

—Adelaide A. Procter.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, - - - J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, - - - H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, - - - DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label or every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & Co.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Lakeside School of New Theology.—The revised programme for this gathering, as printed in the last number of the New Theology Herald, extends from August 5 to 21. We print it entire, hoping many of our readers may be able to profit by it. President Cone, Doctor Minor and Doctor Rexford, represent the Universalist denomination. Doctor Hill, Professor Cary, Messrs. Rich, Mason, Mayo and Jones are Unitarian. Doctor Thomas, Messrs. Haven, E. P. Adams, Doctor Townsend and Solon Lauer represent what might be called the Independent Movement, the People's church, which (may it be!) is the seed of the great liberal church that is to come. One lawyer, one physician, one school teacher, a lecturer, an elocutionist and a musician are to enrich the programme. We are sorry that but one woman's name appears. The New Theology is to find many of its best public interpreters among the women.

FRIDAY, AUG. 5.

2 p. m.—Opening by Rev. J. G. Townsend, D. D. Rev. F. J. Chase. Subject: "The Coming Man."

SATURDAY, AUG. 6.

10:45 a. m.—
2 p. m.—Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D. of Chicago. Subject: "Social Forces."

SUNDAY, AUG. 7.

10:45 a. m.—Rev. J. G. Townsend, D. D. Sermon.
2 p. m.—Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D. of Chicago. Subject: "The Cross of Christ."

7:45 p. m.—President O. Cone, D. D., of Buchtel College. Sermon.

MONDAY, AUG. 8.

10:45 a. m.—Prof. George L. Cary, of Meadville Theological School. Subject: "How to Study the Scriptures."

2 p. m.—Dr. Henry R. Rogers, of Dunkirk, N. Y. Subject: "The Sun in its New Role."

TUESDAY, AUG. 9.

9 a. m.—Conversation Meeting, led by Rev. J. G. Townsend. Subject: "What is the New Theology?"

10:45 a. m.—Solon Lauer. Subject: "The Crisis."
2 p. m.—Rev. E. P. Adams, of Dunkirk. Subject: "Co-Education of the Sexes."

7:45 p. m.—Rev. M. L. Williston, of Davenport, Iowa. Subject: "Scotland and England." Illustrated with Stereopticon Views.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 10.

(Unity Club Day.)

10:45 a. m.—Pres. O. Cone, D. D., of Buchtel College. Subject: "Messianic Prophecies."

2 p. m.—Arthur Stearns, Esq., of Cleveland. Subject: "Co-Education of the Sexes."

7:45 p. m.—Grand Concert, by Mrs. W. J. Bentley Concert Company.

On this day, in addition to the above, addresses will be given by A. J. Rich, Corresponding Secretary of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs; Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Editor of UNITY, Chicago; Rev. A. D. Mayo and Rev. J. G. Townsend. This day will be one of unusual interest and importance, representing as it does a large and comprehensive educational movement in the churches.

THURSDAY, AUG. 11.

9 a. m.—Conversation Meeting, led by Pres. O. Cone, D. D. Subject: "Education."

10:45 a. m.—Rev. L. W. Mason, of Union City, Pa. Subject: "Discernment of Spiritual Truth."

2 p. m.—Rev. E. L. Rexford, D. D., of Detroit. Subject: "Clement of Alexandria, or the Earliest Type of Christian Theology."

7:45 p. m.—Rev. M. L. Williston, of Davenport, Iowa. Subject: "Switzerland and Egypt." Illustrated with Stereopticon Views.

FRIDAY, AUG. 12.

10:45 a. m. Conversation Meeting, led by Rev. J. G. Townsend. Subject: "The Dynamic of the New Theology."

2 p. m.—Rev. Thomas Hill, D. D., LL. D., ex-President of Harvard University. Subject: "The Crucifixion Historically Considered."

7:45 p. m.—Grand Concert, by Mrs. W. J. Bentley Concert Company.

SATURDAY, AUG. 13.

10:45 a. m.—Rev. Thomas Hill, D. D., LL. D. Subject: "Toads."

2 p. m.—Rev. E. L. Rexford, D. D. Subject: "The Heathen as a Factor in Modern Theology."

7:45 p. m.—Prof. J. B. Roberts, of Philadelphia. Subject: "Elocution."

SUNDAY, AUG. 14.

10:45 a. m.—Rev. Thomas Hill, D. D., LL. D. Sermon.

2 p. m.—Rev. E. L. Rexford, D. D. Sermon.

7:45 p. m.—John R. Clark. Subject: "The Chivalry of Reform Movements."

MONDAY, AUG. 15.

10:45 a. m.—Rev. Thomas Hill, D. D., LL. D. Subject: "Children to be Taught from Nature."

2 p. m.—Solon Lauer. Subject: "Scientific Theology."

TUESDAY, AUG. 16.

10:45 a. m.—Theodore W. Haven, Ph. D., Battle Creek, Mich. Sermon.

2 p. m.—Prof. S. G. Love, Superintendent of City Schools, Jamestown, New York. Subject: "The Philosophy of Education."

7:45 p. m.—"Merchant of Venice." Given by Prof. J. B. Roberts, of Philadelphia, supported by his English Literature Class of Buffalo, and histrionic talent of Jamestown.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 17.

10:30 a. m.—
2 p. m.—Rev. J. G. Townsend, D. D. Subject: "The New Theology"

3 p. m.—Grand Concert, by Mrs. W. J. Bentley Concert Company.

7:45 p. m.—F. N. Thorpe, Ph. D., of Philadelphia. Subject: "The Wage Winners."

THURSDAY, AUG. 18.

10:30 a. m.—Rev. J. G. Townsend, D. D. Subject: "Utopia;" to be followed by Conversation.

2 p. m.—F. N. Thorpe, Ph. D. Subject: "The Industrial Relations of the State."

7:45 p. m.—John R. Clark, of Detroit. Subject: "Gough, in Humor and Eloquence."

FRIDAY, AUG. 19.

10:30 a. m.—F. N. Thorpe, Ph. D. Subject: "Co-operation in the United States."

2 p. m.—John R. Clark. Subject: "To and and Fro in London."

7:45 p. m.—"Richelieu." Given by Prof. J. B. Roberts, supported by his English Literature Class of Buffalo, and histrionic talent of Jamestown.

SATURDAY, AUG. 20.

10:30 a. m.—Rev. A. N. Somers. Subject: "Does the World Owe me a Living? or A Study of Crime and Pauperism."

2 p. m.—Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D., of Boston. Subject: "The Human Element in the Bible."

7:45 p. m.—

SUNDAY, AUG. 21.

10:30 a. m.—Rev. J. G. Townsend, D. D. Sermon.

2 p. m.—Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D. Subject: "The Commanding Power of the Gospel."

7:45 p. m.—Sacred Concert, by Mrs. W. J. Bentley Concert Company.

The Mrs. W. J. Bentley Concert Company will remain and slug during the entire assembly.

Sioux City, Iowa.—The church is very active and is a growing power in the state. At its recent "Flower Service" fifteen new members were welcomed, and a number of children were dedicated. The devoted earnestness of its minister, Miss Safford, and the ever-thoughtful activity of our lay-leader secretary, Miss Gordon, make Sioux City a very center of liberal interest for us. The society is developing some strong workers, women and men, and the programme of the Unity Club banquet recently held is of special interest in Unity Club work.

—The programme of the banquet has been in the drawer for some weeks waiting for space. It has so much good reading that we print the "Toast Topics" and the literary starters for the same. Almost any one ought to respond after having the cue given them thus. We omit names:

TOASTS.

Our Club—"Measure not the work until the day's out and the labor done."

Our Leaders—"We are all wise in capacity, though so few in energy. There needs but one wise man in a company, and all are wise, so rapid is the contagion."

Formers and Reformers—"There's perfect goodness somewhere, so I strive."

The Inner Circle—"Love works at the center."

The Outer Circle—"Our doubts are traitors, and make us lose the good we oft might win, by fearing to attempt."

The Present Time—

"Draw new furrows 'neath the healthy morn,
And plant the great Hereafter in the Now."

Our Oldest Member—

"Spring still makes spring in the mind
When sixty years are told,
Love wakes anew this throbbing heart,
And we are never old."

Poetry and Science—"Without the first, we never could have had the second."

Notes from the Northwest.—Mr. Hunting will spend some weeks upon his farm in Minnesota. Mrs. Wilkes is holding meetings at Luverne during the summer. Miss Bartlett continues her work at Sioux Falls, where the new church is under way. Miss Putnam, of the Meadville Theological School, is preaching for the summer at Rock Rapids. Misses Safford, Gordon and Murdock spend the summer at Hamilton, Ill. Miss Amelia Murdock has charge of the Sunday-school at Humboldt during the vacation. Miss Wakefield continues her efficient Sunday-school service during the summer at Sioux City. Miss Mila Tupper, of Cornell university, is speaking for the new society at Eagle Grove for the season. Miss Hultin spends a part of her vacation in Michigan.

Des Moines.—DEAR UNITY: The year's work here closed Sunday, July 10, with an added membership of nine, six at the beginning and three at the close of the service. The congregation has steadily increased, and after our vacation we shall go on with renewed courage. Rev. Ida C. Hultin, our pastor, has gone to Michigan for her vacation and will be with us again next year. The Western Conference has been invited to hold its next annual meeting at Des Moines, and we sincerely hope it will accept.

Geneva, Ill.—We learn with regret of the resignation of Mr. West. The Geneva people feel that he has filled an important place in their spiritual history, and part with him on financial grounds only. It is to be hoped that we shall not lose his ability, piety, and unflinching mental courage from our western ranks. The Geneva people speak warmly, too, of Mrs. West's services in organizing the young people into a Unity Help Society.

Books Slightly Damaged and Greatly Reduced in Price.

We have on hand two copies of "The Thought of God," by F. L. Hosmer and W. C. Gannett, which can not be sold as perfect on account of the cover being wrinkled and slightly stained. In other respects they are perfect. We will mail them for 65 cents each; regular price $1.00.

A few copies of James H. West's "Uplifts of Heart and Will" have been bound, in which the presswork is defective, although not enough so as to make the book illegible. In other respects these copies are as good as the regular edition. To close them out we offer them at 25 cents each, post-paid; regular price 50 cents.

CHARLES H. KERR & Co.,
175 Dearborn street,
Chicago, Ill.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, JULY 30, 1887.

[NUMBER 22

EDITORIAL.

It is no sign of wise freedom or bravery to cast the pearls we have to swine before we go searching for new treasure. The man who does that will find himself without a jewel with which to compare and judge his new acquisitions, and, perhaps, without that in his soul which will enable him to tell pearls from peas.

EMERSON says, "He who would gather immortal palms must not be hindered by the name of goodness, but must explore if it be goodness;"—and it is evident that we need a thorough exploring expedition among our laws and moral standards. President Bascom is reported as having said in his baccalaureate the other day, that the offenses for which some are languishing in prisons are mere bagatelles compared to those for which others are held in honor. Society has hardly yet begun to learn that the one true test of good and evil for it to use, is Justice.

WHY is mankind so troubled at the diversity in religious opinions? Everywhere God has written the word Progress, and everywhere, but in the matter of religion, we believe it. We feel no call to ride in stage coaches out of respect for our grandfathers. We stand and watch the steam thresher, with all its cogs and belts and bands; and as the separator pours the grain one way in a great golden stream, while the straw and chaff go the other, do we doubt whether this machine is a legitimate product of natural science, because through the open barn doors of our neighbor we can hear him threshing out his little three-acre crop with a flail?

LET the people give gladly when the contribution box comes round; for here is the harder way they had to do it in Boston two hundred years ago, as quoted by Mr. Dole: "The Magistrates and chiefe Gentlemen first, and then the elders and all the congregation of men and most of them that are not of the Church, all single persons, widows and women in absence of their husbands, come up one after another one way, and bring their offerings to the Deacon at his seate and put it into a box of wood for the purpose, if it bee money or papers; if it be any other chattle, they set it or lay it downe before the Deacons, and so passe another way to their seats again."

THE New Theology Herald, with an insight that is refreshing, thus describes the real infidel:

If there is any infidel, it is he who in the presence of truth clings to error; who, when his heart beats responsive to the larger influx of spiritual life, sits mourning the demise of superstition; who, when his voice should ring with the accents of the larger truth, is silent or feeble voiced because of tenderness for the false and foolish.

If there is any Atheist it is he who trembles for God's throne when man-made foundations are seen to crumble; who fears for God's omnipotence when opposed by the presumptuous weapons of human folly; who, in the midst of God's glories, fears lest the decay of belief in ancient marvels should cause man to doubt the Divine Creator; who, in the light of an ever-present inspiration, bewails the loss of ancient parchments, or the failing authority of ancient oracles. The greatest skeptic is he who fears to test the strength of Faith by every means.

DR. BERNHARD STADE's "History of Israel," published this year in Berlin, has not yet received the notice in our papers it should. It continues the work so patiently carried on during the last fifty years by Ewald, Graf, Kuenen and Wellhausen. Doctor Stade dates the oldest part of the Pentateuch, known as the writing of the Jehovist, in the latter part of the ninth century B. C.; the book of Deuteronomy 621 B. C.; and the larger part, known as the "Priestly Codex," or work of the Elohist, and made the groundwork of the Pentateuch, still later, during the Babylonian exile. His conclusions are still more startling than Kuenen's, and he finds little but legend in the stories of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses and Joshua. But a scholarly reviewer in the Nation defends them and says: "Never has the minute examination and dissection of historical tradition been carried out with more painstaking earnestness, sounder knowledge, and greater freedom from religious or anti-religious prepossessions, than in the histories of Wellhausen and Stade."

THE consciousness of deathlessness, when attained, is something very different from an external dogma taken from a book. The last makes immortality an arbitrary gift; the other finds it in the nature of things. The one is a repetition of creation, the other is continuation, eternal life. The one depends on frail external evidence; the other is perfected, incorporated into our lives—an achievement of Living. The one faith is a prop, a crutch, a parachute; the other, strength, faculty, eternal buoyancy. The one is superficial, kept for emergencies; the other is an axiom of the soul, having to do constantly with all human interests. The one is liable to be torn away, because it is attached, and not ingrown; the other, when attained, points, as constant as the needle to the pole, to the endless persistence of mind force and heart force—the sublime, immortal destiny of man.

"WHEN after ages look back upon our own, they will recognize that in science its key-note has been the idea of Unity." So says Grant Allen in his recent article on "The Progress of Science from 1836 to 1886." Instead of the "fragmentary and disjunctive science of fifty years ago," we now see a "unified cosmos, consisting everywhere of the same prime elements, animated everywhere by the same constant and indestructible energies, evolving everywhere along the same lines in accordance with the self-same underlying principles," in "mind and matter," in "body, soul and spirit." J. Addington Symonds in his able article on "The Progress of Thought" in the same period, asserts the same, and adds that this idea brings more spirituality to thought. He says, "When we begin to regard this Unity with eyes from which the scales of Christian antagonism have fallen, we discover that we cannot think of it except as spiritual." Science "while establishing law, has prepared the way for the identification of Law with God." He claims that "the main fact in the intellectual development of the last half-century" is "the restoration of spirituality to our thoughts about the universe."

WHAT the leading thinkers of the early church taught about the scriptural "firmament" and the "waters above" it, is shown by Andrew D. White in his new papers on "The Warfare of Science." Saint Ambrose held the firmament to be a solid vault, and the thunder to be caused by the winds breaking through it; and taught that if the vault revolved, this "water is just what is needed to lubricate and cool its axis." Saint Jerome held the same, with the addition that to keep the upper waters in place, the Creator had turned them into ice. Saint Augustine "thought it his duty to guard especially the whole theory of the waters above the heavens." The "venerable Bede" wrote of these waters: "Some declare that they were stored there for the deluge, but others, more correctly, that they were intended to temper the fire of the stars." Among their other interesting theories, was that of Tertullian and his followers, who held that lightning was identical with hell-fire, and that the sulphurous smell attending it was proof. All these and many similar conclusions were based on scripture texts, and on Augustine's axiom, that "Nothing is to be accepted save on the authority of scripture, since greater is that authority than all the powers of the human mind."

Nor all slavery is abolished yet. Rev. Mr. Pentecost told the other day of a widow in Newark, who had been making children's dresses at eight cents apiece, and was able by close effort to earn twenty-four cents a day,—with which to support herself and four children, and, as he satirically said, "to buy drink and indulge in the other extravagances, to which we are told the poor are especially addicted." He added that it was money in the purse of that employer that he could hire the woman, instead of owning her as a slave. If the story was not true, and if the woman got treble those wages, she was still a slave; and a society in which she lives beside men who spend millions for private luxuries, has something rotten in it. Not that we have any quarrel with rich men, merely as such. Many of them are the hardest workers in the community and deserve luxuries. Nor is the rich man's wealth monopolized by himself, as popularly assumed; but most of it is invested in the public service, and most of his income re-invested in some business which benefits others and which the rich man only manages,—and manages better than a poor man could. So far as rich men use their wealth generously and with public spirit, they deserve the great gratitude of the community, instead of the curses so many are getting to-day. Still the poor have right to complain, while some men have private palaces and only occasionally try to remedy the inequality by a charity-ball where the costumes cost forty-fold more than the charities come to. The coming man will be ashamed to live in a too costly mansion; and the coming woman will see that the beauty God gives her makes diamonds dull and trains ridiculous.

The Oliver Wendell Holmes Hospital.

Last spring, when the senior editor took a flying trip into the northwestern part of UNITY's diocese, he had the pleasure of looking through the Oliver Wendell Holmes Hospital at Hudson, Wisconsin, a sanitarium perfect in its appointments and ideal in its situation. The building was dedicated last month with fitting ceremonies. The following response to the toast "Oliver Wendell Holmes" was made by Hon. E. E. Woodman, of St. Paul. We are glad to let him thus speak without consent or request to his associates the readers of UNITY:

"One of the distinguishing characteristics of the nineteenth century is the widespread philanthropy that marks the time. Near the close of the eighteenth century there was a sun-burst of science, and by its illumination men saw the intrinsic equality of human souls. Uplifted by this grand idea, they tore down thrones and tyrannies, and forever swept into the rubbish of the ages the divine right of kings and all the tinsel fripperies of artificial ranks and orders among men.

"In the nineteenth century, with the sun of science riding high in the heavens, and our knowledge ever broadening and deepening under its glorious light, a larger and nobler idea is swaying the human soul, not the equality, but the brotherhood of men. Thus has the century blossomed in charities that, as being the expression of love in the soul, and as going out to others rather than centering in ourselves, we feel to be diviner than faith, diviner than hope. In every civilized land are a thousand monuments to the pervading and moving power of this noble sentiment. Beginning a hundred years ago with prison reform, and showing its least works to-day in Fresh Air Funds and Flower Missions, the best thought of the century has been given to the amelioration of the social state of the poor, the unfortunate and the afflicted.

"The institution that you have dedicated to-day stands in line with these humanities. This suggested the propriety of the name it bears. Certainly nothing but a foundation in Samaritan ethics could make it worthy to be the namesake of Oliver Wendell Holmes. For it is he that has touched the well-springs of feeling in all our hearts and given them vent in charities. As old Burton was the anatomist of Melancholy, so he is the anatomist of Love. Having risen to the lofty conception of the unity of the spirit, not in man alone, but throughout the universe, he has a heart of tenderness and humility toward even our lowly brother of a shell-fish; and in the far frontier of life, where the nautilus sails its ship, has been inspired with the noblest aspiration of the human soul:

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!

* * * * *

Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

"To adorn a well of healing his name is best. In thus using it we seek to honor the distinguished instructor in his long professional career; the humanitarian poet, who has interpreted the spirit of his age; and the benign autocrat, under whose enchanting sway that spirit has been moved to all benevolences."

Calamities and Providence.

The ancients thought calamities sent from Providence to punish sin, and generally knew what the sin was. When that destructive storm fell on the wheat harvest in Samuel's time, he told the people it was because they had asked for a king; and when a pestilence visited Israel in David's time, the Biblical writer assures us that its destruction of 20,000 men was because David had committed the great sin of taking a census. Jesus rose above such errors, and taught a Providence that sent sun and rain on evil and good alike, and let the tower of Siloam fall regardless of its victims. But few Christians have followed him here, and the idea that storms were divine punishments was a "truism" in mediæval thought, President White says. So late as the 17th century, the Catholic Bishop Majoli's authoritative work compares thunder and lightning to "bombs against the wicked," and says, "It is not to be doubted that, of all instruments of God's vengeance, the thunderbolt is the chief." A Protestant Swabian pastor, soon after, enumerates five sins especially punished with lightning and hail,—three of which are incredulity, neglect to repair churches, and withholding tithes from the clergy. So in this country Increase Mather taught that the scanty harvests of one year were probably caused by the low salaries the people were paying their preachers; and his son Cotton Mather tells of two ministers who were ill-paid, and "God, who will not be mocked," made the town lose cattle to "the value of 300 pounds sterling." Even so late as 1870, the French Bishop of Verdun ascribed a drought to the sin of Sabbath-breaking.

Such thoughts, however, are fast disappearing. We have learned that Providence makes no distinction between Protestant, papist and pagan, or even between worshipers and wicked. Corn grows as well for a Catholic as for a Calvinist, and as well for an atheist as for either. The earthquake smites saint and scoffer alike, and sometimes slays the theologian and saves the thief. Lightning cares for neither theology nor morals, but would just as soon strike a Christian church as a Mohammedan mosque,—and would sooner strike a tall steeple than a small saloon. Providence always acts through law.

But do not these calamities prove there is no Providence at all? How can they be reconciled with goodness in God or nature? In answering, we must exclude the calamities we bring upon ourselves. When our fire-traps burn, we have no right to infer there is no Providence. When our weak bridges break, we have no right to conclude there is no God. Rather the fact that fire burns wherever it gets a chance, is only a proof that Providence is faithful. The laws that let weak bridges break, but are themselves never broken, are proofs of the best possible God, who can always be trusted. Even the damages of earthquakes are partly our own fault, and are largely due to architects,—as Gibbon long ago said. Nor is the earthquake any worse than our own customs. Its shock is no more cruel to a city than a Christian siege. If earthquakes have destroyed 100,000 lives this century,—our wars since the middle of it have destroyed twenty times as many. Earthquakes, too, unlike wars, are a necessity of nature, coming from the same forces that have shaped the earth, and that still bless it,—and it will be a sorry day for man when the planet's internal disturbances cease. Nor could a true God interfere with them;—for Deity must be faithful to the divine laws, and as Mr. Chadwick finely said of the Charleston earthquake, "So help him God, He could not do otherwise."

So of our more familiar tornadoes. An observer compared the terrible scene after one to a battlefield. Perhaps it was bad, but by means so broad. In any of our late great wars, an action which killed but fifty men would hardly have had the honor of a mention in the morning paper. In the museum at Madison, one sees a board that has been driven through a tree in a tornado; and not far away a Gatling gun which shoots four hundred times a minute. Beside our torpedoes, —tornadoes seem quite harmless and humane; and cyclones are innocent compared with Christian cannon. At any rate, so long as we honor Napoleon for destroying two million men, let us not blame God or nature too severely for a storm that destroys but forty. Besides, these storms are necessary parts of the wind system which is fanning the cities and refreshing the farms, ventilating the valleys, purifying the prairies, and bearing moisture from the oceans to water our grain and to make the rivers to grind it with. Before we curse the winds for taking the lives of a few men, we want to remember that they are giving life to us all.

Calamities are, besides, great educators. The best Providence is not one which pets us, but pushes us out to struggle and be strengthened. To so-called evils we owe much of our progress. Hunger has developed our fisheries and farms. Cold has taught us to master fire for furnaces and factories. Need underlies all the arts. The storms on land have led to houses and started architecture. The storms at sea have brought stronger ships and the triumphs of navigation. Lightning gave the first lessons in electricity, and out of the tempest has come the telegraph. Nor has the education been merely mental, but moral. Storms have strengthened not only ships, but human bravery; and have not only built houses, but brought humaner sentiments in them, and warmed both hearths and hearts. They have evoked a pity and sympathy in the human soul, that far more than redeems any want of it in the wind. Calamities level our false distinctions, show us all equal before the great powers of nature, open our pockets and hearts, and bind mankind in closer brotherhood. They do more than prosperity to broaden minds, soften feelings, and bring spiritual sentiments. Through them we learn relentless law;—but also learn that this law is evolving love, and is itself love, and argues an eternal love that can be trusted.

H. M. S.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Road to Rue.

"THE END OF THAT MIRTH IS HEAVINESS."

Yes, all is bright and fair,
And merry music's played;—
There's neither grief nor care
Nor weary footprints made;
Life's sweetest roses grow,
And all the skies are blue,
And all the rivers pleasant flow
Along the road to Rue.

The heart is gay and glad;—
The eyes are strangely bright,—
There spring no fountains sad
To dim their crystal sight,
For Laughter rules the day,
And witching faces through
The leafage look nor turn away,
Along the road to Rue.

The soul doth own a hope
That cannot dream of pain,
And lips to beauty ope
Nor count their kisses vain;—
'Tis joy and love and mirth,
With all the words so true:
'Tis all of heaven and naught of earth
Along the road to Rue!

CHARLES G. BLANDEN.

The Injustice of Socialism.

Under the above heading, a writer in the April Century arraigns the socialistic doctrine, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs." He says: "According to this rule, a man of superior talents or creative genius would receive no higher recompense than the most inefficient workman, and, indeed, if the latter had a larger family, he would apparently receive more. The obvious intent of this rule is to prevent men of superior abilities from rising above the mass."

Such a conclusion is unavoidable if wages be the only criterion of success, if we recognize no higher recompense than money, and the things which money will buy. Mercenary as we are, I think we are hardly ready to admit this,—we are not ready to say that the crown of wild olive was an injustice to the victor in the Olympic games, and that Jesus and Socrates never rose above the masses. In what does rising above the masses consist? When we compare men with their fellows, the standard must be found in those things which constitute them men, in their inherent manhood. "A horse does not say to a horse: I am superior to you, for I possess much fodder and much barley, and my bits are of gold, and my harness is embroidered; but he says: I am swifter than you. And every animal is better or worse from his own merit or his own badness. Is there then no virtue in man only? And must we look to the hair, and our clothes, and our ancestors?"

There is nothing in the system of Socialism to prevent a man's doing the best of which he is capable, and freedom to do his best is all that a brave man wants. The socialist says that the man of superior talents and creative genius is already blest above his fellows in the possession of these gifts and in the assurance of honor and gratitude which must surely come to him from their exercise. Society is under no obligations to reward him for his good fortune. A true man feels that the highest recompense of a good deed is in the ability to do it, in the consciousness of having done it.

Is he indeed just who says, "Because my brother is inferior to me,—weaker of limb, dimmer of sight, cloudier of intellect, therefore I should have the softer couch, better food, more perfect schooling, and restful leisure?" Is it justice or selfishness which speaks here? Whence has a man his superior talents, and creative genius, and to what end? Are they not an inheritance from all past ages? Does not their present value depend upon their adaptability to the wants of mankind? Do they then belong to the man alone? Is he elevated or degraded when they are made an article of merchandise?

Under our present system, when a man has spent unremunerative years in the study of a profession, or in scientific research, justice demands that he should be reimbursed for the expense he has so incurred, and large fees are the approved means. According to the socialistic scheme, a man is to be considered as much a worker for the commonwealth during his years of preparation as while actually engaged in work, and to be paid accordingly. This would open up the learned professions to much talent which is now shut out for lack of means, while it would rid them of many worthless members. Once make other occupations as respectable and as remunerative as the professions, and we shall have many good butchers and bakers and candlestick makers from the ranks of our incompetent professional men.

Most critics of socialism seem to assume that it means a return to barbarism or semi-civilization, and that it puts a premium on incompetence and idleness. A careful reading of the leaders of the movement will convince any one that this is a mistake. It looks forward, not back.

A review of the history of the race will show that where man has worked simply to supply his individual wants, he has not risen above savagery, and his achievements have been of the most meagre description. Men early learned this, and saw that for any work of magnitude co-operation and division of labor were absolutely necessary. Then followed compulsory co-operation, or slavery,—the strong compelling the weak to work for them. This system is still prevalent in many parts of the world, and is the earliest of which we have any record among historic nations. As the moral sense developed, and there faintly dawned upon men's minds the thought of the brotherhood of men, the condition of the workers was ameliorated, and slavery was succeeded by serfdom. Under this system, the workman had liberty of person, and the privilege of having a home and family; otherwise he was little better off than the slave.

Serfdom, or feudalism, because of the same developing moral sense, was succeeded by our present wage system, with whose workings we all are familiar. Have we reached the final stage in this evolution of co-operation? The socialist says, no. Under all these systems, the workers have occupied an inferior position, and attained a lower degree of mental and moral development. They cannot reach the full stature of men under their present conditions. The world is now ready for the next step in advance,—the co-operation of equals. Men are brothers, and therefore equals,—not equal in ability (no two men, be they two capitalists or two laborers, are equals in that sense), but equals in right.

For idlers, socialism has less encouragement than the present order of society. It lays down as a fundamental principle, "if a man will not work, neither shall he eat," and applies this principle to all who are able to work, so that no man can lead a life of idleness and self-indulgence on the stored-up industry of father or grandfather. Each man must work according to his ability, that is, according to the powers God has given him. If he came into the world handicapped by physical, mental, or moral weakness, he should not, therefore, be given the harder task, the fewer advantages, the greater temptations,—he rather should be helped and taught, that in him or in his descendants this disability may be removed. There is no true progress which does not include all mankind. If for the next five hundred years not one invention or discovery was added to the sum of man's knowledge and power, and all the wisdom and skill and zeal of men were turned to bringing the masses of mankind up to the level of the more favored of our own time, it would be no era of loss. These five centuries would shine forth as the brightest in all human history, and from the vantage ground thus gained the race would go forward with an impetus beside which our present boasted progress would seem but a snail's pace.

Socialism is not absolute justice,—that would be too much to claim for anything of human devising,—but socialism is not a thing to be shuddered at and condemned unheard. It is a strong plea for justice,—a plea for the children robbed of their childhood in factory and mine, condemned to ignorance and depravity by the influences among which they are born and reared,—a plea for the homes bereft of the mother's presence and care, because only so can the children be clothed and fed,—a plea for the women who are driven to prostitution for lack of work which will support them,—a plea for the equal rights of all.

Only to the very rich man is the message of socialism a harsh one, and even to him, not so harsh as the words of Christ. To the rich young man Christ said: "Sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor; and come, take up the cross and follow me." The socialist invites no man to the life of poverty and hardship which Jesus led.

Over a hundred years ago, our own Benjamin Franklin said: "If every man did his share of labor, and wasted effort were stopped, four hours labor a day would give to everybody all the wealth he could use."

LIDA MINNISS BROWN.

Days of Quietness.

The seashore, the mountains, mineral springs and farm-houses throughout the country are being rapidly filled with people in search of health and rest ostensibly, often pleasure and excitement in reality. Having summered in all such places, fate has thrown us this year among scenes entirely new, and our fashion of seeking rest and health will at least have the merit of being unique.

We are right in the midst of the "piney woods" of North Carolina, on an elevated ridge, where the air is dry and bracing and where the cool breezes ever blow. Our grounds are simply a few acres of cleared land surrounded on all sides by the forest primeval. Whichever way we look giant pine trees, with the intervening spaces filled with oaks, meet the view. No other habitation is in sight, and we seldom see a passer-by. I fear I shall fail to describe our life so that the reader can get a true idea of its delightfulness, but will try.

We begin the day very early, awakened from sleep by the notes of the wood birds or the joyous song of a mocking bird, and before the freshness and coolness of the morning are gone the household work is performed and the husband is bidden good-by, as a certain office in the distance claims his attention through the day. Then there is a long, quiet, uninterrupted day before us, with time enough to do all we wish, or to leave undone whatever we are disinclined to do. Our life is one of leisure and rest. Imagine what that means to one who has always been hurried, who has had six things to do in the time needed for one, who has struggled ceaselessly to obtain bread and butter, who has felt guilty if every moment was not filled with work of some kind, and who, with all the need for doing, has been compelled to spend months on a bed of pain and weakness! Leisure and rest and health have we found in our hermit-like seclusion.

The long, bright days are spent in holding intercourse by means of the pen with distant friends; in reading whatever is light and amusing, without feeling conscience-stricken for not studying or improving our minds; in lying absolutely idle in the hammock looking up into the impenetrable blue heights of the sky, flecked with the fleeciery of clouds, or into the equally impenetrable green depths of the woods; listening to the soothing murmur of the wind through the pines, and to the tinkling of the oak leaves, which always reminds me of the tinkling of the golden bough which Æneas found—Sic leni crepitabat bractea vento; watching the graceful gyrations of the buzzards circling far above us; thinking thoughts too deep and tender for utterance; and drinking in the sweet, health-giving air with an ever-growing love to the Giver of all good. The good is so much more tangible than heretofore that our gratitude deepens in consequence.

The only real event, and about our only connection with the outside world, comes in the morning when the mail arrives; but when one lives so quietly it is surprising what trifles become momentous events. We watch with keen interest the efforts of a wasp which has killed a monster gray grasshopper that she is trying to take to her nest, probably for the nourishment of the larvæ. The grasshopper proves too burdensome, so she leaves it on the ground and seeks for her mate to assist her. He is nowhere to be found and she flies about in frantic dismay, accomplishing nothing. Before her recreant spouse returns the ever vigilant ants have discovered the prize, and in a few minutes myriads of these tiny creatures are at work to secure for themselves the wasp's unfortunate victim. They sever its legs, wings and head from the body, and detachments of them carry the various members to their underground residence. Our attention is then called off, but the next morning we notice that the ants are carrying away the very last portion of their stolen property. The birds, too, are ever interesting and diverting. We watch them building their nests and laugh as they struggle and pull at the southern moss growing on the trees, in their eagerness to obtain pieces of it for lining their little abodes. To save our moss, which we have brought here, it not being native to this section, we put out strings for their birdships, which they joyously bear away. The growth of the flowers, vines and fruit trees is observed daily, and the wild flowers, many of them new to a northerner, are analyzed in a manner most unscientific, but sufficiently accurate to determine what they are.

And so, in dreaming and planning and hoping and growing in harmony with our Mother Nature, the warm, quiet hours slip away and almost before we know it the coolness of the evening is upon us. Then, away down the long avenue of trees a figure, dim in the distance, is seen, and we go forth into the dusk, down the green pathway to receive the welcoming kiss of the "gude man" as he returns home.

Arm in arm we walk back, talking of the happenings of the day, and after a light repast sit on the veranda and watch the stars shining with a soft brightness peculiar to the southern atmosphere. Bats flit in and out among the trees in search of insects, while the katydids and crickets sing soprano to the far-off bass notes of a choir of frogs. Anon the rich, melodious voice of a negro is heard singing a weird minor song as he wends his way to his cabin. We listen in speechless enjoyment until the last note dies on the air, and as the restfulness and peace of the evening envelop our bodies we lay them down to rest with hearts happy and trusting. Ere long the sweetest, soundest sleep creeps over our senses, and the almost undreamed-of luxury of a night's sleep, unbroken by wakeful hours or even moments, brings refreshment to mind and body.

On Sunday the programme is little changed, except that we have the company of the husband and father. There is no church to attend, but devotional reading, worshipful thoughts and the singing of the sweet old-fashioned hymns, so fitted to our surroundings, makes the day different from the others and satisfying to our spiritual natures.

The heat might be unpleasant were it not for the never-failing cool breezes. Moreover, being so far removed from the world of fashion and conventionality, the simplest, thinnest garments are worn, and we vex not ourselves to concoct divers dyspeptic dishes for the table. A plain diet in which milk, fruit and vegetables are prominent adds both to our healthfulness and comfort.

Lonely we seldom are; although we enjoy social intercourse, it is sometimes good to be away from people; to be free from the work, responsibilities, petty jealousies, gossip and strife of the world. Some day we shall go back to the conflict of life with tempers sweetened, bodies strengthened, hearts softened and souls enlarged; but never shall we lose from our memories the peace, quiet and helpfulness of these long, beautiful, care-free, summer days.

JULIA W. GOODRIDGE.

SOUTHERN PINES, N. C.

Address of Rabbi Iliowizi at Dedication of Unitarian Church of Minneapolis.

If one of our forefathers, who died at the beginning of this century, would on a sudden appear among the living and look bewildered with amazement at the great industrial, social, political and other changes the march of civilization has brought about, what great achievement could we point to and exclaim, "Did you ever dream, O sire, that this would come to pass?" Some years ago a prominent Englishman said that, under similar circumstances, he would pick up a copy of the London Times and say: "Here is the wonder of wonders." And wonderful it is to contemplate that daily product of literary genius and mechanical skill mirroring, as it does, the world's history of each day. Yet it appears to me there is a greater wonder which may justly be considered the triumph of triumphs, and that is the dawn of the realization of that sweet prophetic dream, that heavenly vision that tells of a blessed age when "the wolf shall dwell with the sheep, the lion with the fatling" and when the "earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as waters cover the sea." This denomination with the monotheistic, humanitarian ideal before them, this beautiful plan of worship with no idolatrous image, no heathen rite to defy the letter and the spirit of the Decalogue; this cultured audience whose eyes are beaming "peace on earth and good will to all men," the representatives of the great Universalist church, the fearless expounders of Unitarian thought, and myself, the humble representative of the hoary mother religion, who am here to fraternize with the youngest of her noblest offsprings, are all proofs that the prophetic vision is being realized, and that the dark ages are gone, gone let us hope forever. Let the Old World not smile at the multiplicity of denominations in this free continent. They are the blossoms of liberty, the healthiest symptoms of a nation's life whose mind is unchained, whose beacon is thought, and whose aspiration, whose treasure, is independence. The darkest era of Christianity embraces all those ages during which it has been identified with but one denomination—catholicism. The first split in the ranks of that powerful, ostentatious church was the first rent in the horizon hitherto black with the clouds of barbarism, ignorance, superstition, hatred and oppression. The human mind, so long sterile under the withering breath of a baneful priest craft, in the new rays of freedom's smiling sun began to unbosom its latent, godlike fertility. Thought has wings, and, like the mythical wind, once freed invades and sweeps the whole face of the earth.

Christianity once divided continued to subdivide and ramify, each succeeding branch being an improvement on the one that gave it birth, until the two youngest and noblest twigs, Universalism and Unitarianism, came to light.

Yea, progressive Israel looks at you as the cream of Christianity, as the worthy ideal scions of ideal Judaism, children of whom the eternal mother need not be ashamed. Do not consider it a slight compliment to be thus cordially recognized by that proud, invincible race, who, in the long career of its tragic history, did never, never condescend to bow before heathen pomp or greatness, whether enthroned in Constantinople or worshiped in Rome, but having spun the celestial thread out of which the world's ideals are woven, was, like the silk worm, ever ready to die rather than betray its sacred trust. We recognize you because you do not misinterpret our prophecy, you do not break our Decalogue, save the Sabbath, which the future will restore to its original sanctity. We recognize you because your hands are not reeking with another's blood; there is no dark page in your history. We recognize you because our mission is almost identical. We preach the love and brotherhood of all men, and the unity of God. On our banner is written: "Truth, charity and peace." For these we are living, for these we are striving. Our phalanx is small, compared with the dark powers we are confronting, but the spirit of the Lord is upon us, and Samson-like we battle with the Philistines. It is now our turn to be aggressive, but neither the sword, nor the rack, nor the stake are our weapons. We smite with "the breath of the lips," we conquer with the spirit. I am convinced that from this house of worship more good will spring, more light will emanate than from churches many times larger and richer than yours, because you are marching abreast with the age; you are appealing to the sound common sense of the times, while the others are centuries behind this period of reason. You are talking to the living, they to the dead; you promise salvation to all good men, they have perdition for the majority of the human race.

Ignorance, fanaticism, and hypocrisy are evil powers no Alcides, no Theseus could strangle. Their vitality is appalling. Time and light, that have caused chaos to recede, will destroy these sad relics of barbarism that are still a barrier to the development of healthy thought, to the progress of civilization. Time and light being our co-workers, whom should we fear? That light, pure ethereal light, may not be wanting in this quarter of our glorious country, God has caused His people to build Him a temple, the Universalists to build grand churches, and now this city is enriched by this solid, magnificent edifice, which by Heaven's grace will, like the trunk of the banyan tree, become the focus of many similar places radiating light and hope to benighted man.

Beyond the Human.

• Lo! evermore the mystery of Life
 Encompasseth the world! Lo! evermore
 The finite, baffled, seeks the infinite.
 The tear-loved sphere whirls ever on through space,
 And answerless the human questions fall
 To earth, or pierce the great beyond unheard.
 Lo! every heart has reared its Babel to
 The skies, while deed and hope with pigmy strokes
 Have thought to build beyond the flooded world—
 Have sought to stand upon some topmost point
 While all the whirl of waters 'neath assailed
 No more the being lifted by a hope
 Of God-like power to ask the why of God.

EUGENE ASHTON.

Funerals and Officiating Ministers.

They are both necessary, and the first is inevitable. They usually go together. Some funerals dispense with formal services, or a layman speaks an oration, or the mourners meet and lay away their own dead in silence. Generally the feeling in a Christian land is in the direction of some formality and a clergyman to lead the services; anything else would seem a little off color and to be deplored. As to what minister shall officiate there is but one party to say, namely, the chief mourners, the family of the deceased, unless, as is not infrequently the case, the request of the dead had been made for some particular parson to preside. It is a part of the regular pastor's work and duty to do this service, and where there is a pastor, he is the one thought of at once. And yet, if he should be a new man, and the deceased was well known by a former pastor, that pastor may be called to assist in the services, although he may have most to do and say. It is a courtesy due the regular pastor to conduct funerals in his own parish, even though but little acquainted with the deceased, unless a request had been otherwise made, and nothing, in such a case, is to be thought strange of it. But the family can always have their wishes respected by consulting with the pastor. It is a very unnecessary and discourteous thing to send out of town for a minister to attend a funeral of a member of a parish with a settled pastor, and not invite that pastor to be present and perhaps take some part. Sometimes it is a fashion, as in other things, and to have a "big funeral," as the Catholics say, is a passion for some people, and Doctor A. or Professor B., or some noted man, is invited to officiate. It is all right to send for any one who is a friend of the deceased, but that need not be done without consulting the regular pastor first and letting him know the wishes of the family, precisely as may happen in the matter of weddings; but in either case the way is plain to a courteous man or woman, and the pastor cannot be ignored without chagrin to the pastor and his family, and without the breaking of all rules of courtesy on the part of the other parties concerned. Understand me, I do not say that this neglect and discourtesy is always meant, but it really has no excuse to the kind and the naturally courteous. The parties must have the man they want; that is right and well; but when another's official work is assumed, let him have as little cause to complain as possible.

There is another point quite as important in the matter of some funerals as that of the officiating clergyman; I refer to the compensation. This is a delicate matter, and one that needs light to many who do not act, or act unadvisedly from ignorance of what to do. There are few cases where the pastor of a church ever expects pay for services at a funeral. He always expects it at weddings; that is his and his only perquisite; but at funerals of his own people only when he is called out of town, or is put to any cost. His time must be thrown in as belonging to the parish. Not infrequently, in the case of rich people, a present of fifty or a hundred dollars from the family he serves is given to him in a quiet way, perhaps ostensibly for special acts of kindness, or as a recognition of friendship. This ought to be much oftener than it is to offset some things not so pleasant, as I will presently state. But here is a funeral in a family where there is no pastor. If a minister in town of another church is asked to officiate, he expects nothing and does it as a matter of courtesy to the society or the family, and yet a five dollar bill, or even more, if the family is well to do, should be sent to him through the undertaker, or directly from the family, with a note of thanks for the service, which is the much finer way of procedure. The same should be done in the absence of the regular pastor.

Then again for that large class of persons who have no minister or church, and never pay anything for the support of religion, what shall they do about getting a minister to officiate at a funeral? Yet the man they think they should like, or want, and of course always pay him handsomely for it, not by asking him how much he will settle for, or want, but by sending or giving it to him in an envelope, considering that they can afford to be generous, since they have no pew rents to pay as do others; and also take into account his time and the distance and his expense in getting there. Let me be very plain in this matter, and say that perhaps, from ignorance of what is proper and just in such cases, the officiating clergymen at funerals of non-attendants are often treated very meanly. I could write pages, and almost books, of cases of gross treatment of that class of people supposed always ready and willing to serve the living and the dead, where there is no shadow of obligation, and no thought that compensation is as obligatory as that of the shroud maker or the undertaker. A minister told me the other day of having driven in a snow storm forty miles among the hills and in the cold of New Hampshire to attend the funeral of a man, well-to-do and a stranger, and with hardly a thank'ee, and no more.

Another hired a team, drove five miles and officiated at a funeral in a family of rich farmers, all strangers to him. In about a year, one of the family called on this same clergyman to marry him, and before leaving asked him, "What the legal fee was." The reply he got was that he did not know, but that he read the other evening of an Episcopal clergyman in Salem who, for marrying a couple got a check for a thousand dollars, but that all did not fare as well. He came, however, with his bride and planked down a five dollar bill, but forgot to pay the funeral bill. He did, however, going out of the door, mention it, saying that he had heard that there was some expense by way of a team, in attending the funeral, and had his hand on his pocketbook, when the minister said that he never set any price on such services, when his hand let the pocketbook down into its greedy pocket, never to come out again, although the parson added, but if "I go to any expense I am always willing that should be paid." There ought not to be this ignorance on so important matters as these. Here is a man who, though of the officiating minister's faith, but not an attendant or a supporter of his church, has no claims upon his services, and should pay him, and, if rich, handsomely, for attendance at funerals. If he is the man to be buried; his friends, employing a clergyman, whose salary he does not help pay, should pay for that service as a matter of course. Some of the family may go to his church, but that is not enough; or he may simply be called in to assist another clergyman who is his minister, it matters not, he is entitled to pay, and should get it, and sometimes does, but generally not from rich families. To my own knowledge there are some exceptions, and I will say that a little over a year ago I received twenty-five dollars from the widow of the man I buried, who belonged to a church of another denomination, and the first time I saw her afterwards she said, "I have not paid you enough," and gave me ten dollars more, which gift is repeated from time to time. I shall not tell you how others have treated me in similar cases, but you would not believe me were I to tell you. Now, if any one reads this paper and feels condemned, I advise you, be it late, to rectify the matter by sending the officiating and unpaid pastor a generous fee, if you are able, or send it to his wife, who is tugging away in the kitchen, to help her to a servant, and to save her from working off her fingers and the bloom of her cheeks. Send it as a matter of justice. And especially you rich folks, think of getting out of paying a funeral debt, and to a minister upon whom you have not the least claim. One hundred, two hundred thousand dollars, and the gravedigger paid, the florist paid, perhaps a hundred dollars, fifteen or thirty hacks, possibly a reporter to take down the remarks, but not a dollar for the pastor, or rather for the clergyman, who was not, and never had been his pastor, and who is still wondering how people can be so thoughtless or so mean. I am willing to be the martyr to bear the burden of this utterance, and I can do it better for UNITY than you western folks, and I shall not be suspected of being personally concerned in this matter of unmet justice away off here to the east, as no one here, perhaps, takes your paper (I am sorry if it is so), so it cannot be too plain speech for me who have for twenty odd years been attending to ministerial duties, and have fared, I venture to say, as well as the best, in the matter of officiating at funerals outside of my parish, or of persons supporting no church. And I hope this word will do good, and instruct the ignorant of what is proper. For no one should oblige or tempt the minister to send a bill for services rendered at funerals, since it is a delicate thing to do. I am perfectly willing to have this paper quoted far and near.

A. J. R.

THE STUDY TABLE.

In Thoughts from the Visions of the Night. By M. S. Paden. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn street; paper, $5\frac{1}{4} \times 6\frac{1}{4}$ inches, pp. 16, 20 cents.

This poem is a rumination suggested by the words of Job which form its title. It is in rhyme, the quatrain form prevailing. Its thought is purely Christian. One very rarely sees a poem of modern production with a text for a title which is worth reading; but Miss Paden's is not only worth reading but worth memorizing also, both for its religious or spiritual value and its poetical quality. In our opinion, "H. H." (who has been accounted the first female poet of this country) never produced a religious poem so thoroughly acceptable as this. While quite H. H.'s equal in poetic power, Miss Paden is more artistic in her expression than was she. We are aware that this is saying much; but much requires to be said. There are not half a dozen men in America who are writing poetry as strong, uniformly, as that which Miss Paden is writing; and strength is a quality greatly to be desired in modern verse. May it not be long before we have a volume of this poet's writings!

E. R. C.

German Novelettes. For School and Home. Selected from the best Modern Writers, with Etymological, Grammatical and Explanatory notes. By Dr. William Bernhardt. Volume I. D. C. Heath & Co., Boston.

This carefully edited, beautifully printed, German reader for the school and home contains five pretty stories, and will no doubt be found very useful. The idea of the series is to furnish persons who have acquired some ability in reading German just the right sort of short stories to afford them the needed practice in the language.

Zury: The Meanest Man in Spring County. A Novel of Western Life. By Joseph Kirkland. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

In this book, as in "The Story of a Country Town," and others whose number is growing, we have "realism" applied to a phase of western pioneer life but lately past, and it is safe to say that it is a genuine contribution toward the American Novel, for which we are told we are waiting. The author, who appears to be a new candidate for literary honors, has written a book that will attract attention as original, and smacking of the soil. Besides its racy delineations of character in a new and crude civilization, the motive or moral of the book seems to be the tracing of how, under the pressure of circumstances, avarice is developed and a miser made,—and, happily in this case, un-made at last.

F. K. G.

Profit Sharing. By N. O. Nelson, St. Louis, Mo.

Three good articles reprinted from the Missouri Republican, St. Louis, Mo., to which is added an essay entitled, "Am I my Brother's Keeper?" The aim of the little pamphlet is to advocate profit-sharing, on which point it gives valuable information. There are some documents at the end headed "No Longer an Experiment," which show that the author himself has adopted in his own business, with happy results, the just and wise principle which he advocates. We commend the little pamphlet for its large, brotherly spirit, for the information gathered in a small space, and for its wisdom.

THE HOME.

The Lad and the Lapis.

AN ALLEGORY.

Many years ago a simple-minded youth possessed of some wealth resolved to increase his revenue by shrewd investments. This determination reaching the ears of interested friends was hailed by them with joyous acclamations and subtle arguments. "Now this youth is silly enough to share whatever he possesses with us, consequently any sudden prosperity awaiting him will be as freely bestowed upon his friends as heretofore, and it is of the utmost importance that he should be rightly counseled how and where to invest his money."

Whereupon, with one accord, they immediately hastened to the lad, and after much persuasion induced the simpleton to invest his property in a mine of apparently inexhaustible wealth. He staked his all and lost. Such a terrible misfortune drove the poor fellow frantic, and for years he wandered aimlessly over the earth, a broken-hearted, dispirited mortal.

One day he found himself far away from the busy world, in a desert place of sand and stone. Not a sound to be heard, save the beating of his own rebellious heart, not a face to be seen save the reflection, in a little pool of water at his feet, of his own unhappy features. He sat down upon a slight elevation of sand and began to toy idly with the soil by his side, recalling the happy hours thus spent in his innocent boyhood as he sifted the grains through his fingers into tiny mounds and miniature gardens. He remembered with a momentary gleam of pleasure his boyish delight at the sight of any pretty colored pebbles brought to light by his little hands and treasured as something very wonderful until discarded for those still more marvellous in his childish eyes. While indulging in these peaceful thoughts he picked up a bit of stone, and mechanically putting it in his pocket, resumed his tiresome journey over the barren moor, till at length worn and jaded he threw himself at the foot of a rocky hill and fell asleep.

But his rest was broken and disturbed by fearful dreams; strange voices laughed and jeered at him, and he seemed to be constantly struggling with unseen foes. In his desperation he jumped up from the hard couch and striking his hands violently upon the rough ledge, awoke. A confused clamor at first sounded in his ears; then a tone clear and distinct above all others shouted to the bewildered dreamer. "Look at your pebble, silly boy!" He thrust his hand into his pocket, and lo! in place of the useless bauble he had put there the night before, he beheld a rare and costly gem. Wonder stricken, he laid it upon his open palm where it appeared to nestle coyly 'neath his earnest gaze, irradiating the gloom surrounding him with its clear, pure rays. A long, long time the youth stood entranced at the sight of this dazzling jewel, until by degrees the soft and tender glow reached up and encircled his cold, hungry heart with a sympathetic beam of warmth and brightness.

Overcome with joy and admiration he fell upon his knees, and pressing the priceless treasure to his bosom thanked God for the gift so miraculously sent him. Then arising from the ground refreshed and strengthened, determined now to wrestle with adversity, he retraced his steps and mingled once more in the noisy whirl of life. Holding the pebble tightly clasped within his palm, he roamed from place to place in search of work. Obtaining employment of the humblest kind he often faltered and stumbled on his way, many times strongly tempted to give up the fight; whenever this weakness came upon him, he retired to some quiet spot and gazing upon his jewel drew fresh courage from its cheering light. Every night he placed this talisman upon his pillow, and resting his tired head upon it gained fresh inspiration for the waking hours. And the youth increased in stature far beyond his fellow-men; they marvelled at his strength and spoke of his manly virtue, none knew of the secret power within his grasp, none dreamed of the glory of his vision—"Though all men have the key to this casket few possess the skill to open it."

J. M. F.

How To Keep a Secret.

I.

" 'In violet,' my mamma says
A secret should be kept;
I heard her say to papa
Last night before I slept.
I heard her talking in my room
With papa, soft and low,
'Secrets are kept in violet,'
And I'm so glad to know;
For I have the loveliest secret
I want to talk about,
Of course I can't tell any one,
Lest it should be let out.
But I can tell the violets,'—
She darted down the walk,
"You see, they're just the very ones,
For violets don't talk."
The violets heard a whisper,
A murmur soft and low,
Then warningly she ended with
"You mustn't tell, you know."

II.

I knew her small first finger-tip
Was scarred with needle pricks,
And that something was often brought
For dear mamma to fix.
And on my birthday by my plate
A handkerchief I found,
All snowy white and neatly hemmed
With tiny stitches round.
" 'Tis yours," she cried; "I was so 'fraid
I could not get it done.
See all the stitches round the edge,
I hemmed them every one.
It was a secret; no one knew,
'Cept mamma and the violets,
'Twas being done for you."

" 'Tis beautiful," I said, and kissed
Her shining curls of gold;
And it was kept *inviolat*e,
For not a violet told.—Young Folks.

THEODORE PARKER'S

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

Selected from Notes of Unpublished Sermons, by Rufus Leighton. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 480. reduced from $2.50 to $1.25.

"It has been a great comfort to me often to think that after I have passed away some of my best things might still be collected from my rough notes and your nice photograph of the winged words. The things I value most are not always such as get printed."—Theodore Parker to Rufus Leighton.

"This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. * * * The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

This volume, edited by Mr. RUFUS LEIGHTON, was first brought before the public in 1865. It ran through several editions, but for a number of years has not been regularly upon the market. We have just concluded an arrangement with Mr. LEIGHTON by which we shall have the exclusive sale of the book. The price, originally $1.50, we have

REDUCED TO $1.25.

The book contains 430 large duodecimo pages, and is substantially bound in cloth. The general divisions of subjects are as follows: The Material World and Man's Relation Thereto, the Nature of Man, Traits and Illustrations of Human Character and Conduct, Phases of Domestic Life, Education, Human Institutions and National Life, the Power and Endurance of What Is Noblest in Man, Human Progress, Jesus of Nazareth, Man in His Religious Aspect. Each of these divisions is subdivided into from seven to forty sections; for example, the chapter on Human Progress is subdivided as follows: Man to Make His Own Paradise, the False Idea of Man a Hindrance to His Progress, Man's Progress not by Miracle but by the Use of Natural Forces, Power of the Human Will Over Circumstances, the Necessity for an Ideal, Death a Blessing to Man, the Founders of New England—the True Way to Honor Them, the Prophecy of the Past to the Future, the Next Half Century.

The book is copyrighted, and no portion of it is accessible in any other form, except a single section which has been used in the recent volume published by the American Unitarian Association.

* * * The book is for sale in Boston at Roberts Brothers' Book Store, and may be obtained through the trade generally, or will be mailed on receipt of price ($1.25) by

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

APHORISMS OF THE THREE THREES.

BY EDWARD OWINGS TOWNE.

EXTRACTS FROM PRESS OPINIONS.

"A neat volume."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"Attractively gotten up."—The Current.

"Very entertaining."—N. Y. Christian Union.

"A bit of surprise."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

"Original, sparkling and full of instruction."—The University Voice.

"Solid chunks of wisdom, dished up without sauce or condiment."—Chicago Tribune.

"Many of its Aphorisms are witty and original, and some are very shrewd and wise."—Saturday Evening Herald.

"A neat little volume of Aphorisms or short pithy sentences containing great, practical truths. * * * Many of them are original, sparkling in wit, and good to remember."—Inter Ocean.

"The very process of finding fault with some of its always pithy and suggestive sentences, will help us to new and fresh gleams of thought."—Chicago Times.

"A thoughtful little book, to which we can turn with much pleasure and profit, although our tables are covered with gems of fine thought from the writings of the mighty dead, or the illustrious living. * * *

From the unsatisfactory, incarnate negation of the Emersonian Don Quixote, with his foreground of sophistries, and his background of selfishness, it is a pleasure to turn to the old-fashioned, frank, plain Aphorisms of Mr. Towne, with their Baconian ring and stamp. They remind us of the time when men were simple, when they spoke commonly in grand sentences, and had not reasoned treachery into a virtue. * * * In Mr. Towne's book there is no speaking according to precedent, no aim at tallying with a 'Cid.' Many of his Aphorisms are indeed the 'sum of long reflections,' and all of them are thought-provoking."—Unity.

"The Three Threes' is a social club of nine Chicago gentlemen, who dine together at stated intervals at a down-town restaurant. Meeting 'every ninth night after the first night of each and every of the nine months following the ninth month of the year,' and 'seated in threes at three three-legged tables,' these nine wise men of Chicago spend the evening in discussion. The drops which distil from their lips Mr. Towne has caught in this little book to the number of one hundred and sixty-two."—Literary World.

PRICE.—In silk cloth, gilt top and side stamp, $1.00.

For sale by leading booksellers, or will be mailed on receipt of price by the publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

Faith.

A SERMON BY REV. G. W. BUCKLEY, BATTLE CREEK, MICH.

"Trust in the Lord and do good."—Psalms."Believe and love—a believing love will relieve us of a vast load of care."—Emerson.

The word faith is one of the oldest and most significant in human speech. Its parentage is traced back as far as the very ancient Hindoo word "srad-dha," belief in the unseen. The Romans had "credo," from which comes our own creed. It has been invested with much mystery and undergone varied interpretation. What religious faith signifies to any age marks the intellectual and moral height of that age. It evidently is a variable quantity with the individual and the race. It is not the same in youth as in middle life; not the same, socially, in the morn as in the noontide of civilization. It is not the same in the same age with the priest as with the prophet; with the highest intellects and the multitude; not the same with the Israelites, relapsing into idolatry of the golden calf, so soon as Moses is absent, as with the great law-giver himself. Again, it is not the same with Moses as with Jesus; not the same with the church of St. Paul as that of the middle ages; nor with the Protestant churches of the reformation as with those of to-day.

The early son of earth will point to sacrifice, and offerings, and prayer, and various performances as evidencing faith. This is the ritual faith. Later faith becomes an intellectual condition. It takes the form of assent to human dogmas about the unknowable. This is the theological faith. Still later it takes the shape of a moral condition of the soul to be evidenced by rectitude of life. Faith becomes ethical.

But howsoever external and savage the worship, it was once the projection of the human soul; arose as high as the general condition would permit; was related to its needs as the environment of the lowest organism is to the organs. Time was when the shedding of blood on the altar of sacrifice was perhaps as sincere an offering to God as we may now believe the shedding tears of a "broken and contrite heart."

The history of mankind has familiarized us with the rising of individual genius above the age. As mountain peaks push up into an atmosphere much rarer than that of the plain, so there are souls which ascend to inspiration far purer than that of their contemporaries. They seem to be trustees of the great I Am, appointed to receive the statutes of truth and love; statutes flexible enough to provide for the infinite possibilities of the race. History has also acquainted us with this important fact, that the teachings or faith of these Alpine heights of religious consciousness undergo subsequent perversion and distortion, through ambitious children of organization, until, could they return to earth, each would indignantly "profess unto them," in the words of Jesus, "I never knew you, depart from me, ye that work iniquity." When the seer has gone, then the organizer and theologian comes—after Jesus, St. Paul; after St. Paul, Tertullian, Athanasius, Augustin. The sublimest affirmations of the spirit in flesh descending through smaller souls take their coloring, as the pearly rain-drops the impurity of each stratum of air through which they fall to earth. In time we have the superstition of the Catholic church of the middle ages, or the savagery of Calvinism.

The truth as it appears to Buddha, after his death, is presented as canonical scriptures, and upon these are built church discipline, and huge commentaries. Buddha becomes an idolized personality, worshiped as God, with increase of rites and ceremonies to clog the spirit. The religion of Zoroaster likewise loses its high character. By the third century of our era there were no less than seventy Persian sects, each claiming authority from the teachings of the Master. Artaxerxes, like another Constantine, assembled a general council of the Magi to fix definite articles of Zoroastrian faith. Conformity to these was then sought by prohibition of every other worship, by persecution of the adherents of foreign religion and the heretics at home.

The simple faith of Jesus in God, and the ideals of right, which had existed from the beginning, early began to sink behind an idolatrous worship of his own personality. St. Paul, with his great theological and organizing genius, inaugurated the movement away from the universal religion of the Master. Notwithstanding the frequent prominence given to the essentiality of practicing truth, righteousness and love, the saving faith ever involved with him the personal mediation of Jesus.

Paul had a profoundly earnest, and, to no small degree, catholic mind. He seems to have had much regard for individual liberty of conscience; but his subtle dialectics, especially about vicarious atonement and election, are the fountain-head of most of the theological controversy of after centuries. However, the early Christians generally made their lives stand for a higher faith than intellectual assent to propositions about the divine plan. They did, indeed, live by faith; for in the midst of a corrupt empire they exhibited a brotherly love, a meekness of spirit, a devotion to principle, a purity of life, seldom, if ever, surpassed for any considerable time by so large a sect of men.

But this faith faded away under the blighting influence of augmented power and wealth. It grew more and more dogmatic, signifying some opinion about Christ. There was Arianism, a near relative of modern Unitarianism. This found an opposite extreme in patripassianism; and ranged between these two were various other issues concerning the nature of Christ.

Thus we have, as in the history of the Persian religion, conflicting divisions in the church; and the opinion grows that uniformity in belief and worship is essential. Thence come different councils or synods with their authoritative promulgations of what shall be believed, until in 451 the council of Chalcedon declares as final the christology of the church to be Trinitarian.

Faith now becomes assent to what the church prescribes as the revealed truth of the Bible. One dogma is piled upon another, to obscure heaven's true light. But valiant Luther, wrestling with the devil in his cell at Erfurth, perceived that all the popes and cardinals on earth could not determine a lie to be truth. With him, and yet more with Calvin, faith, though still theological, stood more for an inner condition and less for outward performance. However, Luther, grand soul though he were, while protesting against the authority of Rome, appears the uncompromising stickler for subscription to propositions no enlightened protestant pulpit maintains to-day. The transubstantiation of the Catholic church—how absurd say we. But is it much more absurd than Luther's consubstantiation? The noble Swiss, Zwingli, more modern, proclaimed the bread and wine to be merely symbols; and for this difference of opinion Luther refused fellowship with him.

Notwithstanding the diversity of creed the Reformation brought about, the faith that saves must needs be theological,—assent to the declared opinion of some body of men about the divine discipline. Luther is credited with saying: "Hast thou sinned, then believe. Yea sin boldly, still more boldly believe. Though thou hast committed murder a hundred times, only believe a hundred times more."

Let us present again the three stages of faith in this wise: First, belief that there is a God, expressing itself through the early ritualism of sacrifice, offerings, and various objective forms. Second, belief about God, expressing itself through theology, or the authoritative opinions of a priesthood. Third, belief in God, expressing itself through the ethics of righteous being. This latter is the faith "formata," which is love and virtue.

The vast majority in Christendom have not yet outgrown the second stage. A few, rapidly becoming many, have caught the sweeter "incense of the breezy morn" of that final faith of "freedom, fellowship and character in religion."

Into the literature and the public worship of the day it is breathing itself more and more. The work to be done now is to transmute dogmatic faith into moral faith—transmute the faith in salvation through a particular belief about God, about one of his sons, about one of his inspired books, into faith in the saving power of a virtuous activity of the soul. In the spirit of the prophet, when he indignantly cried out in the name of the Lord, "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me?" Who hath required this at your hands to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations. Wash you, make you clean, cease to do evil, learn to do right,—in that spirit, the prophet of these days proclaims: "To what purpose are your confusing and unthinkable dogmas—your middle-aged, sixteenth century, or eighteenth century, theology? Make clean the heart within; wash in the everlasting fount of truth and love. Do any of the beatitudes of Jesus declare: Blessed are the Trinitarians, or the Unitarians; blessed are they that hunger and thirst after theology; blessed are the merciless; blessed are the war-makers; blessed are they that have been persecuted for theology's sake? Nay,—but blessed are the pure in heart; blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness; blessed are the merciful; blessed are the peacemakers; blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of Heaven.

So anxious has the selfish heart of man been to be saved and rewarded, that he must needs invent a scheme whereby may be cast upon one the burdens of all. Thus shall A escape the penalty of his lesser goodness, through greater goodness on the part of B. We have been far more anxious to be saved than to earn the right to be saved. Fenerbach may almost be forgiven for pronouncing the essence of religion to be covetousness.

Our whole civilization has been materialized by poverty of spiritual faith. In the disposition to look for reward and happiness to outward agencies, heaven itself has been a place for distributing among the saints the sinners' comforts and enjoyments on earth. Christian churches can be counted by thousands and thousands in the land; but need we better evidence of the want of true faith than the spectacle of mad gain, of unbridled cupidity, which we must bear witness to for several decades of political and social existence? We have faith in matter, not in spirit; faith in physical, not moral law; faith in the conservation of material, not of spiritual force; faith in steam, electricity and dollars, not in honesty, truth and love; faith in acts of congress, in protective tariffs, more than in the laws of God, and honest days' works. We have faith in temporary shifts and sharp practices, as though we could evade right and somehow escape the penalty. In private and public life; in business and politics, our conduct is dictated by immediate and not ultimate ends, by the evanescent interests of a brief existence on earth rather than by the enduring interests of life eternal in the universe, somehow and somewhere. A low ethics in the competition of private business is applied to the economy of a great state. Smartness in the politician magnetizes the voter more than goodness. National wealth, rather than national virtue, is the end of our policy. The true grandeur of the nation is not what Charles Sumner eloquently proclaimed it to be, the dispensation of justice, but the procurement of a surplus revenue. European war with murder and rapine is preferable to peace, if believed to increase the sale of our grain and wares. The balance of trade is infinitely more important than the balance of right. We have heard from the newspapers how the chaplain in the House of Congress in his opening prayer "thanked God that our silver and gold had multiplied;" but no report has yet come of thanks given for increased faith in the ideals of virtue, which live to perish never, whatsoever become of the surplus; whatsoever the rise and fall of empires in the womb of time.

The faith in monopoly and unjust combination, in craft and overreaching, is the faith that destroys, instead of building up, a nation—destroys the very ones themselves most actuated by it. The love of dollars and power rather than mankind early sowed the dragon's teeth from which have sprung a crop of evil agencies, hostile to our material, intellectual and spiritual development. In politics this moral skepticism has manifested itself in what log-rolling and bribery, what perjury, deceit and circumvention; what absenteeism; swapping and purchasing of votes; false representations of the conditions and needs of private enterprises; cunning and misleading adjustments of duties for special favor! What tortuosity of conduct and impairment of usefulness has it not caused to some of the most gifted of our statesmen?

The skepticism of moral cowardice and un-self-reliance seems to have enfeebled our whole civilization. Our education fails to instruct the young how to meet the highest responsibilities of life with the courage that overcomes resistances, and the resignation that submits without sulking complaint to the inevitable. The boys and girls have unusual metal who graduate from our schools and colleges fit for anything more than dress parade. The large majority of them have imbibed the idea that to get on in the world with the least possible work and discomfort is the end of life. The road to success commences with them at the top round of the ladder, rather than at the bottom; and if not started from the top they think themselves wronged, lose heart, sit down and rail at the world.

Our religion has been a burden-shifting theology, providing salvation by the easier way of dogma and rite, than that of unremitted striving of the spirit to overcome the flesh. There has been no end of professed belief about God; but practically we have acted as atheists. A New York financier is reported to have exclaimed on being reproached with sharp practice in Wall street: "Up town I endeavor to do my duty to God, the church and my family; but down town I have to take care of myself."

Because new churches are being built; because there may be religious revivals and more members added to the rolls; because some evangelists draw large crowds to their entertainments—does it signify a revival of spiritual faith in society, an outgoing of the human heart toward God, in a deeper love and practice of the moral verities? May it not rather indicate a revival of interest in the curious and antique; a revival of desire for social advantages; a revival of pride in church architecture? In the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians held a festival of homage to Apollo. The island of Delos was consecrated by the removal of all coffins containing human remains, and ancient observances of worship were revived. Nevertheless, there existed at Athens widespread impiety and self-seeking materialism.

And now let the central thought of the hour be this: the faith to be preached and practiced in these generations of men is faith in the moral sentiment, the voice of God in the soul, faith in the triumph of right over wrong, which makes our lives a daily song of the ideal world yet to come; which moulds us into justice, truth and love, bringing harmony with nature, man and God.

Faith is virtuous thought translated into action. Faith is that reverence for our higher selves which makes us doers as well as hearers of the word. Herbert Spencer maintains that the growth of an organism depends on the adjustment of internal processes to external processes. Well, let us say the growth of the soul is in proportion to the adjustment of the outward life to the moral sentiment. According to diversities of character, this moral sentiment in different individuals must needs express itself by different works. Only let it consecrate us in the direction of our bent. Have we a genius for trade, commerce, manufacturing, agriculture, building, invention; for law, medicine, divinity, teaching, journalism, literature, music or what not—let us be more intent on the merit of our work than the wages thereof. Whether employer or employe, whether leader or led, let the end be moral—the transmutation of the work and the dollars into better character and the amelioration of mankind; into charities for needy sons and daughters of earth, asylums, reformatories, home missions, educational institutions—into various deeds of love and instrumentalities for preventing and alleviating suffering, and promoting virtue among men.

Through the conscience, God declares himself to us not less in the market place than the church. We can worship

Him as truly, yea, more truly, in every honest transaction, in every errand of mercy, every kind word and act, every dispensation of justice, every allegiance to truth, in every self-renunciation, or virtuous aspiration,—more truly than in hymn singing, or praying, or preaching. The latter worship is only the means; the former is the end. May the one be an inspiration to the other unto salvation!

In place of the departing enthusiasm for a personal mediator to save us, we must have an enthusiasm for the eternal attributes of goodness, in fidelity to which Jesus offered the sacrifice of his young and richly endowed life. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for another." This is the working faith.

But there is also a passive faith, the faith of resignation, which shall greatly bless us, if happily we do find it. I do not mean that submissive fatalism which influences man to readily succumb to circumstance; but that sweet resignation which reconciles to the sorrows and adversities common to the lot of man, that sublime trust in the beneficence of God, which causes the soul to sink self in the vaster self of the universe, to subserve willingly its high end in the great sweep Godward. This is the faith which lives by adversity not less than by prosperity; which translates all sorrow and resistance into angels of God; which finds nourishment unto purification even in the death of the fairest flower of the household. This is the faith to walk under "sorrow's fire-whip," and believe it swung by the hand of God, lash us in whatsoever form it may—in death, in physical infirmity, in the limitations or resistances of heredity and outward circumstance, in the misunderstanding, betrayal or unjust censure of friends, in revilement and persecution for righteousness' sake. "By faith we understand, that the worlds have been framed by the word of God;" therefore would we have this faith most difficult to acquire, the faith that cries out "Though he slay me yet will I trust in Him;" "my strength and my Redeemer."

This working, submissive faith it is which makes saviors of the race; which will make saviors out of any of us in proportion as we have it. It is a transforming power. The soul that waxes strong in it is glorified and doth glorify. As the sun illuminates the physical world, producing such multiform growth, utility and beauty, so does this faith illuminate the soul, generating growth, and usefulness, and holiness among men. It transfigures the world without into poetry, truth and love. It is the harmonizer of self and the world; the subjecter of appetite and passion to the spiritual law. It is, indeed, what St. Paul defines it, "The giving of substance to things hoped for; the proving of things not seen;" for it beholds face to face the ideal future, and strives to make it into the present flesh. By this faith the just do live and attain immortality, for they "see," with the psalmist, "the end of perfection." The storm-cloud cannot be so thick but hope's telescope shall pierce it.

Years since, Fred Douglass was speaking in a large city on the wrongs and sufferings of his race. In despondent mood he portrayed for the colored man a hopeless future. The tall, gaunt, dusky form of old Sojourner Truth arose in the audience, and cried out: "Hold! Frederick, is God dead?" No, God lives, and all the manifold activities of matter and mind, nature's catastrophes, man's revolutions, his joys and sorrows, all the conflicts and contrasts of life are playing parts in the vast movement of fate centering in Himself, "for, certainly, our appetites here, be it of war, or peace, or hate, or love, all this is ruled by the sight above."

In varied forms and degrees has this faith been exemplified on earth—in the resignation and virtue of Epictetus under the lash of slavery; in the patience and purity of Marcus Aurelius, in his daily striving for self-mastery amid the temptations of absolute power in a corrupt age; in the saintly Fenelon, walking unspotted and loving in the immoral, hypocritical and skeptical court of Louis XIV; in Channing's piety and devotion to duty through many years of physical suffering; in the philanthropy of Wilberforce or Florence Nightingale; in the moral statesmanship of Solon, Cato, Gladstone, Sumner; in the steadfast service of human rights in the face of obloquy of Roger Williams, of Garrison, of Lincoln.

This is the faith which carries the crosses, and leads to the crosses of the world; which Socrates taught to the Greeks, and brought him the hemlock; which Jesus published to the Jews, and brought him the agony of Gethsemane; which made Saint Paul, and many another soul, count his thorn in the flesh for the glory of God. This is the old and the new faith that shall come again to baptize man unto eternal life. This is the Holy Ghost, the Comforter of Jesus, which shall return to sit in tongues of fire on the justified when his personality no longer overshadows our worship.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EDITOR OF UNITY: May I say one word on the subject of Jfs for parents. It seems to me that your contributor has omitted one that, to my mind, is very essential for those who "wish to do well by their children." Should she not have included: if you teach them to think and believe for themselves? Your paper (which I was very glad to receive) is the advocate of "freedom, fellowship and character in religion." Have not children as much right to absolute freedom of opinion as to freedom in other respects? but how seldom it is accorded!

Freedom is as essential as fellowship in religion—is, indeed, as it figures in your announcement, precedent of it. Yet, many parents, who above all things desire fellowship in religion with their children, never dream of allowing them that absolute freedom of opinion which is the first essential of true fellowship. A man because he has won his own freedom of opinion has no right to exact from his children the adoption of opinions because they constitute his own idea of freedom. Every child has a right, first to be taught to think, and, being able to think, to choose consciously his own opinions.

Free religionists who have themselves gained freedom seem to forget this. They bring their children up in the atmosphere of free religion, precisely as orthodox parents do in the atmosphere of orthodoxy, and look for fellowship with them as a consequence of similarity of opinion, whereas, to me, fellowship, to have any value, must be able, if necessary, to exist in the face of the possibility of other opinions.

In the same way, every progressive mind has a right to change in opinion; indeed, progress, in its very nature, implies change. And the earlier a child is taught to consider the opinions of others as not infallible, and to think out his own, the sooner he will be intelligently free—i.e., capable of choice, in which alone is freedom. No mind is free as long as it unhesitatingly accepts the opinion of any other without thought.

I hope F. E. M. will excuse this expression of opinion; the importance of my Jf must justify me. Yours truly, JANET E. REMTZ-REES.

EDITORS OF UNITY: I was glad to see Mr. H. Tambs Lyche's rebuke in the last UNITY. Surely Mr. Lyche puts it justly when he says, "Why teach a nation to do what in the individual we think wrong." In state affairs it is sometimes considered proper, for the sake of expediency, to do things which in pure ethics would be wrong; but I can see no good reason why a paper, which has for its object the teaching of high ideals in religion and ethics, should advocate such matters.

Besides, even on any grounds, it would seem in this particular case that forgiveness and forgetfulness would be the better policy. Yours truly,
G. M. ALVES.

HENDERSON, KY., July 25th, 1887.

No man however great is complete without a knowledge of other men and their achievements in his line.

A MONOPOLY in full possession of the field and able to fix its own prices is on the road to bankruptcy.

UNITY.

EDITORS:

JENKIN LLOYD JONES,

J. V. BLAKE, ... J. C. LEARNED,
W. C. GANNETT, . . . H. M. SIMMONS,
F. L. HOSMER, ... DAVID UTTER.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., PUBLISHERS,
175 DEARBORN STREET, CHICAGO.

Weekly: $1.50 per annum.

The date on the address label of every subscriber indicates the time to which the subscription is paid. Remittances are acknowledged by changing this date. No written receipts are sent unless requested. No paper discontinued without an explicit order and payment of all arrearages. Remit by draft on Chicago or New York or by postal or express order, payable to CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

Advertising, 6 cents per line; reading notices, 12 cents. Communications regarding advertisements should be addressed to LORD & THOMAS, 45 Randolph Street, Chicago.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Woman's Unitarian Association is one of the most forehanded of our western study organizations. It is already out with its next year's programme of study and its list of over two hundred members. The following is the order of studies:

SEPTEMBER 29.

Church of the Messiah, Mrs. E. A. West, Leader. Topic: "Temperance Work in the Liberal Churches."

OCTOBER 27.

Third Church, Mrs. E. E. Marean, Leader. Topic: "New Methods in Foreign Missions."

NOVEMBER 17.

All Souls Church. Sermon by Rev. Florence Kollock.

DECEMBER 22.

Unity Church, Dr. Leila G. Bedell, Leader. Topic: "Relation of Health to Religion."

JANUARY 26.

Church of the Messiah, Mrs. G. F. Shears, Leader. Topic: "The Wages of Sin."

FEBRUARY 23.

Third Church, Mrs. S. W. Conger and Mrs. C. H. S. Mixer, Leaders. Topic: "Contact with Children as an Educating Influence."

MARCH 23.

All Souls Church, Mrs. G. A. Follansbee, Leader. Topic: "Recent Controversies in the Roman Catholic Church."

APRIL 28.

Unity Church, Miss Florence Hilton, Leader. Topic: "Dean Stanley and the Broad Church Movement."

At the beginning of each meeting ten minutes will be devoted to a review of the current religious events of the month, in charge of Mrs. S. C. Ll. Jones.

The managers of the New Church Independent, the Swendenborgian monthly of this city, announce that if the necessary financial backing can be secured they will issue their periodical as a weekly, beginning in December, under the name of The New Christianity. Rev. S. H. Spencer, of Henry, Ill., is expected to take the chief editorial responsibility. While we cannot indorse the entire platform laid down in his prospectus, we cheerfully join hands with him over his second article:

Since pure or absolute religious truth is not attainable by finite minds, but only aspects of truth agreeable to individual genius and state, therefore soundness of doctrine is not to be determined by council or creed; and the new paper will strenuously maintain the sacredness of individual freedom and the rights of the individual conscience.

Philadelphia.—Mr. Mangasarian's last sermon before vacation gave "Five Reasons why we Fellowship with Unitarians."

The Unity Ethical Association in Camden has had a series of successful meetings, from which everybody is encouraged to proceed happily into the new season's work.

—Since coming here, Morse has made a bust of Emerson which is entitled to the consideration of art and literature alike as being a work of unusual expressiveness and beauty. Mr. Pearsall Smith, of this city, who is now abroad, has undertaken to introduce it into England. Mr. Smith is the gentleman who proposed Whitman's visit to England, and was prepared to accord him royal financial treatment while going and coming and while there. —I understand that Morse, who is still here, is to make the Emerson head for the Minneapolis church.

—Two Hebrew shoemakers have been fined under the law of 1794 for plying their trade on Sunday. It is a sad outrage upon human honesty.

—The Camden society propose publishing a monthly record as soon as the necessary plans can be matured. The opposition the church finds in Camden is mostly the result of misunderstanding, and as the local papers, though inclined to be fair, are inefficient in their reports, it is thought the community might be enlightened by the circulation of a periodical compend of liberal literature.

Sioux Falls, Dak.—The walls of our new church are going up rapidly. We purpose having a corner-stone service soon, and the children will take part in it. The church is after the plan of Mr. Powell's church in Topeka, but it is built of Sioux Falls jasper granite instead of wood. There will be a very high and spacious basement. There is also a large parlor, a kitchen, a minister's study and two large and handsome rooms over the parlor which will be fitted up for the minister, who may lodge there if he wishes. We still hope to have it done before cold weather. The little church we are now in is very much crowded.

—Mrs. Wilkes is busy, as usual. She preaches now every Sunday at Luverne. She recently preached a most eloquent and touching sermon in the prison chapel. Her subject was "Forgiveness," and her text, "Her sins which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much."

—Miss Putnam, of Meadville school, who is spending her vacation at Rock Rapids, will exchange with Miss Bartlett July 31.

—Our Sunday-school went on a picnic excursion to Spirit Lake, Friday, July 22.

—Mr. Hunting is now at his home in Des Moines. He delivered a Fourth of July oration at Luverne, which was said to be the finest thing of the kind ever heard there.

Boston Notes.—It is pretty well determined by the A. U. A. to start a mission in Japan as soon as the acceptable minister offers himself.

—The Liberal Christian Mission of Rev. Narcisse Cyr, to Paris, France, and its suburbs, promises to set an entering wedge in the hard theology of the French evangelists. Indeed, that theology is already breaking up. Truly, pure Christianity never seems to have a resting time.

—Large preparations are making at Weirs, N.H., to receive delegates to the grove meeting, and from the appearances and reports the managers will not be disappointed in the number of expected visitors.

—Rev. C. A. Bartol is an expert at rowing and sailing a boat at his seashore home, Manchester-by-the-sea, Mass. Rev. Chas. F. Dole is the expert in the same exercises at Bar Harbor, Me.

—Many more books are now sold than last year at the A. U. A. building for summer vacation reading. Some all the time to persons not Unitarians.

—Union services of our churches have a small attendance. Rev. Charles R. Weld, of Baltimore, filled last Sunday the pulpit of the First church.

—A good deal of enthusiasm is expressed this year in the churches of Boston and suburbs in the Grove meeting at Weirs, N. H., set down for next week. The success of the National Bureau of Unity clubs seems assured by the prominence to be given its lecturers at Weirs. Your Rev. J. Ll. Jones will be one of its heaviest advocates. E. R. B.

Dorchester, Mass.—The children of the First Parish are setting some good examples. They decide this year to give up their own picnic and give the money for it to city children who would not otherwise get a picnic. Some of the elders must have "caught on" to the idea, for the collection for the purpose came to more than $180. And not long ago the "True Helpers," the temperance society of this same school, reprinted a temperance story by Miss Phelps, as their tract,—"the very best story of the kind there is," said one who knows. Send to them for a copy, and see what you think.

Lactated Food

The Mother's Favorite.

Send for our Circular entitled

"LETTERS FROM MOTHERS,"

which contains a large number of letters, many of which say the life of their baby was saved by the use of LACTATED FOOD.

Read these letters and, if you wish, write to the mothers and get their opinion—every one will gladly answer

If your baby is not hearty and robust try it.

LACTATED FOOD

Is also a Perfect Nutrient for INVALIDS,

in either chronic or acute cases. Weak stomachs always retain and relish it. Thousands of Physicians recommend it as the best of all prepared foods. Unequalled in DYSPERPSIA.

150 MEALS for an INFANT for $1.00.

EASILY PREPARED. At Druggists—25c., 50c., $1.00

WELLS, RICHARDSON & Co., Burlington, Vt.

1887-BABIES-1887

To the mother of any baby born this year we will send on application a Cabinet Photo of the "Sweetest, fattest, healthiest baby in the country." It is a beautiful picture, and will do any mother's heart good. It shows the good effects of using Lactated Food as a substitute for mother's milk. Much valuable information for the mother given. Give date of birth.

Wells, Richardson & Co., Burlington, Vt.

FLY DUTCHER'S LIGHTNING KILLER. The most successful exterminator. Every sheet will kill a quart. Quick work. They die near the plate. Commence early and keep ahead of them. Five cents everywhere. Dutcher's Dead Shot.

$50 If you think of expending fifty or one hundred dollars in advertising send us a copy of your advertisement, and we will tell you (free of charge), what will be the best possible investment for you to make. Send 10 cents for our 176 page pamphlet.

Address, GEO. P. ROWELL & CO.'S NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING BUREAU, 10 SPRUCE STREET, NEW YORK.

POZZONI'S MEDICATED COMPLEXION POWDER. Imparts a brilliant transparency to the skin. Removes all pimples, freckles and discolorations. For sale by all first-class druggists, or mailed for 50 cts. in stamps by J. A. POZZONI, St. Louis, Mo.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY GOOD NEWS TO LADIES. Greatest Bargains in Teas, Baking Powder and PR. MUMS. For particulars address THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 21 & 23 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, AUGUST 6, 1887.

[NUMBER 23.]

EDITORIAL.

THE new church at Hinsdale, near Chicago, has asked W. C. Gannett to be its minister, and he has accepted the call. Happy church! happy minister! Indeed, how could either be said to be happy unless both were? This church is a bright, earnest movement in a delightful suburb. The leaders are Unitarians from Chicago, who wish thus to have their church make a home where they do. Mr. Gannett takes up the work unhindered by any fixed customs. Pastor and people will work out their aims together.

A PETITION, signed by seventy-four women graduates of the University of London, in favor of the extension of the Parliamentary franchise to women, has been sent to Sir J. Lubbock, M. P., for presentation in the House of Commons. That a woman has as much right to a vote per se as a man seems plain. That there are difficulties and dangers in all voting is equally plain. That certain peculiar dangers threaten the extension of suffrage to women is also equally plain. Hence we are glad of all signs that carefully educated minds are studying the subject.

As to the Jury System, it needs careful attention and study. That something should be done either with it or about it, is, if not plain, at least urgently suggested by many facts. On the one hand is the opinion which we have stated in another note. On the other hand, a paper, speaking of the melancholy trial and conviction of Jacob Sharp, in New York, says of the jury: "On an absolutely secret ballot they stood twelve for conviction at once. Not one of them hesitated, although the seeming flaw in the evidence had been urged upon their attention. And the fact inspires the public with a fresh confidence in the jury system. In fact, juries have done fairly well in this country of late." There are inherent difficulties and dangers in any system of criminal judgment, and it is probable that these lie in the same weaknesses of human nature that make the criminals; nevertheless one way may be more just and less dangerous than another. The subject is one that needs attention.

The subject of Federal aid to education is one of the questions of the hour. Our creed is very simple, namely, that, as we once heard a generous merchant say, "the money of the country must educate the children of the country"—and we care not at all whose the money is or where it is, or whose the children are or where they are. On this point The American has the following, which we think wise and right:

"The reservation to the states of the local functions which give each state a distinct and firm entity is consented to, on all hands. There is no American who is worth attention who desires to make such a nation as France, with the life of everything centered at Paris. Nor does any wise person wish to take from the states any function whose exercise in one way or the other, well or ill, concerns alone the people who reside in each one of them. The aggregate of the national functions is so great, and the importance of each so enormous, that it would be the height of folly to bring to Washington anything that can be safely and justly left at Harrisburg or Dover. But is education one of this class? What does more concern the nation? What more seriously imperils the people of Pennsylvania than the ignorance of the people in other states? The function of the "common defense" of the people we may take as the most natural and most unquestionable of those assigned to the nation, but it would be hard to prove that the preservation of the common intelligence of the people was any less important. If a foreign enemy may come in through Maine or California, and must be repelled by the arm of the general government, is it any less a matter of concern when ignorance and consequent menace to republican institutions invade us by way of Florida or Louisiana?"

"THE July Westminster Review contains an article on 'American Education.' The system is very thoroughly discussed, and its faults and virtues weighed. In the course of it note is taken of the alleged 'godlessness' of American schools, and in discussing this matter the writer makes the statement 'that the popular religion, though seldom openly attacked, is gradually, by the simple force of enlightenment, sinking into the position of a tolerated form of charlatanny, alongside the once respectable alchemy and astrology.'" This is worthy of note; though we should not call it "godlessness," but rather Immanuel, that is to say, the God-with-us of pure, simple and noble ideas of religion. Of course the common theology must fall into disrepute before growing science and education—OF COURSE! But a nobler religion takes its place. Apropos of this is the following from a correspondent: "Would it not be well, in presence of the astonishing controversy between Andover and the American Board, to make it plain that the basis of all Christian dogma is the belief that the Maker of mankind has, from the making of the first man, doomed the vast majority of His creatures to never ending torment; a thing absolutely incredible to any sane man who has not had it instilled into him from babyhood."

The Best of Everything, published by D. R. Goudie, 163 Washington Street, Chicago, having changed its dress and appearing now in regular newspaper form, issues a manifesto setting forth four special points that the editor means to urge. First, he wishes to sweep away "the present absurd, cumbersome, unjust and unbusiness-like custom of trial by jury," in place of which he proposes "a permanent court of well paid, intelligent, upright judges, appointed by and subject to the supreme authority of the state or nation." Secondly, he says, "We want a new system of taking the vote in all elections, city, state, and national. . . . The methods of business and legal procedure that did well enough for a nation of two millions of homogeneous people do not serve the interests of sixty millions, made up of all nations, creeds and tongues." Thirdly, the editor means to advocate boards or courts of arbitration to decide disputes between employers and employed. Fourthly, and not least, he says, "We want the absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic as soon as the people are sensible enough to realize that it is, par excellence, the curse of the world, the producer of eight-tenths of all the ignorance, poverty, vice and crime that exist in our country." These are brave aims for a newspaper, either weekly or daily, and Mr. Goudie sets them forth in the most uncompromising way.

TOUCHING the mooted point of legalized arbitration and courts for the same in labor disputes, The Best of Everything has the following paragraph, which is worthy of thought: "It has always appeared to us as exceedingly strange that we had the power to force our neighbor into court over a dispute in reference to property that might not involve a value of ten cents, and compel him to abide by the decision of the judge or jury before whom we appeared. That we could force him before the same tribunal for a single remark in disparagement of our character or standing as a citizen, and that he would be compelled to abide whatever penalty the said court might see fit to impose upon him; while thousands of workmen had no court before which they could bring their employer, although the whole living of themselves and little ones were involved in the contest; nor had the employer a tribunal to which he could appeal, no matter how unjust, tyrannical and arbitrary the walking delegate might be. Such a state of affairs is a scandal and reproach to our common sense; it is unbusiness-like and unjust to both employer and employe. Absolute freedom of contract is all very well in its way, but the trouble is, that it never has, does not now, and never will exist in the business and manufacturing world; brute force, in one shape or another, and on one side or the other, has carried the day in almost every dispute which has been decided outside of the law courts."

THE beautiful charity called "The Fresh Air Fund" is now making its first appearance in Chicago. The Daily News has undertaken the collection and application of the funds with the co-operation of the officers of the Charity Organization Society, especially the executive care of Secretary W. Alex. Johnson, and the money is coming in handsomely. The object of the charity, as every one knows, is to give poor children and very young children with their mothers the advantage of a visit to the country for some days or weeks. In some places the charity is called The Country Week. Always it is hailed with enthusiasm everywhere, as it deserves to be, and it has done great and beneficent service in Boston, New York, Cincinnati and other places. No doubt it will now become a permanent summer charity in Chicago. The money, as we have said, is forthcoming plentifully. The pressing need now is some families in the country who will receive one or more children for a couple of weeks. Who of our friends living within two hours by railroad of Chicago, willing to take these little ones, will send in their names to W. Alex. Johnson, Sec. of the C. O. S., 116 La Salle Street, Chicago? Time and need presses. Let charitable hearts speak quickly. Fear not. You will find yourselves as much blest as the children. The experience in the east has been that families who thus have opened their doors once have found the experience so delightful that they have been eager to do it and anxious to get the children the next year.

ALREADY we have expressed ourselves carefully, feelingly, loyally, and, we hope, fraternally towards all, on the question of giving back the battle flags. We are sorry to see that a Union soldier who has been serving as a pension examiner in Cincinnati has been turned out of office because in a private party of friends he confessed the same view that we hold. We said a party of friends, but there was present either one loose-tongue or one false friend at least; for the man's opinion was telegraphed to Washington, and his dismissal instantly ordered. On this fact the American very justly says that if the offender "had taken any public occasion to denounce Mr. Cleveland's action, his dismissal would have been condoned because of his impropriety. But the private expression of his opinion in moderate terms is something for which a free citizen of a republic is responsible to nobody. It is a distinct attempt to import monarchical ideas into our system, when such an utterance is made the ground for a removal from the public service. On the monarchical theory the official is the personal servant of the sovereign, and must show all the deference which is employed in personal service. In our system he is the servant of the public, and there can be no adequate reason for his removal which does not connect itself with the public interests. The public have an interest in having the chief magistrate treated with proper courtesy by his subordinates on all public occasions. But it is not their interest to have those subordinates coerced into a suppression of their personal opinions, under such penalty as this. And its interests are not served by having any head of department dismiss a subordinate without a hearing, however grave the charges brought against him."

Was It Honest?

In a recent number of the Critic appears the following:—

"A knowledge of books, if only of their outsides, is a valuable thing to possess. A well-known bibliophile, browsing in a second-hand bookstall a few weeks ago, picked up a little volume from the ten-cent counter. To the looker-on he showed no excitement, but his heart was beating like a trip-hammer as he slowly put on his spectacles and turned to the title-page of the book. Then he glanced through it leaf by leaf, fumbled about in his pocket for a ten-cent piece, dropped it into the palm of the keeper of the stall, and walked home with the book in his hand: he couldn't trust it to his pocket. When he got to the little room where he lodges, he sat down and again turned the pages carefully. This time he was alone, so he could let a smile of satisfaction play without restraint upon his face, and his gray eyes twinkled brightly through his spectacles. He kept the book all night to gloat over, and the next day sold it to a wealthy bibliophile for $500!

Was it honest? We confess we think it dishonest, and dishonesty of just so much the more sad and blameworthy kind as it is connected with the domains of thought, literature, and scholarship, where, if any where, honest dealing should find especial fellowship and be cherished most carefully. Yet we have reason to know that this act is no isolated case. We remember being confounded years ago when a very eminent scholar in this country told us, with a triumphant laugh, of his purchase of a copy of Wetstein's New Testament. That is a rare book, selling, when found at all, for about $30; yet this scholar happening to light on a copy whose owner was ignorant of its value, carried it off for $7, gloating over his bargain. Again we ask, Was it honest? Sometimes the true character of an act will appear most plainly by setting it against its exact opposite,—as foul air, to which we have grown used and insensible, becomes apparent to us when once we get our heads outside of it and draw a deep breath of the pure atmosphere. Beside the foregoing acts, we will place the act of a poor man of which we were informed. He purchased a special book from a dry goods merchant after haggling about the price; but the next day he returned and laying down three shillings on the merchant's desk, said: "I sold the book for more than I thought I could when I beat down your price yesterday; here is your share of it." Now how do the two kinds of acts look against each other? Which is the honest one, the act which each of the two scholars did without scruple, or the act of the poor book-dealer? And from whom ought we to have expected the most enlightened and delicate honesty, from the second-hand book-dealer or from the scholar?

But there is another question about these scholars' act. Was it dignified? Supposing for a moment it be called honest as trade goes, still, was it noble, high-minded? We say No! As to the point of honesty, let traders dispute as they will. We know all about the arguments on the business side. We have been all over the poor, shambling reasoning a hundred times. We have not the space, nor indeed the heart, for it just now. But on the point of the nobility and personal dignity of the act in question, we will spend a word, and say plainly that it is ignoble, undignified and supine, for two strong reasons at least. First, the act which these scholars were guilty of was neither more nor less than the getting of something for nothing; and this is a deed which we have characterized over and over again in UNITY as a mean, base, fraudulent thing. We shall say it a hundred times yet! we would like to say it till the air rang with it. If there be a disease with which the world is sicker than it is with that base sickness of trying to get something for nothing, we know not what to name it. It passes us to understand how a man can hold anything in his hand for which he has given no equivalent of any kind, and not only feel happy in having the thing but actually gloat over the fact of having gotten it for nothing.

Secondly, the act of the two scholars was a mean one because it took advantage of ignorance. To wring things from other hands as alert, strong and cunning as our own, has at least some show of credit in it, and even possibly the charm of agile dexterity; but merely to prey on ignorance, as when these two scholars took advantage of their unlettered fellow men, is an act bigger in size but no better in quality, as we can see, than stealing a blind man's pennies or robbing a cripple. Ah! poor human justice! Many a wretched fellow has gone to prison for an act less mean and more tempted,—yes, and less hurtful to society, than the act which the scholars did, with few men, we fear, to say them nay!

J. V. B.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Experience.

I knew that thou wouldst fail—
Oh! I knew it!
Dost thou recall the day—
Alas! that so I rue it,
And all my heart again doth quail!—
When on thy bosom I did lay
My head, and ask, almost in dream,
This question—What the deepest joy doth seem?
Then answered I—not waiting thee,—
With the still quickness of a dream,
Half thought, half speech, as in a dream—
“My incommunicable bliss
That filleth me is this, is this,
That I love thee.”
But answered thou—
I hear thee now—
“Nay, not so, nay,
But this I say,—
The dearest joy to me
Is to be loved by thee.”
How all my heart in me did quail!
Then I knew that thou wouldst fail.

J. V. B.

The Unitarian Review.

If UNITY before this has not given special mention to the Unitarian Review since it passed into the strong hands of Rev. Joseph Henry Allen as editor, it is not because we failed to hail Mr. Allen's editorship in our minds or were insensible to the growing value of the Review. But perhaps we are a little glad that we have delayed till now a special article, because we have so noble a number as that for July for our text and occasion. Of Mr. Allen himself we need not speak. His broad and varied scholarship stands among the foremost in the Unitarian fold, and, for that matter, in any fold. His wide mental sympathies bring the man to the aid of the scholar. His peculiar historical training and uncommon power of actually himself living in and reproducing the life of any epoch which he studies, and his previous experience in editing the Christian Examiner (the cessation of which we have never ceased to lament as a loss to Unitarian scholarly development),—all these qualifications set the editing of the Review in a high place in giving it into his hands. As to the Review, we want to say strongly that it is taking on a very noble tone indeed; of which fact the July number is a happy example. It opens with an article by Doctor Hedge on the subject of “Feudal Society”—an article worth studious reading. By way of introduction to a graphic page which we wish to quote, we will say that the article begins with the statement that in history there is properly no beginning, since we can find no time when civil society was absolutely new. Then, if no beginning, so history shows no decline. There has been no halt in the march of humanity, nor even a retreat. If there seem to be an arrest, it is only as the winter seems to arrest vegetation, but really rests, not arrests. Thence, feudalism is not an absolutely new product, but must be studied in its source in the German tribes which overran the Roman empire. By this study the vassalage, the war element, the knights, the peculiar position of woman, which are the salient points of the feudal system, are explained. Doctor Hedge treats interestingly of the separative tendency of the feudal system which spread power broadcast. He says that the king was merely one noble among many, with perhaps more numerous vassals and a court, but with no more actual power than many of the barons of his realm; and he traces to this tendency the rise of the country in national polity over capital cities, such as Athens, Rome, Sparta, Carthage, of which, in the earlier civilization, the countries were mere dependencies. Chivalry, Doctor Hedge says, was the application of Christianity to the business of arms, associated with the old German reverence for women. Now for the graphic page of details which we wish to quote. Doctor Hedge says that the chivalric life of feudalism is not brilliant on close inspection, but more like theatrical illusions, dispelled by a peep behind the scenes. This he enforces by the following description of the household conveniences and manners. Readers of “Ivanhoe” will recall a similar testimony in that novel, though not so much at length. Doctor Hedge says: “The floor was usually covered with straw or with rushes, not too often renewed, and harboring fragments of food and all manner of impurities. Our fine lady's wardrobe and household appointments, though not wanting in jewels and other splendors for festive seasons, were lamentably deficient in what are now regarded as the necessities of life. She had no stockings to her feet, most likely no cloths to her table, possibly no sheets to her bed. If she had handkerchiefs, the supply was exceedingly limited, consisting of one or two for state occasions, and none for common use. She had no accommodations for sitting in her bower, except perhaps a stone seat in the embrasure of the window and her bed. Chairs were unknown. At meals the company sat on rude wooden benches around coarse wooden tables. Waiters were abundant, but the table furniture was scanty and vile to a degree very shocking to modern sensibility. A few pieces of plate, hereditary or plundered, graced the tables of the wealthy; but the dishes were mostly wooden trays, and the plates or trenchers were of the same material. The custom of a plate to each person was a luxury undreamed of. One plate for two was the utmost allowance; and, at festive entertainments, the gallantry of the age contrived to couple the sexes, so that each gentleman should share his plate with a lady. In the novel of “Launcelot du Lac,” a lady whom her jealous husband had compelled to dine in the kitchen complains that it is a very long time since any knight has eaten off the same plate with her. Gentleman and lady have a plate between them, but no fork. The fork is altogether a modern invention. Knightly and fair fingers came into primary relations with boiled and roast,—a fashion more primitive than nice, especially when we add the absence of napkins.”

In concluding the article Dr. Hedge says nobly: “The conditions may change, but the problem of life is ever the same. In every age, the problem for the individual is how to make the most of a day,—to fill up the given mould of existence with an adequate flow of conscious life. . . . Historic progress is not of men, but of man. Individuals are relatively no wiser and no better from age to age; but humanity advances all the while with sure and steady pace.” But we hope and think that if there be no wiser individuals than in the old times, yet surely there are a greater number of wise ones.

The article by Rev. C. F. Dole on “The Voluntary System in the Support of Churches,” is not only very interesting and very well done, but of a high nobility of tone. What a ring for truth and fellowship has the following: “In a church, all are supporters together according to their means, and all are equal beneficiaries. Neither, again, is it a true church when you gather the rich by themselves, howsoever you contrive by subtle barriers to exclude the poor, or however you contribute to support a mission church around the corner. A fashionable church! What would Jesus Christ have thought of such an anomaly? As though he ever contemplated any church that was not the expression of the missionary spirit! A church of the respectable! What respect would Jesus have had for its smooth self-complacency?”

Other articles we must pass over for lack of space, just expressing our pleasure in the broad-minded editorial article on the “Western Opportunity,” in which Mr. Allen says plainly that the western opportunity for a high and pure religion is not to be judged "by anything we have known of theological motives and controversies familiar to us in older communities." We wish to say a warm word, though we have but a little space left, for the department of the Review called "The Editor's Note Book." This is distinguished in this number, as we have had occasion to observe in other numbers, by the widest and most heart-felt devotion to humane causes and questions. Mr. Allen discusses in, to us, a very wise and impressive manner, the appalling facts which he groups under the title "Crime as a Political Factor." Also there is a discussion of fresh aspects of the labor question called out by sundry books, the most notable being the recent translation of Karl Marx. Following this is a discussion longer still, and very interesting for facts as well as wise in views and warm in spirit, entitled "Industrial Arbitration." From this editorial department we quote the following concerning such facts as the crimes in Ireland and among our own anarchists: "However we judge the particular case, the fact that strikes sharpest is the existence of crime, ferocious and sanguinary, unaccompanied by any sense of guilt. It is like the horror of a battlefield, where the furious effort to maim and kill is unchecked by mercy or remorse,—unimpelled, too, by personal animosity or hate, so that, the battle over, each is equally eager to bind up the other's wounds. It is, in a way, one deep mystery of our moral nature; but, in another way, it is a fact that meets us under all sorts of disguises and at every turn. Whether in war, or in party politics, or in the social struggle, men continually do or consent to deeds which as private acts they shrink from and abhor. 'Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?' But he will do it at the very next bidding of a party leader, in the next emergency that gives him a pretext for casting off his private sense of right in favor of what has the sanction of political antipathy and passion." We would like to quote more, especially from the discussion of Arbitration, but have no space. The Review ends with its departments of "Critical Theology" and "Literary Criticism," of which we need not speak. If the Review goes on like this—and why should it not in Mr. Allen's hands?—it will go through deep seas and leave a shining wake. It ought to be in all Unitarian households; to help which distribution, so far as we have influence, is one reason for this article, but a still greater reason is our delight in the tone and power of the Review.

J. V. B.

Kitchen Windows.

Sure, ma'am, I could niver engage to ye; the kitchen is too small for me comfort at all and intirely." With this, my girl, with recommendations from a dozen last employers, majestically departed.

That my kitchen was small had not before ever suggested itself to me, although I had worked in it many a month. So it happened that Miss Bridget O'Hauty-Tauty's words set me thinking.

Much of my work in the kitchen is done either by the window or the open door; and as I live in an up-stairs flat, my window and door give me a good long look far down the street. As I look out I see two trees, an aspen and a cottonwood. Very early in the season the first delicate green of the new foliage steals over my trees; and the summer through they wave and nod in a friendly way. They seem to scrub and rub with me, and to iron and bake. They shake and rustle and grow green and full, until at last the fall winds strip them; then the graceful network of branches seems penciled against the sky like some beautiful arabesque on the front of heaven's blue portal.

As I sit at my ironing-table in hot summer days, it is no fancy, real coolness comes over to me from those two trees, a block away,—coolness and peace and quiet pleasure, borne on the subtle lines of that great invisible, intangible something we call spirit, which links the farthest star to the tiniest speck in space.

